

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2023 with funding from Kahle/Austin Foundation

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOLUME FOUR

1910-1911

FROM OCTOBER 15, 1910 TO APRIL 8, 1911, INCLUSIVE

COPYRIGHT, 1910-1911

NEW YORK
THE AMERICA PRESS

73203

1910/11

INDEX

VOLUME IV—OCTOBER 15, 1910 TO APRIL 8, 1911, INCLUSIVE

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
A FTER Many Days	89	Briand, M. The Railroad Strike, 52; His		Classics, New Fashions in Teaching the....	498
Alexandria, New See.....	71	Cleverness, 387. (See France.)		Cleary, Bishop of Auckland	455
All Souls	77	Bridge Across the Hudson, 1; St. Louis, 167;		Clune, Rt. Rev. Dr., Appointed Bishop.....	407
Alsace-Lorraine. Chronicle....	244; 436; 484;	Hell Gate,	578	Cluny's Thousandth Year	30
Altoona Parochial Schools	45;	British Colonies. (See Great Britain.)		Collier, Price. Irreligious Schools in France.	422
American and English Speech. (Ed.)....	237	British Guiana: Catholic Schools, 61. (See		Columbus Day Celebrations	25
American Commonwealth, The	318	also Correspondence.)		Columbus Day and the Puritans. (Ed.)....	64
American Men of Science	288	British Honduras: In San Felipe.....	448	Commonwealth, The American	318
American Students in Rome	285	Brownson, O. A., Memorial.....	144; 167	Communism for Children, Holy	198
Anderson, S.C., Church Dedication.....	71	Buddhism	(1) 464; (2) 487	Concordat, Spanish	8
Anglican Church Congress	70	Buenos Aires: Irish Passionists.....	598	Confirmation, A. (Associations Cultuelles.)	279
Anglicans, Anglican Misrepresentation (Ed.),		Burroughs, John: On Scientific Faith	581	(Ed.)	279
63; The Courage of Conviction. (Ed.)....	88			Congo State: Chronicle, 435; Atrocities.....	565
Anglo-Saxon Myth	382	C AGE Masts on Battleships	216	Congregationalists	119
An Old Lady Worth Remembering.....	281	Campolide, Dungeons of. (Ed.).....	112	Congress, Sixty-second, Opening	601
Anti-Modernist Oath	558	Canada. Chronicle: 2; 26; 51; 74; 98; 122;		Consecration St. Patrick's Cathedral, N. Y....	22
Apostles Without Pay. (Ed.).....	159	146; 170; 195; 218; 242; 266; 292; 313;		Constance, Daughter of Joseph de Maistre....	281
Apostolic Delegate for Canada	142	337; 338; 362; 385; 386; 410; 434; 458; 482;		Convert Clergymen: Dr. McGarvey on.....	88
Apponyi, Count. (Ed.).....	433; 458; 471;	506; 530; 554; 578.....	602	Converts Ordained Priests	262
Arason, John, Hero of Iceland	513	Trade with U. S., 26; 385; Caughnawaga,		Corby, Rev. William, C.S.C. Gettysburg Monu-	47; 74
Archæology. Christian	225	29; Protest Against Mayor Nathan, 51; To-		Corporation Tax	553
Argentina. Chronicle: 316; Schools in 17th		ronto's New Seminary, 94; New Apostolic		Courage of Conviction, The. (Ed.).....	88
Century, 213; Irish Passionists, 598; Italians		Delegate, 142; Patois, 177; Immigration,		"Credo" of Dante, The	521
(Ed.), 592; New Triple Alliance (Ed.), 17.		311; Priests, Ministers and Politics (Ed.),		Cremation in a Cornish Parish	237
(See also Correspondence.)		424; Working Women, 520. (See also Econ-		Cuba. Chronicle	291
Arkansas, Warship	337	omics, Sociology.)		Current Literature. Insulting Cartoon. (Ed.)	87
Army, Catholics and the	511	Canalejas	41; 64; 112; 496; 556; 582
Art. John La Farge, 16; 216; Mosaics in		Canals of Mars	239	D ANCE of the Moors	546
Santa Maria Maggiore, 428; John La Farge's		Cardinal and the Wizard, The. (Ed.).....	470	Daily Newspaper, Catholic	266
Collection, 548; Art Dealers Fined.....	602	Caricatures, Protests Against	36	Danish West Indies. Chronicle	244
As a German Critic Sees Us. (Ed.).....	280	Carnegie. Peace Fund	241; 272	Dante, The "Credo" of	521
Associations Cultuelles. (Ed.).....	270;	Carter's Lectures in Boston, Dr.....	432	D'Annunzio. (Ed.)	494
Auckland, Bishop Cleary	455	Catholic Church. In Denmark, 32; Foe of Edu-		Darius Green. (Ed.)	327
Australia. St. Mary's Cathedral, Sydney, 430;		cation? 55; Defections in the United States.		Deaths in Shooting Season	194
Bishop Clune, 407; Catholic Progress, 469;		438		Decrees and Encyclicals of 1910.....	93; 309
Catholic Education	591; 596	Catholic Daily Newspaper. (Ed.).....	327	Decrees of S. Congregations: Studies for Nov-
Austria. Chronicle: 172; 196; 295; 316; 340;		Catholic Encyclopedia, Vol. IX.....	142	ices, 93; Against Ecclesiastics in Business,
364; 388; 412; 436; 460; 484; 508; 532; 556;		Catholic Growth, Jealousy of.....	103	286; Safeguarding Marriage (Ed.)	616
Emperor, 316; Ministry, 316; 340; Navy,		Catholic Press, Central Bureau, 463; In Ger-		Defections from the Church. (in U. S.)....	438
388; Crown Prince Rudolph, 520. (See also		many (Ed.), 424; Bishop of Jaca.....	621	Democracy's First Great Triumph.....	150
Correspondence.)		Catholic Protectories. (Ed.).....	378	Denmark: Catholic Church	32; 188
Aversa, Most Rev. Joseph, Nuncio.....	598	Catholic Schools and Colleges. (See Education.)		Diaz, President, Cabinet Resignation, 578;
Aviation: Chavez, 12; International Balloon		Catholic Sisterhoods	550	Turning from Diaz (Ed.), 185. (See also Race, 50; Another Trent Affair, 65; Tri-		Catholic Societies: Women in Uruguay, 107;		Mexico Chronicle.)
umphs and Mishaps, 73; Accidents, 119;		St. Vincent de Paul, 159; 232; Chile, 166;		Divorce, Nevada's Shame. (Ed.).....	519
Morality of, 365; New Records, 410; Hydro		Probation of New York, 527; Young Men's		Divorce at Auction. (Ed.).....	376
Aeroplane	482	Planned, 598. (See Federation; Sociology.)		Dix, Governor, at Catholic Protectory.....	453
		Catholic University, Washington. New Edu-		Dolliver, Jonathan P.	26
		cational Review	165	Domestic versus Foreign Affairs. (Ed.)....	304
B ACKSLIDING Catholics. (Ed.).....	590	Catholic Writers	197	Dominican, A Great, Bishop Benevente. (Ed.)	88
Ballestrem, Count von	342	Catholics. Numerical Increase. (See Statis-		Dominican Sisters in Louisiana, Golden Jubi-
Ballinger, Secretary. Resignation	530	tics.)		ilee	119
Banana Blight. Central America	506	Catholics and Socialism. (Ed.)	377	Dooley, Very Rev. Peter, V.F.....	599
Barry, John. Statue	360	Catholics and the Army (U. S. A.).....	511	Doyle, Edward H.	456
Base Proselytism. (Ed.).....	186	Catholics and the Labor Unions.....	299	Dramatic Incident, A. (Pombal; Jesuits)....	179
Battle of the Tongues	389	Catholics in Convention: Review 1910. (Ed.)		Dramatic Notes: "La Samaritaine," 600; "The
Baumgartner, Alexander, S.J.....	10	352		Easiest Way"	621
Barcelona, Social Week in	215	Catholics in Government Service. (Ed.)....	186	Draper and Religious Instruction, Mr.....	413
Bavaria, 148; Passion Play	182	Catholics in U. S., Census of. (Ed.).....	470	Draper, Commissioner. Report on Education.
Beginnings of Italian Socialism.....	174	Caughnawaga, Canada	29	(Ed.)	447
Belgium. Chronicle: 100; 147; 219; 244; 294;		Census Frauds, 51; New York	186	Drennan, Rev., M.A.....	23
315; 508; Socialism in Ghent, 158; a Liège		Census Statistics of Catholics in U. S. (Ed.)		Driesch, Hans. Biology	175
Socialist; First Communion of Children, 219;		470		Drummond, Rev. L. H., S.J.....	503; 520
Battle of the Tongues, 389. (See also Cor-		Centennial, New Orleans, Ursulines	359	Duchesne, Mgr.....	441 respondence.)		Central Information Bureau for Catholic Press		Duveen Brothers. Art Dealers	602
Belmont Abbey	71	Central America: Chronicle, 362; 506; Banana		Dynamite Disaster in New Jersey.....	410
Benevente, Rt. Rev. Fray M., O.P.....	88	Blight	506
Requests: Kellner, Rev. John A., 24; Kuhn,		Chamizal Territory Dispute	472	E ARLY New York Catholic Free Schools.
Katherine M. B., 599; O'Mahoney, Frances		Charitable Organizations, Catholic	159; 232	(Ed.)	42
A.	406	Charity to the Foreign Missions. (Ed.)....	446	Ecclesiastical Review. Dr. McGarvey on Con-
Beuron, Emperor William at	172; 244	Cheverus, Bishop, Anniversary	94	vert Clergymen	84
Bible, Protestant. (Ed.).....	613	Chicago's Catholic Growth	262	Ecclesiastical Year (1910), The, in U. S.,
Bi-centenary of Mobile.....	453; 497	Child Welfare Exhibit	366; 392; 414	England, Ireland	309
Bid for Peace, A. (Ed.).....	568	Children, Church Services for, 452; Holy		Economic Contradiction, An. (Ed.).....	158
Bigotry Again. (Ed.).....	495	Communion	198	Economics:
Biology	175	Chile: New Triple Alliance (Ed.), 17; Cath-		Meerschmum Industry, 22; Commerce Changes
Bismarck's Memoirs	432	olic Social Congress, 166; Her New Presi-		in U. S., 46; Railroad rates, 46; Water
Blumensaat, Rev. H., S.J., Memorial.....	192	dent, 421; Transandin Railway.....	506	Supply for Los Angeles, Cal., 70; Imports
Bohemia: Chronicle.....	100; 148; 172; 244	China: Diminished Imports, 165; Chinese		from Tropics, 70; Manitoba's Rat Inva-
Boicottaggio. (Ed.).....	494	Trust Pigtail Holocaust, 508; Plague, 508;		sion, 94; Fall in Consols, 94; Coal Discov-
Boonaventure, Mother M.....	360	Opium Trade, 563. (See also Correspond-		eries in England, 94; Artificial Coal, 94;
Books for Christmas	234	ence.)		Increase in Imports, 118; Causes of High
Books on Education	165	Chorus Against Electivism	102	Prices, 119; Crops and Prices, 121; Potash
Boston: Columbus Day and the Puritans		Christ or Anti-Christ	461	Exports, 121; Reciprocity with Canada, 142;
(Ed.), 54; Federation Catholic Societies....	430	Christian Archeology	225	Welland Canal, 142; Imports to Japan and
Boundary Dispute: Peru and Ecuador.....	2;	Christian Ruler, A. (Emperor William.)		China, 165; Vineyards in France, 165; Im-
Boys, Homes for. (Ed.).....	399	(Ed.)	208	ports from Canada, 191; Europe's Wheat Im-
Branly, Prof., Honored	411	Christian Science	206	ports, 191; Foreign Postage, 214; Marconi
Brazil: Hierarchy, 47; Future, 301; Nuncio,		Christmas Greeting. (Ed.).....	254	Messages, 214; Cherbourg Pilotage, 214;
598; Statue to Dom Pedro II, 602; New		Christmas Presents Among Books	234	Pullman Rates Reduced, 214; Chinese Trust,
Triple Alliance (Ed.), 17; Meeting at Rio		Christmas, St. Vincent de Paul's. (Ed.)....	232	238; New Atlantic Cable, 263; Mexico's de Janeiro (Ed.).....	186	Church and the Age of Mankind, The.....	528
Brent, Margaret, Suffragette.....	224; 264	Church and the Suicide, The. (Ed.).....	520
		Church and Politics, The. (Ed.).....	591
		Church Services for Children	452

Plant in Sweden, 287; Pacific Coast Trade, 287; Canals in Germany and Switzerland, 287; Increase in Land Values in N. Y., 334; Seine Improvements, 334; Industrial Waste, 335; English Capital in U. S., 358; Luxuries not Prosperity, 358; Alcohol from Sisal Hemp, 383; Irish Exports, 383; Local Option in Ireland, 383; Trade in Pacific States, 430; Piece Work Problem, 430; Canadian Reciprocity, 454; Japan's Domestic Troubles, 454; Wirelans in Alaska, 454; Forest Destruction, 477; Italian Civil Service, 477; British Board of Trade, 502; Tobacco in Ireland, 502; Timber in British Columbia, 526; Internal Combustion Engines for Ships, 551; Desiccated Bananas, 551; Consumption of Beer in Germany, 551; Catholic Poles in Louisiana, 551; State Railways in Japan, 575; Steel and Iron in Japan, 575; Cunard Company and Canada, 599; Doping Wild Horses, 599; Nursery Stock Importation in Canada, 599; Chicago Tunnel, 599; Exports and Imports in Belgium, 623; Coal Mine Strikes in British Columbia, 623	287 287 287 334 334 358 358 383 383 383 430 430 454 454 477 477 502 502 526 551 551 551 575 575 599 599 599 623 623
Ecuador, Boundary Dispute, 2; 541. (See also Correspondence.)	541
Eddy, Mrs. M. B. G. Death, 193; (Ed.)	207
Edison, Mr., on the Mind. (Ed.)	470
Editor, A Great (Veuillot)	536
Education and Religion
Teaching Morality in Public Schools, 70; Religion in Schools, 129; Hostility to Parochial Schools, 237; Protestant Minister Champion, 333; Irreligious Schools in France, 278; 422; Mr. Draper, 413; 447; Catholic Schools Save Money for the State, 429; Church Services for Children, 452; Moral Phases Discussed by the Independent , 524; Juvenile Crime in Chicago, 514; Religion in Prussia	70 129 237 333 278 422 413 447 429 452 524 514 548
Education (Catholic)
Resolutions of Knights of Columbus, 21; Early N. Y. Free Schools, 42; Altoona Case, 45; 237; And the Catholic Church, 55; Catholic Schools in British Guiana, 61; Secret of Catholic Educational Influence, 81; Decrees of S. Congregation on Studies for Novices, 93; Prizes for Parish School Pupils, 118; Attendance at Jesuit Schools, 165; A New Educational Review, 165; Philadelphia Parochial Schools, 190; Catholic Papers for School, 213; Discipline in Argentina, 17th Century, 213; Watching Hostile Legislation, 261; French Catholics, 136; 333; Sisters of Charity, Kentucky, 333; Rhodes Scholarship California Student, 357; Advanced Training Schools, 405; Novel Greek Society, 405; Archbishop O'Connell and Boston College, 405; Eighth Annual Meeting Educational Association, 548; Study of Latin, 572; In Australia, 591; 596; New York Parochial Schools, 620; Schools in La Vendée	21 42 45 55 61 81 93 118 165 165 190 213 17th 261 333 333 357 405 405 405 548 572 591 596 620 623
Education (Catholic): Colleges and Schools
Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass., 141; Marquette University, 141; Loyola University, Chicago, 333; In Ireland, 429; Quebec, 452; St. Columba's, N. Y., 452; Mount St. Mary's, Plainfield, N. J., Burned, 524; Loyola College, Baltimore, Alumni, 527; Jesuit Colleges in Colombia, 524; St. Charles, Md.	141 141 333 429 452 452 524 527 524 572; 598
Education (General and Secular)
Fraternities and Sororities, 22; 429; 486; 596; Boston Teachers' School of Science Association, 93; Electivism, 102; Tendencies in State Universities, 118; Censorship of Moving Pictures, 118; Government Book List, 165; Socialism in the Schools, 221; Object Lesson Borrowed from Uncle Sam, 284; Primary Schools in France, 320; Students Working Their Way Through College, 237; 429; Present Day Extremes, 284; In New England, 311; In Germany, 311; National Association, 311; Illinois School Tax, 333; Ferrer Schools in New York, 357; 609; Usefulness of College, 382; Coeducation in England, 382; Harvard Entrance Requirements, 382; Child Welfare Exhibit, 366; 392; 414; Athletics, 452; Thrifty Habits, 452; Public School Results, 476; Individual Training, 476; Greek Letter Fraternities, 476; The College in Politics, 476; New Fashions in Teaching the Classics, 499; Graft in Pittsburg, 501; Dean Matthews on Eugenics, 501; Teaching English, 501; Defects in High Schools, 524; Cost of Athletics, 548; Study of Latin, 572; Lax Discipline, 572; University of France, 585; Compulsory Education in the State of Washington, 596; Unjust Legislation in Wisconsin, 596; High School Fraternities Condemned, 596; Libraries and Athletics	22 429 486 596 93 102 118 118 165 221 284 320 237 429 284 311 311 311 333 357 609 382 382 382 366 392 414 452 476 476 476 499 501 501 501 524 548 572 585 596 596 596 597
Education—Editorials:
A Memorable Page in School History, 42; What French Catholics Demand, 136; "Neutrality" in French Schools, 278; Entrance Requirements in Harvard, 400; What is Religion (Com. Draper's Report), 447; Education at Home and Abroad	42 136 278 400 447 591
Egan, Dr. Maurice F.	503
Elections not Always the Voice of the People. (Ed.)	113
Elections, State	97
Elephants, A Royal Offer of	473
Emperor William (see Germany) at Beuron, 172;	244
Encyclicals of 1910	93; 309
England: Pre-Reformation Churches, 137; Growth of Materialism, 249; Trades Unions, 370. (See Great Britain and Correspondence.)	137 249 370
English Crisis, The. (Ed.)	208
Episcopal Church, Protestant. Open Pulpit Canon, 56; Practice and Principle, 109; And Reunion (Ed.)	567
Episcopalian Comprehensiveness. (Ed.)	209
Espinouze, Father. Revolution in Portugal	50
Eucharistic Congress for 1911	335
Euphrates, Valley of the	561
Evening Post, New York. View of Religion. Evolution of Italian Socialism	126 200
FAITH Once Delivered unto the Saints, The. (Ed.)	305
Falconio, Most Rev. Diomed, Catholic Sisterhoods	550
Farrell, James A.	139
Federalist Party	150
Federation	608
Federation of Catholic Societies, 142; 166; New Orleans, 71; Boston, 430; 550; Chile.	166
Ferrer School in New York, 341; 357; (Ed.) 377; Columbia College Professor, 353; Ferrer Aftermath	501
Ferrer Schools	609
Fidelis, Father C. P.	453
Fires: Forest, 25; Cincinnati, Philadelphia, New York, Chicago, 265; Washington Place, N. Y., 602; Albany Capitol	602 431
Fisher, Walter L., Secretary of the Interior	530
Fitzgerald, Mons. E. S.	286; 431
Flynn, Mgr. Dennis J.	48
Fogazzaro, "Il Santo." (Ed.)	542
Fortune Tellers. (Ed.)	257
"Forty Years of Service." (Ed.)	327
France, Chronicle: 3; 27; 52; 76; 99; 123; 171; 195; 219; 242; 267; 293; 315; 339; 363; 387; 411; 459; 483; 507; 532; 555.	579
School Outlook, 28 (see Education); Income Tax, 28; Railroad Strikes, 52; 79; Official Liquidation, 153; Vineyards, 165; Primary Schools, 320; Metz Socialists, 339; Briand, 387; The Black Troops, 387; Liquor Riots, 388; Army, 411; Branly Honored, 411; Irreligious Schools, 422; Troops in Africa, 459; Morocco, 459; Ministry, 483; Waldeck-Rousseau's Letters, 484; Income Tax, 484; Religious Revival, 545; 574; Foreign Legion, 579; What French Catholics Demand (Ed.), 136; "Neutrality" in French Schools (Ed.), 278; A Confirmation (Associations Culturelles) (Ed.), 279; France and Its Exiled Religious (Ed.), 350; Irreligion in France (Ed.), 398; Irreligious Schools (Ed.)	422 383 120 144
Franciscans. New Provincial of Friars Minor Franklin on Official Chaplains	120
Franklin's Benevolence	144
Fraternities and Sororities, 22; 429; 486; 596. (See also Education.)	22 429 486 596
Free Schools, Early N. Y. Catholic. (Ed.)	42
Freemasons. Portugal	233
French Catholic Books	90
Gaelic. Alliance, American, 70; Interesting Book	240
Galapagos Islands	362; 386
Gasquet, Abbot	360
Gasson, Rev. Thomas J., on Socialism. (Ed.)	446
Gauthier, Most Rev. Charles Hugh	310
Gaylord Case	119
Germany, Chronicle: 3; 4; 28; 52; 76; 100; 124; 148; 172; 196; 220; 244; 268; 294; 316; 340; 364; 388; 412; 460; 484; 508; 532; 556	580
Shipyards' Strike, 4; New Metropolis, 4; Catholic Churches in Berlin, 4; Rebuke to Nathan, 65; Czar and Kaiser Meet, 100; Theatrical Manager Disgraced, 100; Statistics of Catholics, 105; Emperor William Criticized, 124; Budget, 124; Potash Controversy, 145; 268; Cheap Meat, 148; American Vines, 148; Trusts, 148; Statistics, 159; 268; American Beef, 172; Bishops United, 191; Emperor Counsels Temperance, 195; Assailed in Reichstag, 195; Socialism, 220; English Spies, 268; Moabit Riots, 340; Cable to Brazil, 340; Proclamation Anniversary, 364; Submarine Sinks, 364; And South America, 375; Emperor's Birthday, 388; 436; Emperor and Portugal, 443; Centre Party, 580; Recent Mission Movement, 584; Capital Punishment (Ed.), 61; Berlin Catholics Rebuke Mayor Nathan (Ed.), 65; Germany's Future (Ed.), 159; A Christian Ruler (Emperor William) (Ed.), 208; As a German Critic Sees Us (Ed.), 280; Forty Years of Service (Centre Party), (Ed.), 327; Catholic Press (Ed.), 424; The Kaiser and the Sui-	240 386 360 446 310 119 580
cide (Ed.), 495; The Church and the Suicide (Ed.)	520
Germany, A World Power	345
Germany, Catholics in	105
Germany, Mission Sodality of Catholic Women	397
Germany, Tariff Difficulties With	391
Gettysburg Monument to Rev. William Corby, C.S.C.	74*
Gibbons, Cardinal, on Mr. Edison's "Brain Cells" (Ed.)	470
Gibbons, Cardinal, Cardinal's Day, 335; Appointed Indian Commissioner	479
Gibraltar, a Diocese	286
Giesberts, Herr, German Critic. (Ed.)	280
Glennon, Archbishop, Attacked. (Ed.)	350
Goa. St. Francis Xavier's Shrine. 142; 383; 527	527
Golden Wedding, A	408
Goodchild, Rev. Dr. Sermon on the Keys	605
Good Shepherd Nun and the Independent	471; 317
Good Shepherd Nuns Expelled from Portugal	119
Government Service (Open to Catholics). (Ed.)	186
Governors in Conference	193
Graf Franz von Ballestrem	342
Great Britain, Chronicle: 2; 26; 51; 75; 98; 122; 146; 170; 194; 218; 242; 267; 291; 314; 338; 363; 386; 410; 434; 458; 483; 507; 531; 555; 579; 603. (See also Correspondence, England.)	579
Great Britain, Catholic Statistics, 504. (See Great Britain under Sociology.)
Great Britain, House of Lords. (Ed.)	208
Greece, Chronicle	124
Growth of Materialism in England	249
Guarding the Border. (Ed.)	543
Guatemala	362
HAECKEL'S Anti-Christian Ravings	613
Hagen, Rev. John, S.J.	164
Hague International Arbitration Court, 74; Tribunal	484
Haid, Bishop, O.S.B.	71
Harvey, Life of Mother	356
Harvard Entrance Requirements. (Ed.)	400
Hell Gate Bridge	578
Henry Street	569
Herbmann, Dr. Charles G.	360
Hero of Iceland, The	513
"His Enemy . . . Oversowed Cockle." (Ed.)	377
History, U. S. (See U. S. Political.)
Holland, Fortification of Flushing, 325; 436. (See also Correspondence.)
Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass.	141
Holy Name, The	269
"Homages" and Homage. (Ed.)	231
Honduras, Money Loan. (Ed.)	568; 362
Horticultural: A Bridge from Frost to Flowers	425
House of Representatives, 409; 434; 457. (See U. S. Chronicle.)
How Official Liquidation is Managed in France	153
Hudson River Bridge, 1; Piers	530
Hungary, Chronicle: 124; 220; 268; 296; 436; 484; 508; 532. (See also Austria and Correspondence.)
Hymn of International Peace, The	368
ICELAND, The Hero of	513
"Il Santo." (Ed.)	542
Immaculate Conception	173
Immigration, 46; Canada, 311. (See also Sociology.)
Immigration Committee Report. (Ed.)	231
Immigration Home in Boston	453
Immigration Problem, The	343
Import Duties Evaded	26
Important Discovery in Vatican Archives	437
Incarnation and the World, The	245
Incarnation, The. (Ed.)	305
Independent , The, and Catholic Observances, And Moral Phases of Education, 524; and Pius IX, 206; And the Truth Again, 471; Makes the "Amende Honorable"	617
India, Chronicle: 123; 243; In Mission Fields, 82; Rev. A. Muller, S.J., 154. (See also Great Britain.)
Insult, from Current Literature . (Ed.)	87
International Congress, White Slave Traffic	318
In the Portuguese Colonies	274
Ireland, Chronicle: 2; 27; 52; 75; 99; 122; 147; 171; 194; 219; 242; 267; 292; 314; 339; 363; 387; 411; 435; 459; 483; 507; 531; 555; 579; 603; National Schools, 143; Bilingual Schools, 213; Hostile English Newspapers (Ed.), 326; "Ulster Will Fight"	826
Ireland, Archbishop, on Y. M. C. A., 353; on Religious Bigotry, 407; on Peace	482
Irish College, Rome, Alumni in Dublin	23
Irish Dominican College, Lisbon. Founder	95
Irish Passionists in Buenos Aires	598
Iroquois Chief, An	29
Italian Socialism, Beginnings of 174; Evolution	200
Italians for Farms	166
Italy, Chronicle: 147; 196; 220; 532; 556; 580; Socialism, 174; W. R. Thayer on Modern Italy, 255; Victor Emmanuel's Monument, 509; Giolitti, 530; Luzzatti, 580; (See also Sociology.) German Catholics Rebuke

	PAGE		PAGE
Mayor Nathan (Ed.), 65; The Logical Jew (Ed.), 87; The Independent and Pius IX (Ed.), 206; The Outlook and the Vatican (Ed.), 230; An Apologist for Modern Italy (Ed.), 255; Unlooked for Returns (Nathan Insult), (Ed.), 256; Italians in Mexico (Ed.), 280; Boicottaggio (Ed.), 494; "Il Santo" (Ed.), 542; Rev. Mr. Tipple Again (Ed.), 566; Italians in Argentina (Ed.), 592; Thrifty Italians (Ed.), 593; Viva Roma! (Ed.), 615; Congress in Philadelphia (Ed.), 616. (See also Correspondence.)		Marquette University	141
JACA, Bishop of: Catholic Press.....	621	Marriage Bond, Safeguarding the. (Ed.)....	616
Jails, Our. (Ed.).....	134	Mars, Canals on	239
Jamaica, W. I., New Cathedral.....	372	Mass for Night-workers	238
Jansenism in Holland.....	229	Mass in Presbyterian Church, 201; 223; 247; (Ed.).....	186
Jealousy of Catholic Growth.....	103	Materialism in England	249
Jesuit Myth Once More.....	416	Max of Saxony, Prince.....	326
Jesuits in Macao, 383; And Pombal.....	179	Meat Trust. Adverse Decision.....	357
Jews. Statistics, 191; Defense of Pius X.....	182	Memorial Mass, Sixty-ninth Regiment.....	621
Jogues. Memorial.....	266; 329; 386	Memorial to Father Jogues.....	329
Johnson, Hon. Ben. Bigotry. (Ed.).....	495	Memorials to Distinguished Catholics.....	509
Johnson, Lionel, on St. Ignatius.....	40	Mercy Hospital, Baltimore.....	544
Justices, Chief.....	6	"Mere Coincidence," A. (Ed.).....	217
Juvenile Fiction.....	45	Message to Congress, President's. December, 1910.....	217
KAHN, Congressman Julius	71	Messmer, Archbishop. Anti-Catholic School Legislation.....	596
Kaiser and the Suicide, The. (Ed.).....	495	Methodism and the American State, 160; In Porto Rico	160
Kelly, Very Rev. Dr. Frank C.....	360	Metropolitan Museum of Art, Visit to.....	271
Kellner, Rev. John A.....	44	Mexico. Chronicle: 26; 74; 170; 266; 290; 340; 362; 412; 458; 506; 529; 530; 553; 554; 578; 602; Madeira Case, 26; Butchery, 74; Uprising, 170; Cabinet Resigns, 578; Turning from Diaz (Ed.), 185; Mexican Misgivings (Ed.), 256; Italians in Mexico (Ed.), 280; Domestic versus Foreign Affairs (Ed.), 304; Guarding the Border (Ed.), 542; "It's an Ill Wind" (Ed.), 543; Suffrage in Mexico (Ed.), 615; New Treaty With (Ed.), 491. (See also Correspondence.)	606
Kelly, Rt. Rev. Edward, D.D.....	214; 359; 407	Mexico's Tribulations	89
Keneally, Archbishop of Simla.....	430	Mickiewicz, Adam	504
Keys of the Kingdom, The.....	605	Mission at St. Ignatius' Church, N. Y.....	504
Knights of Columbus at Quebec, 21; in Argentina.....	517; 587	Mission of Lower Zambesi.....	504
Kuhn, Katherine M. B.....	599	Mission Movement in Germany.....	584
LABOR Unions, Catholics and.....	299	Mission of Our Lady of the Rosary.....	46
Labor Unions, Hostile to Militia.....	146	Mission Fields, In: Bagdad's Schools for Blind, 59; Use of Post Cards, 59; Before a Pagan Judge (British India), 82; Native Chinese Priests, 130; Christianity in Ceylon, 394; Aborigines of Australia, 467; Shrine of St. Francis Xavier, Goa, 537; The Death of a Persecutor in China, 583; Social Work Among Cingalese Boys	587
La Farge, John	164; 216	Missionary Efforts of Protestants.....	152
Lafargeville	149	Missionary Experiences. After Many Days, 89; In San Felipe.....	448
Law Invalid, Liability.....	577	Missionary Review, The, and Catholics in Germany.....	105
Law, Majesty of the.....	369	Missions, Catholic Indian	335
Laymen. (Ed.).....	494	Missions, Charity to the Foreign. (Ed.).....	446
Lent.....	485	Missions, Protestant. N. Y. City Mission. (Ed.).....	135
Letters to the Editor: No Commercialism at Oberammergau (M. S. Donlan) 24; Goldwin Smith's Vagaries (T. F. W.) 96; Franklin on Official Chaplains (A. D. C.) 120; Franklin's Benevolence (Martin I. J. Griffin) 144; Portuguese Merchant in New York (T. F. M.) 144; Social Work in Barcelona (A. J. Shipman) 215; Pioneers in Jefferson County, N. Y., 216; John La Farge's Art (William Laurel Harris) 216; Cage Masts on Battleships (Gilbert Chase, Commander, U. S. N.) 216; An Interesting Book in Gaelic (Charles O'Farrell) 240; Recent Disturbances in Mexico (J. P. Rincon) 240; The Pioneers in Jefferson County (M. F. T.) 264; The Brents of Maryland (T. F. M.) 264; American Men of Science (W. F. Rigge, S.J.) 288; Rev. H. W. Wyman, C.S.P., Chaplain California Senate, 360; A Golden Wedding (M. F.) 408; Dr. Carter's Lectures in Boston (J. G. Robins) 432; Canards about the King of Saxony, 456; The Need of Constant Vigilance (Socialism) (D. J. Rankin) 456; The New Religion or the Old (Maria Longworth Storer) 480; The Church and the Age of Mankind (Edward F. Garesché, S.J.) 528; The Highland Macdonells (T. F. M.) 575; The Real Y. M. C. Association (M. J. Riordan).....	624	Missions, Protestant. (See Protestant.)	453; 497
Lewis, William H., Assistant District Attorney Liability Law Invalid	74	Mobile, Bi-centennial	489
Libel Case, Panama. President Roosevelt vs. N. Y. World.....	50	Model Woman, A. (Princess Sophie).....	499
Liberia's Dream. (Ed.).....	113	Modern (A) Vistalist. (Hans Driesch).....	175
Lisbon's Irish Dominican College.....	94	Modernism, Anti-Modernist Oath.....	558
Literature in 1910	307	Modjeska, Helena	106
Logical Jew, The. (Ed.).....	87	Monaghan, Prof. J. C.....	144
Logue, Cardinal	144	Montalembert Celebration	441
Lone Patrolman, The. (Ed.).....	422	Montauk Point Seaport	434
Lookout Mountain, Tenn. Peace Monument.....	146	Montreal Free Dispensary	46
Lorimer, Senator	481	Moody, William H. Resigns	1
Los Angeles, 70; Aqueduct, 563; College Transferred	550	Moore, Augustus and George	356
Loures Pilgrims	550	Moors, Dance of the	546
Loyola College, Baltimore, Alumni.....	527	Morality in Public Schools. (See Education.)	365
Lubienski, Sister Cecilia	164	Morality of Aviation, The	365
Ludden, Bishop, on Religious Bigotry.....	407	Morocco, Occupation	459
Luitpold of Bavaria, Prince.....	148	Mosaics in Santa Maria Maggiore.....	428
Lynch, Rt. Rev. Joseph P.....	527	Mount St. Mary's, Plainfield, N. J., Burned.....	524
Lynch, Rev. Thomas F.....	550	Mt. St. Mary's Emmitsburg, Chapel.....	47
Lyons, Mgr. John A.....	503	Muller, Rev. August, S.J.....	154
Macao, Exiles, 383; Anti-Catholic Mob.....	527	Murray, Very Rev. Patrick, C.S.S.R.....	48
MACDONELLS, The Highland.....	575	Music, Catholic Oratorio Society.....	549
McDonnell, Rev. A., S.J.....	239	Mutiny at Rio de Janeiro. (Ed.).....	186
McEvay, Archbishop	335	Mystery Play, A Modern.....	354
McGarvey, Rev. W. J., on "Convert Clergy-men"	88	NABOT Y TOMAS, on the Reformers.....	545
McKinley Bridge, St. Louis.....	167	Nathan Insult. Pius X Thanks American Hierarchy	214
Maistre, Constance, Daughter of Joseph de.....	281	Nathan, Mayor. Montreal's Protest, 51; Berlin's Protest, 65; The Logical Jew, 87; Gen. Pelloux, 220. (See also Italy.)	279
"J. M. de la Law." The.....	369	National Municipal League. (Ed.).....	418
Manitoba's Rat Invasion	94	Native Clergy, India	337
		Navy, U. S., Arkansas.....	544
		Necessidades, Inventory, 617; Palace (Ed.).....	74
		Negro, Assistant District Attorney.....	278
		Nevada's Shame. (Ed.).....	519
		New Ecclesiastical Review.....	165
		New Fashions in Teaching the Classics.....	498
		New Mexico. State Constitution, 193; Bound-ary	265
		New Orleans, Ursuline Centennial.....	359
		New South Wales, 99; Immigration.....	213
		Newspaper Error. (Ed.).....	518
		Newspaper Polemics. (Ed.).....	580
		Newspapers, Catholic	545
		New Treaty with Mexico.....	491
		New Year's at the White House.....	328
		New Year's Greeting. (Ed.).....	279
		New York Census	180
		New Zealand. Education (Ed.), 591. (See also Auckland.)	266; 313
		Nicaragua. Chronicle.....	144
		Nightingale, Florence, and Catholic Charities.....	64
		Nocturno, In Secundo. Lectio IV.....	380
		North American College, Rome.....	238
		Novices, Studies for	93
		Nun who Committed Suicide, The. (Ed.).....	423
		OBERAMMERGAU Passion Play	24; 310
		O'Connell, Archbishop, on Generosity, 238; At Boston College.....	405
		O'Gorman, Justice James A., U. S. Senator.....	601
		O'Mahoney, Mrs. Frances A.....	406
		Open Pulpit in P. E. Church.....	56
		Opium Trade in China.....	563
		O'Reilly, Miss Mary Boyle.....	455
		O'Rourke, Count Joseph	58
		Outlook, The, and the Vatican. (Ed.).....	230
		PACKERS, Decision Against Chicago.....	577
		Page of Early Politics, A.....	101
		Palisades, Interstate Park	98
		Panama Canal and Germany.....	388
		Panama Exposition in 1915. (Ed.).....	351
		Panama. Chronicle.....	50; 291; 313
		Panama Libel Case, 50; 313; President Taft's Visit, 145; Canal Fortification, 361; Mr. Roosevelt	577
		Pan-American Trade Conference.....	457
		Parochial Schools. (See Education.)	47
		Pasadena. Meeting of Scientists.....	8
		Passing of the Supernatural.....	130
		Passion Play under Protestant Auspices.....	598
		Passionists in Buenos Aires.....	272
		Peace Foundation of Mr. Carnegie.....	471
		Peace Mission, The (Count Apponyi). (Ed.).....	368
		Peace, Monument, Lookout Mountain, Tenn., 146; World Peace Conference, 241; Carnegie Fund, 241; World Peace Mania, 334; International	362
		Peary, Robert E., Claim Admitted.....	220
		Pelloux, Gen. Speech against Nathan.....	169
		Pennsylvania Station, New	145
		Pensions, United States.....	279
		Pernicious Social Activity. (Ed.).....	407
		Perth, Bishop Clune, of.....	541
		Peru. Boundary Dispute	518
		Pervasive Seventeenth, The. (Ed.).....	137
		Petre, Miss, and the Times. (Ed.).....	434; Report of War Department, 218; Home Rule, 218; Mineral Resources, 239; Parcels Post, 266; Year 1910, 325; Volcano, 410; Civil Service, 434; Sugar Trust, 506; Friar Lands, 506; The Leper Colony, 539; Prosecuting Aggressions, 611; "What's in a Name?"—Catholic and Protestant in the Philippines. (Ed.).....	399
		Phillips, Percival, on Portuguese Liberty.....	412
		Pioneers in Jefferson County, N. Y.....	216
		Pius X. Reading for Seminarians.....	169
		Poels, Rev. Dr. New Appointment	95
		Poland: Adam Mickiewicz, 89; Dr. Von Jazdewski	466
		Polish Catholic Daily Newspaper.....	266
		Pombal, Marquis de	179
		Population of U. S., Catholic.....	478
		Porto Rico: Prosperity, 74; Methodists, 160; Naval Station	482
		Portugal. Chronicle: 1; 49; 50; 73; 97; 172; 243; 268; 295; 315; 340; 364; 388; 412; 435; 484; 508; 531; 556; Recognition, 1; 124; Father Espinouse, 50; What Portugal Looks Like, 53; Republican Program, 71; Republicanism, 73; 83; The Secret Passages, 86; Irish Dominican College, Lisbon, 95; Religious Orders, 97; Good Shepherd Nuns, 119; Jesuit Exiles in New York, 142; A Dramatic Incident (Pombal and the Jesuits), 179; Freemasons, 233; Emperor William, 243; Jesuits, 109; 131; 254; Portuguese Colonies, 274; Portugal (Ed.), 16; How It Happened (Ed.), 40; A Portuguese Prelate Speaks (Ed.), 62; The Secret Passages (Ed.), 86; The Dungeons of Campolide (Ed.), 112; Revolution and Religion (Ed.), 114; Two Kinds of Republics (Ed.), 114; An Eloquent Voice from Portugal (Ed.), 254; The Wrong Road (Ed.), 327; Letter from a "Benighted" Oriental (Ed.), 395; Portugal Is Speedy (Ed.), 398; Nun who Committed Suicide (Ed.), 423; Portuguese Liberty (Ed.), 494; Religion and Government (Ed.), 543; Pastoral of Portugal's Bishops (Ed.).....	568
		Portuguese Merchant in New York.....	144
		Post Cards	59
		Potash, Controversy with Germany.....	145
		Pre-Reformation Churches in England.....	178
		Presbyterians, And the Mass.....	201; 223; 247
		Press, Daily, Erroneous Report. (Ed.).....	518
		Priests, Ministers and Politics. (Ed.).....	424
		Primary Schools of France, The.....	320
		Princess Sophie von Waldburg.....	489
		Prisons	134
		"Progressives" Organizing	385
		Protectory, Catholic. Governor Dix at.....	453
		Protestant Bishop on Unity, A. (Ed.).....	187
		Protestant Missions	5; 135; 152
		Prussia, Religion in the Schools of, 548. (See also Germany.)	77
		Purgatory	64
		Puritans, Columbus Day and the. (Ed.).....

Q	PAGE	S	PAGE	T	PAGE
QUEST of the Ultimate.....	126	SERRA, Junipero, Statue	71	Tabernacle Society	105
RAILROADS. Safety Appliances, 2; N. Y. Cen-		Seton, Archbishop	360	Taft, President. Message to Congress.	313
tral Development, 51; Harriman Exten-		Shields, General James. Memorial.....	144	Dec., 1910, 217; Policies	313
sion, 409; Rate Decision, 482; In the Orient	507	Ship Subsidy, Legislation	385	Talley, Alfred J., on Passion Play.....	192
"Rational Education"	609	Shooting Season, Disasters	194	Tariff Difficulties with Germany.....	391
Reaney, Rev. W. H. A.	119	Siberia. An American Abroad.....	111	Tax, Corporation	553
Reardon, Rev. W. A.	432	Signs of the Times. (Catholics in Germany.)	105	Thanksgiving Day, 125; President's Proclama-	137
Recent Mission Movement in Germany.....	584	Simla, New Archbishop (Kenally).....	430	Thayer, William R., on Modern Italy.....	255
Reciprocity and President Taft.....	457	Sims, Commander	337	Thirteenth Century Ruling, A. (Ed.).....	518
Red Flag, The. (Ed.).....	567	Sisters of Charity, Ky., Constitutions.....	333	Thrifty Italians. (Ed.).....	593
Religion and Modern Scientists.....	559	Sixty-ninth Regiment, Memorial Mass.....	621	Times, New York, on History of Spain. (Ed.)	326
Religion in Schools. (See Education.)		Smith, Goldwin, Vagaries	96	Tipple Again, The Rev. Mr. (Ed.).....	566
Religion in the United States.....	297	Socialism: And the Church, 48; Milwaukee,		Tolstoy. (Ed.).....	184
Religion, The New or the Old?.....	480	122; Press Propaganda in U. S., 127; Bel-		Toronto's New Seminary	94
Religion, What Is? (Ed.).....	447	gium, 158; Italy, 174; 200; Germany, 220;		Trades Unions in England	370
Religious Liberty in Russia (Ed.).....	448	in the Schools, 221; 609; Sunday Schools,		Transandine Railway	506
Religious Training in Schools.....	129	221; The Great Social Problem, 321; So-		Treasury, United States, Surplus.....	602
Repplier, Miss Agnes, Laetare Medalist.....	623	cialism in Sweden, 440; The Need of		Treaty, New, with Mexico.....	491
Reunion, Episcopal Church and. (Ed.).....	567	Constant Vigilance, 456; Christ or Anti-Christ,		Tumulty, Joseph P.....	360
Reunion Magazine and the Jesuits.....	281	461; In the United States (Ed.), 160;		Turkey. The New Régime.....	493
Revival of Medievalism in Sweden.....	35	An Economic Contradiction (Ed.), 158;		Turning from Diaz. (Ed.).....	185
Rice Family, Massachusetts	29	Pernicious Social Activity (National Munic-		UNCLE Sam as a Family Man. (Ed.).....	280
Rio de Janeiro, Mutiny at. (Ed.).....	186	ipal League) (Ed.), 279; Socialism and		Unexpected Witness, An. (Ed.).....	422
Rome. The Logical Jew (Ed.), 87; N. Ameri-		Municipal Reform (Ed.), 304; Catholics and		Unexpected Vindication, An. (Ed.).....	472
can College, 238; American Students, 285;		Socialism (Ed.), 377; Socialists in New		United States. Chronicle: 1; 2; 25; 26; 50;
Rev. Mr. Tipple Again. (Ed.).....	566	York (Ed.), 422; Father Gasson on Social-		51; 73; 74; 97; 98; 121; 122; 145; 146;
Roosevelt and Panama, Mr.....	577	ism (Ed.), 446; The Red Flag (Ed.).....	567	164; 193; 217; 241; 265; for 1910, 289; 313;
Rosary, Mission of Our Lady of the.....	46	Sociology:		337; 361; 386; 409; 433; 457; 481; 505; 529;
Ruse, The, of Fray Dimas.....	43	Mission of Our Lady of the Rosary, 46; Free		553; 577; 601; Political History, 101; 150;
Russell, Mgr. William T.....	527	Dispensary in Montreal, 46; Anglicans in		318; 304; Population, 265; Senate, 409;
Russia, Religious Liberty in. (Ed.).....	448	Social Questions, 70; American Gaelic Alli-		433	457
Russian Irishman, A.....	58	ance, 70; Pneumonia and Suicide, 94; Crip-		Unity, A Protestant Bishop on. (Ed.).....	187
Ryan, Archbishop Patrick John, 335; At Fire-		pen Case, 94; Accidents to Aviators, 119;		University of France, The	585
men's Memorial, 358; Sketch, 442; Obser-	527	Legal Protection of Workmen, 119; Our		"Unthinkable War, An" (Ed.).....	614
quies, 478; Estate		Jails (Ed.), 134; Social Work, 141; Public		Ursulines, Centennial, N. Orleans.....	359
SAFEGUARDING the Marriage Bond. (Ed.).....	616	Parks, 141; Imprisonment for Neglect of		Uruguay's League of Catholic Women.....	107
Safety Appliances, Railway	2	Children, 141; A Liège Socialist, 166; New		VALLEY of the Euphrates.....	561
Sailors' Club, Boston	382	York's Bakeries, 166; Italians on Farm		Van de Ven, Bishop.....	71
Salesians in Buenos Aires	526	Lands, 166; Catholic Congress in Chile, 166;		Vannutelli, Cardinal, and the Children (Ed.)	231
"Samaritaine, La"	600	Statistics of Jews, 191; New South Wales		62; In Boston, 24; In Canada.....	231
Santa Clara College	262	Immigration, 213; Christian Charity Needed,		Vatican Observatory	164
Saturday Afternoon	66	237; Dignity of Poverty, 262; Growth of the		Vatican Archives, Important Discovery.....	437
Saxony, King of	456	Population of Italy, 286; Multiplication of		Vaz, Father Joseph	552
Scapular Med. Decree	359	Libraries, 287; Catholics and the Labor		Venezuela and Orinoco Steamship Co.....	74
Schrenbs, Rt. Rev. Mgr. Joseph, Appointed		Unions, 299; Immigration to Canada, 311;		Verse, St. Patrick	509
Bishop, 359; Consecration.....	453	White Slave Traffic, 317; Encroaching on		Veuillot, Louis	536
Science:		Public Property, 334; Universal Peace Mania,		Victor Emmanuel's Monument	509
Conference on Mount Wilson, 47; Polar Flat-		334; Benefactions of 1910, 334; Catholic Or-		Vienna, Meat Tariff, 172; Catholics and Prot-	306
tening, 47; War Dirigibles, 48; Manila Ob-		ganizations, 347; Catholic Protectories, 378;		estants	550
servatory Commended, 72; Ebro Obser-		Boston's Catholic Sailors' Club, 382; The		Vincentians, College at Los Angeles.....	271
vatory, 72; Father Hagen of the Vatican Ob-		"Anglo Saxon" Myth, 382; Irish Emigrant		Visit to the Metropolitan Museum of Art.....	616
servatory, 72; Variable and Binary Stars,		Society, 407; Montreal's Birth Rate, 407;		Viva Roma! (Ed.).....	113
72; Halley's Comet, 72; Woven-wire Masts		French Hospital Horrors, 429; Immigration,		Voice of the People. (Ed.).....	621
on Battleships, 72; Life Germs Carried by		429; Japanese Anarchists, 430; 551; Social		Volpicelli, Ven. Caterina.....	16
Meteorites, 95; X-Rays and Vitality, 96;		Work by Catholics, 453; Visiting Catholic		Volume Four. (Ed.).....	218
Variable Stars, 120; Submarine Vessels,		Prisoners, 454; Labeling Authorities, 477;		Von Steuben, General. Statue.....	489
120; Spectral Types and Parallax, 120; Cap-		Science and the Plague, 477; Report of N. Y.		WALDBURG, Princess Sophie von.....	418
ture Theory, 143; Uranium Ores in Aus-		Commissioner of Labor, 477; Matters in		Wanted: A Native Indian Clergy.....	65
tralia, 144; Oxygen in High Altitudes, 144;		Spain, 501; New Orleans Provides for		Wellman, Captain. His Airship.....	453
Sun's Influence on Weather, 168; Stalac-		Homeless Men, 526; Foreigners in Switzer-		Consecration	135
te Cave in Austria, 168; Coal Heating		land, 526; Salesians in Buenos Aires, 526;		Well Paid Apostles. (Ed.).....	244
Value, 168; Comet's Tails, 168; Blast Fur-		The Queen's Daughters, 550; Thrift of		West Indies, Danish. Chronicle.....	53
naces, 192; Cyanogen Spectrum, 192; Co-		Foreign Workmen, 550; Remedies for En-		What Portugal Looks Like	432
halt and Chromium, 214; Agricultural Graph-		demics, 550; Big Brother Movement Among		Whelan, Rev. John T.....	217; 255; 287
ics, 214; Mineral Wealth of Philippines,		Catholics, 574; Social Work among Cingal-		White, Chief Justice.....	317
239; Canals of Mars, 239; 285; Earth's		ese boys, 587; Work of Spanish Ladies in		White Slave Traffic, The	317
Rotation, 261; Mining Coal, 285; House		Morocco, 598; Paupers in Great Britain, 599;		Wilson, Woodrow. On the Church, 72; On	476
Damp, 285; Electrical Cooking for Navy,		Religious Nurses in Rome, 599; Local Op-		the College	476
285; Astronomy in 1910, 310; Magnetic		tion in Alabama, 599; Women in Trades		Women in Public Life (Ed.), 282; Catholic	107
Storms, 311; Rapid Firing Artillery, 336;		Professions, 623; Catholic Schools in La		Women in State Elections	122
The Captain, 233; An Old-Fashioned Gentle-		Vendée	623	Workmen. (See Sociology.)
man, 353; Titania, 379; Henry.....	593	Some Friends of Mine: The Patriarch, 187;		World, N. Y., vs. Pres. Roosevelt. Libel Case. 50
Sophie von Waldburg, Princess.....	489	157; The Doctor, 161; The Notary, 187;
South Africa. Chronicle.....	99	The Captain, 233; An Old-Fashioned Gentle-
South America. Chronicle.....	291	man, 353; Titania, 379; Henry.....
Spain. Chronicle: 196; 295; 310; 388; 484;		Sophie von Waldburg, Princess.....
331; 556; 603; Article XXIX of the Con-		South Africa. Chronicle.....
cordat, 8; Vitality of Catholic Spirit, 60;		Spain. Chronicle: 196; 295; 310; 388; 484;
"Padlock Law," 196; Religious Orders, 556;		331; 556; 603; Article XXIX of the Con-
Social Week in Barcelona, 215; Spain and		cordat, 8; Vitality of Catholic Spirit, 60;
the Vatican, 512; Inactivity of the Reform-		"Padlock Law," 196; Religious Orders, 556;
ers, 545; Spanish Politicians with the		Social Week in Barcelona, 215; Spain and
Church, 534; Spanish Politicians against the		the Vatican, 512; Inactivity of the Reform-
Church, 557; Political Situation in, 419;		ers, 545; Spanish Politicians with the
582; What Spanish Religious Are Doing		Church, 534; Spanish Politicians against the
(Ed.), 18; Canalejas (Ed.), 41; 64; 112;		Church, 557; Political Situation in, 419;
496; New York Times and the History of		582; What Spanish Religious Are Doing
(Ed.), 326; Waking Up (Ed.), 400. (See		(Ed.), 18; Canalejas (Ed.), 41; 64; 112; also Sociology.)		496; New York Times and the History of Spiritualism. Messages from the Spirit		(Ed.), 326; Waking Up (Ed.), 400. (See
World	23	also Sociology.)
St. Boniface, Industrial School, Manitoba.....	574
St. Charles' College, Maryland.....	572
St. Francis Xavier. Celebration at Goa.....	142
St. Ignatius, Lionel Johnson on.....	401
St. Ignatius' Church, N. Y.....	504
St. Louis Bridge	167
St. Joseph	533
St. Mary's Hospital, Hoboken.....	142
St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, Alumni.....	192
St. Patrick. Verse	509
St. Patrick's Cathedral, N. Y., Consecration.....	22
St. Patrick's Day. (Ed.).....	518
St. Peter's Church, N. Y., 125th Anniversary.....	191
St. Vincent de Paul's, Brooklyn. Golden Jubilee	191
St. Vincent de Paul Society.....	159; 282

"Wrong Road, The." (Ed.).....	327
Wyman, Very Rev. H. H., C.S.P.....	360

YEAR 1910 in Literature.....	306
Y. M. C. A. Archbishop Ireland on, 353; In Mexico (Ed.), 473; The Real.....	624
Young Men's Catholic Association Planned.....	598

ZAMBESI Mission	504
-----------------------	-----

CORRESPONDENCE

New Year's at the White House.....	328
Argentina: New President, 373; Politics, 396; Knights of Columbus.....	517; 587
Australia: Catholic Progress.....	469
Austria: Catholic Congress, 14; Lay Catechists in Vienna.....	588
Bavaria: Writer Defends Pius X, 39; Passion Play.....	182
Belgium: Catholic Democratic League and School Question, 13; Immigration to Canada.....	324
Brazil: Portugal's Revolution.....	444
British Guiana: Catholic Schools.....	61
Chile: New President.....	421
China: Financial Reform, 492; First Mass of a Chinese Priest.....	541
Ecuador: Catholics.....	132; 156; 181
England: "Old Catholics," 37; Hastings' Pil- grimage.....	38
France: Duez to be Brought to Trial, 111; Freemasonry, 204; Robert d'Orleans, Duc de Chartres, 276; Some Features of the Religious Crisis, 376; Freethinking Press, 444; The Old Order Changes.....	612
Germany: Jewish Protest Against Nathan, 183; Statistics of Protestants, 205; Foreign Colonization, 253; A Mission Sodality of Catholic Women, 397; Empire's Fortieth Anniversary, 445; Is it a New Kulturkampf? 468; Growth of Christian Trades-Unions, 469; Modernist Troubles, 515; Emperor Will Not Visit Rome, 565; War Taxes in the Col- onies.....	589
Holland: Catholic Influence, 85; Jansenism, 229; Dutch Evangelical Alliance, 469; Con- ditions in that Country.....	538
Hungary: National Catholic Congress.....	227
Italy: The Legions of Students in Rome, 275; Luzzatti, Pelloux and Nathan's Speech, 302; Economic Social Union of Catholics.....	589
Jamaica: The Kingston Cathedral.....	468
Japan: The Religious Problem in Japan, (1) 277; (2) 303; (3) 323; (4) 346; (5) 372; (6) 396; The Tokyo Imperial University, 421; American Peace Society.....	516
Mexico: Echoes of Mexico's Centenary, 13; Our Lady of Guadalupe, 182; Prosperous Mexico.....	251
Philippines: The Leper Colony, 539; Proselyt- ing in the Philippines.....	611
Portugal: Truth About Portuguese Repub- licans, 83; From a Jesuit in Prison, 109; How the Jesuits Were Driven Out, 131, 203; A "Benighted" Oriental and Western Civilization.....	395
Siberia: From an American Abroad.....	111; 347
South Africa: Rhodesia's Diamonds.....	183
Spain: Vitality of Catholic Spirit, 60; Repub- licanism in Spain.....	419
Sweden: Christianity without Christ, 229; Re- ligious Liberty.....	564
Syria: The Devil and the Peasant.....	252
Turkey: The New Régime.....	493

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Messages from the Spirit World, 23; Socialism and the Church, 48; Republican Program in Portugal, 71; Woodrow Wilson on the Church, 72; What is a Preacher Without a Creed? 119; The Real Republic of Por- tugal, 143; Everything the Church's Busi- ness (Chicago Inter-Ocean), 167; Recogni- tion of Portugal, 190; Protestant Episcopa- lians on Confirmation, 239; New York Dio- cese in 1910 (Archbishop Farley), 332; Bishop Matz on Catholic Organizations, 354; Young Men's Christian Association, 406; Pius X to Archbishop Bruchési, 453; Archbishop Farley's Appeal for the Pope, 478; Y. M. C. A. in Mexico, 503; Advan- tages of Catholic Colleges, 525; Leo XIII on Lent, 573; Archbishop Redwood on Chris- tian Education.....	597
----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	-----

AUTHORS

Ayscough, John: Mezzogiorno.....	522
Badot, Jules, O.S.B.: The Lectionary; Its Sources and History.....	283
Balfour, Charlotte: Life of St. Clare.....	426
Bazin, René: The Barrier.....	235
Bearne, Rev. David, S.J.: Our Lady's Luten- ist.....	189
Benson, Robert Hugh: The Cost of a Crown, 335; The Maid of Orleans, 523; Christ in the Church.....	595

Bensusan, S. L.: Home Life in Spain.....	416
Blanchan, Neltje: The American Flower Gar- den.....	21
Bonvin, Ludwig, S.J.: Hosanna, A Catholic Hymn Book.....	217
Borden, Lucille P.: The Centurion.....	235; 355
Bosch, Mrs. Herman: Bible Stories Told to Toddlers.....	235
Branner, John C.: A Brief Grammar of the Portuguese Language.....	117
Bronchain, Rev. Louis, C.S.S.R.: Meditations for Every Day in the Year.....	236
Brown, Abbe Farwell: The Christmas Angel.....	235
Brown, Alice: John Winterbourne's Family.....	331
Brown, Stephen J., S.J.: A Reader's Guide to Irish Fiction.....	331
Bryce, James: American Commonwealth.....	235; 318
Burroughs, W. Dwight: The Wonderland of Stamps.....	260
Campion, Rev. Father: Discourse on the Edi- fying Life of the Late Rev. Father Bake- well.....	450
Capes, Miss E. M.: A Poet's May.....	285
Capes, H. M.: Footsteps in the Ward.....	68
Capron, Father Luis, C.S.S.R.: Excelencia del Sacerdocio y Vocacion a Este Estado.....	283
Cecilia, Madame: Hints for Instructing Con- verts, 236; More Short Spiritual Readings for Mary's Children.....	236
Chadwick, Rev. Hubert, S.J.: Gongalo da Silveira, S.J.....	450
Chérence, Very Rev. Leopold de, O.S.F.C.: St. Clare of Assisi.....	426
Chesterton, Gilbert K.: What's Wrong with the World?.....	91
Coler, Bird S.: Socialism in the Schools.....	570
Conybeare, F. C.: History of New Testament Criticism.....	451
Copus, Rev. J. E.: Andros of Ephesus.....	235; 547
Cornejo, Jesus, C.S.S.R.: El Convite Eucaris- tico Manual Para la Comunión Frecuente.....	163
Crockett, S. R.: Love's Young Dream.....	282
D'Alton, Rev. E. A.: History of Ireland from the Earliest Times to the Present Day.....	209
Daly, T. A.: Carmina.....	235
Dease, Alice: A Priest and His Boys.....	450
Demimuid, Monsignor: Saint Thomas à Becket D'Sa, Rev. M.: History of the Catholic Church in India.....	163
Dunac, Abbé E.: L'Heure du Matin ou Meditations Sacerdotales.....	427
Duplessy, Abbé: Victor Hugo Apologiste.....	354
Du Puis, Brother Francis: Life of St. Clare.....	426
Earls, Michael, S.J.: Melchior of Boston.....	189; 235
Fah, Dr. Adolf: Predigten des Hochwst. Herrn Dr. Augustin Egger.....	523
Fiege, very Rev. Fr. Marianus, O.M.Cap.: The Princess of Poverty: St. Clare of Assisi.....	117
Foster, Agnes Greene: By the Way.....	19
Figelmessy, Elisa H.: Two Boys in the Tropics.....	162
Fraser, Mrs. Hugh: A Diplomatist's Wife in Many Lands.....	402
Fries, A. E. B.: The Adventures of Two Ants.....	117
Gatterer, Dr. Michael, S.J.: Die Erziehung zur Keuschheit.....	451
Gerry, Margarita Spalding: Through Five Ad- ministrations; Reminiscences of Col. William H. Crook.....	260
Gerste, A., S.J.: Notes sur la Medicine et la Botanique des Anciens Mexicains.....	163
Gillmore, Inez Haynes: Phoebe and Ernest.....	381
Graham, Rev. William: Duty. Twelve Confer- ences to Young Men.....	547
Graham, John E.: Mere Hints.....	236
Gray, Mary Agatha: The Turn of the Tide.....	282
Griffin, W. Hall: The Life of Robert Brown- ing.....	522
Grimes, Abbé: Traité des Scrupules.....	69
Gros, Abbé: Meditations Sacerdotales.....	354
Gruender, Rev. Hubert, S.J.: De Qualitati- bus Sensibilibus, 427; Free-Will the Greatest of the Seven World-Riddles.....	547
Haggeney, Rev. Carl, S.J.: Furstin Sophie von Waldburg zu Wolfegg und Waldsee.....	489
Hall, Thomas C.: History of Ethics Within Organized Christianity.....	594
Hammarström, Nancy: The Adventures of Two Ants.....	117
Haviland, M. D.: Lives of the Fur Folk.....	212; 235
Hedley, Rt. Rev. J. C., O.S.B.: Sermons of St. Bernard on Advent and Christmas.....	189
Henry, O.: Whirligigs.....	115
Herrington, W. S.: Martyrs of New France.....	162
Hewitt, Joseph W. (and M. Mather): Xeno- phon's Anabasis.....	427
Hibbert, Francis Aidan: Dissolution of the Monasteries.....	20
Hirst, W. A.: Argentina.....	69
Holt-White, W.: The People's King. A Short Life of Edward VII.....	211
Howells, William Dean: My Mark Twain.....	188
Hughes, Thomas, S.J.: History of the Society of Jesus in North America.....	21

Huonder, Anthony, S.J.: Dos Rosas.....	20
Huntington, J. V.: Rosemary.....	235
Hutten, Bettina von: The Green Patch.....	138
Hutton, Edward: Siena and Southern Tuscany.....	162
James, George Wharton: Heroes of California.....	212
Johner, P. Dominicus: Kleine Choral-Schule.....	475
Johnson, Clifton: Highways and Byways of the Rocky Mountains.....	117
Joyce, Robert D.: Ballads of Irish Chivalry.....	19
Kane, Rev. Robert, S.J.: The Plain Gold Ring.....	571
Ker, Paul: En Pénitence Chez les Jesuites.....	90
Kellner, Karl Alois, S.J.: Christianity and the Leaders of Modern Science.....	559
Kerbs, Dr. E.: Untern Petersdom. Wander- ungen durch die Vatikanischen Grotten.....	404
Kerr, Lady Amabel: Spiritual Counsels of Fénelon.....	117
Klarmann Rev. Andrew, A.M.: Life in the Shadow of Death.....	236
Krus, Dr. Franz, S.J.: Die Erziehung Zur Keuschheit.....	451
Lanslots Dom I., O.S.B.: Catholic Theology, or, The Catechism Explained.....	474
Lanyon, Helen: The Hill of Dreams.....	235
Lathbury, D. C.: Correspondence on Church and Religion of William Ewart Gladstone.....	43
Laughlin, Clara E.: Just Folks.....	569
Lepin, Rev. Marius, S.S., D.D.: Christ and the Gospel.....	404
Lings, Rev. Albert A.: Life of the Blessed John B. Marie Vianney, Curé of Ars.....	450
Locke, W. J.: A Christmas Mystery.....	235
Lounsbury, Alice: Gardens Near the Sea.....	140
Lucas, E. V.: Mr. Ingleside.....	139
Lucas, Reginald: Lord Glenesk and the "Morning Post".....	92
Lumsden, Carlos B.: The Dawn of Modern England.....	211
McCarthy, Denis A.: Voices from Erin and Other Poems.....	139; 235
McCarty, Dwight G.: Territorial Governors of the Old Northwest.....	259
McClung, Nellie: The Second Chance.....	474
Martin, Charles A.: Catholic Religion.....	236
Mather Maurice (and J. W. Hewitt): Xeno- phon's Anabasis.....	427
Menéndez Ramón: El Romancero Español.....	212
Modjeska, Helena.....	106; 234
Monroe, Will S.: Bohemia and the Czechs.....	499
Montgomery, Harry Earl: Christ's Social Rem- edies.....	451
Moore, John T.: The Gift of the Grass.....	547
Muckermann, Hermann, S.J.: Grundriss der Biologie.....	450
O'Connor, R. F.: Life of St. Clare.....	426
O'Reilly, E. Boyle: Heroic Spain.....	43; 234
O'Rourke, Rev. John H., S.J.: Under the Sanctuary Lamp.....	234
Otten, Rev. Bernard J.: Old Christianity vs. New Paganism.....	475
Partridge, Anthony: The Golden Web.....	450
Perrin, Abbé: L'Évangile et le Temps Présent.....	90
Phillips, Stephen: Pietro of Siena.....	140
Quadrupani, R. P.: Direction pour rassurer dans leurs doutes les âmes timorées; Direc- tion pratique et morale pour vivre chréti- ennement.....	69
Quin, Rev. George E., S.J.: The Boy Saver's Guide.....	595
Reilly, Peter: The Charity of Christ.....	236
Roberts, Charles G. D.: Kings in Exile.....	235; 260
Rock, Austin: A Minister's Marriage.....	330
Rosebery, Lord: Lord Chatham.....	329
Rother, Rev. Aloysius, S.J.: Certitude: A Study in Philosophy.....	475
Routhier, A. B.: The Centurion, A Romance of the Time of the Messiah.....	235; 355
Russell, Rev. Matthew, S.J.: The Life of Blessed John Eudes, 69; Jesus is Waiting, 116; At Home with God.....	354
Ruville, Dr. Albert Von: Back to Holy Church.....	258
Sardá y Salvany, Don Félix: Le Libéralisme est un Péché.....	90
Saudreau, Auguste: Les Faits Extraordinaires de la Vie Spirituelle, 161; La Vie d'Union à Dieu, 161; L'Etat Mystique.....	161
Scaglia, P. Sisto: Notiones Archaeologiae Christianae Disciplinis Theologicis Coordi- ata.....	225
Schmoeger, Rev. Carlos E., C.S.S.R.: Vida de la Venerable Ana Catalina Emmerich.....	283
Sheehan, Canon, D.D.: The Intellectuals.....	570
Sibaud, L'Abbé F.: La Loi d'Age Pour La Première Communie.....	354
Smith, Goldwin: Reminiscences.....	474
Spalding, Rev. Henry S., S.J.: The Old Mill on the Withrose.....	189
Spearman, Frank H.: Robert Kimberly.....	500
Steele, Francesca M.: St. Bridget of Sweden.....	92
Sutcliffe, Halliwell: A Winter's Comedy.....	258
Sykes, Ella C.: Persia and Its People.....	168

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Tabb, Rev. John B.: Lyrics, Child Verse, Later Lyrics, Poems	235	Ethics Within Organized Christianity, History of	594	People's King, The. (Edward VII)	211
Thompson, Francis: Life of St. Ignatius Loyola	235	Eudes, Life of Blessed John	69	Persia and Its People	163
Thurston, Katherine Cecil: Max	139	L'Evangile et le Temps Présent	90	Phoebe and Ernest	235; 381
Waggaman, Mary T.: Eric; or, The Black Finger	235	Excelencia del Sacerdocio y Vocacion a Este Estado	283	Pietro of Siena	140
Wallace, Cathryn: One Christmas Eve at Roxbury Crossing	235	Faits Extraordinaires de la Vie Spirituelle, Les	161	Plain Gold Ring, The	571
Waller, Mary E.: Flamsted Quarries	140	Fénelon, Spiritual Counsels of	117	Poems. Rev. John B. Tabb	235
Walsh, Dr. James J.: Education, How Old the New	234	Flamsted Quarries	140	Poet's May, A	235
Watson, Rev. M. J., S.J.: Within the Soul: Helps in the Spiritual Life	331	Footsteps in the Ward	68	Portuguese Grammar	117
Wayne, Kenneth H.: Building Your Boy; How to Do It, How Not to Do It	93	Free Will, the Greatest of the Seven World-Riddles	547	Predigten Des Hochstw. Herrn Dr. Egger	523
Wehs, Rev. John A.: Ned Reider	403	Friendly Little House and Other Stories, The	282	Priest, A, and His Boys	450
Whalen, Will W.: The Lily of the Coal Fields	570	Fürstin Sophie Von Waldburg Zu Wolfegg und Waldsee	489	Princess of Poverty, The: St. Clare of Assisi	117
Woodward, Rev. G. R.: Songs of Syon	425	Gardens Near the Sea	140	Reader's Guide to Irish Fiction, A	331
Wright, Irene A.: Cuba	259	Gift of the Grass, The	547	Religion in New Netherland. (1623-1664)	381
Zulueta, Rev. F. M., S.J.: Early Steps in the Fold	258	Gladstone, W. E. Correspondence	43	Reminiscences. Goldwin Smith	474
Zwierlien, Rev. Frederick J.: Religion in New Netherland, 1623-1664	381	Glenesk, Lord, and the Morning Post	92	Robert Kimberly	500
BOOKS
Adventures of Two Ants, The	117	Golden Web, The	450	Roman Missal in Latin and English, The	547
American Commonwealth, The	235; 318	Green Patch, The	138	Roman Missal	234
American Flower Garden, The	21	Grundriss der Biologie	450	Romancero Español, El	212
American Jewish Year Book, The	92	Heroes of California	212	Rosemary	235
Andros of Ephesus	547	Heroic Spain	43; 234	Round the World	68
Argentina	69	Highways and Byways of the Rocky Mountains	117	Second Chance, The	474
At Home with God	355	Hill O' Dreams, The	235	Sermons of St. Bernard	189
Attributes of God Mirrored in the Perfections of Mary, The	283	Hints for Catechists on Instructing Converts	236	Silveira, Gonçalo de, S.J.	450
Back to Holy Church	258	History of Ethics Within Organized Christianity	594	Socialism in the Schools	570
Bakewell, Discourses on the Life of Rev. Father	450	History of Ireland	209	Society of Jesus in North America	21
Ballads of Irish Chivalry	19	History of New Testament Criticism	451	Songs of Syon	425
Barrier, The	235	History of Religions. Lectures on the	68	Spiritual Counsels of Fénelon	117
Bible Stories Told to Toddlers	235	History of the Catholic Church in India	427	St. Bernard, Sermons of	189
Biografías de los Heroes y Caudillos de la Independencia	20	History of the Society of Jesus in North America	21	St. Bridget of Sweden	92
Bohemia and the Czechs	499	History of the Telugu Christians	189	St. Clare of Assisi	117; 426
Book of Knowledge, The Children's Encyclopedia	235	Home Life in Spain	416	St. Ignatius Loyola, Life of	235
Boy-Saver's Guide, The	595	Hosanna, A Catholic Hymn Book	116	St. Thomas a Becket	163
Brief History of the Catholic Church in the United States	356	Hugo, Victor, Apologiste	90	Siena and Southern Tuscany	162
Broad Highway, The	619	India, History of the Catholic Church in	427	Story of Our Lord's Life Told for Children, The	235
Browning, The Life of Robert	522	Intellectuals, The	570	Story of the Bridgettines, The	619
Building your Boy	93	Ireland, History of	209	Story of the Carol	617
By the Way	19	Jesus Is Waiting	116	Syntax of Classical Greek	618
California, Heroes of	212	John Winterbourne's Family	331	Territorial Governors of the Old Northwest	259
Carmina	235	Just Folks	569	Through Five Administrations	260
Catholic Encyclopedia, Volumes VIII and IX	115	Kings in Exile	235; 260	Traité des Scrupules	69
Catholic Religion, Christian Teaching and History	236	Kleine Chroalschule	475	Turn of the Tide, The	282
Catholic Theology; or, The Catechism Explained	474	Lectinary, The; Its Sources and History	283	Two Boys in the Tropics	162
Centurion, The. A Romance of the Time of the Messiah	235	Lectures on the History of Religions	68	Uganda, Los Martires de	117
Certificate: A Study in Philosophy	475	L'Heure du Matin ou Méditations Sacerdotales	354	Under the Sanctuary Lamp	234
Charity of Christ, The	236	Liberalism, Le, est un Péché	90	Unterm Petersdom	404
Chatham, Lord, His Early Life and Connections	329	Life and Legend of the Lady St. Clare, The	426	Vida de la Ven. Ana Catalina Emmerich	283
Children's Encyclopedia, The	235	Life in the Shadow of Death	236	Vianney, Life of the Blessed John B. Marie	450
Child Verse. Rev. John B. Tabb	235	Life of an Enclosed Nun	67; 235	Vie D'Union a Dieu, La	161
Christ and the Gospel	404	Life of Robert Browning	522	Voices from Erin and Other Poems	139; 235
Christ in the Church	595	Life of Blessed John Eudes	69	What's Wrong with the World?	91
Christ's Social Remedies	451	Life of Christ for Children, A	235	Whirligigs	115
Christianity and the Leaders of Modern Science	559	Life of St. Ignatius Loyola	235	Why Should I Be Moral?	619
Christmas Angel, The	235	Life of the Blessed John B. Marie Vianney	450	Winter's Comedy, A	258
Christmas Mystery, A	235	Liguori, Meditations of St. Alphonsus	236	Within the Soul: Helps in the Spiritual Life	331
Christmas Tales	68	Lily of the Coal Fields, The	570	Wonderland of Stamps, The	200
Convite Eucaristico, El	163	Lives of the Fur Folk	212; 235	Xenophon's Anabasis	427
Correspondence on Church and Religion of W. E. Gladstone	43	Loi d'Age pour La Première Communion, La	354	Aichner, Prince-Bishop	120
Cost of a Crown, The. A Sacred Drama in Three Acts	235	Love's Young Dream	282	Anesagasti y Llamas, Rt. Rev. Jaime	48
Crook, Reminiscences of Col. William H.	260	Lyrics, Rev. John B. Tabb	235	Archambault, Rev. J. B., S.J.	288
Cuba	259	Maid of Orleans, The	523	Atkinson, Mother M. Alphonsus	336
Dawn of Modern England, The	210	Martires (los) de Uganda	117	Ballestrem, Count von	342
De qualitatibus sensibilibus	427	Martyrs of New France	162	Benavente, Rt. Rev. Fray M., O.P.	88
Diplomatist's Wife in Many Lands, A	234; 402	Max	139	Bonacum, Rt. Rev. Thomas A.	431
Direction pour rassurer dans leurs doutes les âmes timorées	69	Meditations According to St. Alphonsus	236	Brady, Rev. Francis X., S.J.	552
Direction pratique et morale pour vivre chrétiennement	69	Meditations Sacerdotales. L'Heure Du Matin ou	354	Bull, Dr. George Joseph	384
Dissolution of the Monasteries	20	Melchior of Boston	189; 235	Cahill, Rev. Samuel, S.J.	96
Dos Rosas	20	Mere Hints	236	Carroll, Governor John Lee	528
Duty. Twelve Conferences to Young Men	547	Mezzogiorno	522	Casey, Thomas	157
Early Steps in the Fold	258	Minister's Marriage, A	330	Cassidy, Peter A.	72
Education, How Old the New	234	Mission (la) du Canada avant Mgr. de Laval	619	Chouteau, Pierre	215
En Pénitence chez les Jésuites	90	Missions, Thoughts on Foreign	260	Colgan, Archbishop	504
Episodios Historicos de la Guerra de Independencia	20	Modjeska. Memoirs and Impressions of Helena	106; 234	Cruz, Don Anibal, Chilean Minister	288
Eric; or, The Black Finger	235	More Short Spiritual Readings for Mary's Children	236	Delphos, Rev. Alexis	456
Erziehung Zur Keuscheidt, Die	451	Mother Mary Aloysia Hardey	258	De Smedt, Rev. Charles, S.J.	575
L'Etat mystique	161	Mr. Ingleside	139	Dooley, Sister Mary Vincent	405
		My Mark Twain	188	Edwards, Professor James F.	408
		Ned Reider	403	L'Etourneau, Rev. Louis, C.S.C.	72
		Notes sur la Medecine et la Botanique des Anciens Mexicains	163	Fitzgerald, Mgr. Edward S.	431
		Notiones Archaeologia Christianae Disciplinis Theologicis Coordinate	225	Fitzgerald, Rev. Thomas, S.J.	263
		Old Christianity, vs. New Paganism	475	Forest, Right Rev. Anthony	552
		Old Mill on the Withrose, The	189	Fox, James D.	24
		One Christmas Eve at Roxbury Crossing	68; 189	Garesché, Rev. Frederick P., S.J.	240
		Our Lady's Lutenist	189	Gauvreau, Rt. Rev. Mgr.	525
		Our Lord's Last Will and Testament	260	Girouard, Hon. Désiré	600
				Goller, Very Rev. Hermann, S.J.	144
				Grant, Hugh J.	120
				Griffin, Right Rev. Mgr. Thomas, D.D.	264
				Harkins, Rt. Rev. Mgr. P. J.	239
				Heslin, Rt. Rev. Thomas	504
				Holmes, Mother Sainte Croix	480
				Horan, James, Fire Chief	312
				Jazdzewski, Dr. von	466
				Jullien, Rev. Michael, S.J.	479

Keating, Rev. Thomas S.	288
Kelly, Dr. Aloysius O. J.	504
Kennedy, Rev. J. D., LL.D.	336
Klopper, Very Rev. Wm., D.D.	239
La Farge, John	164
Lampe, Sister M. Frances de Chantal.	263
Loughlin, Rt. Rev. Mgr. James F.	600
Lyster, Right Rev. Dr., of Achonry.	431
Macdonell, Rev. Alan, S.J.	575
McDonald, John B.	554
McDonnell, Rev. M.	48
Moran, Sister Mary Agnes	192
Mother Mary Alphonsus (Atkinson)	336
Mother Sainte Croix (Holmes)	480
Mother St. Catherine	167
Muller, Rev. Augustus, S.J.	154
O'Connor, Very Rev. John F., S.J.	600; 623
O'Meara, Madame, R. S. H.	96
Oster, Rt. Rev. Mgr. Anatole, V.G.	239
Peters, Rev. H. J., S.J.	336
Pigeon, Sainte Croix	480
Sánchez, Most Rev. Manuel	167
Segna, Cardinal	336
Silva y Alvarez Fostado, Archbishop.	552
Sister Isidore	336
Sister Mary Agnes	192
Sister M. Frances de Chantal (Lampe).	263
Sister M. Vincent (Dooley)	405
Sister Sainte Croix (Pigeon)	480
Varosy, Archbishop Julius	214
Walsh, Dr. Michael	24

ADVERTISERS

Artists' Materials
Wingsor & Newton's.
Banks
Emigrant Industrial Savings Bank—Kings County Trust Co.
Book Binding
Eugene C. Lewis Co.
Brushes
E. J. Kelly.
Builders
Richard L. Walsh Company.
Camps
Berkshire Boys' Camp—Camp Portinimicut.
Cigars—Tobacco
Edwin Cigar Company—The Surbrug Company.
Dentists
Drs. Burke & Burke.

Dry Goods
Abraham & Straus—W. H. Baker Linen Co.—
Brokaw Bros.—John Wanamaker—O'Neill-
Adams Co.—M. Heminway & Sons' "Crochet Silks."
Duplicator
Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co.
Ecclesiastical Wares, etc.
The Gorham Company—The W. J. Feeley Company—Menceley Bell Co.—Joseph Sibbel Studio—Fr. Pustet & Co.—Bernardini Statuary
Co.—Benziger Bros.—American Seating Co.—
Mayer & Co.—Vermont Marble Co.—Peter
Theis' Sons—Wm. Purnell Co.
Educational Institutions
Academy of St. Joseph—Convent of the Holy Child—College of St. Catherine—College of St. Elizabeth—Convent of Jesus and Mary—Fordham University—Georgetown University
—Holy Cross Academy and High School—
Holy Cross College—Ladycliff—Helen A.
Hayes, King Opera School—Mount Saint Joseph-on-the-Wissahickon—Seton Hall College—
St. Mary's College, St. Marys, Kan.—Spring Hill College—Winona Seminary—Drake Business School—New York University—Convent of the Cenacle—Academy of Mt. St. Vincent —Academy of the Holy Family—Holy Angels
Academy—Immaculata Seminary—Mt. St.
Joseph Academy—Mt. de Chantal—Old Point
Comfort College—The McEvoy School—St.
Mary-of-the-Woods—St. John's Preparatory College—Carlton Academy—College of St.
Genevieve—Language Phone-Method—Laurel Hall School.
Electrical—General
James Reilly's Sons' Co.
Flooring—Interlocking Rubber Tiling and Mats
Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company—Cary
Mfg. Company (Steel Mats).
Fences
Enterprise Foundry and Fence Co.
Flowers and Plants
Wagner Park Conservatories.
Furniture—Office, etc.
Mullins' & Sons—Globe-Wernicke Co.—Finn Brothers.
Groceries
L. J. Callanan—New York Bottling Company
—Barnston Tea Company—Royal Baking Powder Co.—Enoch Morgan's Sons Co.—National Biscuit Company—"Parowax"—Liebig Company's Extract of Beef—New York and Columbia Coffee Co.—Anheuser-Busch "Malt Nutrine."
Hatters
E. M. Knox—E. N. Murphy.
Heating, Furnaces, etc.
Richardson & Boynton.

Inks, Mucilage, etc.
Chas. M. Higgins & Co.
Insurance—Fire
Liverpool and London and Globe Insurance Co.
Investments
Mercantile Trust Co., St. Louis—Maurice F.
Reidy.
Kitchen Utensils—Laundry Machinery
James Y. Watkins & Son.
Library Supplies
The Van Everen Company.
Oil Lamps and Heaters
Standard Oil Company.
Printing
The Meany Printing Company.
Photographer
E. F. Foley.
Publishers
Robert Appleton & Company—Benziger Bros.
—P. J. Kenedy & Sons—Longmans, Green &
Company—Chas. Scribner's Sons—S. S. Mc-Clure Company—M. H. Wiltzius Company—
Mission Church Press—Catholic Publication
Society of America.
Refrigerators
McCray Refrigerator Company.
Restaurant
O'Donnell's New Restaurant.
Rolling Partition
James G. Wilson Mfg. Co.
Sanitariums
Sacred Heart Sanitarium—St. Joseph's Sanitarium—American Carlsbad Sanatorium.
Shipbuilders
Ward & Company.
Shoes
James S. Coward.
Stationers
Dempsey & Carroll
Travel
John J. McGrane—Hamburg-American Line—
Agnes J. Kelly—The Gross Tours, Inc.—Columbus Travel Society.
Tree Expert
The Davey Tree Expert Co.
Typewriters
Victor Typewriter Company.
Typewriter Supplies
S. T. Smith Company.
Telephone
New York Telephone Company.
Vaseline
Chesebrough Mfg. Co.
Water Filters
Duplex Filter Company.
White-Washing Machines
McCormick Mfg. Co., Dayton, O.
Window Decoration
Wm. B. Quaile.

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Vol. IV, No. 1

(Price 10 Cents)

OCTOBER 15, 1910

($3.00 a year)

Whole No. 79

CHRONICLE

Washington Withholds Recognition—U. S. Supreme Court Changes—No Bridge Across the Hudson—Railway Safety Appliances—Trouble in Peru—Canada—Great Britain—Ireland—France—Germany—Progress of the Great Shipyards' Strike—Plan New German Metropolis—Catholic Churches in Berlin—What Austria Needs...1-4

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Protestant Missions, Past and Present—The Chief Justices—The Passing of the Supernatural—Article XXIX of the Concordat—Alexander Baumgartner, S.J.—On the Death of Chavez—Japan's Merchant Marine.....5-12

CORRESPONDENCE

Echoes of Mexico's Centenary—Belgium's Catholic Democratic League and the School Question—Austria's Catholic Congress.....13-15

EDITORIAL

Volume Four—Portugal—A New Triple Alliance?—What Spanish Religious Are Doing 16-18

STAMPS FOR SALE.....19

LITERATURE

Ballads of Irish Chivalry—By the Way—Dos Rosas—Episodios Historicos de la Guerra de Independencia—Dissolution of the Monasteries—The American Flower Garden—History of the Society of Jesus in North America, Colonial and Federal—Books received.....19-21

EDUCATION

Resolutions on Higher Education by General Convention, Knights of Columbus—High School Fraternities and Sororities Condemned....21-22

ECONOMICS

Crisis in the Meerscham Industry.....22

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

St. Patrick's Cathedral Consecration—New College Church, Emmitsburg—New Superior, St. Vincent's Seminary, Germantown, Penn.—Alumni of the Irish College, Rome.....23

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Messages from the Spirit World.....23-24

PERSONAL

Cardinal Vannutelli—Rev. John A. Kellner...24

OBITUARY

James D. Fox—Dr. Michael Walsh.....24

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

No Commercialism at Oberammergau.....24

CHRONICLE

Washington Withholds Recognition.—A circular note sent simultaneously to all the powers by Provisional President Braga, announcing that he has been proclaimed President of Portugal, that the revolution has been successful and that he has appointed a Cabinet, was received by the State Department at Washington on Oct. 7. The United States has not replied to the note. The State Department will not commit itself to a recognition of the new republic until proof of its stability is forthcoming. There are evidences of censorship in the news given out from Portugal, according to officials in Washington, who suggest that it is too early yet to judge accurately the status of the Government from the partisan pronunciamientos of the Braga régime.

U. S. Supreme Court Changes.—Associate Justice William H. Moody, of the United States Supreme Court, tendered his resignation to President Taft, to take effect on November 20. The President wrote accepting the resignation and expressing high regard for the retiring justice and regret that serious illness had made his resignation necessary. In retirement Mr. Moody will receive the full pay of an active member of the court, $12,000 a year. His successor, it is said, will not be announced until some time late in November.

Simple ceremonies in the audience room of the executive chamber at Albany marked the retirement of Governor Charles E. Hughes, of New York, and the inauguration of Lieutenant Governor White as his successor until January 1 next. Mr. Justice Hughes assumed the duties of his office, October 10.

No Bridge Across the Hudson.—For years many New Yorkers have dreamed of a bridge across the Hudson River which would connect the city with the Jersey shore. It looks now as though that dream would never be realized. The Hudson River Commission has been long actively at work on the plans for a bridge. For a while Fifty-ninth street was considered a possible point from which the bridge could be started on the New York side, but it was given up on account of the cost of the land that would be needed for the Manhattan approach. Dr. George F. Kunz, of the New York Academy of Science, in a recent address to the geological section of that society made known for the first time the adverse report of the engineers who were asked to examine the other sites proposed. From Storm King, near West Point to the lower end of Manhattan Island there is no bed rock in the river accessible for the support of bridge piers. A support in the middle of the stream or one about a third of the distance from each shore is absolutely necessary to hold up a bridge, because at no point is the stream less than 3,900 feet across, which is too wide for a single span. Borings were made particularly off One Hundred and Seventy-ninth and One Hundred and Ninth streets; the two points considered best adapted for the Manhattan approach to the bridge. Fifteen hundred feet from shore at the uptown location and at a depth of 170 feet nothing but silt and mud was found. Rock was reached at 67 feet off the Jersey shore. Practically the same conditions were found to exist further down the stream. After all its proud boasts there are a few simple things which science admits it cannot do.

Railway Safety Appliances.—Definite standards of safety appliances to be attached to railway cars and locomotives have at last been agreed upon after nearly a third of a century of effort. The proposed changes in equipment will cost the railroads about $50,000,000. The agreement was reached by a committee appointed recently by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It consisted of fifteen representatives equally chosen from the operating departments of railroads, safety appliance inspectors and railroad operatives. The Interstate Commerce Commission had been given six months in which to frame and make effective suitable standards of safety appliances. The order of the commission goes into effect at once. The agreement reached will apply naturally to new equipment only, but the commission from time to time will determine what the standards shall be on the present equipment.

Trouble in Peru.—The protocol signed by the Peruvian representative, Señor Felipe Pardo, and Secretary of State Knox, relative to an arrangement of the boundary dispute between Peru and Ecuador has caused an outburst of popular resentment that may result in declaring the Peruvian presidency vacant. Louis Ulloa, an influential publicist, has published in Lima an inflammatory article in which he asserts that as the United States is intent upon obtaining from Ecuador the cession of the Galápagos Islands, which are of great strategic importance in relation to Panama, the decision will surely be given against Peru. The general opinion at Lima is that the Peruvian Congress will oust the President and make other arrangements to settle the boundary dispute.

Canada.—The feeling against reciprocity with the United States is growing even among Liberals. It is stated that whatever negotiations are undertaken will refer principally to natural products, and that the inclusion in them of agricultural implements, of which the free admission is the chief demand of the western farmers, is only probable.—The opening of a trade route to Europe through Hudson Bay, is the subject of much discussion. Some maintain that there is no certainty that Hudson Straits are open to safe navigation every year, and that even though they be so, the season is so short as to make the scheme impracticable. Others reply that navigation is open and safe for nearly four months, and instance Archangel as a port that for centuries has carried on a profitable trade under similar conditions. Their opponents deny the justice of the comparison. Archangel has the material of its trade close at hand, while a port on Hudson Bay must be connected with the sources of its material by railway a thousand miles in length.—An official of the British Columbian Department of Mines has given a report on Bitter Creek. He says that he was shown some good specimens, but he denies absolutely not only the sensational stories which caused such excitement in Great Britain during last spring, but also the proved existence of gold in any quantities, either in placers or in lodes.—Lieutenant-Governor Fraser of Nova Scotia is dead. He is said to have been, first of all, a Canadian, loving equally English, Scotch, Irish, French and Acadian, and loved by all. Lieutenant-Governor Belaya of Alberta has been reappointed for another term of five years. Mr. George W. Brown of Regina has been appointed to succeed Lieutenant-Governor Forget.

Great Britain.—The opinion seems to be general that the conference over the reform of the House of Lords will turn out a failure, and that there will be a general election next January.—Lord Charles Beresford has written an open letter to the Prime Minister on the naval program, pointing out that it is insufficient in view of that of the triple alliance. He demands more ships of the highest class and suggests a loan for the purpose of paying for them.—The question of payment of members of parliament is being discussed, and may probably play a considerable part in the next election. The Unionists are generally opposed to it; but some who wish to see Unionists workingmen returned, favor it. On the other hand, the Liberals are also by no means of one mind in the matter.—The annual Anglican Church Congress met at Cambridge. The Archbishop of York stated that the national Church had before it the task of educating its members; "for to the majority of Churchmen the conception of their Church as a great spiritual society with its own faith to teach; its own witness to give, its own moral law to uphold, had scarcely yet appeared in the horizon." There was a time when every Englishman thus apprehended the Church. The idea was lost at the Reformation. An admission more damaging to the fantastic theory of continuity could hardly be made.—Dr. Maclagan, for many years Archbishop of York, who resigned his see last year, is dead. He was one of those prelates, who, having been Presbyterians, are a cause of much anxiety to many Anglicans on account of the doubtfulness of their baptism.

Ireland.—The report on Irish trade for 1909, by the Department of Agriculture, shows a remarkable increase in exports over any previous year for which statistics are available, especially in manufactured goods, such as woollens, linen, cotton, yarn, leather, etc., which rose from $110,000,000 in 1908, to $150,000,000 in 1909. The total exports show an increase from $290,000,000 in 1908, to $408,000,000 in 1909. There is a large decline in whiskey exports, while porter shows a corresponding increase. The improvement was coincident with the arrest of decline in population for the first time in half a century and with a large increase of acreage under tillage.—The Ventry estate of over 100,000 acres in the most congested district in Kerry has been purchased by the Congested Districts Board and sold to the tenantry at reasonable terms. The successful issue of the negotiations, due to the ability and energy of Mr. Thos. O'Donnell, M.P., has brought peace to a district which has been long the scene of much suffering and consequent disturbance. The acquisition of proprietorship is not confined to agricultural tenants. Several towns in various parts of Ireland have been recently sold to the tenants, and negotiations are proceeding for the transfer of others to the occupiers.—The agitation in England for the payment of members of parliament, supported by prominent Unionists, is followed with interest in Ireland. The Dublin Independent favors it on the ground that it would relieve the Irish Party of the necessity of appealing for financial support outside of Ireland, would improve the standard of representation by attracting able men who cannot now afford the expense and will not accept private compensation, and would raise the tone of the Party by making members responsible to their constituents and not to a paymaster. The same paper calculates from the financial returns for the half year that Ireland's increase of taxation in 1910 will be $8,100,000, instead of $3,000,000, as estimated by Lloyd George.—In response to a cablegram from Mr. M. J. Ryan, announcing that the Buffalo Convention of the Irish National League had subscribed $151,000 to the Irish cause, Bishop O'Donnell, of Raphoe, cabled his satisfaction, saying that the generosity of Irish-America "ensures the union and discipline in the ranks that are the condition of freedom."—The Dublin Corporation, a predominantly Nationalist and Catholic body, has conferred the freedom of the city, by unanimous vote, on the distinguished Dublin physician, Sir Charles Cameron, a Protestant and Unionist, for his great services to civic health and sanitation. On the same day a prominent Protestant church dignitary had inveighed against the narrow partisanship of the Dublin Aldermen.—Mr. Fionan McCullum, delegate of the Gaelic League to the United States, has left Ireland bearing strong recommendations from Dr. Douglas Hyde. He will be joined by Rev. M. O'Flanagan, the other delegate, towards the end of the month.

France.—When there was question of an income-tax a few years ago, the men who make the laws decreed that the $3,000 which each deputy draws is not a "salary" but an "indemnity" and consequently cannot be taxed. But they were not so cunning as they imagined. An "indemnity" is liable to seizure for debt whereas only one-fifth of a salary can be attached. So that the provident legislators who voted to increase their own "salary" or "indemnity" have no protection in case they run into debt. Thus has iniquity o'erleaped itself.—One of the public anxieties in France at the present time is where the people can find meat to eat. The export of as small a number as 10,000 cattle would send the prices soaring, and that added to the already high cost of other necessities of life would cause considerable suffering.—The "appeasement" promised by Briand is generally recognized as containing no promise of concession to Catholics. Indeed it has been continually repeated by the supporters of the Prime Minister that there is to be absolutely no recession from the line of aggressive policy which the Government has hitherto pursued. Even Paul Deschanel, on whom Catholics at one time built such hopes, says that "when we talk of administering the Government for the advantage of every one, that does not mean that we are going to hand the Republic over to our enemies," namely, the Catholics.—The question of First Communion is causing no end of trouble in France. Mgr. Chapon, the Bishop of Nice, for example, writes to Cardinal Coullié, of Lyons, regretting bitterly the anticipation of the time at which children formerly made their First Communion. He fancies he perceives all sorts of disasters as a result of the Papal decree.—A short time ago some representatives from Paris were entertained at a banquet in Brussels by the Bourgemestre Max who is said to be a Freemason. The Belgians have the reputation of being hospitable, but possibly under the influence of the generous wines, Max recalled with effusiveness that the historic destinies of France and Belgium were often identical, that Belgium and France had the same language, and also a common religion, the religion of progress. These assertions have very properly evoked the wrath of the Bien Public of Ghent, which recalls the fact that French domination brought nothing but disaster to Belgium, that their language is not common, for the largest and best part of Belgium is Flemish and not French; and, finally, that the religion of Belgium is the religion of progress indeed, but not in the French sense; it is the religion of the Holy Catholic Church. What particularly irritated the Belgians was to find their country designated as "a little corner of France."—At a solemn meeting of a grand Freemason lodge a motion was made and carried by acclamation denouncing the King of Spain; another motion called for the suppression of all free professional schools. The subjects of debate were "Lay Morality," "Trade Syndicates," "Espionage in the Army," "The Death Penalty," in which Cohen, a name which suggests the Jew, demanded its suppression, and a protest was also made against flogging the Apaches. The woman question brought out a protest against women being admitted as members of the Grand Orient. Brother Kais, presumably another Jew, protested against the graft of Government and Freemason moneys. The report of how Catholics were driven out of all Government positions was listened to with pleasure as was also the account of the campaign which was inaugurated to do away with the office of country parish-priests.

Germany.—The very remarkable ovations accompanying the Emperor William's welcome during his late visit to Vienna have caused great satisfaction throughout the empire, and his address has been enthusiastically approved by the press generally.—The rumor that one object of William's journey to Austria was to arrange a marriage between his only daughter, Princess Victoria Louise, and Archduke Charles Francis Joseph, the next in succession to the Austrian throne after Francis Ferdinand, is denied. Religious differences would prove an insurmountable obstacle to the union, it is declared.—It is not yet known how great will be the deficit in the budget to be laid before the Reichstag in its approaching session. The State Secretary of the Treasury is reported at his wit's end over the preparation of the bill. Nevertheless, after consultation with his department heads Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg has announced that no changes in tax schedules will be attempted prior to the next elections of the imperial legislative body.

Progress of the Great Shipyards' Strike.—The struggle for an increase of wages, begun weeks ago in the shipyards of Germany, is still on and already merits record as the most disastrous of all labor conflicts waged in Europe. In consequence of the strike 22,112 workmen in these yards found themselves out of employment at the end of September. It will be remembered that metal workers took early action in sympathy with the shipyards' strikers, and that leaders of the employers' association threatened a general lockout of metal workers in case they persisted in their sympathetic attitude. Negotiations which have been going on with the object of preventing a lockout seem to have failed, both masters and workmen declaring their determination not to withdraw from their respective positions. Nearly 100,000 men are affected in Berlin alone, while it is estimated that at least 500,000 throughout Germany will be turned out should the lockout prevail. It is believed that the Government will be obliged to intervene.

Plan New German Metropolis.—Chicago having pushed Berlin into fifth place among the great cities of the world, it is now proposed to create a new German metropolis, with a ready-made population of over 2,500,000. This achievement is to be attained by amalgamating fifteen towns in the province of Westphalia. A project covering the preliminary details soon will be submitted to the various aldermanic bodies of the towns, which it is hoped will consolidate. Local differences may postpone the realization of the scheme for some time. The towns in question are flourishing communities, among them being such mighty industrial centres as Essen, the seat of the world-famed Krupp armor and cannon works; Düsseldorf, the great steel town of Germany, and Barmen, whose immense textile factories make it a German edition of Fall River.

Catholic Churches in Berlin.—The great capital of the German empire is ordinarily classed as a distinctively Protestant city. It will be news, then, to most people to learn that even Munich, the reputed first of Catholic cities in Germany, includes but a slightly greater number of Catholics in its population, than does Berlin. Greater Berlin, the capital proper with its immediate suburbs, has to-day a Catholic population of more than 350,000 souls, divided among 40 parishes. In 74 parish and succursal churches and chapels Mass is said every day. The parishes compare very favorably with those of more Catholic lands. St. Hedwig's, for example, numbers 31,400 souls; that of the Sacred Heart, 20,000; that of St. Matthias' 25,000; St. Michael's over 22,000; the parish of Charlottenburg 24,000, besides some few others which pass the 20,000 mark. All this is the more surprising since the majority of the parishes and succursal stations date no farther back than 1890. The Catholic population is largely made up of Poles, and of Germans who have streamed into the city from other parts of the empire. Most of the newcomers are of the poorer classes, who have come to Berlin to find employment. Naturally they can do little towards the material development of the Church. The charity of their fellow Catholics must aid them in this.

What Austria Needs.—Commenting on the repeated references during the Innsbruck Catholic Congress to the need of unity and harmony among the peoples making up the empire, a distinguished Salzburg journalist has this to say: "The parliamentary elections of the year 1907 showed a decisive majority of Catholic voters among the Germans, Slovenians, Italians, Czechs and Poles. It is possible then, if the chosen representatives of our many peoples agree to unite on a common Catholic platform, to send to the Reichsrath a party strong enough to assure a ministry that will in every condition be heedful of Catholic interests. Why is it that we fail to do so. Is it because the national spirit rules more strongly among us than does our love of our Church and its well-being? Candidly the selfishness of our national spirit appears to have but one controlling restraint, each people fears to take any decided action lest it give opportunity to the other factions to group together and overwhelm it. It is this radical "Nationalism" that constitutes the real danger facing Austria and the Catholic Church to-day. To preserve the empire it is above all else necessary to secure peace and harmony among our constituent races and peoples, and no one should realize better than does the Catholic how sacred is the duty placed upon him by love of country and love of Church to labor to this end. Mazzini taught us the principle: 'To destroy Austria, it will be necessary first to inflame its people against one another.' When Catholics will have learned the lesson we shall speedily see active among us a genuinely Catholic party, holding fast in united numbers to the essentials that make for the common welfare of our empire and unselfishly considerate as well of the interests that touch the well-being of each race and people within its borders."

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Protestant Missions, Past and Present

A special correspondent of the Chicago Record-Herald wrote lately from Constantinople a letter so frank as to be really instructive. It begins with the assertion that nowhere do American Protestant missions come so near their ideal as in the Ottoman Empire, and justifies the statement by saying that the missionaries, not confining themselves to the making of converts to Christianity, labor more successfully for the material than for the spiritual welfare of the people. To them, according to the correspondent, Turkey owes the electric telegraph, the sewing machine, the printing press, modern agricultural implements, the tomato, the potato, hospitals, dispensaries, and modern schools and lastly, the Bible, readable in his native tongue, to every Turk who can read, but, we may infer, generally unread, because Protestant missionaries always find their goods more readily received than their religion.

The missionaries accept cheerfully the inevitable conditions; and so, the letter tells us, their farthest reaching work is education. They see to it that every pupil leaving their schools carries with him the germ, not of Christianity, but of progress. For more than half a century they have been working to prepare the people for the great change that has come over them recently. They do not teach revolution nor encourage revolutionary methods; but they have always preached liberty, equality, fraternity and the rights of man. These terms are ambiguous. One may preach liberty, equality, fraternity and the rights of man in the sense of the French Revolution, or in the sense of the Catholic Church, or in one of the many wrong senses lying between those two extremes and approaching, more or less, the former. It goes without saying that the Protestant missionaries did not preach them in the Catholic sense, the only true one. Consequently when they say they have neither taught nor encouraged revolution, one thinks of Mr. Winkle earnestly entreating Mr. Snodgrass not to call on the peace officers to prevent his duel with Dr. Slammer, and admires the Turks' perspicacity, so much keener than that of the poetic Pickwickian.

But things were not always so. The correspondent of the Record-Herald puts half a century roughly as the period of these missionary activities. Eighty years, however, have elapsed since the American Board of Foreign Missions sent to Turkey its first agents styled by the Greek Holy Synod, "blasphemous and impious Calvinists and Nestorians," and by an Athenian newspaper, "apostles of the devil." As we learn from one of their own historians (History of Christian Missions, by Rev. William Brown, M.D. 3 vols. London, 1864), the report went abroad that they were paying per head for conversion a miraculous ten piastres which the convert could not diminish no matter how lavish might be his spending; that to ensure stability in the new religion they took the picture of every convert, and, should any fall away, they would shoot his picture and the backslider would fall dead. A Moslem came saying that he understood they were hiring people to worship the devil, and offered to join them with a hundred others should their terms be satisfactory. But the day of the free dispensary had not dawned. Christians offered to become Protestants hoping to escape taxation and to enjoy the protection of the British Consuls, and were told such hopes were vain. The day of preaching liberty, equality, fraternity and the rights of man was still distant, and the willing converts were lost. One would sell himself for a piece of bread to hear the Gospel; the sun of the tomato and the potato was many degrees below the horizon, and he too was repelled. Neither temporal benefits nor political formulas had place in the system of these missionaries. They had come to persuade Oriental Christians to give up the veneration of saints and images and the confession of sins to a priest, and to receive in place of these what they called the pure Gospel, and for nothing else. They were mad fanatics. One of them could write on the most holy day of our Lord's Passion: "This has been a high day with Catholics here, and I could not but feel when I saw even Turks laughing at the ceremonies they witnessed, that they were in the right." (The missionary's indignation made him negligent of grammar, but in his intention the last "they" refers to "Turks," not to "Catholics.") All the earnestness of the fanatic was theirs, yet they had to confess failure. To please his employers one might report that many Armenians were turning away wonderfully from fables to the Word of God, but he could not stop here. Sometimes truth insists that

"turpiter atrum

Desinat in piscem mulier formosa superne,"

and so the glittering generality ends in a hope, greatly mixed with doubt, that a modest "several" are giving evidence of true piety.

Such a perversion of Eastern Christians could be the dream only of men utterly ignorant of their character and history. Even Catholics do not always understand them. A Syrian applied for admission into a certain sodality of the Blessed Virgin. The director with the unformulated popular idea that everything on the farther Mediterranean shore is infected with Mohammedanism, asked: "But are you a Christian?" "What!" exclaimed the Syrian. "Am I a Christian? I am the fellow-countryman of Our Lord Jesus Christ." Armenians, Greeks and Maronites were civilized Christians when our ancestors were devil-worshipping barbarians. As for Protestantism sprung from renegades, it is beneath the contempt of men who received from saints their religious rites and had handed them down from generation to generation for more than a thousand years when the apostates of the sixteenth century made their appearance.

England's policy in the East required it to imitate France and Russia in the protection of missions, and in 1850 it obtained from the Sultan a formal recognition of the Protestant missions. When one sees that the patrons of the missionaries were such men as Stratford Canning and Palmerston, he is at liberty to suspect that the connection between that recognition and the change of mission policy to the preaching of material progress and the educating of the Turk for the change to come, was something more than a mere coincidence in time, and the half century of the Record-Herald's correspondent strengthens the suspicion.

However this may have been, thoughtful Protestants ought to be struck with the revolution in Protestant missionary methods. Yet, though the kingdom of this world be substituted for the kingdom of Christ, and material civilization for salvation, such Protestants are not impressed. Minding earthly things they glory in their shame. This was the note taken by a meeting of the Laymen's Missionary Movement in this city some time ago. It was taken again by a meeting of Presbyterian ministers in the beginning of this month. A distinguished Catholic preacher had asserted that Protestantism is a soulless religion. The assembled Presbyterian ministers of New York answered him in these words: "Our nation is Protestant. Until the Roman Church can cite a nation that has risen under Catholicism as rapidly and gloriously, Father Vaughan needs no refutation." According to them, then, the development of this nation has been along the lines of Protestantism. No one can say that it has been along the lines of the Gospel. The boast of the ministers is a confession that the materialism of which we speak, has entered into the bones and the marrow and the very substance of their religion, and reveals itself in its domestic operations as well as in its missionary efforts.

But in Asia, as in the United States, the Catholic Church maintains the faith once given to the saints. A glance at the Atlas of Missions will show her establishments everywhere. In them men and women are prepared for the great change to come, not a political revolution, such things are foreign to the Church, but that which will come to all God's children when the trumpet shall sound and we shall be changed.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

The Chief Justices

"God save the United States and this honorable court," and the first session of the Supreme Court had begun. It was the month of February, 1790, and the first chief justice, John Jay, presided at the first official function of this third co-ordinate branch of the newly established republic. New York was still the capital, although it was soon to lose that distinction, and there the court convened.

The judiciary bill, which provided for the Supreme Court, had been approved by President Washington on September 24, 1789, and on the same day, he had submitted to the Senate for confirmation his nominees for chief justice and five justices, John Jay, a native of New York City, heading the list.

Jay had taken an active part in political affairs and had collaborated with Alexander Hamilton in writing in favor of the ratification of the Constitution. Unlike some prominent men of his time, his private life was above reproach, but he bore a dislike which amounted to hatred for the Catholic Church. He had even endeavored to secure a constitutional provision in virtue of which no Catholic could become a naturalized citizen, for he had contended for the renunciation of that spiritual dependence which Catholics have upon the Pope as visible Head of the Church. The chief justice was of Huguenot ancestry. While absent in England on public business, he was elected without his knowledge to the office of Governor of New York, and resigned the chief justiceship to assume his new duties on July 1, 1795.

John Rutledge, a native of South Carolina, of Irish Presbyterian stock, was one of the first justices, but had resigned to become chief justice of his native State. Though, like all Washington's appointees to the Supreme Court, he was a pronounced Federalist in his political views, he was so outspoken in his opposition to the treaty which Jay had negotiated with Great Britain that when his name was proposed by President Washington for the honorable post of chief justice, it was rejected by the Senate. As he had been named when the Senate was not in session, he presided for a few weeks and then, failing to be confirmed, retired to his State. Some do not count him among the chief justices. William Cushing, of Massachusetts, also one of the first justices, was then nominated and was duly confirmed, but he declined to serve.

Oliver Ellsworth, a native of Windsor, Connecticut, became chief justice on March 4, 1796. He was a United States Senator at the time, and had framed the bill constituting the tribunal over which he was then called to preside. As a member of the constitutional convention, he had originated the plan for reconciling the weak States and the powerful States by providing different systems of representation in the Senate and the House. After four years of service, he resigned on account of impaired health.

Barely six weeks before retiring from office, President John Adams made the most important appointment of his whole administration when he named the illustrious John Marshall, of Virginia, for the post vacated by Ellsworth. The Federalists had lost control of the Congress and the Executive, but by this appointment they remained entrenched in the Supreme Court, for, with one exception of little importance, the chief justice's opinion prevailed in every question that came up for settlement during the thirty-four years of his incumbency.

Only twice during its existence has a decision of the Supreme Court been openly defied by the Federal Executive, and both instances occurred while Marshall was chief justice. The first was at the opening of Jefferson's administration and the second was in the stormy times of Andrew Jackson.

Roger B. Taney of Maryland had been taken into President Jackson's official family as attorney general and, against all the other members of the cabinet, had decided in favor of the legality of the strenuous old general's intention to withdraw the Government deposits from the United States Bank. Secretary Duane of the Treasury resigned rather than do the President's bidding. Taney then became Secretary of the Treasury while the Congress was not in session, and withdrew the funds. The Senate rejected the nomination, as it did two years later when his name was sent in for a seat in the Supreme Court. At that time, party names were loosely applied, if applied at all. Voters were "Jackson men" or "anti-Jackson men," although the terms "Whig," and "Democrat" were in the air. By the end of 1836, the "Jackson men" were in control of the Senate, so that when Roger B. Taney was named to succeed Marshall, the President's choice was duly confirmed, and for the first time in its history the republic had a chief justice from outside the Federalist school of politics. From January, 1837, to October 12, 1864, Chief Justice Taney presided over the deliberations and decisions of the Supreme Court. Party feeling and sectional prejudice, which had developed renewed activity after the administration of President Monroe, assumed even a more pronounced attitude during Chief Justice Taney's incumbency, and he went down to the grave with the country in the bitterness of an internecine conflict.

If antecedents could make a man unfit for the highest judicial office in the land, one might say that a certain son of New Hampshire long domiciled in Ohio, might become anything but chief justice; yet Salmon P. Chase was nominated by President Lincoln and confirmed by the Senate. Nobody denied his ability, as nobody denied his irascibility and ambition, yet he demeaned himself with judicious gravity and judicial impartiality in the trying time of Reconstruction which followed the war. However, as chief justice, he had the distinction, unique in the Supreme Court, of cherishing beneath the folds of his silken gown a mighty hunger and thirst for the Presidency. He served for nine years.

Another New Englander, long resident in Ohio, Morrison R. Waite, a native of Connecticut, succeeded as the second Republican chief justice. He had been a member of the Geneva Tribunal to settle the Alabama claims and enjoyed a reputation for uprightness and ability. Upon his death in 1888, the occasion was presented for the first time in fifty-two years for the appointment of a Democratic chief justice. President Cleveland's choice fell upon Melville W. Fuller, a native of Maine, who had long been prominent in legal circles in Chicago. His death a few months since opens the way for the third Republican chief justice.

We see, therefore, that since the creation of the Supreme Court in 1789, there have been only eight chief justices, four Federalists, two Democrats, and two Republicans. The youngest at the time of his nomination was John Jay, who was forty-four years of age. He resigned after six years of service, though he lived to the age of seventy-four. The oldest was Roger B. Taney, who was promoted at the age of fifty-nine and died in office at the age of eighty-seven. Four were born in New England, one of New York, and three in the South.

Since from the beginning of our national existence, there have been two political schools, varying chiefly in their view of the meaning of the Organic Law, these schools have had their spokesmen and advocates in the Supreme Court and in the chair of the chief justice. As many constitutional questions reach that tribunal, it is manifest that though the justices are very reasonably supposed to be outside the field of party politics, their views of the Constitution must have great weight in their deliberations and influence over their decisions. Hence the importance attached to all nominations to the Supreme Court. Although in times of strong party feeling, some of its decisions have caused an uproar in the country and have provoked the most bitter and inflammatory utterances, it is admitted that all our chief justices have been upright men far from the suspicion of venality, even if some of them were charged with narrowminded partisanship.

The chief justice enjoys a primacy of honor but not of jurisdiction. In determining the merits of a case, his vote counts no more than that of any other member of the court. He presides, just as in his absence the senior justice in point of service on the bench presides. If the Supreme Court were now in session, Mr. Justice Harlan of Kentucky, who has been a member of the court since 1877, would be seen in the place of greatest honor.

A study of the membership of the Supreme Court from Washington's day to our own shows us that five States, namely, New York, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Maryland and Ohio, have furnished thirty-three of the sixty-four justices; of the "Old Thirteen," Delaware and Rhode Island have never been represented; citizens of only twenty-three States have been honored with appointments; and only one incumbent, Mr. Justice White of Louisiana, was born west of the Mississippi.

Although there is no law against it, no justice has ever been raised to the dignity of chief justice. If Governor Hughes of New York, who was named justice before the death of Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, were to succeed that illustrious jurist, the custom would be broken.

Far removed from the noisy contentions of every-day politics the Supreme Court has upheld the honor of the republic and has maintained its own dignity in a way to make every American proud of his country. "God save the United States and this honorable court."

D. P. SULLIVAN.

The Passing of the Supernatural

The Journal of Philosophy, Psychology and Scientific Methods deems it worth while to devote twenty pages (almost the entire number of Sept. 29, 1910), to an article on "The Passing of the Supernatural," by Alfred H. Lloyd, of the University of Michigan. This writer brings forward testimony from the utterances of prominent authors and educators of our day; he appeals to facts of religious indifference and religious antipathy on the part of large numbers of all classes; finally he rests his argument on the universal law of decay and growth, to prove the waning of a Christianity that implies the supernatural, and the advent of a new religion that will dispense with it. He might with equal force have proposed these same arguments almost any time during the past two thousand years, yet Christianity has lived on.

The most cursory reader will gather that there lies beneath this whole course of argumentation a lamentable confusion between Christianity as embodied in Christ's Church, and the thousand passing phases of false Christianity that from the first century onward have followed the law of merely human institutions. The great boast of Christianity proper is that it is above this law of decay and growth, and neither history in the past nor any sign of the times to-day points in any other direction.

Read the article of Father Benson in a recent number of the Atlantic Monthly, verify its statements, and say whether true Christianity fails to appeal to the real intellect of to-day. Put your ear to the ground and hear the heart whisperings of the "plain man" as he kneels in adoration at the foot of Mount Royal and ask the same question in his regard.

However, it is not merely in the domain of fact that this article abounds in gratuitous assertions; with the cool assurance so characteristic of his school, Professor Lloyd marks off his distinctions of the supernatural and in the light of a fantastic philosophy, without pretense of argument, proceeds to interpret and explain the "passing." Other distinctions and qualifications should have been made long before he reached the discussion of the supernatural.

No analogy drawn from the process by which a species is preserved and even advanced through the sacrifice of individuals is applicable to the Catholic Church, for the simple reason that that Church is unique in its species. Here the "letter and spirit," "soul and body" have been so firmly welded that no power can break that union while the world lasts. As this Society, unlike other organizations, owes its formation to something far beyond merely human and natural development, so its maintenance and growth are in a very real sense independent of the weakness and malice of men and the laws of the natural world.

But this writer will hear of no "being, or power, or region, or substance" really apart from and above the natural. This would be "on the whole a medieval view," despite the fact that it is the conviction of several hundred millions of the world's inhabitants to-day, including a very fair proportion of its best intellect. He prefers to discuss the passing of such a supernatural as is compatible with his own philosophy. Stripped of confusing verbiage one gathers that philosophy to be a recent form of the philosophy of experience. Its last word is that ultimate reality—total reality—is the active striving of man in nature—back of him the centuries of experience through which he has reached his present status, stretching out before him the vast, undefined, boundless sea of future possibility. But the ultimate is not reached so easily. What is man and his experience? What is the ocean of pure possibility? These are among the first questions in any serious philosophy.

Building on such a sandy foundation Professor Lloyd constructs his theory of the supernatural. "Select," he says in substance, "any portion you wish of actual, realized human experience; contrast it with the preceding stage and you have the supernatural; you have there the only existing God, the only existing heaven that there is—a God and a heaven not above nor distinct from, but immanent in nature. But that God and that heaven are doomed to pass—mortal like the world they compose; your comforting thought is that they will make way for a better God, a better heaven, and a better world. This supernatural is but partial; the supernatural par excellence—in toto—is nothing more than the wide realm of possibility itself."

Very few really great, very few really trained minds will be brought under the captivity of such a shallow philosophy as this. Still less danger is there that it will banish the supernatural either from its throne in heaven or from the mind of humanity. But what it does effect and will effect is to weaken and destroy faith and morals, right thinking and right living in the immature minds and unformed hearts of a multitude of our American college youth who are being fed on it. The real supernatural will not die, the true Christian Church will not fall; but they will be driven out of many individual lives and their entrance to many others effectually blocked where the freedom of university chairs is given to such teaching.

J. J. LUNNY, S.J.

Article XXIX of the Concordat

"To the end that there may be in all the Peninsula clergymen and evangelical laborers in sufficient number, whom the bishops may be able to employ on missions in various parts of their dioceses, to assist the parish priests, to help the sick, and in other works of charity and public utility, Her Majesty's Government, which intends to make timely provision for bettering the condition of the colleges destined to train missionaries for the colonial possessions, will at once take steps, after referring the matter to the Ordinaries; for the establishment of houses and religious Congregations of St. Vincent de Paul, St.

Philip Neri, and another Order of those approved by the Apostolic See, which shall serve at the same time as places of retreat for ecclesiastics, for spiritual exercises, and for other pious purposes."

Much of the discussion which has gone on about the status of the religious Orders in Spain is made to hinge on the above article of the Concordat of 1851, between Pope Pius IX and Queen Isabella II. We have seen fit, therefore, to reproduce it in full, for the convenience of our readers, to whom the Latin or the Spanish text may not be accessible. It will be observed that the quotation speaks only of calling into existence under Government patronage certain religious institutes for helping the parish priests in giving "missions" and in charitable work generally, and of improving the condition of the missionary colleges which educated priests for Spain's then very considerable transmarine possessions.

In fixing the stipends of the prelates, the income of the seminaries, and the allowance for public worship, the Spanish Government also bound itself, by a flimsy thread, it is true, to provide for the temporal wants of the institutes named in Art. XXIX. "Her Majesty's Government," we read in Art. XXXV, "will provide by the most suitable means for the support of the houses and religious Congregations which are mentioned in Art. XXIX."

As far as the Concordat is concerned, we now have the case fairly before us; but for its proper understanding, we must go back to the last days of Ferdinand VII, father of Isabella II, and the years that immediately followed his death. Ferdinand had espoused and buried three wives without being blessed with an heir to his throne. His fourth venture joined him with Doña Cristina of the royal house of Naples, who bore him a daughter, Isabella, who was in her third year when the king breathed his last in 1833. Under the old Salic law, which had long been in force in Spain, only males could succeed to the throne. The case of the great Isabella the Catholic was no exception, for she was Queen, not of Spain, but of Castile and Leon, parts of the present kingdom. Ferdinand, however, had set aside the Salic law, thus making his little daughter eligible, but his younger brother, Don Carlos, who stood next in order of succession, maintained that the act was not properly that of the old king but of Doña Cristina and the ministers of the crown who had taken unfair advantage of Ferdinand's affected mentality, and had obtained the revocation through trickery. The world is not in possession of conclusive evidence, at this late day, to settle the question between the rival claimants.

In the war which broke out on the demise of the king, Doña Cristina as Queen Regent for Isabella fought her battles and called upon the so-called Liberals and the Freemasons to crush the Carlists. It was the old story of seeking an alliance with evil associates, for Doña Cristina's supporters turned on her, placed her under arrest, and eventually forced her to retire from the regency. The "Radicals" among her whilom auxiliaries got control of the country and inaugurated a period of anarchy and outrage in which religious houses were burned and their inmates were butchered by frenzied mobs. The ministry suppressed all religious Orders and declared their estates the property of the nation. During these years of worse than civil war, the child queen had no voice in public affairs. She was still but a child, namely, a girl of thirteen, when the Cortes of 1843 declared her "of age." What personal influence could such an infant have in the councils of a kingdom rent with discord, a prey to anarchy, and pillaged by robbers and vandals?

Quoting from the statistics of 1835, we find there were twenty-seven religious Orders of men with members varying in number from under a hundred to 11,232 Franciscans in a total of 31,161. The seven next Orders in point of numbers just about equaled the Franciscans, who, it will be noted, constituted nearly one-third of the religious in the kingdom. Their property was confiscated to the crown and rapidly disposed of for ridiculously small sums; but many priceless works of art and invaluable monastic libraries were wantonly destroyed by the ruffians whose insignia were the firebrand and the sword.

Shortly after going through the formality of assuming the sceptre of Government, Queen Isabella obtained the services of General Narváez, who had the ability and the will to reduce the chaotic country to something like order and peace. He was at the head of affairs when the preliminary steps for the Concordat of 1851 were taken, but retired a few weeks before it was signed. This solemn "Law of the State," as it is called in the document itself, met with scant courtesy at the hands of his successor, General Espartero, Doña Cristina's admiring counselor, who displayed his law-abiding propensities by ordering, in defiance of the Concordat, the sale of certain Church properties which, also in defiance of the Concordat, had been retained by the Government. But the good and gentle Pius IX, willing to strain every point for the sake of souls, acceded to an additional Agreement on August 25, 1859, in which (Art. XX), he waived all claim to the property of which the Church had been robbed by this fresh rascality of Spain's minister and actual master. The same Agreement re-affirmed the Concordat of 1851, one more article of which must be quoted: "Art. XLIII. All the rest pertaining to ecclesiastical persons or things for which no provision is made in the preceding articles will be directed and administered according to the discipline of the Church canonically in force."

The Spanish Government had done mischief that it could not undo; it had wrought ruin where restoration and repair were beyond its power; but it was ready to do something towards righting an enormous wrong. Of the wealth of the Church and the Orders, which it had seized and sold, it would make restitution to the extent of supporting the bishops and the parish priests with their assistants, of keeping up churches and seminaries, of providing for colleges of missionaries, and of contributing towards the maintenance of three Orders of men, the Sisters of Charity, and other religious women. All other Orders were neither named nor excluded: the Government simply did not bind itself to do anything for them. As a matter of fact, however, it did recognize other Orders, employing their members, promoting them to honorable positions, and recognizing their worth by conferring on them those distinctions and decorations with which royal governments are wont to reward conspicuous merit.

Now and then the secular press sings a jeremiad about the awful drain that contemplative nuns are on the resources of a nation. Men who write thus may know many things, but they have something yet to learn about contemplative nuns. Those that we have in this country don't seem to have bankrupted the nation; but elsewhere, it will be objected, they are all the more harmful because they are more numerous. Our answer is that if a young lady wishes to become a contemplative nun she takes with her to the convent a sufficient sum of money the income from which will supply her very modest wants. In convents, fashions don't whirl around like a weathercock, so that within a twelvemonth a lady's head-dress may resemble a layer cake, a toadstool, and a coal hod; a sheaf of "American Beauties" would represent a nun's board bill for a month; and a stroll in her convent garden is her trip to the seashore and the mountains.

It stands to reason that if heroic souls, all afire with Liberty's sacred glow, lead an attack on the cloistered nun's convent home, pillage it, parade the streets in wanton glee with the fruits of their crime, and even apply the incendiary's torch to her only abode, she must still have shelter; if the majesty of the Government steps in and appropriates the nun's dower, she must still have food; and therefore she strives to eke out the living that the mighty begrudged her, the while she prays for those who persecute and calumniate her, "that she may be the child of her Father in Heaven."

Those who recognize and admit the frailty and fickleness of mortal man know full well that no profession, no vocation, is a sure protection against man's inborn hankering after riches, honors, and power. And the history of the Church contains sad examples of what may be the consequence of neglecting the soul's welfare for the sake of goods that perish. St. John Colombini was full of the love of God, and hoped that his spiritual children might share that same blessed spirit. They fell far short of his lofty ideals, and the Church had to lay a heavy hand upon them. Let the Holy See know that irregularities exist where God ought to be served with the greatest fidelity, and there will be at hand means to remedy the evil. Though a robber may have an excuse ready, it is one that satisfies only himself and his kind.

H. J. SWIFT, S.J.

Alexander Baumgartner, S.J.

On September 15, 1910, in the Jesuit house of writers at Luxemburg, died Father Alexander Baumgartner, known for the past thirty-seven years as one of the most prolific and popular contributors to the German literature of our day. His monumental work, which elicited the most unqualified praise from every side, is the famous "History of the World's Literature," designed by him to be completed in ten volumes. "The greatest and most comprehensive History of World Literature is that of the Jesuit Alexander Baumgartner," writes a Protestant divine. "The reception given to the work has been a glorious one," the Berlin weekly Journal for Classical Philology (1902 N. 1) tells us: "The comprehensive and difficult task of undertaking a history of the literature of all civilized nations, intended for the general public and at the same time deeply scientific, taking into account all the most recent researches, was possible only to a man of Father Baumgartner's calibre, who was prepared for his work by a vast and scholarly familiarity with foreign languages, an extensive knowledge of countries and subjects of every kind, a habit of close and penetrating observation, a brilliant poetic talent and an exquisite refinement of the aesthetic sense." Of the volumes planned by the author five had already appeared in print and the sixth was just completed when Death wrote the "Finis" to his work.

The father of our poet and critic was the famous statesman, political writer and historian of Switzerland, Jacob Gallus Baumgartner, who played so important a rôle in the political struggle of his own native land during a great part of the preceding century. For many years he was conspicuous as one of the foremost advocates of state-absolutism in Switzerland; but on seeing the disastrous consequences of his own policy, he possessed the courage boldly to abandon the camp which had heaped all its honors upon him, and to champion the cause of the rights and liberties of the Church which he had once so bitterly opposed. To him, more than to any other, his native canton of St. Gallen owes its political organization, its commercial prosperity, its episcopal see, and its written history.

The same fearless courage and eager activity which characterized the father likewise distinguished the son. Born January 27, 1841, at St. Gallen, Alexander Baumgartner received his higher education at Feldkirch, Munster, Maria-Laach, Ditton-Hall and Stonyhurst. In 1874 began his literary labors for the Stimmen aus Maria-Laach, the periodical of the German province of the Jesuits, and in 1877 he was appointed one of its editors, a position which he occupied to the end of his life.

The countless articles and poems from his pen which through the course of thirty-seven years have been contributed to this and other periodicals would form a literature in themselves. It may be of interest to call attention to a few whose subjects are especially familiar to us.

We find among others lengthy monograph studies upon Lady Georgiana Fullerton, Edgar Allen Poe, Aubrey De Vere, The Religion of Shakespeare, The Shakespeare-Bacon Controversy, Recollections of Sir Walter Scott—with whose family the author was personally acquainted—and in general a long list of essays on the various phases of religion in our own country. It is only to his published volumes, however, that I wish here to refer. Passing over his work in History, Biography, and Fiction, which is less extensive, we may group his books into three classes: Poetry, Travels, and Literary History and Criticism.

The spirit of poetry reveals itself in all his works. It sings its songs unbidden within his heart, it gleams in radiant splendor over the land of all his travels, it woos him ceaselessly to seek its treasures over all the earth. His muse, as we know her from the multitudinous verses scattered throughout the journals of Germany and America or from his published volumes of poetry, is ever deeply religious and truly the handmaid of the Holy Spirit, loving most to sing of the one only perfect ideal of all that is womanly, all that is motherly, all that is heavenly in pure human nature. He is, above all, the minnesinger of our Lady. His most popular volume, "The Litany of Loretto," is a cycle of sonnets, tender, thoughtful, and glowing with devotion. It appeared in 1883, went into a third edition in 1904, and was translated in Holland. In 1884 Baumgartner published "The Lily," a quaint, artistic translation of a beautiful Icelandic song of the fourteenth century, a charming Marian poem which Protestantism has not been able to pluck from the heart of the people. Lastly we must mention his allegorical drama, "Calderon," in two editions, written in the spirit and after the model of the great master whose name it bears. It was composed for the second centenary of the poet, May 25, 1881, and contrasts the deep Catholicity of the Spanish poet with the so-called modern thought as represented by Spinoza. Lessing's Nathan enters as the personification of the self-satisfied intolerance of modern "Toleration;" and Goethe's Faust, as genius emancipated from the trammels of positive Christianity and wandering after interminable vagaries.

The second class of his works we have characterized as descriptive travels. They consist of the large volumes of his Northern Voyages: "Iceland and the Faroe Islands" (1889, "Through Scandinavia to St. Petersburg" (1890), "Pictures of Travel in Scotland" (1884). The fact that each of these books has seen a third edition sufficiently attests their popularity, since, as a critic remarks, bulky books of travel are not wont so to be patronized. Of the first of these Mathias Jochumsson, the most important Icelandic poet of our day, says that it is the best ever written by any visitor to those distant shores; and Thorwold Thoroddsen, the famous geographical authority, considers it superior in thoroughness and reliability to any similar work. The value of these volumes consists in the fact that the author comes exceptionally well prepared for his task, with a scholar's mind and a poet's heart. Perhaps the most striking tribute to the artistry of his descriptions is that of the painter who wrote that he had been able successfully to reproduce the scenes depicted by the author, although he himself had never visited them.

But admirable as these works are it is as the historian of literature that Baumgartner stands at the height of his fame. We can mention only in passing his four invaluable contributions to the history, respectively, of German, Dutch, American and Eastern literature; his "Path of Lessing's Religious Evolution," a reflection upon modern thought in Germany (1887); his "Joost Van den Vondel," the life and works of the great Catholic Milton of Holland (1882, translated into Dutch, 1886); his "Longfellow's Poetry," one of the best studies upon our Household Poet (1877 and 1887); and finally his "Râmâyana and the Rama-Literature of India," a sketch in literary history (1894).

More important even than these, and requiring a special consideration, is his masterly production in three volumes entitled, "Goethe." It is here especially that we behold in him the knightly spirit of his father that dared to cast the glove of challenge into the teeth of folly and untruth, no matter by whom they might be championed. A wave of idolatrous devotion for the great Baal of modern culture was passing over Germany and threatened to destroy not merely the critical common sense of the period—which were no very vital matter—but the national conscience as well. Much and passionately as Baumgartner admired the God-given genius of Goethe, and profoundly as he could bow to it when it revealed itself in the poet's noblest works, yet his heart was filled with loathing and indignation to see all the flagrant vices, the religious cynicism, the prurient voluptuousness of the man idolized together with his nobler traits, to behold the very rag-tag ends of his erotic epistles placed in the hands of German youths and maidens as ideals of Platonic love. Such a work, as was natural, drew upon him the unqualified disapproval of a world which he had robbed of its illusions, but it won for him no less the sincerest gratitude of the judicious, "the censure of the which one must, in your allowance," as Hamlet tells the players, "overweigh a whole theatre of others." Baumgartner's "Goethe" is the result of much patient study, much traveling, thought and research. The style flows clearly, smoothly, in a current deep, yet sparkling on the surface. There is a delicacy of touch, and a lightness of wit always at his command to lend a sprightliness to the most profoundly scholarly matter and presentation.

And now finally we come to the great monument to his name, the great masterpiece of his art and learning, "The History of the World's Literature." We must from the first be careful not to view these volumes as a mere compilation, but as the result of a vast and almost unprecedented breadth of reading and research, of slow and constant study ripening into conviction. It is a work, therefore, of interest to the specialist as well as to the general reader. Grube in his "Chinesische Literatur" (Berlin, 1902), remarks that Father Baumgartner's presentation of Chinese literature is the best hitherto offered. Similar statements are made by other authorities regarding different parts of the great work, which, like a Titanic picture, unfolds in historic perspective all the great creations of mind and heart, groups together the various literatures of the civilized nations and shows as in mammoth cyclorama the cultural development of the world in all its causes and relations. Says Prof. Otto Weissenfels in the Berlin Philological Weekly: "Everything has the ring of the specialist, but beneath the surface there lies the art of a strong-spirited nature, richly impressionable, whose thorough development has attained to a most exceptional refinement" (1903, 1547 ff). There is here, as he reminds us, no straining after effect, no display of the wares of learning, so common in books of this character; but a full possession of a vast knowledge that is borne easily and gracefully. "Of all the qualities that go to make up the great literary historian not one is wanting. It is impossible to withhold from him this praise" (Ibid.).

It is remarkable that all the flattering comments of non-Catholics in reference to this work have followed upon the obnoxious "Goethe," and that the three volumes of the latter have passed through their second edition (1885-1886), which at present is likewise exhausted.

Of Baumgartner's "History of the World's Literature" five volumes have hitherto appeared in print, each of which has received a fourth edition: "The Literature of Western Asia and the Lands of the Nile," "The Literature of India and Eastern Asia," "The Greek and Latin Literature of Classical Antiquity," "The Latin and Greek Literature of the Christian Nations," and "French Literature." The first volume was issued in 1897, and the sixth, "Italian Literature," had just been completed before his death. The remaining four volumes are to be taken in hand, as I understand, by various writers of the German Province.

In conclusion, we must emphasize above all else the deeply religious spirit of the man, from which is derived the truest and greatest value of his works. All that he wrote is permeated with this and the worth of the world's literature is tested by the touchstone of Catholic Truth alone. His zeal in the cause of Catholic morality is nowhere more beautifully illustrated than in the last work from his pen, "The Attitude of German Catholics towards Recent Literature." It bears a message not merely to the Catholics of Germany but of all the world concerning the dangerous freedom allowed in aesthetics in regard to the erotic and nude in art, and pointing out the modern tendency of pandering to non-Catholic circles and of seeking a larger reading public by disregarding the sanctities of religious and moral principles. The note of warning is a timely one, surrounded as we are by a reviving paganism in literature and art, which, while ignoring God and His Christ, must likewise ignore morality and cast aside that sense of sacred purity which can nowhere exist except beneath the eyes of the All-pure, the Virgin Son of the Mother Immaculate, to Whom alone each energy of our author's life was wholly consecrated.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

A letter to the London Times contains the following, with regard to the death of the aeronaut who attempted the flight from Brigue to Milan:

"Chavez said when asked why he returned from his first flight at Brigue, that 'he had some regard for his own existence.' Evidently he quite gave up the idea of the attempt, as he remarked that it might be done, but only in perfectly calm summer weather. But the pressure was too strong. He attempted a second time, and the result is known. His last days were passed in crying most bitterly; a brave man does not do this when he knows that he has given his life for a sane and adequate motive. The motive was in this case, and others like it, neither sane nor adequate.

"I read to-day in the Secolo XIX (a Genoese newspaper), the following paragraph:

'Chavez is dead, and it is not the mountain that has killed him; it is the men who, in order to feel the pride of an enterprise in which they took no part, either did not see or were silent regarding the mad risk which changed the attempt into heroic suicide.'

"It is to be hoped that this is the first symptom of a reaction; if it is so, Chavez's death may save many lives."

With the exception of the qualification of Chavez's flight as "heroic" suicide, instead of foolhardy, we are glad to make these ideas our own. We would apply them also to the automobile racing which lately, as well as in past years, has had such lamentable results.

According to statistics just issued in Tokio, by the Department of Communications of the Japanese Government, there are now 239 shipyards and 55 dry docks in Japan. The merchant marine has made remarkable progress since 1896, when the royal regulations for the encouragement of Commerce were established. The figures of growth in the number of ships constructed in Japan in the last twenty years show remarkable expansion in every detail. The largest steamships are now built in the home yards. The supply of shipyards is reported as still insufficient to meet the demands of those engaged in marine transportation. Elaborate tables, prepared by the department, show the heavy purchases made to fit out the shipyards immediately before, during and after the Russo-Japanese war, 1904-1905. They do not, however, show the extent of Japan's fleet of smaller trading vessels engaged in fishing and in the trade with China and Corea.

CORRESPONDENCE

Echoes of Mexico's Centenary

MEXICO, OCT. 2, 1910.

The grand historic pageant, which was one of the many brilliant features of Mexico's celebration, was witnessed by President Diaz and a select company of foreign and native dignitaries from the balcony of the national palace. At the head of the procession marched the group of the Conquest, consisting of eight hundred and thirty-nine persons, representing Cortés and Montezuma and their respective suites. Careful attention to detail in all that concerned the costumes of nobles, warriors, priests and people made the spectacle one of dazzling splendor. Cortés on a prancing charger and Montezuma conveyed in a richly-adorned palanquin met before the presidential party, where the Spaniards and Aztecs of the sixteenth century mingled once more with the Tlaxcalans of Cortés and the lords of Texcoco and Coyoacan and other powerful vassals of Montezuma.

The second group represented the Spanish domination and consisted of two hundred and eighty-eight persons, who performed with admirable precision the inspiring maneuver of trooping the colors. The Spanish royal standard, in the keeping of a gorgeously attired gonfalonier, was the recipient of these histrionic honors.

The third group represented the period of Independence, the prominent figure being the Liberator, Don Agustin Iturbide, who once more led the "army of the three guarantees" through the streets of Mexico.

It was the fifteenth day of September, the hundredth anniversary of Hidalgo's shout for liberty. As the evening wore on, balconies and streets were thronged with people who were waiting for the closing act. At a quarter of eleven, the bands of music ceased, the fireworks stopped, and the immense crowd in front of the national palace was hushed into silence. Then out upon the air of the calm, clear night were wafted the voices of thousands of children in the notes of the national anthem. The singing was over, the wild applause subsided, the throng gazed expectantly towards the balcony of the national palace. The great clock was on the stroke of eleven. In the midst of an almost breathless silence, the President emerged and stood in full sight of the waiting people. Bearing in his left hand the national standard of red, white and green, he grasped the rope of Hidalgo's bell, the herald of Mexican independence, and its silvery notes rang out over the city. A moment later and the aged President repeated once more Hidalgo's memorable words, "Viva Mexico, viva la independencia." A park of artillery thundered forth the national salute of twenty-one guns, the church bells throughout the city added their voices, the bands struck up, and the army of people burst into wild cheers. The second century had begun.

On Saturday, September 17, a procession was formed in front of the ministry for foreign affairs, to conduct with becoming solemnity to the national palace the uniform of General Morelos, a revolutionist, executed by the Spaniards during the war of independence. During all these years it had been preserved in the Army and Navy Museum, Madrid, but was presented to the Mexican Government through the graciousness of King Alfonso XIII. In the same procession were borne the battle flags which had led the people to conflict in those days of bloody strife. There were several of them, one being the standard of Father Hidalgo. It was the first in order of time and therefore could not with propriety be left out of the procession; yet nothing like it had been seen in the streets of Mexico since 1873, when under President Lerdo y Corrial, all "religious manifestations in public" were prohibited under penalty of fine and imprisonment.

Hidalgo's standard was a representation of Our Lady of Guadalupe, the original being preserved with great veneration in the basilica near the capital. The heroes of independence were forgotten for the moment; all eyes were fixed on the banner of Guadalupe. Cheers for the "Queen of the Mexicans" rent the air; flowers in profusion were strewn along the way; many knelt in the street as the sacred banner passed, and some, presuming on the joyousness and solemnity of the occasion, approached and pressed its folds to their lips. All the church bells, from the twenty-seven in the massive towers of the cathedral to the humblest on some little chapel, rang out in all their gladness, yet there was no public religious manifestation. The law and the republic were still safe.

F. MODESTO.

Belgium's Catholic Democratic League and the School Question

LOUVAIN, SEPT. 22, 1910.

Your readers have often had the School Question as it actually stands in Belgium put before them in the pages of AMERICA, and the details of the discussion of this matter, at the Congress of the Democratic League, held lately at Nivelles, under the presidency of His Eminence Cardinal Mercier, Archbishop of Malines, will surely interest them.

Among the many associations which abound in Catholic Belgium, the League is the one which actually has the most powerful influence on Belgian politics.

It is necessary to remark at the outset, when speaking of the School Question, that we leave out all education save Primary or Elementary. In short, the whole question of the schools may be resumed in the following words: the present system of subsidies and state-aid must be changed.

Some Catholics demand an absolute equality of subsidies between State schools and free or voluntary schools; others, fearing that were this the final solution, a certain apathy might arise among Catholics who so far have had to struggle hard to support their schools, and would prefer to have only a partial help from the State, sufficient to enable them to sustain a successful competition in efficiency with the state-aided schools. All, however, are agreed that the laws dealing with primary education must be changed, and that radically. There are even many who declare that it is the most important question up for decision in the next session of Parliament. Moreover, it would seem that for the moment they are ready to forget their differences as to the necessity and advisability of obligatory education, in order to settle definitely a question in the discussion of which much feeling has been shown.

Disregarding this question of means to the end, this is an account of some of the evils existing under the present system. A word of warning—some of the figures may perhaps shock readers of AMERICA, but the ferocity with which the Church's enemies carry on their war against religion will be evident. It must be borne in mind also that here in Belgium one is either Catholic or anti-Catholic, and that there is no middle term, as for instance Protestantism.

Let us, following in this M. Henri Francotte, see what is the actual state in the town and province of Liège. There are at present 6,725 children attending the free schools, écoles libres, Catholic, without support from State or Commune, while against this we find 11,630 who frequent the State or Communal schools, where a perfect neutrality is supposed to reign. But very few are nowadays deceived by this false term. Evidently this is not as it should be, and betterment is impossible before the Catholics can recover the lost ground. The only free school subsidized by the province is a Rationalist orphanage at Forest. If the province had the courage of its convictions it would be forced to subsidize all primary education, as it admits the right of parents to give an education in conformity with their belief, but this would be an action far too just for an administration well known for its anti-Catholic views. The Catholics, moreover, do not ask subsidies which would dispense them from the necessity of voluntary contributions, but they ask more equality and more justice, in order to do more good and to render their schools more efficient. It may seem incredible, that under a Catholic Government, such a state of affairs is tolerated, but it must be remembered that the Provincial and Communal Councils are very independent of the Government. The Government may legislate, but the councils, which are very often radically anti-Catholic, will always find means of interpreting and applying laws to suit their own irreligious views, much as a Liberal Government in England, several times defeated in their attempts at positive legislation against the Catholic schools, strive now to do what in a straightforward way is impossible, by means of administrative powers.

The situation in the Hainaut is worse. M. Pierre Vierhaagen exposed the existing evils, and these facts are largely from his speech.

On the 31st of December, in the industrial regions of Hainaut, nearly 54,000 out of 97,437 children frequented the neutral schools, among these 7,772 were dispensed from religious teaching, and thus in virtue of the application of existing laws these 7,000 children rendered impossible any religious instruction for the remaining 47,000. The anti-Catholics, seconded in their efforts by the administrative power of the councils—communal as well as provincial—did their best to augment the number of exemptions, and succeeded only too well. In 1907, the Minister of Education forbade their action, stopped their activity in this matter, whereupon the Socialists and Freethinkers opened with diabolical energy a campaign which unfortunately could not be prohibited. That their success was great is seen by the number of exemptions obtained in Charleroi, a district where 80 per cent. enjoyed these exemptions. Thus, practically no religion is taught in those districts where the effects of the campaign are felt, while in the communes, where nominally there exists a course of religion, difficulties are easily manufactured, which practically result in excluding religion from the schools.

Thus, masters and mistresses, if they are not formally commanded to give religious instruction, neglect their duty. The clergy must fill the breach, but the curé is already overcharged with work, he must find a substitute, who demands impossible wages. As a result we find 65 per cent. of these communes where no religious instruction whatever is given.

In some parts of the Borinage the situation is not so bad, but there one sees masters using the hours consecrated to religious instruction in declaiming against the clergy, the Church, and everything religious. We can easily imagine what must be the religion taught at Jumet by a renegade religious, and a mistress who has not made her first communion, or at Courcelles, where another renegade religious and the "Citoyenne S"—a well-known apostle of Malthusianism—are responsible for the religious instruction. Such religious instruction is nothing but an attack on all religion. The Bien Public, commenting on this, writes as follows: "The law of 1879 was fundamentally bad. The law of 1884 made it possible to have Catholic schools in Catholic Communes, and brought into view the anti-religious schools of the other Communes. The law of 1895 made it possible to establish Atheism, under the guise of religious instruction, in a great number of schools, which thereby help on rapidly the de-Christianization of the Hainaut."

In order to remedy this sad state of affairs the following resolution was unanimously passed. It was sent, moreover, to Parliament some months ago, as a protest signed by over 100,000 persons, and it shows very clearly the line of the battle undertaken for the schools:

"The undersigned, conscious of the amelioration achieved by the law of 1895, would point out that this law does not comply with the intentions of its authors, by reason of the application made of it by many Provincial and Communal administrations. They, therefore, beg Parliament to revise it, and therein to develop the application of those constitutional principles which render inviolate the liberty of conscience of Belgians, and assure those parents, who prefer to send their children to the voluntary schools, all the advantages which those obtain who send their children to the Commune's school."

M. D.

Austria's Catholic Congress

INNSBRUCK, SEPTEMBER 21, 1910.

Your readers will be pleased, I trust, to have the accounts of our Katholikentag, already sent on to them, supplemented by a summary review of the work accomplished during its sessions.

The president's opening address on the tasks before the congress, was clear and to the point. He wasted no words in flattery, but said plainly that the backward state of social organization in Austria among Catholics was due to their own negligence and apathy; they had lapsed in a fancied security, while their enemies, particularly the Social-Democrats, had covered the land with a network of organizations until now the Catholics must not only catch up and even surpass them, but must fight their organized and bitter, and often coarsely avowed enmity. But they were at last awake, and the last two congresses had aroused the Catholic conscience. Catholics were increasingly active in every department of social activity. In this, their seventh general assembly, they were to review the battles of the past, and taking heed of their former failures and weaknesses, were to map out a more effective campaign for the coming years. For the permanent success of this campaign it was essential that they become firmly united socially and politically, as they were one in faith.

Later on in the opening evening there was a monster meeting of the Bonifatiusverein, under the presidency of the leader of the Verein, Father Augustus von Galen, O.S.B. The Bonifatiusverein aims to offset the infamous Los-von-Rom movement, and it has succeeded, and is succeeding admirably. Its monthly publication, the Bonifatiusblatt, is a magazine of apologetics for the people, and has a circulation of close to a million in four languages. A bi-monthly apologetic magazine, the Bonifatius Korrespondenz, is issued for students and the educated laity in general. The association, also, helps to build churches in desolate districts, and carries on a temperance propaganda. Its headquarters are in the Benedictine abbey of Emmaus, in Prague, a foundation of the Beuron community of Benedictines. The meeting was very enthusiastic and showed how effectually the Bonifatiusverein was working against Protestant proselytizing in Austria.

Saturday, September 10, and Sunday were given up mainly to the sectional meetings. On Saturday morning there was a numerously attended and interesting conference on the burning Austrian question of the Catholic press. The principal address was delivered by Dr. Frederick Funder, editor of the Reichspost, and was an excellent survey of the situation. He showed clearly that, although much has been done, especially during the last five years, for the improvement and spreading of Catholic newspapers, the Jewish-Liberal and Social-Democratic sheets, with their immense circulation and material resources, are still the mentors of public opinion for the majority of Austrians, especially among the cultured and moneyed classes, and among workmen. After a lively discussion suitable resolutions were adopted, urging upon Catholics renewed activity, especially in furthering the "Piusverein." A resolution also embodied the wish that an international Catholic telegraphic news bureau be established. Following the press meeting there was a conference on "Sunday Observance and the Alcohol Question," and in the afternoon one on the "Saving and Retaining the Christian Spirit in Schools of all Classes" and another on the "Apologetical Mission of Catholics." The main address in the latter conference was delivered by Father Augustus Galen, O.S.B. All these conferences were of a high character and the discussions were participated in actively and numerously by delegates of all classes and nationalities. They gave evidence that the social problems of Austria were well recognized and courageously faced, nor was there any minimizing of the strength of the organization of the anti-Catholic forces.

The first great festival meeting on Saturday evening was as crowded and enthusiastic as were the others. Two speeches were made, one by Count Trautmannsdorf, on the necessity of a Catholic organization embracing all classes, the other by Father Fonck, S.J., President of the Papal Biblical Institute, on the Church and modern intellectual life. The latter speech evoked great applause. An edifying incident of this meeting was the sending of a telegram, in the name of the Catholics of Austria, to the Eucharistic Congress in Montreal, conveying the greetings of Catholic Austria and uniting with the Catholics assembled in Montreal in the adoration of the Blessed Sacrament.

Sunday's sessions opened with a pontifical high Mass in the parish church, celebrated by the Prince-Bishop of Brixen, in the presence of Cardinal Katschthaler, Archbishop of Salzburg, and five other bishops of the Austrian hierarchy. The music of the Mass was splendidly rendered by the very excellent choir, and the church presented a beautiful picture with the banners of more than forty Catholic associations and student corporations in the nave. Of the latter, all the Austrian corporations, with four or five from Germany and one from Switzerland, were present. An eloquent sermon was preached by the priest-poet of Tirol, the Reverend Anton Müller. (Bruder Willram). Conferences followed later on the organization of the young men and women of Austria, of the farming classes, of the commercial and artisan classes, and an especially important one on the emigration question, and the kindred problems of how to prevent the farmers from abandoning the country for the cities. The acuteness of the emigration problem in Austria may be gauged from the figures given by the opening speaker in this conference, that the number of emigrants from the Austrian monarchy to the United States alone rose from not more than 10,000 in 1880, to 338,452 in 1907. These conferences were followed by a monster meeting of Austria's great press association, the Piusverein (see AMERICA, Vol. I, pp. 229-230), the main feature of which was an eloquent speech by Father Victor Kolb, S.J., whose address at the Fifth Congress in 1905, gave the impetus which led to the foundation of the association. The Piusverein now numbers over 140,000 members, and has done and is doing yeoman service in the cause of Austria's Catholic press.

The most imposing and enthusiastic assembly of the congress was the closing meeting on Sunday afternoon. The great hall was crowded with 15,000 people. It presented a picture of Catholic Austria in miniature. Around the great crucifix on the stage were grouped the flags of the workmen's unions and of the peasant military companies, the latter having come from South Tirol and the Upper Inn Valley in two special trains. In front of the flags was seated the President with his assistants, at his right the venerable Archbishop of Salzburg, and on either side the bishops of Brixen, Trent, Linz-Lembach, Leitmeritz, Brünn and the Bishop Vicar-General of Vorarlberg, with several abbots and other prelates. In the audience were representatives of the highest Austrian nobility, scores of government officials, students with their variously colored caps, priests and religious of nearly every order, and finally hundreds of peasants with their characteristic, if at times somewhat gaudy, national costumes.

It would be difficult indeed to say which incident of this meeting was the most impressive, the magnificent act of faith, which the entire assembly at the president's suggestion and repeating after him, threw down as a gauntlet to their unbelieving opponents; the shout of assent to the telegram sent to the Holy Father, thanking him for the Borromeo Encyclical and protesting against its wilful misinterpretation; the impressive silence as the assembly knelt to receive the blessing of the Cardinal, or the grand Te Deum which, rising from fifteen thousand throats, formed a fitting close to the congress.

The success of the Katholikentag has naturally not given pleasure to the Liberals and the Social-Democrats. On Sept. 15, a meeting was held in Innsbruck, under the auspices of the "Deutscher Volksverein," a Liberal organization, in which it was loudly proclaimed that the Liberals were as good Catholics as any, but were not "Jesuit Catholics." A joint meeting of the German National party, the political sponsors of the Los-von-Rom movement, and the Social-Democrats, is scheduled for October. The announcement that the notorious ex-Jesuit Hoensbroech will, if possible, be present and will address the meeting, is sufficient to determine its anti-Catholic character.

M. J. AHERN, S.J.

A M E R I C A

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1910.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1910, and published weekly by The America Press, New York, President, THOMAS J. CAMPBELL; Secretary, MICHAEL J. O'CONNOR; Treasurer, J. J. WILLIAMS.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $8.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Sq. W., New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

Volume Four

This issue marks the beginning of Volume Four of our Weekly Review. True to its name and to its character as a Catholic Review, AMERICA has aimed to be an exponent of Catholic thought and activity, and to meet the needs of the times by discussing actual questions and vital problems from a truly Christian point of view. It is gratifying to know that, in its efforts to attain this aim, AMERICA has merited thus far the support and approbation of thousands of subscribers, and that it has proved attractive, not only to Catholics, but to a large number of non-Catholics who desire information about Catholic affairs. Gratitude for the spontaneous outpouring of commendation which has helped to lighten the task of editing the Review, will be an inspiration, it is needless to say, to those charged with that duty in their efforts to broaden the scope of Catholic journalism, to enable it to exert a wholesome influence on public opinion, and to become an active factor of Catholic sentiment in civic and social life.

With each number of this issue our subscribers should receive a copy of the Index for Volume III. If this supplement is not enclosed in the present number, a notice should be sent to this office and the copy will be promptly forwarded.

Portugal

We are told that Freedom shrieked when Kosciusko fell. She must have done the same thing when the Portuguese Republic rose. After the cannon and musketry had convinced the city of Lisbon, by littering the streets with her dead, that she was free and the whole miserable country with her, a Doctor Costa, who wore, as if in mockery, the double decoration of Minister of Justice and Education, waded through the welter of blood and addressed the world in the following words:

"I have the honor," he said, "to announce that the Republic which has just been created (by me and the other patriots) is to introduce a pure and progressive government; to open wide to everyone the portals of education; and to set up a system of justice that will ensure liberty to all. We, therefore, shall close all Catholic schools and expel every monk and nun from the country." He then went on to congratulate the fighters, two of whom were women. But no one will believe that they were women.

A Provisional Government was forthwith organized, and an individual named Braga, who had been summoned from Brazil for the purpose and who was present on schedule time, was made President. The papers described him as "a scholar of international reputation" (it is marvelous how much greatness opposition to Almighty God has created); "an unassuming man whose attitude throughout the enthusiastic celebration was one of modest deprecation. The revolution," he assured his hearers, "has no personal or military aims, but just as those of Brazil and Turkey, it is the outcome of philosophical ideas." Like Shakespeare's hero, this scholar in politics is "as mild a mannered man as ever cut a throat or scuttled a ship." Though a sage of saintly demeanor he floats the black flag at his peak.

His first act is to proclaim officially the freedom of the press, the abolition of star-chamber methods in law-courts, the secularization of public instruction, and the suppression of religious congregations.

He loses no time in giving effect to his words. He emphasizes his own and his party's views of freedom of the press by suspending or throttling the Catholic newspapers. He abolishes star-chamber methods by seizing every religious house and suppressing every religious congregation without even a pretext of a trial. "Confiscation," he says, "will follow in due course." His notion of justice is to hustle to the frontier with indecent haste thousands of blameless men and women, regardless of their age and infirmities, letting them starve if such good luck might happen. He forbids secular priests to appear on the street with their garb, to avoid disorder, which means to avoid assassination. The last news is that they, too, the Cardinal Archbishop included, are bundled out of the country. Finally, Braga's conception of liberty consists in taking criminals from the jail to let them resume their depredations. The scenes in the sack of the churches were a revival of the horrors of the French Revolution. What would Americans say to such a President?

How awful and abysmal are the depths to which he has dragged the once powerful and glorious Portugal! Thus, for instance, by government proclamation and by officials acts, the foul and dissolute harlot is not molested, but there is no place for the Sister of Charity in Portugal. Men who have consecrated themselves to the good of humanity are made outcasts and outlaws, while the most desperate thugs and assassins are given special honor and consideration by the self-constituted rulers of Portugal. You may have all the educational facilities of the State at your disposal to make atheists and anarchists of your sons and daughters, but you cannot teach them the doctrines and morality of Jesus Christ in Portugal. The poor and the sick and the homeless who have been hitherto sheltered and cared for by Catholic charity in asylums and hospitals will soon see the roof sold over their head and the proceeds of the sale pocketed by the apostles of freedom and justice in Portugal. The men who murdered King Carlos because he strove to put a stop to the loot of the politicians of both parties, who had piled up a debt of $800,000,000 on the poverty-stricken nation, are now given new opportunities for plunder by the seizure of the churches and schools and eleemosynary institutions of wretched, mangled, dishonored and degraded Portugal.

Nor is this all. The gory records of that gruesome 3d of October read like a story of Mohawk savagery. Among other horrors the Sunday papers tell us that "an armed band entered Trinas Convent, which was occupied by 150 Portuguese Sisters of Charity, some of whom resisted. A dozen of the Sisters were wounded. Later the troops occupied the convent. The wounded Sisters were taken to the hospital. The others were taken away in closed vans, their destination being unknown." The Sun says that "disgusting acts of ribaldry and defilement were also committed by the mob in the churches."

And all this is in the full glare of what is called the civilization of the 20th century! Unbidden the exclamation leaps to every decent man's lips: "Good God! are there no men in Portugal? Where were the fathers and brothers of those Sisters of Charity? Can there be monsters vile enough to shoot down like dogs a cowering group of nuns? And how is it that New York Tribune, which recounts these abominations, can tell us in the same issue that "the policy of the new Government of Portugal is in general commendable?" And how is it that Charles H. Sherril, the United States Minister to Argentina, who happened to be in Lisbon, can speak of "the admirable self-control of the revolutionists," while at the same time he tells us that "everywhere there were marks of blood, damaged walls and other marks of combat"?

To the world at large the revolution has come like a clap of thunder, but as a matter of fact the explosion had long been premeditated. A lunatic precipitated it by killing one of the arch-conspirators, and that was used as a pretext. The madman has evidently transmitted his mania to the nation, which now presents itself to the world with words of liberty and justice on her lips, but with her hands and her garments red with the blood which she has shed in torrents in violation of both liberty and justice.

The dishonored country is a sorry spectacle to the world as she sues for admission into the family of civilized nations. After murdering one King and de-throning another, she asks the rulers of Europe, every-one of whom is connected by ties of blood with the Sovereigns of Portugal, to condone both of the outrages. In this part of the world it will be difficult to observe the political proprieties and to greet as a Sister Republic a nation which proclaims the reign of freedom and justice, and whose very first acts are a savage and sanguinary violation of both. Like Medea, she slaughters her own offspring and scatters their mangled remains along the road as she flees to other debaucheries. Freedom's shriek in Portugal is the wild scream of a bird of prey battenning on a carcass. Meantime we wait for some faint protest from the world at large; but not a sound is heard.

A New Triple Alliance?

When the Monroe Doctrine was first put forward as embodying the feelings and aspirations of this country, the United States did not present a very formidable barrier to any sinister designs which European governments or any combination of them might have had upon parts of the American continent. There were but two States beyond the Mississippi, Louisiana, namely, and Missouri; there was a long coast-line; there was an unprotected western border; the spirit of the country was distinctly unwarlike, for the memory of the war of 1812 was still fresh. Then, too, the whole population did not reach the twelve million mark.

Whatever it may have come to mean since 1823, it was then only a protest in self-defence, a voice raised in favor of New World politics against Old World systems; it was a declaration that the United States did not wish to have neighbors that might prove meddlesome, officious and domineering. The coming of such neighbors would be considered an "unfriendly act" and would be resented. A moment's thought tells us that there was ample room for agricultural development and industrial expansion, for after the lapse of nearly ninety years from the communication of President Monroe's message, vast tracts of Latin-America remain an unknown land to all save the few savages who roam at will over treeless plains and through dense forests. It would seem, therefore, that the chief cause of American uneasiness at a time when there were afloat in Europe certain projects looking to active military operations on an extended scale in Spain's former colonies, was the fear of a future political predominance of strong European governments in the affairs of the American continent. It was the fear that European governments might seek to hold American governments in a state of vassalage or tutelage, and that only a nominal independence might in reality be the lot of the various commonwealths which had formerly owed allegiance to Europe, and of other states which might rise as the result of exploration and settlement. It is with nations as with individuals. Those who were friendly while living far apart may quarrel outrageously when they live so they can jostle and crowd one another.

The recent Pan-American Congress in Buenos Aires has commanded its full share of space and attention in the Latin-American press, but we have not been so fortunate as to see any highly eulogistic editorial comment on its efficiency as a unifier. Some editors were ungracious enough to say that the delegates gracefully shunted all matters of vital interest and importance, confining themselves to vapid vaporings and vague generalities about friendship, peace, prosperity and like harmless topics.

Cometh now the German press with the bald statement that the three most important republics of South America, that is, Brazil, Argentina and Chile, have entered into an alliance to ward off undesirable influences from their policies. Their united area reaches over four million and a half square miles, and their population is about twenty-five million. Chile cannot support a dense population on the rocky sides of the western slope of the Andes, but the other two republics could furnish homes for ten times their present number of inhabitants. Facilities for communication and transportation between South America and Europe are immeasurably better than they are between South America and the United States. Moreover, Argentina in particular has received large numbers of European immigrants. The natural result, therefore, is that the sympathies of the people do not incline them towards more intimate relations with the United States. Add to these facts certain diplomatic activities of the Federal Government, which have been viewed by some Latin-American publicists as an unwarranted interference in the domestic affairs of one's neighbor, and it is easy to understand why there is note of alarm in their editorial and utterances, and why there are warnings to their statesmen to be on their guard against submitting to the dictation of the United States.

The three republics are better equipped to-day to proclaim a South American Monroe Doctrine for their common good than was the United States in 1823. Brazil, with a population of eighteen million and an area almost equal to that of the United States, has obtained German officers to drill her army. This is in itself significant, for large German colonies have already been planted in the southern part of that republic. It implies, also, that Brazil has veered away from France and has determined to profit to the full by the advantages held out by German commercial activity.

If, as seems to be the case, there is an element of touchiness and suspiciousness in the Latin temperament, the Federal Government cannot be too careful in avoiding even the appearance of evil when there is question of the rights and dignity of sovereign States. They may ask, not without reason, who invited their powerful northern neighbor to "hold a candle at their function?"

What Spanish Religious Are Doing

A year book, recently published by the Spanish ministry of the government, furnishes valuable information for those who see an economic scourge in the pretended excessively large number of houses of monks and nuns in Spain. It has been shown already that in proportion to its Catholic population Spain has fewer religious men and women than several other European countries; but we owe a vote of thanks to the compilers of the year book for telling us in detail just how many of those monks and nuns spend their time.

We are told, in the first place, that Spain has 606 provincial and municipal hospitals, all in charge of religious; only 422 of these hospitals, however, always have patients to be attended. The Sisters of Charity head the list with 253 institutions in their charge; the Sisters of Our Lady of Consolation follow with 24; the Carmelite Sisters have 19, and the Servants of Mary have 16.

"The services of the religious," says the report, "are gratuitous in 111 establishments and recompensed in 208; but the compensation is very moderate, consisting of 485 pesetas a year." As a peseta is 20 cents in American money (or just 19.3 cents, to be exact) each religious receives for her service the handsome sum of $93.60, out of which she boards and clothes herself. Though the government furnishes the house, it does not supply the hospital nuns with food or clothing.

The Little Sisters of the Poor maintain, without government aid, 51 refuges for the aged poor, and shelter between men and women, 5,093 old people. A similar organization, known as the Sisters of the Aged and Abandoned, cares for 3,596 of the same helpless class.

There are in different parts of Spain 50 free eating-houses, under the control of the authorities, but in nearly every case, administered, and that gratuitously, by monks and nuns, who prepare and serve the food that the authorities supply for the distressed poor. Nearly four and one-half million meals were served by them in 1908.

Finally, the year book mentions 22 reformatories and refuges in charge of religious, such as the Capuchin tertiaries in Madrid and elsewhere, the Sisters of the venerable Order of the Most Holy Trinity, the Oblates, and others.

To this rapid survey of the labor of the religious of Spain for the relief of poverty and bodily misery, we may add that in their various free schools of all kinds, from the kindergarten to commercial colleges and trade schools, including night schools for adults, these same "excessively numerous" religious furnish without a cent of cost to the government the benefits of an education to 133,991 persons.

"STAMPS FOR SALE."

One pleasant autumn afternoon a certain poor but respectable individual betook himself, not for the first time, to the place of business of a well-stocked stamp dealer, there to feast his eyes on rare philatelic treasures which he could never hope to possess. Received as courteously as if he had come to make a considerable purchase, he was soon deeply immersed in the study of early "Sandwich Islands," rare "colonials," and choice "high values" from the four corners of the earth. But rich pastry, however toothsome, quickly palls the appetite, so he turned with a sigh of regret to the album of stamp oddities, as it might be appropriately called, for it consisted of the bizarre forms which have appeared now and then in the domain of timbrology. There were triangular stamps of Newfoundland and the Cape of Good Hope with their latter-day imitators from Ecuador and Liberia, and a couple of sorry specimens, sober in color and crude in execution, from the republic of Colombia in the sixties; Madagascar furnished some specimens that might have served as chest protectors, and the native States of India presented a large and varied assortment of bugaboos.

Just at that moment a stylishly gowned lady entered and offered some stamps for sale. There must have been several thousand, all carefully arranged in small packages tied with thread. "I belong to a society that collects them," volunteered the visitor, "and the proceeds are to be for sociological work." "But, madam," said the suave dealer, "these stamps have no market value." "What is that! No market value? Just outside your door you have a sign which says 'Stamps bought and sold,' and we have been, I don't know how long, collecting all these stamps." There they were, all neatly freed from bits of envelope and nicely arranged, but the proprietor merely put on a deprecating look and remained silent. "What offer will you make for the lot?" "Really, they don't represent any money to me and I couldn't make an offer." That was all. The lady gathered up her wares and her train and left, half grieved and half vexed.

With a deep sigh the dealer turned to the lounge who, while inspecting the oddities, had been a not wholly unwilling listener. "Almost every day," he said, "we have such callers. They come with an armful of rubbish and expect us to take it off their hands. They save stamps from their letters and pester their friends for more stamps from letters; they waste time in counting them and arranging them, thinking, no doubt, that they are going to coin money for some good work in which they are interested. When we tell them that their time and labor have been lost, they sometimes look at us as if we had designs on their property."

"And yet," interposed the lounge, "you value your stock away up in the thousands, so some people have made money by saving up stamps."

"That is true enough, but they have not made their money on stamps that are used by the million or, at least, by hundreds of thousands. The stamps to save are the stamps that you seldom see; such stamps have a value which increases with time. Our one-cent and two-cent cancelled stamps may bring a few cents a pound, but think of the time and labor spent in collecting them and finding somebody to buy them even at a price so ridiculously low."

"Is the same true of foreign stamps?"

"Largely so, if you limit it to the stamps of the great countries and to the varieties very commonly used. All the stamps of small, out-of-the way countries have a certain value from the fact that so few of them are actually used to prepay postage. Look at these stamps of San Marino, running in face value from one centesimo to ten lire, one-fifth of a cent to two dollars; all are novel and some are artistic; however, few people, if any, have seen all these stamps in a used condition. But they are genuine postage stamps, and are sold at about twice their face value by the dealer, who imports them as anything else is imported. The little republic makes a tidy sum on stamps that will never be used in the mails."

"I have seen advertisements of requests for cancelled stamps in behalf of some charitable enterprise. What is the use if the stamps are worth nothing?"

"Many such gifts, I dare say, are worth nothing, but along with much rubbish there may be something worth having. If some of our early Swiss immigrants have upstairs in the attic stamps which brought them letters from home fifty or sixty years ago, they may have a hidden treasure well worth bringing to light; and the same may be said of stamps of the smaller German states."

One more longing look at the dealer's heaped up treasures and the lounge hied him home and behind a locked door, viewed once more his own little collection, dear in pleasant memories and associations, even if not very precious in terms of the vulgar coin of the realm.

H. J. S.

LITERATURE

Ballads of Irish Chivalry. By ROBERT DWYER JOYCE, M. R. I. A. Edited by P. W. JOYCE, LL.D. London: Longmans, Green & Co. Dublin: Gill & Son. 50 cents net.

Dr. Joyce and his distinguished brother, the editor and annotator of this volume, seem to have divided between them the field of Irish history, poetry, legend and lore. Over thirty years ago Dr. R. D. Joyce published in Boston "Deirdre" and "Blánid" and by thus introducing into English verse two epics of ancient Ireland became an unconscious pioneer of the Gaelic movement. While a medical student in Cork, 1861, he had published stirring ballads of the Anglo-Irish wars and continued, when a Boston physician of large practice, to mould into many metres the legend and heroic episodes of patriotism, love and valor of his native district where the Galtees slope down from Tipperary to Limerick and Cork. His learned brother, unwearied in all that pertains to Ireland's literary credit, has gathered together in this volume the cream of his minor poems, which with a few exceptions would otherwise be out of reach of the general reader. They are well worth collecting. The Sarsfield ballads have already found a place in many Readers but those in which the scenes of his boyhood—hill and glen and stream, fairy nook and holy well—are lovingly and skilfully inlaid, are even stronger in interest, frequently suggesting the descriptive power of Scott but thrilling with a simple pathos that the poet of Ben Lomond and Loch Katrine seldom compassed. Joyce may be called the Scott of the Galtees and the Golden Vale—and we do not know to which belongs the compliment. The notes are as interesting as the text. Dr. P. W. Joyce evidently knows by heart every spot of ground covered by the poet. He is brimful of its history and legends, pagan and Christian, and where further information is desirable, can refer the reader to volume and page of his own books on Irish names of places and his social and political histories of Ireland. There are numerous and well-sung songs in the volume, and for the correct airs the reader is directed to the editor's published collections of Irish music. Four good illustrations and a handsome binding enhance the value which is much more than the publisher's price.

M. K.

By the Way. Travel Letters written by AGNESS GREENE FOSTER. San Francisco: Paul Elder & Co. Price $1.50 net.

This book is made up of brightly written letters to friends at home from many places in Europe. They have all the interest that belongs to an observant woman who, like the rest of her sex, has the knack of picking up pleasant trifles, which a man would look upon as useless. Thus in describing Windsor Castle the author runs over without comment the terraces, gardens, state apartments and even the great tower; but has a word or two for St. George's Chapel. A man having to say something about it would give a page of common place about the Knights of the Garter and perhaps would tell in learned style how unauthentic is the story of the Countess of Salisbury. The woman knows better than to repeat what may be found in any encyclopedia or in any school history. She mentions it in her own way as "St. George's Chapel where royal marriages are celebrated" and leaving all splendid amplification to the reader's imagination, bids good bye to her friends and catches the train up to London.

But possessing the charm of the feminine mind, this book reveals its inexactness. Nelson's Victory has not, we believe, been degraded to the rank of a school ship but is still the flagship in Portsmouth Harbor. The author's foreign expressions are often incorrect. Thus one can not pass without censure such mistakes as "objets d'arts", "Arc de Carrousal", "petit gateaux", "bon bourgeois", collectively for the middle class, "la belle Paris", "Firenza"; and we doubt very much whether an Italian would recognize his language pronounced according to the phonetic spelling of page 79. With regard to the horns of Michelangelo's Moses, it is evident that the "learned monk" gave the right explanation, but it is no less clear that the fair traveller did not understand it.

As the publishers say, this book would be an excellent companion on board ship for one visiting Europe. But it would also be an agreeable one at home. The get up is most creditable and the illustrations are handsome and, what is not always the case in such publications, novel.

It is a pity that the author introduces, even by way of quotation, the slur on the Catholic Church one reads with pain on page 77.

H. W.

Dos Rosas. ABDU'L MASICH, el Niño Mártir de Singara. Hadra, la Pequeña Confesora. El Expósito de Hong-Kong y Otras Narraciones. La Fuente Sagrada de Chichén-Itzá.

B. Herder of St. Louis has added these three volumes to his series of juveniles, "Desde Lejanas Tierras", (From Distant Lands) the object of which is not only to give interesting tales of mission work but also to weave into the stories correct descriptions of foreign countries and customs. The first little volume takes us to the banks of the Tigris, describes the country, and tells us of Mohammendan life and ways; the second transports us to China and talks entertainingly of child life in the Celestial Empire; the third relates a weird tale of Yucatan at the time of its discovery by the Spaniards. Well bound and prettily illustrated, they will be treasured by the Spanish-speaking child fortunate enough to get them. Originally composed in German by that veteran in the mission field, Father Anthony Huonder, S.J., clever hands have made them feel quite at home in their Spanish dress. At the modest price of thirty cents apiece, they ought to find their way into many a home.

* * *

Episodios Historicos de la Guerra de Independencia. (Dos Tomos) Biografías de los Heroes y Caudillos de la Independencia. (Dos Tomos) Mexico, D. F.: Administración de El Tiempo.

These two books have been called forth by the centenary of Mexican independence, which has been celebrated with a round of entertainments, with the inauguration of public buildings and monuments, and with the re-opening of the venerable and illustrious University of Mexico.

The first takes up the striking, sometimes startling, incidents of the eleven years of war, which intervened between Hidalgo's shout for independence at the town of Dolores in 1811 and the recognition of Mexico's independence by Spain, in the person of Don Juan O'Donoju, the sixty-third and last Viceroy of New Spain.

The second gives biographical sketches not only of the famous leaders in the revolution but also of others who, perhaps, devoted themselves as heartily to the cause, even if their names are not so generally known. One hundred and fifty of these patriots receive this tribute of admiration from their grateful countrymen; and upwards of fifty of Mexico's ablest writers have collaborated in bringing out these deeply interesting volumes to honor the memory of the heroes of Mexican independence.

* * *

A new and valuable addition is made to the history of the great Medieval spoliation by Hibbert's "Dissolution of the Monasteries," (Sir Isaac Pitman). Already during the last few decades serious English readers have been enlightened on the true nature of the confiscation policy that deprived the nation of a heritage of art treasures, and drove the needy and the suffering of that day to crime or extinction by famine. Mr. Hibbert makes it clear that property not dogma was, at the root of the infamous campaign. After Thorold Rogers, Gardiner, Dixon, Gairdner, Gasquet, and now Hibbert, it is impossible to maintain the accusations against the monastic system invented by the "Reformers" and supported by Froude. Immunity from certain abuses and malpractices on the part of some religious confraternities is not for an instant claimed; but learned, impartial researches leave no room for comparison between the monks and their successors. Pillage was the motive of the attack and that it should be cloaked under a pretence of pious interests makes the deed more infamous.

Hibbert deals with one county only, Staffordshire, but what took place there is quite typical of the proceedings in the rest of England. If forms and scruples were at first observed those were soon laid aside, for the Government forgot all other consideration than the satisfying of greed in its eager rush for possession of the coveted goods. Mr. Hibbert goes into the details of the scheme for plunder with unparalleled painstaking. He explains the course pursued for the extortion of appeasing sums until final seizure left the unfortunate dupes homeless and in penury. "The continuation fines served to prolong the houses for a twelvemonth only, and as the autumn of 1538 drew on the news probably reached all the houses that they were doomed."

Mr. Hibbert confirms Gairdner's revelations of the means employed to obtain false evidence of corrupt practices which would justify confiscation. The monks were menaced or bribed to sign a prepared report by the interested commissioners. As soon as the evil was perpetrated, and the rightful owners of the monasteries banished, there was no show of applying their possessions to the uses for which they had been originally destined. The peasantry—says Mr. Hibbert—suffered most, for the relief extended in times of distress was no longer forthcoming. Charity had disappeared.

With regard to the form of public worship there was little change. The Mass was still read in Latin and it was only in 1540 that the first English Prayer-Book was issued. So that the plunder of the monasteries was but a prelude to the remodeling of doctrinal truths and the transformation of religious service. Loot and not conscientious belief had inspired the acts of the self-styled Reformers in England.

BEN HURST.

The American Flower Garden. By NELTJE BLANCHAN. New York: Doubleday, Page & Company. (8 by 10 in., 368 plus XIV pp.). $5.00.

The elegant binding, letter-press, and illustrations have the outward signs of a floral treasure-house. By perusing the exquisite volume, we see that the signs have not misled us. With a knowledge and love of the subject, and with a graceful and versatile pen, our guide conducts us by pleasant paths and inviting bowers from the first essays at landscape decoration to the soul-lifting contemplation of fair prospects made doubly fair by the magic wand of the artist.

"Earth emancipated from the commonplace" is approved by the gifted authoress as a definition of a garden. But she shows that it is more—it is earth with splendor dight, earth glorified. A chapter on the Partnership between Nature and Art introduces the reader to all that goes to make a garden from the modest effort of the flowerlover whose earthly possession is a cottage to the scenic creations of the landscape artist whose esthetic touch transforms slope and swale and gully and crag into a harmonious floral mosaic.

The Formal Garden, so suggestive of the stately minuet, the Old-Fashioned Garden, full of fond memories, the Naturalistic Garden, where Nature is aided but not fettered—all come in for generous and sympathetic treatment. The Rock Garden, which can be made a thing of beauty and is so often a monstrosity suggestive of a hideous nightmare, receives the attention which it should have at this time when it is growing in popularity and yet is so little understood. The chapter on the nelumbium, the nymphaea, and other aquatics ought to open the eyes of many a suburban resident to the possibilities of a tiny stream and a boggy spot.

Summing up all in a few words, The American Flower Garden tells us what, when, where, how to plant, whether tree, shrub, vine or fleeting flower. The soul of the artist is seen in the printed page; the illustrations, both color plates and half tones, scattered with Flora's prodigality through the volume, set more strikingly before the eye the lesson of things beautiful which the pen has traced. Though the trees are leafless and the sward where not mantled with snow is faded and sere, The American Flower Garden spirits us away from winter's cold and bids us rejoice in the awakening spring and the promised summer when earth shall be decked as a bride and shall repose in her raiment of beauty.

* * *

History of the Society of Jesus in North America, Colonial and Federal. By THOMAS HUGHES of the same Society. Documents, Vol. I, Part II, Nos. 141-224.

(1605-1838). Cleveland: The Burrows Brothers Company; London and New York: Longmans, Green & Co.

"If the interests of history are to be served, or the course of error stemmed, we may not ignore what we do not like, nor need we blush at old sheets which blush not, nor are we at liberty to retire with the instinct of self-preservation from facing that which we fear." Thus the Reverend author prepares us for the perusal of a series of Documents beginning with the suppression of the Society of Jesus in 1773 and going on to the year 1838. The coming of the Sulpicians to the United States, the establishment of our hierarchy, and the restoration of the Society of Jesus throughout the world are the chief occasions which called forth the Documents here brought together. Few of them have a bearing on the strictly spiritual ministrations of the Jesuits, while there is a surfeit of those which concern the long-drawn-out controversy between the third Archbishop of Baltimore and the Jesuits over the title to certain estates in Maryland to which he laid claim or in which he felt that he had an interest. Ungrateful though it may be, the conscientious historian who aims at something more authoritative than a popular manual is bound to reproduce the lights and the shades on his historical canvas, else it could represent not the realm of truth but only pleasing fancies.

It is commonly said that no man is a hero to his valet. This is simply another way of saying that even in the great and the honored there remain traces of human frailty and petty meanness which may at times so assert themselves as to overshadow or eclipse nobility of soul and precipitate actions which, in more sober and self-contained moments, might be repudiated and condemned. The human element with all that it implies must necessarily exist in the Church militant.

On such a foundation as he has laid in the Documents so untiringly sought out and marshaled together, the author promises to raise two volumes of Text, which they are designed to illustrate. They prove that he hews to the line, let the chips fall where they may.

* * *

BOOKS RECEIVED

Correspondence on Church and Religion of William E. Gladstone. Selected and Arranged by D. C. Lathbury. With Portraits and Illustrations. Two volumes. New York: The Macmillan Co. Net $5.00.
What's Wrong With the World. By Gilbert K. Chesterton. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. Net $1.50.
Heroic Spain. By E. Boyle O'Reilly. New York: Duffield & Co. Net $2.50.
Siena and Southern Tuscany. By Edward Hutton. New York: The Macmillan Co. Net $2.00.

Pamphlets:

The Buddhist and Catholic Positions. By J. Pahanunay, O. M. I. Colombo, Ceylon: The Messenger Press.
The Gospel According to St. Mark. By Brother Joseph, S.J. Trichinopoly: St. Joseph's Industrial School Press.
Medical Notes on Lourdes. By Dr. H. Guinier. Trichinopoly: The Morning Star.

EDUCATION

The following resolutions, presented by George A. Connolly of California, were adopted by the National Convention of the Knights of Columbus at Quebec, August 4th, 1910:—

Whereas, The Catholic education of children of Catholic parentage is a matter of vital importance to the preservation and propagation of the Catholic Faith in America; and

Whereas, The Catholic laity have cooperated with their hierarchy in the establishment and maintenance of Catholic schools for the instruction of their children in the elementary and primary grades, so that Catholic parochial schools have been multiplied in great numbers, and have reached a high degree of efficiency; and

Whereas, The subject of secondary and higher education of Catholic youth has not received, and is not now receiving, from the Catholic laity an attention and study commensurate with its importance; and

Whereas The need of sound religious training in high school, academic, college and university courses is even more pronounced and pressing than in the primary and elementary grades; and

Whereas, There has been a noticeable spread of the practice of sending Catholic youth to non-Catholic and even to anti-Catholic institutions of higher education; and

Whereas, Experience has demonstrated that this practice is fraught in most instances with the gravest dangers to the faith and morals of our Catholic youth; and

Whereas, This practice is not only dangerous and unwise, but also unnecessary; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we the National Council of the Knights of Columbus, hereby profess and proclaim our devotion and loyalty to the principle of Catholic higher education; that we pledge our Order, and every member of our Order, to advance this sacred cause by every means within our power; and that we earnestly recommend to our entire membership the moral and financial support of Catholic institutions of higher education; and be it further

Resolved, That we hereby pledge our National Officers and our Board of Directors to give the widest possible publicity to these resolutions and to the general subject of the importance of Catholic higher education, using such means thereto as their judgment and experience may dictate; and be it further

Resolved, That for the purpose of the more general and effective carrying out of the purpose and intent of these resolutions, the Supreme Knight be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint from this Council a special committee, to be known and designated as the Committee on Catholic Higher Education, said committee to consist of three (3) members, each of whom must be known to the Supreme Knight to be sincerely devoted to the principle of Catholic Higher Education; that each member of said committee, while engaged upon the work of such committee, and acting under the direction of its Chairman, or of the Supreme Knight, shall be entitled to his reasonable traveling expenses and a per diem of ten dollars, the vouchers for which shall be approved by the Supreme Knight, and when so approved, the amount thereof shall be paid by the National Treasurer; provided, however, that the total expenditures of the said committee until the next National Convention shall not exceed the sum of one thousand dollars ($1000.00); and be it further

Resolved, That the said committee be requested to diligently inquire into the best means of interesting the Catholic public in the matter of chairs, scholarships, original foundations, and cost of maintenance of Catholic institutions of higher education and to report the result of its labors to the next National Convention of our Order; all to the general end that Catholic Higher Education may be brought closer to the homes of our people, and that there may be, within the shortest possible time, at least one Catholic High School in every town, one Catholic College in every diocese, and one Catholic University in every archdiocese, in the land.

The question of high school fraternities and sororities is once more to the fore, now that the resumption of classes has again made their approval or disapproval by parents and school authorities a matter of actual interest. Probably the clearest exposition of the disadvantages involved in such associations that has come to our attention is that reported from Chicago during the past week. Members of the class of current events of the Sunday School of the First Congregational Church of Evanston, Chicago's well-known suburb, discussed the question and among other sharp criticism labeled these fraternities and sororities "breeders of anarchy and lawlessness." But one member of this large class had a word to say in favor of such organizations. The opposition to the high school societies was urged principally by Mrs. H. H. Kingsley, wife of the Superintendent of Schools, Andrew P. Canning, a Democratic Congressional candidate, and Mrs. Catherine Waugh McCulloch, the suburb's woman justice of the peace. Mrs. Kingsley had this to say:

"I have gone into the question so deeply that I have consulted the heads of both the boys' and the girls' societies and asked them for their arguments in favor of their organizations. I found that many of them offered the same statements—that the societies aided social life and recreation; but on the other hand, there were some who confessed that there were no real advantages to be gained from membership.

"The societies upset home life when the children constantly are leaving their own firesides to attend evening meetings or parties of their societies. They bring home secrets which they cannot or will not tell their parents and this brings about an alienation of the children from their mothers and fathers. Parents know fully that the teachers and educators object to these organizations, and when they allow them to join it is done in bold contempt of the best judgment of those to whom they intrust a big share of the task of raising their children."

Mr. Canning said the fraternities opposed democratic principles.

"In a public institution and in a high school especially," he said, "all children should be on a basis of equality. These organizations take in the sons and daughters of the rich, who then hold the poorer children in greater contempt than before. They engage in an objectionable form of politics, for always the fraternity will endeavor to keep its members to the front in school or class affairs, no matter whether they merit the attention much less than some other person not a member of their order."

Mrs. McCulloch emphasized the point that the high school society could not be discussed so thoroughly as the college fraternity, of which it is an imitation.

"High school children are too young to go to evening parties," she said. "They range from 12 to 16 years old for the large part, and at that age boys ought not to have 'girls' and girls ought not to have 'beaux.' They dress up and imitate the manners of grown folk at their parties. An afternoon party for children is all right; but the evening party with the young people strolling to and from the party, free from the watchful eyes of their elders, is all wrong."

ECONOMICS

The German press announces a crisis in the meerschaum industry. The source of supply at Eski-Schehr in Asia Minor is almost exhausted, and as a consequence, the trade which has been built up at Vienna, Budapest, Paris, and elsewhere, including the little town of Ruhla in the Thuringian Forest, is threatened with destruction. The bearing that this has upon Ruhla is seen when one reflects that its annual exportation of meerschaum pipes reaches the value of $1,500,000. The industry goes back to 1750, and was begun by a Count Andrassy. While he was on a journey in Turkey, he was presented with a piece of meerschaum as something very rare, and on his return to Budapest, he commissioned a wood carver to make some pretty object of the lump of mineral. The carver fashioned two pipes, one of which he kept for himself because while he was shaping it some drops of wax had accidentally fallen upon it and stained it. When he began to smoke it, he noticed that the spots where the wax had fallen took on a rich brown color, and this suggested to him the idea of smearing the whole pipe with the same substance, the result being the first colored meerschaum pipe. He communicated the secret to the count, who followed the same plan. From that time the Hungarian nobles have gloried in the possession of similar pipes. The carver made a fortune.

The finest meerschaum in the world is that from Eski-Schehr, the production of late years having amounted to 12,000 boxes annually, worth in the crude state about $50 a box.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

St. Patrick's Cathedral, the finest religious edifice in the country, was formally consecrated on Wednesday, Oct. 5. Never in the history of New York were so many church dignitaries, Cardinals, Archbishops, Bishops and Monsignors assembled to participate in a religious ceremony. Fifty thousand spectators within and without the sacred edifice added their numbers and their devotion to the impressiveness of the occasion. The consecration, made possible by the generosity of the faithful in lifting a debt of $850,000, which has rested upon the Cathedral since its completion thirty years ago, was the crowning achievement in the long and meritorious career of Archbishop John M. Farley. The consecration services proper, which began at daybreak, were brought to a close by a Solemn Pontifical Mass, celebrated by Cardinal Gibbons, of Baltimore. On canopied thrones within the sanctuary railing during the Mass sat Cardinal Vannutelli, the papal legate, and Cardinal Logue, primate of all Ireland, while about them were grouped archbishops and bishops from every diocese in the country; many, too, from distant parts who had attended the Eucharistic Congress in Montreal and remained over for the consecration. Among the most notable present was Diomedea Falconio, papal legate to the United States, with Archbishop Farley, the chief consecrator. Twenty-two thousand worshippers were crowded within the Cathedral, while outside more than 30,000, unable to gain admittance, waited during the long hours of the ceremonies. In the great procession to the cathedral for the pontifical Mass more than 5,000 men and boys participated, including the prelates and the clergy. The sermon for the occasion was delivered by Archbishop Glennon, of St. Louis. At the conclusion of the Mass, Archbishop Farley delivered an address to Cardinal Vannutelli, the representative of the Holy Father, to which the papal legate replied. Pontifical Vespers were celebrated in the evening by Mgr. Falconio, and a sermon was delivered by Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Hickey, Bishop of Rochester, N. Y.

The children, too, had their share in consecration week. Eight thousand of them, representing all the parochial schools in New York City, but only a twelfth of the total number of pupils, filled the benches of the great cathedral and even the chairs in the aisles, and overflowed into the Lady Chapel. The impressive ceremonies of the previous day were reproduced for the little ones. Cardinal Vannutelli celebrated the Pontifical Mass, and Cardinal Gibbons assisted in the sanctuary. A feature of the Mass was the chanting of the Gregorian service by the boys and girls in the congregation. "I did not hear one discordant note among the thousands of voices singing," Archbishop Farley told the children from the pulpit. "Cardinal Vannutelli desires me to say for him that one of the first pieces of information he will give the Holy Father will be the account of your presence here and your remarkable singing. He promises to ask for a special benediction for you to come from the Holy Father himself." Monsignor McGean, rector of St. Peter's in Barclay Street, the oldest Catholic church in the city, preached the sermon.

On Friday, the closing day of the ceremonies, about 3,500 religious attended Pontifical High Mass. The celebrant was His Eminence Cardinal Logue. Cardinal Vannutelli said that he had never before seen so many nuns and brothers together at one time. One thousand Christian Brothers attended together with Augustinians, Redemptorists, Dominicans, Franciscans, Jesuits, Carmelites, Benedictines, and other religious communities of men within the archdiocese. Among the nuns the orders more largely represented were the Sisters of Charity, the Sisters of Mercy, the Sisters of St. Joseph, the Gray Nuns and the Ursulines.

Rev. Thomas J. Campbell, S.J., editor of AMERICA, was the preacher. The choice of a former provincial of one of the orders was quite in keeping with the unique character of the assemblage. Archbishop Farley followed with a short address in which he paid a special tribute to the religious laymen and their work, saying:

"Dearly Beloved Sisters and Brothers in Christ: I would feel myself wanting in the performance of my duty as Archbishop if I did not avail myself of such a unique opportunity to address such a number of you at once and to congratulate you on your presence here this morning. The reason why I wanted all the religious orders of the diocese represented here to-day I imagine is obvious to every one. We had the little ones of the city here yesterday—those of the most beloved of His heart—to participate in the first pontifical high Mass to be offered up in this cathedral since its consecration.

"It was a sight that cheered the heart of every one. It gave me more pleasure than I can express, and I feel that the prayers issuing from those thousands of innocent hearts and lips were an especially pleasing intercession with our Saviour for the good of this diocese. So to-day in like manner I felt that you, dearly beloved brothers and sisters, had an extra right after the little ones to assist at a sacrifice offered up by one of the princes of the Church."

On October 12, His Eminence Cardinal Gibbons dedicated the new College Church at Mount St. Mary's, Emmitsburg. The funds for the new edifice were subscribed by the alumni of the College, and hundreds of former graduates attended the dedication.

The Rev. M. A. Drennan, C.M., has been appointed Superior of St. Vincent's Seminary, Germantown, Penn., not Provincial of the Eastern Province of his Congregation, as was stated recently. In recognition of his many personal excellencies and long tried executive ability, his brethren, last November, elected the Very Rev. P. McHale to the office of Provincial of the Lazarist Communities in succession to the Very Rev. James McGill.

The Alumni of the Irish College, Rome, established an organization in Dublin, September 27, under the title of "The Ven. Oliver Plunket Union," the venerable Martyr having been a student of the college and for many years Professor in the Roman Propaganda. Bishop Donnelly, Coadjutor to the Archbishop of Dublin, celebrated the inaugural Mass, which was attended by a large number of clergy from Dublin and the provinces. At a subsequent meeting Bishop Donnelly, who was elected President, held up the learned, humble, zealous and self-sacrificing Primate of Armagh as an example to the Irish clergy. Archdeacon Hutch read an historical paper on the apostolate of the Venerable Martyr, and Mgr. O'Riordan, Rector of the Irish College, Rome, gave an interesting and erudite exposition of the literary work of the Irish College during the three centuries of its existence. The papers will subsequently be published. The Union, besides promoting general co-operation among the Alumni will devote itself toward forwarding the canonization of Venerable Oliver Plunket.

PULPIT, PRESS, AND PLATFORM

MESSAGES FROM THE SPIRIT WORLD.

Editor Catholic Register:

A great deal of excitement has been created by the promise of Prof. James to communicate, if possible, after death, with his friends in this world; and much disappointment has been felt in certain circles, because he has thus far failed to send any message. Some thoughts are suggested by this failure to establish communication.

Nothing lends itself more readily to hallucination and deception than real, supposed or imaginary communication with the departed; for who can disprove what is professedly occult and which no one can possibly know except the person who claims to have received secretly a message from the other world?

It is evident that those who have passed beyond are not free to communicate with the living, for Prof. James must certainly have reached the other shore by this time, and yet he has not sent the promised message. If communication were free it would be of every day occurrence, for what departed soul would not willingly and frequently visit, enlighten and comfort the loved ones left behind?

It is certain, too, that no communication takes place between the disembodied spirits and the inhabitants of our sphere without God's express permission. Now, it is not a part of His ordinary providence to allow this, because it serves no necessary or useful purpose.

Why do people wish to communicate with the dead? Either to establish for a certainty the existence of a future world; to learn something more definite about the life hereafter and hear how their friends fare in that unknown realm; to be directed with regard to their spiritual activities in the present state; to possess occult knowledge; to be taught the way to salvation and shown the right road to heaven and happiness; or in some cases for no nobler purpose than to satisfy curiosity, the thirst for novelty and the craving for the mysterious and occult.

No messages from the other world are not the only means; they are not even the best, surest and safest means for gaining any of these ends. Without such extraordinary visitations from the spirit world, every man has all the help needful for learning about the future life whatever God intends and wants him to know; because God has established on earth, through His Son, Jesus Christ, an infallible Church divinely appointed to teach religious, moral and spiritual truth without any danger of error. Christ has made His Church the pillar and ground of truth; He has built His Church on a rock and declared that the gates of hell shall not prevail against it, that He is with it all days to the consummation of the world; He has empowered it to teach all nations and said that who so hears not the Church shall be as the heathen and the publican; all to indicate that he uses the Church to transmit the truth.

The parable of Lazarus and Dives emphasizes this truth. When Dives, in his torments, asked Abraham to send some one to warn his brothers, in order that they might live better and thus escape his fate, the answer was: "They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them." When Dives still insisted: "If one went to them from the dead they would do penance," Abraham replied: "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they believe if one rise again from the dead."

Whoever has a strong Christian faith and believes firmly and practically that Christ has established a Church commissioned to teach the way of truth and lead mankind safely to heaven is not likely to be very much disturbed by the revelations of psychic research or to give much credence to the stories of psychic manifestations and communications; because he sets more store on the ordinary means of spiritual enlightenment clearly ordained by Christ. He remembers, too, that St. Paul would have none of these usual and extraordinary methods fraught with untold danger to the soul; for he did not hesitate to say that even if an angel of God came and taught a doctrine different from his, he would declare him anathema.

I conclude, therefore, that no message is to be expected from Prof. James, who evidently has his hands full taking care of what concerns him in his present state and has either no desire or no power to deal with the material world. Anything purporting to be a message from him or the spirit-world, if rigidly examined, will be found to be either a deception, an hallucination or an imposture.

M. P. DOWLING, S.J.

PERSONAL

During the past week His Eminence Cardinal Vannutelli spent last Saturday and Sunday in Boston as the guest of Archbishop O'Connell, where he was received with distinguished consideration. A banquet and reception were given him at the Hotel Somerset, at which Governor Draper of Massachusetts, Mayor Fitzgerald of Boston, the Hon. J. C. Pelletier, the Marquis de Bouthillier Charigny and Archbishop O'Connell made addresses. On Sunday he visited Brighton Seminary and in the evening was the guest of a formal dinner at the Archbishop's residence. On Monday he was in Rochester; and on Wednesday and Thursday in Brooklyn as the guest of Bishop McDonnell and was there also received with the most enthusiastic demonstrations of welcome and respect.

The will of the Rev. John A. Kellner, late pastor of St. Gabriel's Church, New Rochelle N. Y., contains the following bequests: St. Joseph's Hospital for consumptives, New York, $2,000; St. Francis Hospital, $1,000, and the Rev. John J. Dunn, director of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, $1,000. Other beneficiaries are the Vicar General of the New York Archdiocese, who is to receive $1,000 for Masses to be said by one hundred of the most needy priests of the archdiocese, to be selected by him; the pastor of St. Gabriel's Church $1,000 to be distributed among the poor of St. Gabriel's parish; St. Francis Xavier's College, of which he was a graduate, $1,000; the Cathedral College of New York City, $1,000, and St. Joseph's Home for the aged $500.

OBITUARY

James D. Fox, of the Supreme Court of Missouri, died in St. Louis, October 6th, of apoplexy. He was born in Madison Co., Mo., Jan. 23rd, 1847; and Fredericktown, the county seat was always his home. He studied at the St. Louis University; was elected Judge of the Circuit Court four terms of six years each; was finally chosen one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the State and at his death was the ranking justice. He was an active member of the Helias Council of the Knight of Columbus. The funeral ceremonies took place at the College Church, St. Louis, but the burial was in the old home town.

Dr. Michael Walsh died on October 6th, at his home in Brooklyn, N. Y., at the age of 75. He was a native of Kilkenny, Ireland, and after a distinguished career as a student at Maynooth, he was appointed a professor at Carlow College. He held the degrees of Ph. D. and LL.D. In 1868 he became a journalist in New York City, and five years later was made editor of the Sunday Democrat and became its proprietor not long afterwards. In 1889 he founded the Catholic Herald and when he retired some years ago from the management of the Sunday Democrat and the editorship of the Catholic Herald he devoted himself to editing matter for a Catholic publishing house.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I enclose herewith a clipping from the editorial page of this evening's Chicago Evening Post. This paper, although it has not a very large circulation, is a journal of considerable influence. Did I feel myself capable of handling the subject I should attempt to reply to the editorial, but I do happen to know something about the matter, having attended a performance of the Passion Play the past summer. It is positively unfair to speak of "commercialism" in connection with the representation. The German peasants are thrifty and practical, and the people of Oberammergau are merely consistent with these national traits. They are not extortionate. I received lodging and breakfast there for five marks. My seat cost four marks, and it was a fairly good one.

Mr. W. T. Stead, the editor of the Review of Reviews, declares that Anton Lang received for his share of the proceeds ten years ago scarcely more than $13.50, a mere trifle, considering the great labor his efforts must have cost him, since the preparation extends over many months. The physical and mental strain upon him during the months of the performances must be enormous. If there is anything commercial about this great event, it is the tourist agency side of it, for the tourist agencies have begun to exploit it to the fullest extent.

Professor Ranschenbusch's references to the "rationalism" of Fathers Weiss and Daisenberger, and to the lack of "Catholicism" in their version are of course absurd. The statement that the Catholic clergy of Bavaria have been notably independent in their relationship to the Vatican, is the statement of a writer quite unfamiliar with his theme. It is to be regretted that such an unreliable piece of journalism should have the power to work so much harm, misleading those who do not know and irritating those who do know something about the matter.

MICHAEL S. DONLAN.

Chicago, October 5, 1910.

The Coward Shoe

The Arrows Show Where the greatest strain falls on your foot muscles and right there the Coward Arch Prop Shoe supplies the support needed.

The extension heel steadies the ankle and forms a buttress for the elastic span of the arch prop construction which holds the instep up in place, and prevents and remedies falling arch or "flat-foot."

Put this shoe on your foot and see how much easier it makes walking.

SOLD NOWHERE ELSE

JAMES S. COWARD

264-274 Greenwich St., N. Y.

(NEAR WARREN STREET)

Mail Orders Filled | Send for Catalogue

MENEELY BELL CO.
TROY, N.Y. AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.
BELLS

Just Published

Three Historical Events in Maine

BY THE

REV. T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

Single Copies 15 cents

100 Copies $10.00

THE AMERICA PRESS 32 Washington Sq. W.
NEW YORK

Moisture Will Spoil Ordinary Soda Crackers

NO matter how good the ingredients or how careful the baking, once expose soda crackers to the slightest dampness of air and they lose their taste and much of their food value.

That's why bulk crackers kept in barrels, boxes and cans get tasteless and tough and hard to swallow. They absorb moisture, and they also gather dust, germs and store odors. What a pity that this most nutritious of flour foods is so contaminated!

But there is a soda cracker too good, too perfect to be thus treated! After baking, Uneeda Biscuit are immediately placed in dust tight, moisture proof packages which preserve their crispness, flavor and nourishment.

NATIONAL BISCUIT COMPANY

(Never sold in bulk)

5c

for a package

McCRAY REFRIGERATORS

We make a specialty of Built-to-Order Refrigerators for SCHOOLS, HOSPITALS, INSTITUTIONS, etc.

Style No. 171

Write for our free Catalogs,
Number 48 for Institutions
" 87 " Residences
" 59 " Meat Markets
" 72 " Florists
" 67 " Grocers

Branch offices in all principal cities

McCRAY REFRIGERATOR CO.

38 Lake Street

KENDALLVILLE, INDIANA

New York Office, 231 West 42d Street

Sacred Heart Sanitarium

FOR REST, QUIET, RECUPERATION AND HEALTH

Unsurpassed results obtained in Nervousness, Rheumatism, Heart and Stomach troubles. No surgical, hospital nor insanity cases taken. A delightful, homelike, restful place—ideal for all run down conditions. Hydrotherapy, Electricity, Massage, Zander Gymnasium, Sun parlor; Swimming pools, billiards, bowling, etc. Gaited saddle horses, large indoor riding pavilion; suspended running track connected by tunnel with bath department. 17-acre park.

A staff of five physicians give their exclusive services to the patients.

WRITE SISTER SUPERIOR FOR BOOKLET X. MILWAUKEE, WIS.

The Largest Retailer of Hats in the World

E. N. MURPHY, 4 Myrtle Ave., BROOKLYN, N.Y.

BROOKLYN: 4 Myrtle Ave. 1605 Broadway.
NEW YORK: 207 Broadway, entrance on Fulton St. 1415 Broadway.
241 West 125th Street.

Telephone Connections.

Catalogue on request.

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER"
AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week
32 Washington Square, West, New York City

THE CATHOLIC MIND

A periodical published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month.

Each number contains an article of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style.

These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is: one at a time and the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

$1.00 a Year (24 numbers)

5 cents a number

SPECIAL OFFER

SCIENCE AND HER COUNTERFEIT. By Rev. J. Gerard, S.J.
LORD KELVIN AND THE EXISTENCE OF GOD. By H. V. Gill, S.J.
SOCIALISM AND CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. J. F. Hogan, D.D. (2 Nos.)
MEANINGS OF THE WORD SOCIALISM. By C. S. Devas, M.A.
IMPRACTICABILITY OF SOCIALISM. By C. S. Devas, M.A.
CATHOLICS AND THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT. By Rt. Rev. Mgr. Parkinson, D.D.
THE CHURCH—THE STRONG SAFEGUARD OF THE REPUBLIC. By Most Rev. Wm. H. O'Connell, D.D.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE. By Robert Hugh Benson.
THE DELUSION OF CHRISTIAN SCIENCE. By Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J.
THE DOCUMENTARY EXPOSE OF THE RUPTURE OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS BETWEEN THE HOLY SEE AND THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT. (2 Nos.)
THE CONCORDAT OF 1801. By D. Moncreiff O'Connor.
THE FRENCH SEPARATION BILL. (Text.) PRIMARY EDUCATION IN FRANCE.
THE GENIUS OF CARDINAL WISEMAN. By Wilfrid Ward.
THE MASS AND THE REFORMATION. By Rt. Rev. J. Canon Moyes, D.D.
THE ATTITUDE OF MODERN PROTESTANTS TOWARDS THE VIRGINITY OF OUR BLESSED LADY. By Rev. A. J. Maas, S.J.
EXHORTATION OF PIUS X TO THE CATHOLIC CLERGY.

SINGLE COPIES, 5 cents

100 COPIES—SPECIAL PRICE—$2.00

THE AMERICA PRESS

32 Washington Sq., West

New York City

ALTAR WINES

From the Jesuit Fathers
Novitiae Vineyards at LOS GATOS, CAL.

"MALVOISIE" a light dry wine,
perfectly matured.

$1.00 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.

"NOVITIATE" a generous wine,
somewhat sweet—will keep in wood.
$1.50 per Gal. $5.25 per Doz.

Depot and Sole Agency
P. A. MAHONY BARNSTON TEA CO.
Treas. 6 Barclay St., New York

INTERCHANGEABLE CARRIAGE?

Yes,

And best of all it takes but a few seconds to do it

It isn't necessary to send for a mechanic to come and file and fit and make a repair shop of your office; you or anybody can make the change, it's so simple.

If you are doing several copies of manifold work on the Victor and somebody wants a hurry message written, just stop where you are, slip out the carriage with manifold work, replace it with another carriage and you are ready for business.

Remember it takes but a few seconds to make the change.

VICTOR TYPEWRITER COMPANY

812 & 814 Greenwich St., New York

NOW READY

AMONG THE HURONS

VOLUME II OF

Pioneer Priests
of North America

Tells the heroic story of de Brébeuf and His Associates

"This book is a striking illustration of the truth of Shakespeare's well-known words 'Men's good is oft interred with their bones.' . . . We cannot then but feel grateful to Father Campbell for what he has done to assure the fame of those glorious confessors and martyrs from a threatened obscurity. . . ."

"Missionaries such as these have a special work in this day of weak faith and widespread disbelief; for the story of their lives, while it stimulates the one, is a living protest against the other. Father Campbell's theme is a great one, and he has dealt with it well. The clear and simple language in which he recounts the wonderful heroism of these truly wonderful men, is more impressive and convincing than any elaboration of style, and surely more in harmony with the quiet, simple characters of the men of whom he treats."—The Tablet, London.

By Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J.

480 Pages. With Index. 24 Illustrations.

PRICE, $2.00

VOLUME I

This extremely interesting book consists of a series of 18 monographs of the missionaries who labored among the Iroquois Indians. Beginning with the life of Jogues in 1642, they continue up to 1710, when the Indians, just before their annihilation, passed over from French to English control.

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS:

"For lovers of history and biography, of the adventurous, the heroic, and the saintly, there is much to attract the attention in this volume of over 800 large, clearly printed pages."—The Sacred Heart Review.

"The adventures of most of the missionaries read like romances."—The New York Herald.

"One of the most interesting Catholic books we have ever read."—The Monitor (San Francisco).

Price, $1.60, postage prepaid

THE AMERICA PRESS 32 Washington Sq. W.
NEW YORK

BEAUTY IS BORN OF HEALTH and Health is the foundation of all the joys of life. The mission of

ANHEUSER BUSCH'S
Malt-Nutrine

is to bring the pleasures of health and strength to all. It is a liquid food and gives vigor and nutrition to those lacking the power of perfect digestion.

Declared by U. S. Revenue Department A PURE MALT TONIC and NOT an alcoholic beverage

SOLD BY Druggists and Grocers

ANHEUSER - BUSCH
St. Louis, Mo.

MORTGAGE INVESTMENTS

On Massachusetts Real Estate

Yielding 7% on term mortgages on property of best character,
Amounts accepted from $500 up.

MAURICE F. REIDY, Worcester, Mass.
Reference Mechanics National Bank

LIBRARY SUPPLIES

Adjustable
Book Covers—Library Numbers Gummed
and perforated always in stock
—also alphabets of various sizes.

For sale by stationers or by

THE VAN EVEREN CO.
60 Ann Street - New York

The Book Covers are made of tough, strong paper
and are inexpensive, efficient and easily put on

FINN BROTHERS

Manufacturers of

Roll Top Desks

STORE and OFFICE FIXTURES
Counters, Shelvings,
Partitions, Etc.

Estimates and Designs Furnished

Office 358 BROADWAY Salesrooms

59-65 FRANKLIN ST., NEW YORK

Telephones, 4855-4856 Franklin

Factory: 112-114 LEROY STREET

Telephone Connection

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER"
AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week
32 Washington Square West, New York City

WITH GLACIER WINDOW DECORATION

YOU CAN GET

Stained Glass Effects on Ordinary Windows

Suitable for Residences and Churches

Write To-day for Booklet No. 6

Address WM. B. QUAILE, 752 Broadway, New York.

INSTITUTION LINEN

of all kinds, also Sheets and Pillow
Cases, Blankets, Bed Spreads, etc., etc

WRITE for SAMPLES and PRICES

H. W. BAKER LINEN CO. Dept. "K"
41 WORTH ST.
Importers and Manufacturers NEW YORK CITY

BOUND VOLUMES OF
AMERICA A CATHOLIC REVIEW
OF THE WEEK
SIX MONTHS TO A VOLUME
$3.50

The AMERICA Press, 32 Washington Sq. W., New York

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF HENRY VAN RENSSELAER

Priest of the Society of Jesus

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF A WELL-KNOWN AND MUCH-BELOVED PRIEST
By Edward P. Spillane, S.J.

The volume is enriched with a fine photogravure portrait of Father Van Rensselaer, and with many other interesting illustrations.

Price, $1.00. By mail, 10 cents extra

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Square, W., New York

PRINTING OF EVERY DESCRIPTION
FOR Churches and Schools

Periodical Publications
Catalogues Programs
Stationery Etc., etc.

THE MEANY PRINTING CO.
5th Avenue, Cor. 11th St., NEW YORK.

FREE SCHOLARSHIPS AT THE Leading Catholic Colleges Board and Tuition

Creighton University, Omaha, Neb.
Fordham University, New York, N. Y.
Georgetown University, Washington, D. C.
Niagara University, Niagara Falls, N. Y.

Notre Dame University, Notre Dame, Ind.
St. John's University, Collegeville, Minn.
University of Ottawa, Ottawa, Can.
University of St. Francis Xavier's College, Antigonish, Nova Scotia.

* * *

All Hallows College, Salt Lake City, Utah.
Columbus College, Chamberlain, S. Dak.
Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass.
Holy Trinity College, Dallas, Tex.
Sacred Heart College, Denver, Colo.
Sacred Heart College, Sacred Heart, Okla.
Seton Hall College, South Orange, N. J.

St. Ambrose College, Davenport, Iowa.
St. Bonaventure's College, Allegany, N. Y.
St. Joseph's College, Dubuque, Iowa.
St. Michael's College, Burlington, Vt.
St. Viateur's College, Bourbonnais, Ill.
St. Vincent's College, Beatty, Pa.
St. Charles College, Ellicott City, Md.

Tuition Only

Catholic University of America, Washington, D. C.
Benedictine College, Savannah, Ga.
Boston College, Boston, Mass.
Brooklyn College, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Canisius College, Buffalo, N. Y.
Christian Brothers' College, Memphis, Tenn.
Loyola College, Baltimore, Md.
Marist College, Atlanta, Ga.
Sacred Heart College, Prairie du Chien, Wis.
Sacred Heart College, Augusta, Ga.

St. Francis Xavier's College, New York, N. Y.
St. Mary's University, Galveston, Texas.
St. Ignatius College, Cleveland, Ohio.
St. John's College, Brooklyn, N. Y.
St. John Berchman's College, Toledo, Ohio.
Fordham University Law School, New York, N. Y.
Fordham University Medical School.
Georgetown University Law School, Washington, D. C.
Georgetown University Medical School.
St. Louis University Law School, St. Louis, Mo.

PREPARATORY SCHOOLS (Board and Tuition)

St. Ann's Academy, New York, N. Y.

St. John's Preparatory College, Danvers, Mass.

COLLEGES FOR YOUNG LADIES (Board and Tuition)

COLLEGE OF NEW ROCHELLE, New Rochelle, N. Y. MOUNT ST. JOSEPH'S COLLEGE, Dubuque, Iowa.
ST. MARY'S COLLEGE, Notre Dame, Ind.

N. B.—Other Colleges and Schools will be announced later.

These Scholarships may be obtained by securing subscriptions for AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week.

For further particulars address

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Square, West,
New York, N. Y.

EVER NEED DUPLICATES

of Form Letters, Price Lists, Bills, Invoices, Drawings, Menus, Reports, anything! Then take advantage of our offer of TEN DAYS' TRIAL WITHOUT DEPOSIT. Daus' Improved Tip Top is the simplest and quickest method of duplicating. 100 copies from pen-written and 50 copies from type-written original. Complete duplicator. Cap size (prints 8 3/4 x 13 in.). Price $7.50 less special discount 33 1/3 per cent. net $5.00.

The Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co., Daus Bldg., 111 John St., New York

BROKAW BROTHERS

ASTOR PLACE & FOURTH AVE.
NEW YORK

While there's very little scope in color and patterns in clergymen's clothing—there's a broad latitude in the essential details.

Our long experience in catering to the clothing requirements of clergymen has taught us what is right in Fabrics, Cut and Fit.

Samples and self-measurement blanks sent upon request

Estab. Over Half a Century

$1.00 WILL BRING POSTPAID

one of our
Fine Gold Filled
5 year guaranteed
ROSARIES

In any color. Order through your jeweler or direct. Catalogue free.
Wm. Purnell Co.
Mfg. Jeweler
37 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

ST. JOSEPH'S SANATORIUM

Silver City, New Mexico

Conducted by the Sisters of Mercy

A THOROUGHLY equipped institution for the treatment of all suitable cases of tuberculosis. Each room has two wide connecting porches, electric lights and all modern conveniences. Infirmary for febrile cases, also cottages for those desiring them. Trained nurses and resident physician in constant attendance. Climatic conditions ideal: cool summers and moderate winters. Annual precipitation 12 inches, with only 32 cloudy days. Altitude, 6,000 feet. All ethical lines of treatment, including tuberculin in suitable cases.

For Catalogue and particulars address either Sister Superior or Oliver T. Hyde, M.D., Medical Director.

Ecclesiastical Furniture

PEWS · PULPITS · FONTS · VESTMENT CASES · ETC.

Built to secure harmony with the general architectural and decorative scheme, from the finest, exquisitely hand-carved to the simpler, more inexpensive styles. Styles and Prices to meet any requirements.

Illustrations or special designs to harmonize with the architecture and arrangement of your Church gladly submitted to those interested.

American Seating Company Address D. pt. B.X.

215 Wabash Ave.

NEW YORK

19 West 18th St.

BOSTON

70 Franklin St.

CHICAGO

PHILADELPHIA

1225 Arch St.

PITTSBURGH

824 Lewis Bldg.

The Famous Rayo

The Lamp with Diffused Light

should always be used where several people sit, because it does not strain the eyes of those sitting far from it.

The Rayo Lamp is constructed to give the maximum diffused white light. Every detail that increases its light-giving value has been included.

The Rayo is a low-priced lamp. You may pay $5, $10 or even $20 for other lamps and get a more expensive container—but you cannot get a better light than the Rayo gives.

This season's Rayo has a new and strengthened burner. A strong, durable shade-holder keeps the shade on firm and true. Easy to keep polished, as it is made of solid brass, finished in nickel.

Once a Rayo User, Always One.

Dealers Everywhere. If not at yours, write for descriptive circular to the nearest agency of the

Standard Oil Company
(Incorporated)

HEADQUARTERS FOR THE CLERGY

PHOTOGRAPHY!

High-Class Work at Reasonable Prices
Cardinal Logue, Archbishop Farley, Bishop Cusack, Mons. Kearney, Edwards, Murphy, McMahon, Kelly, &c., have honored us with sittings.

E. F. FOLY 164 FIFTH AVENUE
Bet. 21st and 22d Sts.
Appointments 'Phone, 5995 Gramercy

Telephone Call, 5922 Barclay

THE S. T. SMITH CO.

Manufacturers of

Ink, Inked Ribbons, Carbon, Manifold and Typewriter Linen Papers

Diamond Brand Typewriter Supplies

11 BARCLAY STREET

NEW YORK

F. JAMES REILLY
President

JAMES REILLY'S SONS' CO.

• General Electrical Repairs •

122-130 CENTRE STREET

Corner White Street

Telephone 881 Franklin

NEW YORK

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 32 Washington Square, West, New York City

"Perfect" Warm Air Heaters

"Perfect" Cooking Ranges

and

Richardson's Steam and

Water Boilers

Give splendid satisfaction

THOUSANDS IN USE

Send for Catalogue

RICHARDSON & BOYNTON CO.

31 West 31st Street

Chicago NEW YORK Boston

DIRECTORY OF COLLEGES AND ACADEMIES

Georgetown University WASHINGTON, D. C.

Directory for Catalogues or Information

The College (Graduates and Undergraduate Schools)
The Registrar, 37th & O Sts., N. W.

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E. St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Joseph Himmel, S.J., President

LADYCLIFF

On the Hudson (Adjoining West Point)
Young Ladies' Academy

A department for small boys. Education thorough and practical. Location beautiful and convenient. Terms moderate. Send for prospectus. Address Sister Superior, Ladycliff, Highland Falls, N. Y.

New York State Regents' Examinations.

Academy of St. Joseph

In-the-Pines

BRENTWOOD, N. Y.

A Boarding School for Young Ladies,
Affiliated with the State University

PROSPECTUS EXPLAINS THE TERMS, ETC.

St. Mary's College

St. Marys, Kansas

BOARDING COLLEGE
Under the Jesuit Fathers

Two Courses of Study:
Classical and Commercial

For Catalogue, send to
REV. ALOYSIUS A. BREEN, S.J., President.

Mount de Chantal

WHEELING, W. Va.

A SELECT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS

For Catalogue apply to The Directress

Convent of the Holy Child

SHARON HILL, DELAWARE COUNTY, PA.
15 Minutes from Philadelphia

ACADEMY FOR YOUNG LADIES
Highest English Course. French, Drawing, Music by Certified Teachers. Preparation for foreign travel. As the numbers are limited, special care can be given to the formation of character and training of each child. Address Mother Superior

COLLEGE OF ST. ELIZABETH

CONVENT STATION.
Near Morristown, N. J.

One hour from New York City.

A Catholic Institution for the Higher Education of Women

COLLEGE Four years' course leading to the degrees of B. A. and B. S. SCHOOL OF PEDAGOGY Required for entrance two years of College work

SCHOOL OF MUSIC. COURSE LEADING TO THE DEGREE OF B. M.

ACADEMY A High School Course of Four Years. Full College Preparatory Work. GRAMMAR AND PRIMARY DEPARTMENTS SEPARATE

REGISTERED By the New Jersey State Board of Education and the University of the State of New York Apply for Year Book to The Secretary

MT. ST. JOSEPH ON THE WISSAHICKON

For illustrated catalogue address MOTHER SUPERIOR, Chestnut Hill, Philadelphia, Pa.

CATHOLIC COLLEGE FOR WOMEN
situated in the romantic Valley of the Wissahickon. Degrees conferred. Also Academic, Commercial, Intermediate and Elementary Departments. Very special advantages in Music and Art. The piano student possesses superior opportunities in the use of the Virgil Clavier Method pursued throughout the course. The Art Studio is admirably equipped, and every attention is given to the study of Art, both in theory and practice. Gymnasium perfectly equipped. Outdoor exercise, tennis, basket ball, fencing, etc.

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE

WORCESTER
MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Collegiate and Preparatory Departments

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $260 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra. Send for catalogue to

REV. THOMAS E. MURPHY, S.J., President

Seton Hall College

FOUNDED 1856

South Orange, New Jersey

COLLEGE AND HIGH SCHOOL

Bayley Hall for Students
of Grammar Course

FOR CATALOGUE ADDRESS
Very Rev. James F. Mooney, D.D., Pres.

"OUR LADY OF PEACE" RESIDENCE FOR LADIES

225-227 WEST 14th STREET, NEW YORK CITY

THE important residential institution under the management of the religious order of Jesus-Mary is now open to receive guests. This institution responds to a great need in our metropolis. 170 rooms at $8 to $12 per week are ready to accommodate ladies in the literary profession, retired teachers, stenographers, students and others desirous of a peaceful abode. All the rooms are cheerful, well heated, and furnished to give comfort to each one. Library, music room, large roof garden, sun parlor add to the enjoyment of the boarders.

The atmosphere of the house is homelike and attractive. Special price for suites.

School of music will open September 1st, 1910. Private courses in French for ladies and children also begin at same date. For further information, apply to MOTHER SUPERIOR.

ST. JOHN'S PREPARATORY COLLEGE

DANVERS, MASS.

SELECT HIGH SCHOOL conducted by the XAVIERIAN BROTHERS

Classical, Scientific and Commercial Courses

Ideal Location

All New Buildings

New Equipment

Competent Instructors

Develops the Whole Boy

Send for Catalogue

Brother Benjamin, Director

IMMACULATA SEMINARY

MOUNT MARIAN, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Situated in the suburbs. Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of St. Mary-of-the-Woods. Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Conservatory methods in Music. Oil and Ceramic and Water-color Studios. Abundant out-door exercise. Sightseeing with experienced chaperons.

For Year Book address, Sister Secretary

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

ADJOINING BRONX PARK, NEW YORK CITY

College and High School

ST. JOHN'S HALL, FOR SMALLER BOYS

The location affords the healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city

MEDICAL SCHOOL
in connection with Fordham Hospital

WRITE FOR CATALOGUE

LAW SCHOOL
at 20 Vesey St.
in the midst of the courts

SPRING HILL COLLEGE

FOUNDED 1830 Spring Hill, Mobile Co., Ala. CHARTERED 1836

BOARDING COLLEGE CONDUCTED BY THE JESUIT FATHERS

Just the School for boys who wish to escape the rigors of the Northern climate. Mean temperature of the winter months, 52 degrees Fahrenheit.

HEALTHY LOCATION—EVERY CONVENIENCE OF A MODERN COLLEGE

CURRICULUM INCLUDES THE PREPARATORY, HIGH SCHOOL AND COLLEGE COURSES. DEGREES CONFERRED

Write for Catalogue to Rev. F. X. Twellmeyer, S. J., President

DIRECTORY OF COLLEGES AND ACADEMIES

ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS

COLLEGE FOR YOUNG WOMEN (TWO HOURS FROM INDIANAPOLIS)

FOUNDED IN 1840; INCORPORATED IN 1846. EMPOWERED TO CONFER COLLEGIATE DEGREES. Four Years' College Course. Academic and Grammar Departments. Elective Courses for Special Students. Conservatory of Music, with Vocal, Piano, Harp, Violin, Pipe Organ, etc. Oil and Ceramic and Water-color Studios. Modern languages by native teachers. New Gymnasium, with Natatorium, Running Track, Bowling, Basket Ball, etc., directed by a graduate of Dr. Sargent's school of Physical Training. Out-of-Door Sports—Horseback Riding, Boating, Archery, Golf, Tennis. For Catalogue and Illustrated Booklet, Address . . SISTER SECRETARY . . Box 70 . . St. Mary-of-the-Woods, . . Vigo County, Indiana

BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL

Holy Cross Academy and High School

FOR GIRLS : : : 53d YEAR

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity

343-349 West 42d Street and 340-350 West 43d Street, New York City

Registered by the New York State Educational Department.

Students prepared for College and the New York Training School for Teachers

Preparatory Department for Young Children

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR BOYS UNDER TWELVE YEARS

THE SISTERS OF CHARITY

Mount Saint Vincent-on-Hudson, New York City

ANNOUNCE THE OPENING OF

COLLEGE COURSES FOR WOMEN

Leading to Degrees, B. A. and B. S. Freshman and Sophomore Classes

SEPTEMBER, 1910

Junior and Senior Classes to follow.

Professors of distinction.

Equipment of the best.

Location healthful, convenient, one half hour from Grand Central Station.

DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS

Fall term begins September 29th, 1910. Write for Prospectus

ACADEMY OF THE HOLY FAMILY

BALTIC, CONNECTICUT

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity

PREPARATORY, COMMERCIAL AND ACADEMIC COURSES

Prospectus explains terms, etc.

Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

OLD POINT COMFORT COLLEGE FOR BOYS
Military, Academic, Commercial and Preparatory courses. Write for catalogue.
Bro. MARCELLUS, Director,
Fort Monroe, Va.

Only 75 Cts. Each, Postpaid

Keep every number of

AMERICA

A Catholic Review of the Week

IN A HANDSOME

Adjustable Binder

of boards and maroon cloth with maps of The Western Hemisphere and the World on Mercator's Projection.

THE AMERICA PRESS

32 Washington Square W.

New York City

Mount St. Joseph Academy

2064 Main Street, Buffalo, N. Y.

FOR YOUNG LADIES

Delightfully situated

Thoroughly Equipped New Building

Chartered under State Board

Terms, $250 per year

Also Separate School for Young Boys

HELEN AUGUSTA HAYES

VOCAL INSTRUCTOR

342 West 55th Street, New York

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 82 Washington Square, West, New York City

BUSINESS SCHOOLS

DRAKE SCHOOL

RESULTS—NOT THEORY

Individual Instruction in BOOKKEEPING

SHORTHAND and TYPEWRITING

with a GUARANTEE of position to each graduate.

Night Session (take ANY

2 hours) from 5 to 9 o'clock.

Start at Once. Send for Catalogue.

154 Nassau Street Tribune Building, Near Brooklyn Bridge.

Pilgrim Walks in Rome

A GUIDE TO THE HOLY PLACES IN ROME AND ITS VICINITY

By P. J. CHANDLERY, S.J.

Third edition enlarged $1.60, Postpaid

THE AMERICA PRESS

32 Washington Sq. W. New York

NOW READY

MARY ALOYSIA HARDEY

RELIGIOUS OF THE SACRED HEART

1809-1886

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY THE REV. THOMAS J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

440 Pages 16 Illustrations With Index

THE LIFE STORY OF A REMARKABLE WOMAN

PRICE, TWO DOLLARS

By Mail 20 cents extra

"Had the Life of Mother Hardey not been published it would have been a positive loss for the history of the Catholic Church in the United States, where for more than fifty years she was such a conspicuous figure. Her biographer completed the work several years ago, but it was only after reiterated entreaties and expostulations that the manuscript was finally put into the hands of the printer."—From the Introduction.

Advance orders will receive prompt attention

THE AMERICA PRESS 32 WASHINGTON SQ. WEST
NEW YORK CITY

Made for St. Gabriel's Church, New Rochelle, N. Y.
Designed and executed by The Gorham Company

The Window illustrated herewith is an example of Antique Glass.

The Ecclesiastical Department will be pleased to furnish, on request, further particulars on this subject.

The Gorham Co.

Fifth Avenue and Thirty-sixth Street
NEW YORK

WILL YOU REPRESENT AMERICA

A Catholic Review of the Week

WE want a reliable man or woman in each city and town to act as our agent. No experience or capital required.

THIS opportunity is open to you no matter where you are situated, as AMERICA is a national publication. There are hundreds of prosperous communities where we are still without an active representative.

Will You Join Our Staff?

NOW IS THE TIME

Write at once, giving reference

AGENCY BUREAU

The America Press 32 Washington Square W.
NEW YORK, N. Y.

Interlocking Rubber Tiling

3-8 INCH THICK

Noiseless
Sanitary Indestructible
FOR

*Aisles, Sanctuary, Vestibule
ETC.*

Special Ecclesiastical Designs

Send for Beautiful Illustrated Catalogue "A"

The Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co.

Headquarters Tiling Department

64th STREET AND BROADWAY, NEW YORK CITY

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Vol. IV, No. 2

(Price 10 Cents)

OCTOBER 22, 1910

($3.00 a year)

Whole No. 80

CHRONICLE

Columbus Day Celebrated—Columbus Day in Boston—Destructive Forest Fires—Death of Senator Dolliver—Art Firm Evades Import Duties—Madero Case in Mexico Ended—Honduras Next—Canada's Trade with the States—Canada—Great Britain—Ireland—France—The Schools—Income Tax—Germany—Degree for the Emperor—Germany's Foreign Secretary in Vienna25-28

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

An Iroquois Chief—Cluny's Thousandth Year—The Catholic Church in Denmark—Orestes A. Brownson, as a Man—Revival of Medievalism in Sweden—Protests Against Caricatures—More Money Loans—Nicaragua Gets an Adviser29-37

CORRESPONDENCE

"Old Catholics" in England—A Summer Incident—"Sentire cum Ecclesia"—Bohemia. 37-39

EDITORIAL

How it Happened—The Chameleon—Germany and Capital Punishment—A Memorable Page in School History40-42

THE RUSE OF FRAY DIMAS43

LITERATURE

Heroic Spain—Correspondence on Church and Religion of William Ewart Gladstone—Literary Notes—Books Received43-45

EDUCATION

Unfairness of Altoona, Pa., School Board—Punctuality of Pupils—Meeting of Missouri College Union45

SOCIOLOGY

Mission of Our Lady of the Rosary—Free Dispensary in Montreal46

ECONOMICS

Commerce Changes in U. S.—Reasonable Increase in Railroad Rates46

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

Unveiling Monument to Father Corby, C.S.C.—Three New Dioceses in Brazil—Dedication of College Chapel, Emmitsburg, Pa.—Holy Name Demonstration in Pittsburgh, Pa.47

SCIENCE

The Conference on Mount Wilson—Annual Meeting of the Astronomische Gesellschaft—Conspicuous Polar Flattening—New Type of War Dirigible—Georgetown University Reports of Earthquakes47-48

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Socialism and the Church48

PERSONAL

Very Rev. Dennis J. Flynn—Very Rev. Patrick Murray, C.S.S.R.48

OBITUARY

Rt. Rev. Jaime Anesagasti y Llamas—Rev. M. McDonnell48

CHRONICLE

Columbus Day Celebrated.—Columbus day was observed in fourteen states as a legal holiday. Parades, mass-meetings and banquets were the ordinary features which marked the celebration in the larger cities, while in some places, as in Boston, a solemn pontifical Mass added a religious significance to the day. In Philadelphia the morning parade was reviewed by Mayor Reyburn. In the evening the Knights of Columbus held a largely attended meeting in the Academy of Music, at which his Grace Archbishop Ryan presided and made a brief address. The chief speaker was the Rev. Thomas J. Campbell, S.J., editor of AMERICA. In Pittsburg the local Italian societies had their parade, and in the evening the Knights of Columbus tendered a banquet to James A. Flaherty, of Philadelphia, Supreme Knight who, with Governor Stuart, was the guest of honor. At the Knights of Columbus' celebration in Chicago, addresses were made by Charles Murphy, M.P., secretary of State of Canada, Vice-President Sherman and Judge Grosscup, of the United States Circuit Court.

Columbus Day in Boston.—Perhaps the most noteworthy recognition of the anniversary of the discovery of America, was the Boston celebration. Thirty thousand marched in procession through the principal thoroughfares, and the multitude which viewed the parade was estimated at half a million. Many of the organizations were in uniform, while others were dressed in fanciful costumes of different periods of American history. Floats were numerous and added greatly to the display. The vanguard was composed of four companies of coast artillery and half a dozen companies of blue jackets and marines. Then came the Ninth Massachusetts Infantry and the Ninth Regiment Veteran Association forming the escort. Italian societies, Knights of Columbus, Hibernians, Foresters, Catholic Chinese, Portuguese and Polish societies, and the Holy Name Society, composed the six divisions of the long line. The parade was reviewed at different points by President Taft and Governor Draper, his Grace Archbishop O'Connell, Mayor Fitzgerald and Chief Marshal Sullivan.

In his sermon to the thousands who thronged the cathedral, Archbishop O'Connell, after a scholarly review of the discoverer's achievement, said: "Italy and Spain participate in the glory of his achievement. It is well to recall this fact to-day when other counsels prevail for the time in either country. Short-sighted statesmen of the present time ignore the illustrious history of the past, when both countries were in complete submission to the voice of the Holy See, and seek now to create a prejudice in those countries against ecclesiastics and all that they represent. If, in the providence of God, Italy and Spain had their golden age and gave birth to achievements which dazzled the world, precisely at that time when ecclesiastics stood in place and power and where Catholicity held primacy over minds and hearts, how fatuous it is in these days to try to deceive the peoples by representing the Church as the enemy of civilization and progress."

Destructive Forest Fires.—Forest fires on both sides of the American-Canadian line destroyed seven towns in Minnesota and partly burned five towns in that State and three in the province of Ontario, Canada. The estimated loss of life is 1,000, and of property from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000. Five thousand persons were made homeless. The prompt work of the Canadian Northern Pacific saved thousands of lives, as the inhabitants of several towns escaped only by the special trains run for them by that company.

Death of Senator Dolliver.—United States Senator Jonathan P. Dolliver died suddenly on October 15, at his home in Fort Dodge, Ia., at the age of fifty-two. He was one of the ablest speakers of the Republican party and his death will be a serious loss to the progressive Republicans of the Senate. In 1908 Senator Dolliver was the choice of President Roosevelt and William H. Taft for Vice-President candidate on the ticket with Mr. Taft, and in the Republican convention of 1900, which nominated Theodore Roosevelt for Vice-President.

Art Firm Evades Import Duties.—Customs officials, acting on evidence obtained by Collector Loeb, arrested two members of the firm of Duveen Brothers, New York, the greatest art importers in America, seized all their books and records and took possession of many of the art treasures in their art store. The arrests were made on the charge of conspiracy to defraud the government out of customs duties, and although the specific fraud alleged in the complaint involved a small amount, Henry A. Wise, the United States Attorney, said that the firm had defrauded the Government out of more than $1,000,000 in years of systematic undervaluation of art treasures imported into the United States. Several wealthy patrons of art, according to Collector Loeb, will come under scrutiny. The total amount of the undervaluation, the collector says, will exceed the sums revealed by the investigations of the frauds of the Sugar Trust.

Madero Case in Mexico Ended.—The case against Francisco Madero, recently a candidate for the presidency who was imprisoned on a charge of seditious utterances and was released on bail, has been dropped by the Mexican Government on condition of his leaving the country. He is said to have established himself at San Antonio, Texas.

Honduras Next.—Very disturbing reports have come from Honduras, where ex-President Bonilla recently attempted a revolutionary movement. Foreigners, especially Americans and Englishmen, have been subjected to humiliating exactions by the authorities of Amapala, who seem disposed to attempt to drive out all foreigners.

Canada's Trade with the States.—For many years Germany has held the second place in the listed exports from the United States. The official reports for the first eight months of the fiscal year now give that distinction to Canada, whose imports from the United States are $158,000,000, as compared with $133,000,000 to Germany. The increase in Canada's purchases are chiefly in raw cotton, machinery, electrical appliances, lumber, corn, books, structural iron and steel, automobiles, horses and unmanufactured tobacco. For the eight months Canada bought ten times as much as did Japan, twice as much as Asia and Oceania combined, and about 80 per cent. as much as the rest of the Western Hemisphere. Canada imported from the United States in that time three times as much as France, five times as much as Italy, and considerably more than half as much as the United Kingdom. In August sales to the United Kingdom were $30,000,000, and to Canada, $23,000,000. This is all important both for the States and Canada in view of the pending negotiations for closer relations between the two countries. The figures show, too, that in eight months United States imports from Canada increased from $52,000,000 to $62,000,000.

Canada.—The Archbishop of Montreal has called a public meeting to protest against the attacks of Nathan, Mayor of Rome, on the Church and the Holy See. The Jews of Montreal repudiate Nathan, saying he had no right to meddle with ecclesiastical affairs. They add moreover, that he is only nominally a Jew, which, if the account usually given of how he gained his high place in the secret societies be correct, is true as far as it goes, but does not give the whole truth.—One Sheldon who had been carrying on a bucket-shop in Montreal on a large scale, absconded last week leaving many creditors in the lurch.—A public Free Trade meeting held in Winnipeg with Mr. H. Vivian, member of the British Parliament, for chief speaker, attracted only seventy-six persons.—The report of the commission to investigate trade relations between Canada and the West Indies and the means of promoting them, moved Mr. Balfour to say, in an address at Edinburgh, that the whole question of inter-imperial preference and free trade has taken a new aspect and holds now the first place in imperial questions. Canada can not be expected to give indefinitely when the door is banged in her face, and England must realize what the result will be if Canada be compelled to abandon as hopeless the policy she inaugurated.

Great Britain.—The idea of Imperial Federation seems to have taken root. Some think the conference on the Lords will end with a scheme, restricted for the present to Great Britain and Ireland, providing for local parliaments for England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales and a greatly modified imperial parliament.—Lord Charles Beresford has written another open letter, this time on the unprotected condition of British trade routes, to the Prime Minister, who answers that he is fully alive to the necessity of doing everything to secure British supremacy of sea.—A beet sugar factory is to be established in Dorset. Landowners representing 150,000 acres are supporting the project.—The Manchester lock-out has been settled. The refusal of the Fern mill to reengage the workman whose discharge brought about the strike which led to the lock-out, was the difficulty. It was got over by a simple method. The Duke mill engaged him and, to do so, discharged a man whom the Fern mill took. Both sides profess to have maintained their principles.—The Bishop of Manchester has been talking rather freely about the Bible at the Church of England Congress. "Those, he said, who find the song of Deborah, like some of the Psalms, offensively vindictive, must remember that as regards the conception of God, its author was as far from the author of the Epistle to Philemon as a red Indian is from a Westcott or a Lightfoot. People must not be forced into the position of unbelievers, though they should deny the story of Jonah, the miracles of Elisha, the history of Daniel, or even our Lord's resurrection, but should be encouraged to read their Bibles with a desire to lead a pure, loving life.—The Bristol, second-class cruiser, has just completed steam trials. The mean speed reached was 26.84 knots. 1.84 knots better than designs called for. The horsepower developed was 24,227, exceeding that contracted for by 2,227. Moreover there was considerable economy in fuel. The machinery is turbine of the Curtis type. It is fair to add that the Neptune battleship with improved Parson's turbines showed results not dissimilar.—Prince Maurice of Battenberg, cousin of the King, the chauffeur of the Duke of Connaught, and other notables, have been fined in the police courts for motoring at excessive speed. Twenty miles an hour is the limit.—Messrs. Arthur Cocks and H. F. Hinde, who resigned the vicarages of St. Bartholomew's and the Annunciation, Brighton, lately, H. R. Prince, curate of the latter church and O. P. Henly, assistant at the former, and J. D. Knox, curate of St. Saviour's Cathedral, Southwark, have entered the Church. In a letter to the newspapers Messrs. Cocks and Hinde explain their motive. The prohibition of benediction services by the Bishop of Chichester implied the denial of Transubstantiation. Hence, they could not submit but were obliged to enter the Church which teaches this, as all other Catholic doctrines.—The Duke of Connaught sailed October 11 for South Africa, to open the first federal parliament.—Sir W. S. Robson, Attorney-General, has become a Lord Justice of Appeals. Sir Rufus Isaacs, the first Jew to hold the office, becomes Attorney-General, and thus next in ordinary succession to the Chancellorship. This may bring about a modification of the laws concerning this office, which Catholics could not hope to obtain. Mr. John A. Simon becomes solicitor general at the very early age of 37.

Ireland.—An interview by Mr. Redmond in the London Daily Press is the subject of much discussion in Ireland. The Irish leader professes entire loyalty to the British Empire and continues: "We mean by Home Rule the same measure of local self-government for Ireland as exists in each American State. . . . We do not demand such complete local autonomy as the British self-governing colonies possess, for we are willing to forego the right of making our own tariff and are prepared to abide by any fiscal system enacted by the British Parliament. We are prepared to bear our full burden with England, Scotland and Wales in supporting the army, navy and diplomatic corps, which is not done by the colonies." Such questions as Old Age Pensions which are enacted for both countries as a single political unit, are to remain under English control. He only wants "Ireland to decide for herself such local measures as do not concern in any way Great Britain." This granted, "we shall demonstrate our imperial loyalty beyond question and do our best to strengthen the Empire by bringing America and Britain closer together." Mr. T. P. O'Connor in Toronto spoke on the same lines, advocating a federal scheme of government for England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales such as the Canadian provinces enjoy under the Dominion Parliament. These utterances following upon Mr. Redmond's recent strong insistence at Limerick on "complete national self-government" and Mr. W. Redmond's demand for "Boer Home Rule," have created bewilderment in Ireland. The financial arrangement comes in for severest criticism. It is believed that the Federal scheme has been pressed on the leaders of both English parties by Earl Grey and that the Veto-Conference has accepted it. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, speaking in Toronto, expressed better than T. P. O'Connor, the popular demand in Ireland: "Let England trust the Irish people as she has trusted the Canadians. All Ireland asks is fair and equal justice. It is to me the only spot on the government that Ireland has not been given the right of local self-government. Let that be granted as in Canada and in South Africa and there will follow loyalty, content and a unity such as that which followed the granting of autonomy to the people of Canada. Liberty spells loyalty." Mr. Redmond cabled to Dublin, October 17, his repudiation of the Federal scheme; but the gist of the interview is in accord with his article, "What Ireland Wants," in the current McClure's.

France.—Almost simultaneously with the outbreak in Portugal and suggesting, of course, a prearranged plan of operations, nearly all the railroads of the country were tied up with the result that the great centres like Paris were actually straitened for food. On October 13, five of the leaders were arrested. They had assembled in the newspaper of the Humanité and with them were all the Socialist deputies. It was intended to be a dramatic scene, a situation that appeals strongly to the average Frenchman. But the unimpressible police put a stop to their inflammatory speeches and hustled them off to jail. Meantime the reserves of the army had been called out. As three-fourths of the strikers were reservists the effect on the strike was immediate, especially as many railroad men of the southern lines were not enthusiastic for the strike. However, three trains were held up, the crews beaten, passengers insulted and the cars derailed and damaged. In one place dynamite was used. In Paris and elsewhere the police and soldiers were stoned. The troops used their sabres and revolvers freely. The losses from the strike run into millions. There were many sympathetic strikes.

The Schools.—The outlook is bright, now that a sturdy fight has begun. When all the Catholic schools were closed by expelling the teaching congregations, free schools under lay direction were instituted. In consequence of government action most of those have collapsed within the last year. The conflict has, therefore, been transferred to the State schools, and under the direction of the hierarchy, organized opposition has been started against the use of many of the text books in use. This opposition is no longer confined to mere protests, which to those outside of France always seemed to be futile, but there is a positive refusal by the children under their parents' direction, to use the objectionable books. This vigorous method has evoked a storm, and the Educational League of Public School Teachers is urging the Government to pursue its policy against the Church remorselessly. As a counterblast to this action of the Association the Bishops have issued a joint pastoral forbidding the use of certain books which they designated. The consequences was that four of the bishops were summoned to court for libel. Cardinal Luçon and the Bishop of Arras were condemned, but they have appealed; the two other bishops have been acquitted.

This resolute action gave heart to the people. From one end of the country to the other, Leagues were formed and they run up now to thousands, all pledged to oppose the condemned school books. In 240 schools, children, singly or in batches, sometimes as many as twenty at a time, have been refused admission to the schools because of their unwillingness to use the offensive manuals. In 68 schools, children have left of their own accord. In 49, the books have been taken from the children by the parents, and burned or otherwise destroyed; in 143 departments protests have been made by the parents. The Associations of Fathers of Families which have been organized, have established a central bureau for information and direction. Evidently a large part of the French Catholics have grown tired of being driven like sheep to the slaughter.

Income Tax.—The principal trouble that confronts Briand is the Income Tax which is to be discussed at the coming session. It is held in horror by the bourgeoisie. Taxation already weighs heavily in that country on the man of moderate means. Besides heavy death duties a Frenchman is personally taxed on his house rent, the number of his windows, his motor car, his billiard-table and a number of other comforts and luxuries. The Finance Minister Cochery insists that in order to provide for the Workmen's and Peasants' pensions this new tax on Incomes is absolutely needed, and he insists that he will not permit his bill to be in any manner mutilated or broken up. To this attitude of the Finance Minister Briand is strongly opposed, and only 152 out of the 600 deputies have declared themselves in favor of the tax.

Germany.—The Foreign Office in Berlin has replied to the representations made by Ambassador Hill in favor of the New York correspondent who was wounded by the Berlin police in a charge made upon the striking miners during the recent Moabit disturbances. The Foreign office people regret to reply that they see no reason why punishment should be meted out to the police concerned in the trouble. The police were but doing their duty and the unfortunate wounding of the correspondent was due, say they, to his own carelessness. Ambassador Hill at once forwarded the note of the Foreign Office to his own government in Washington.—Justice Oliver W. Holmes of the Supreme Court, Doctor Hadley, of Yale, and Professor Lowell, of Harvard, were among the Americans who received an Honorary Doctorate of Laws during the centennial celebration of the Berlin University.—The Social-Democrats of Berlin issued a call for mass meetings of their followers to take action regarding the "brutalities" of the police during the late uprising of the miners in Moabit. Thirty-one immense meetings were held in Greater Berlin at which 100,000 Socialists are declared to have been present. The meetings in every case passed off peaceably and with no disturbance that called for action by the police. These latter had been armed and massed at convenient points to crush any disorder that might arise. The orators of the occasion contented themselves with bitter criticism of what they termed "the late reign of terror and the sword," and with abusing reference to the conduct of the police.

Degree for the Emperor.—In recognition of his efficient help in securing this substantial fund to be used for founding advanced institutions for scientific research work, the university conferred the degree of Honorary Doctor of Laws upon Emperor William. The elaborate ceremonial accompanying the presentation of the degree was one of the most notable features of a splendid celebration.

Germany's Foreign Secretary in Vienna.—State-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, von Kiderlen-Wächter, was received in Vienna by Emperor Francis Joseph, with whom he held a long conference. The new leader of Germany's foreign politics had an extended interview also with Austria's Foreign Minister. Unofficially it is stated, that, in view of the approaching visit of the Czar of Russia to Potsdam, the representatives charged with the foreign policy of the two great powers of the Dreibund sought a mutual understanding on the great questions that may be touched upon during that visit.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

An Iroquois Chief

Caughnawaga is an Indian reservation on the south bank of the St. Lawrence River, opposite Lachine and a mile or two above the famous rapids. The Indians there are descendants of the Iroquois, who were the relentless foes of the French and the allies of the British in colonial times. They number a little over two thousand and are all Catholics. The plan of establishing a settlement in which the Christian Indians would be preserved from the pagan influences of their own villages originated with the Jesuit missionary, Raffeix. This Father as early as 1667 persuaded several Indians to follow him to Laprairie, a site some miles below their present village of Caughnawaga. Other Indians joined them later, so that in 1670 they formed a community of twenty families. In the course of time, like their pagan forbears in the Mohawk Valley, the Indians shifted their habitation from one place to another till at last they settled down for good at the Caughnawaga of to-day in 1716. The desire of many years to visit these Indians, among whom Catherine Tegakwitha passed the last years of her life and distinguished missionaries toiled and suffered, was recently gratified. I spent a few days among them in mid-September, and became acquainted with a family history which may be as interesting to others as it was to me.

Strolling through the village one morning, I entered a little dwelling, where two Indian women were busily employed in fancy bead-work. The younger woman was refined and attractive. A large crayon on the wall, which seemed strangely out of place in the modest surroundings, attracted my attention. It was a picture of her grandfather and was really a work of art. The face beamed with intelligence. The type was scarcely Indian except for a certain ruggedness of feature and an eye of acute penetration. The left hand rested on a wheel high in front of him which, with the peaked cap he wore, unmistakably proclaimed him a pilot. Those who are familiar with Canadian currency would recognize the portrait as identical with the engraving on the Canadian $5.00 bank note. It was that of Jean Baptiste Taiaiake, the last great chief of the Iroquois, whose picturesque and stately figure used to add so much to the romantic interest of a trip through the Lachine rapids, and was known to generations of tourists. He died at an advanced age in 1892. His granddaughter spoke English well, and except for the dark hair and dark skin would seem out of place in that Indian village. Her name, which she wrote legibly and rapidly, was Miss Louise Rice. The name quite dumbfounded me, for I expected some unpronounceable Indian patronymic. However, I expressed no surprise and reserved the solution of my difficulty for the missionaries stationed at the reservation.

From them I learned that Rice was a very common name in the village; in fact that there were many of the Iroquois bearing English or American names, which they got from ancestors who had been taken prisoners, or had otherwise cast their lot with the tribe in former times.

The story of the Rices has an interest of its own. At the southwest part of Marlboro, then called Chauncy, now Westboro, Mass., lived, in 1704, Edmund Rice and his family. They were people of distinction in that part of the country; for Thomas Rice, a kinsman, was for several years member for Marlboro of the honorable House of Representatives. Edmund had two sons, Silas and Timothy, aged respectively nine and seven years. One day as the lads were in a field some distance from their home a party of Iroquois rushing out of a wood close by seized the youngsters and carried them away to the Indian village on the St. Lawrence. For many years their fate was unknown. But there they grew up, were instructed and baptized Catholics and eventually received into the full brotherhood of the tribe.

Skill in the hunt, prowess in time of war, and marked superiority of intellect won for them the favor and admiration of the Indians. On the death of his son, an Iroquois chief adopted Silas. He took the name of Jacques Tannahorens, and in due time became the great-chief of the remnant of the Six nations at Caughnawaga.

The discovery of Silas Rice under the name of Jacques Tannahorens was the reward of patient researches on the part of the Rev. J. G. L. Forbes, a Canadian secular priest, who labored among the Indians at Caughnawaga from 1889 to 1903. During his chaplaincy he drew up complete genealogical tables of the settlement, which are still preserved in manuscript among the mission treasures. In his search to find the missing Silas among the Indian names in the registers he was greatly aided by Judge William T. Forbes, of Westboro, Mass.

Judge Forbes was himself a lineal descendant of the Edmund Rice, two of whose children had been carried off to Canada, and he was specially interested in tracing the story of his collateral ancestors, the two lads Timothy and Silas. He paid a visit to Caughnawaga in the summer of 1892, and after his visit sent Father Forbes a communication which served as a key to the identification of Silas. This was a copy of a letter written in 1769 to Lieutenant Governor Hutchinson, of Massachusetts. It contained a graphic account of the kidnapping of the two boys and told all that was known of them by their family and friends during the interval of sixty-five years. With the facts and data of this letter, Father Forbes began his search.

Had the original family name of Rice been recorded in the early registers the task of identification would have been easy. But such was not the case. Only the Indian names are found in them. In the letter to Governor Hutchinson, Timothy Rice, the younger of the two captives, was spoken of as Oseronghton. Oseronghton, it said, once paid a visit to his friends in New England.

This was in September, 1749, when Timothy was about 44 years of age. Timothy, or Oserongohton, met one of his relatives in Albany, who accompanied him to West-boro. Oserongohton viewed the house where his father had lived and the field from which he and his brother had been hurried away; he had a clear remembrance of all that had happened, as well as of several persons who were then living. He had, however, forgotten their language and had to speak through an interpreter. His Excellency, Governor Belcher, of Massachusetts, sent for him and received him most kindly in Boston. It was Oserongohton who made the speech to General Gage in behalf of the Caughnawagas soon after the reduction of Montreal.

A short time before the commencement of hostilities between England and the American colonies, in 1775, Captain John Brown was sent to Canada to see if the French and English settlers would join with Massachusetts in rebellion against George III. In a letter to Governor Samuel Adams, Captain Brown reported that French and English were ready to fight for King George, but that the Canadian Six Nations, whose chiefs had been captured in childhood in Massachusetts by the Indians, would aid their brethren in New England.

It will undoubtedly be of interest to many to know that he married Marguerite Tegakwitha, a namesake and probably a relative of the Indian maiden now known to fame as the Lily of the Mohawk. According to the records of the mission Oserongohton died at Caughnawaga on the 27th of September, 1777. He left one son, Pierre, of whom the only record is that he was baptized October 22, 1741.

The search for Silas was not so easy. Every Rice in the village, and they could be counted by hundreds, could be traced back to an Indian named Aronhiowanen. Was this Aronhiowanen the son of Timothy, or was he the son of Silas? "At last by a chain of comparisons of the baptismal and marriage entries," says Father Forbes, "I have succeeded in tracing back with complete certainty the paternity of Aronhiowanen to Jacques Tannhahorens, who is no other than Silas Rice himself." Father Forbes counted nearly 700 living descendants of this Thomas Aronhiowanen.

Silas Rice, alias Jacques Tannhahorens, married at Caughnawaga, Mary Tsiakokawi. She was buried on the 14th May, 1779, having lived to an advanced age. Silas survived her but two days and was buried on the 16th at the age of 84. Miss Louise Rice, therefore, the intelligent and attractive young woman so industriously employed to-day at the village of Caughnawaga in making ornamental bead-work for the pale face, may trace back her lineage through her grandfather, the famous pilot, Jean Baptiste Taiaiake, to Pierre Tekarenkonte, son of Thomas Aronhiowanen, son of the little captive Silas Rice, alias Jacques Tannhahorens, who became the great chief of the Iroquois.

EDWARD SPILLANE, S.J.

Cluny's Thousandth Year

The great public festivities which took place last month in the Department of the Saône and Loire, and which were continued for three days, may help to form an opinion of the curious situation which the religious or irreligious struggle in France has created.

The purpose of these festivals was to celebrate the thousandth anniversary of the Benedictine Abbey of Cluny, which was so famous in former times, especially during the eleventh and twelfth centuries. Of the old Abbey, however, which was so vast and so splendid, and which was indeed almost a city in itself, very few vestiges remain. A solitary but superb and splendid steeple recalls the famous Roman basilica which, after St. Peter's, in Rome, was the most spacious church in Christendom. It was almost as large. Here and there you see a chapel, a few pillars, arcades and isolated towers, and you find a gothic façade which was rebuilt in the eighteenth century. The monastery itself was completely rebuilt about that time. It still stands, and is used now as a school of arts and crafts. The wild men of the Revolution were not the chief authors of the ravages which you see around you. The "Terror" had already passed when the great Abbey was destroyed, and singularly enough it coincided with the fight which the First Consul was having with those madmen. But other vandals appeared; the speculators who bought the buildings and lands for a song. The Government had confiscated the property in 1791.

However, the memories of all the moral, intellectual and artistic glories which cluster about the old ruins have been revived in our days in an altogether unexpected fashion. One of the Academies of that part of the country, namely Macon, was anxious to pay a public and solemn homage to a past which had always been recognized as magnificent, but which now seemed to be invested with more than its usual splendor. It was the thousandth anniversary of the great Abbey, and a great number of learned societies were invited to celebrate it. The invitation was eagerly accepted, and the most distinguished writers and professors hastened to avail themselves of the opportunity of expressing their feelings of admiration and respect. An Archæological Congress was convened for the occasion, and the audience had the opportunity of listening to the courageous and eloquent discourses which were pronounced there, as well as the satisfaction of seeing them reproduced in the newspapers conspicuous for their anti-Christian temper. Side by side with the laymen of the Congress were twenty-five bishops. At their head were Cardinal Luçon and the Archbishop of Rheims. Splendid religious ceremonies concluded the business of the Congress. Mgr. Seton, the Archbishop of Heliopolis, so well known in the United States, was present, and spoke eloquently of the profound friendship which bound together America and Catholic France.

Among the speakers were representatives of three great Academies. M. René Bazin, in the name of the French Academy, was the first to extol the glories of the old Abbey, which he said, "had in the France of the Middle Ages the plenitude of the mission of civilization. It was the apostle of the Gospel of Peace, the guardian of all the sciences; the foundress in every work of charity; the originator of all literary progress, and by its devotion to agriculture was the creator of an art which it propagated over the entire length of Europe."

"At Cluny, as at Monte Cassino," he added, "there were at the side of the brothers who were exclusively devoted to psalmody, to prayer and meditation, and to clearing up the forests, brothers who were calligraphers and illuminators, sculptors, gold and silversmiths for ostensoriums, chalices, ciboriums and reliquaries; there were artists in mosaics, exquisite book binders and musicians. Great architects were there also who conceived and brought to perfection a new and splendid style in ecclesiastical and lay constructions. Often, indeed, in our days, in France, in Spain, in England, in the Holy Land and even in Italy, at Modena, Verona, Pavia, Padua and Florence, if you inquire about the origin of some famous monument; who designed it, who built it, who adorned it, the guide will tell you: 'Cluny, the Burgundian Abbey.'"

Representing the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles Lettres, M. Babelon, the curator of the Section of Medals in the National Library, and Professor in the College of France, paid fitting homage to the monks of Cluny who, he said, "from century to century, handed down to us the inestimable treasure of ancient literature, watching over it as jealously as the Vestal Virgins watched the sacred fire. The monks of the Middle Ages," the learned professor went on to say, "are the intellectual link between antiquity and the modern spirit. In copying the written notes of the Greeks and the Romans, they prevented, in the normal evolution of the human mind, a sudden and complete rupture, a solution of continuity which would have been calamitous, for it would have flung back civilization into the abyss and would have made it retrograde for an incalculable number of centuries."

Another Academician, delegated by his colleagues who have devoted their great abilities to the study of Moral and Political Science, namely M. Imbart de la Tour, showed how the great Order of Cluny gave expression to the finest of French characteristics, moderation and balance. "These two traits," he said, "are noticeable in the Rule, the Institute and the work, just as they are in the architecture of the glorious old Abbey."

Other orators showed the economic, charitable and social work performed by the monks, who increased their territorial power without abusing it, who protected the lowly, founded loan associations for them and provided shelter for the unfortunate and the tramp.

The splendid religious ceremonies which followed gave occasion to display in a still brighter light the intellectual and social influence exercised by the monks. There in the church of Notre Dame de Cluny, Mgr. Baudrillart, Rector of the Institut Catholique of Paris, summed up in a masterly fashion the relations of Cluny with the Papacy. He pointed out the powerful and decisive co-operation which the Benedictines brought to every work of ecclesiastical reform during the 10th century and after. He told the story of the fierce war about Investitures with the lay princes who usurped and degraded the sacerdotal prerogatives. He described the scene at Canossa when the odious Emperor of Germany, Henry IV, had to bend the knee to Gregory VII, the champion of virtue, justice and morality.

Another part of the celebration consisted in the procession and the grand historical pageant which, with the costumes of the epoch, portrayed one of the visits to the Abbey by Saint Louis IX, King of France. In the procession, which was extremely brilliant and interesting, the most notable families of the locality took part. It was like a resurrection of the Christianity of former days.

The impression produced by these gorgeous festivities was not confined to the Province in which they took place. The readers of free-thinking papers like the Temps were surprised not only to read an account of all that happened, but to have the real significance of it all set forth in its pages.

Yes, actually in the Temps (September 12), there appeared a long article consecrated to the glorious memories of the Abbey and its monastic work. It also reviewed the events in which the figure of Urban VIII appears, who called Cluny "the mother of the world."

The greater part of the readers of the Temps must have been amazed. Among them are many functionaries who are in the thickest of the fight against our traditional beliefs.

Another fact is that the celebration created an embarrassing situation for the Government. It did not know whether to abstain entirely, or frankly and honestly to take part in it. The proper thing would have been to have designated the Minister of Public Instruction for the reason that the celebration was being held by the scientific bodies of the country. But M. Doumergue, the actual Minister, like so many others of his kind, belongs to the political world which has the bad habit of treating both our religion and the past history of our nation with hatred and contempt. If such a Minister presented himself at Cluny he would have felt ill at ease. Over and above that he would have run the risk of irritating most of his political followers. Nevertheless, as the Government did not want to appear to show its contempt for such a magnificent demonstration which had been inspired by patriotism and scientific enthusiasm, some official had to be sent. So they commissioned the Sub-Secretary of State for War, M. Sarrant, an erstwhile lawyer and journalist. In presence of that throng of learned men, who did not care a snap of their fingers for him, and forced as he was to face a religious past so suddenly restored to being, Sarraut, like the Government he represented, was extremely uncomfortable. He scarcely opened his mouth, but nevertheless in the two or three words he was forced to utter, he was obliged to pay his respects to the religious glories of Old France against which the militant free-thinkers of to-day are constantly levelling their imprecations and their scorn.

One would be inclined to think that those two words of timid and embarrassed homage were of little account; in fact nothing at all. But no. Because of the actual conditions of France that meagre recognition is a symptom. It shows how arbitrary and factitious is the physiognomy that has been fastened on our country. In presence of the true France the party in power is in a panic.

The contest begun at Cluny has already shown itself elsewhere; and we can reckon on such manifestations becoming more and more frequent. In the scientific world there is a continual and growing insurgency against the tyranny of unbelief. It is especially noticeable in the works which our historians are giving to the press. They are forcing us to realize the absurdity and the odiousness of certain opinions which have been imposed on us and which have been promulgated during the last quarter of a century. Chief among them is that one which has been spread broadcast by our official free-thinkers, and is so continually insisted upon, that up to 1789, the peasantry's sole food was grass and straw. A number of lay manuels, stamped with the Government's approval, always describe the history of our long and glorious past as "dark and barbarous." Lo! now in the most unexpected fashion science appears with her protest against this calumny, and sets herself actively to work at refuting these lies and dispelling the ignorance which has settled on such a large number among our people. We shall see France Christian once again, and free from the domination of its atheist rulers.

The thousandth anniversary of Cluny is a symptom of a movement to whose results we may look with hope and confidence. It is this hope and this confidence which have prompted me to address these few words to the readers of AMERICA.

EUGÈNE TAVERNIER,
Editor of the Univers, Paris.

The Catholic Church in Denmark

It is difficult to understand the unhappy experience of the Church in the northern lands of Europe. The earlier zeal of their peoples is matter of record. It is attested by the remains of splendid churches built by them, by the number of monasteries erected among them, by the story of countless foundations for the benefit of the poor and of rich donations chronicled in those countries' annals. Yet the glory of the Church was swept away in a few years by the hurricane of the Reformation. True, we are assured, Catholic customs and usages never died out completely in the old Scandinavian kingdoms. In Denmark, recent writers tell us, to some extent the rural population even yet believe in the assistance of the saints; the Lutheran names for religious persons and ceremonies never have been in common use; as in former times, the people speak of bishops and priests, of saying Mass, etc. The ministers wear vestments similar to those used in the Catholic Church and the altars are decorated with lighted candles. For a long time the elevation of the Host, auricular confession, and the ancient hymns were retained.

Probably all this may help one to account for the overwhelming spread of Lutheranism among the inhabitants of those countries. Though the lands had been Catholic for centuries, conditions, for one reason or another, were not satisfactory in them at the time of Luther's defection; education, as we understand it, was not possible, and the people were ill-prepared to withstand the strenuous efforts of the reformers. The fact that much of the ancient external form was retained in the new religion was calculated to confirm a simple people in the belief that nothing essential had been changed and quietly they slipped away from the moorings heretofore holding them until, towards the end of the sixteenth century, Catholicism may be considered to have become practically dead among them. Such, at least, appears to have been the case in Denmark.

Some adherents of the old Church were ever to be met in that kingdom, and in the beginning of the seventeenth century an attempt was made by the Propaganda to provide in a regular way for the spiritual welfare of these scattered Catholics, but the severity of the Danish law, forbidding Catholic priests under penalty of death to perform any religious functions, made successful missionary work a matter of difficulty. Confiscation of property and banishment threatened in the case of conversion to the Church were weighty obstacles, too, to a possible return to the old ways. May it be that Providence arranged it so that the new birth of Catholicism in Denmark should be coincident with the threatened defection of peoples who had safely weathered the storm of the sixteenth century revolt? It was only in 1849, at all events, that the rigid conditions standing in the way of the new birth underwent a gratifying change. On June 5 of that year the new Danish constitution granted complete religious freedom, and political and ecclesiastical equality was guaranteed to all dissenters from the faith of the established evangelical church.

Early this year the Catholics of Denmark joined in the celebration of a feast day characterized by a pomp and solemnity such as St. Canute's land had not witnessed since the days of the Reformation. On January 18, fifty years ago, Bishop (later Cardinal) Melchers, of Osnabrück, Germany, raised to the dignity of the priesthood a young levite named John von Euch. Sent to Copenhagen immediately after his ordination, the new priest began there a missionary career which has continued uninterrupted till to-day, when as Vicar-Apostolic, he rules the Danish mission, a district now marked by conditions which assure a solid and enduring growth of the Catholic body. No wonder the Danish faithful determined to make the day memorable in the annals of the Church!

When the young missionary arrived in Copenhagen in 1860 there were in all Denmark but two small Catholic congregations, one in the capital city and one in Fredericia. To-day, at the close of his fifty years' service, he finds himself at the head of an organization made up of 24 congregations, with 36 churches and chapels, 26 schools and 14 hospitals. That progress in a difficult field has been thus notable is due in large measure to the singular talent for organization possessed by Bishop von Euch.

Long before he had been made Vicar, whilst still toilsomely struggling as the sole priest in Jutland to carry the consolations of religion to the scattered Catholics of that district, he recognized the need of establishing missionary centres from which, whilst they served as the beginnings of future parish organizations, the work of a priest in charge might be more satisfactorily carried on. The need appealed to him the more strongly when, in 1884, he took over the direction of the entire Danish Mission as first Vicar Apostolic. His little flock, then numbering 3,000 souls, he found scattered far and wide over the islands making up the kingdom, and he gave his undivided attention from the first to founding permanent mission centres throughout the vicariate. That Bishop von Euch's move was a well calculated one the decided increase of the Catholic population shows. In 1860 Denmark's people numbered 1,608,362 and among them there were but 1,240 Catholics; to-day in a population of 2,588,919, Denmark reckons 7,871 Catholics. While, therefore, the number of inhabitants has increased during these fifty years by 61 per cent., the Catholic Church boasts an increase in the kingdom of 535 per cent. This computation, by the way, takes no account of the 12,000 Poles who have immigrated into the country at the call of those interested in the development of the beet-sugar industry and who are regularly cared for by missionary priests of their own nation.

This growth of the Church in Denmark, be it remembered then, is due to conversions from the established Evangelical church. For years back the tale of the wanderers who have returned to the household of the Faith averages 200 a year, and while here, as elsewhere, it is among the poor and lowly that the doctrines of the Catholic religion find readiest hearing, there are not wanting among those who come back to the Church men and women distinguished for nobility of birth, high intellectual attainments and social prominence.

To administer to the spiritual needs of a charge extending over 16,000 square miles of territory and including within its limits groups of larger and smaller islands involves no light burden. The zealous bishop and the twenty diocesan priests under his jurisdiction would find it an impossible task were it not for the splendid cooperation of the religious, men and women, laboring in the Danish mission district. At the present time 124 members of religious orders of men, representing eight different institutes, conduct 14 foundations within Bishop von Euch's territory; and 440 sisters, of seven different congregations, control 35 establishments consecrated to educational and charitable works. Not the least of Mgr. von Euch's claims to grateful appreciation on the part of his flock rests on the far-seeing judgment which prompted him to secure the assistance of these zealous helpers in the upbuilding of his vicariate. The work being done by the religious in Denmark is invaluable. Commonly enough does one hear it affirmed that the unselfish devotedness of the Sisters of Charity in hospitals and schools has paved the way for the zeal of conquest shown by untiring missionaries, by conciliating the bitterness of ancient prejudice and by rooting out the influence of ancient calumnies. Certainly their example of disinterested charity and forgetfulness of self has won esteem for the Church in which alone so beautiful a spirit of service may grow into fruitage.

Thanks to the efforts of the religious especially, the present record of Catholic schools and charitable institutions in the Danish vineyard is most gratifying. In 1860 in all Denmark but two Catholic schools were in existence; in 1884, when the Vicar Apostolic took over the charge of the new vicariate just established in these parts, he found in his field of labor six elementary and two high schools conducted by the Sisters of St. Joseph, and one high school and one gymnasium under the direction of the Jesuits; in this year of his priestly jubilee, Mgr. von Euch is consoled to see flourishing in his vicariate 20 elementary schools four schools for the advanced training of young women, an excellent normal school, a real-schule, and a college privileged by the Government to confer the usual academic degrees. These latter more advanced institutions, conducted by the Jesuits and the Sisters of St. Joseph, are held in high esteem even among the non-Catholics of Denmark.

But in even fuller measure do the respect and regard and confidence of Protestants go out to those in charge of the Catholic hospitals. The mission boasts fourteen splendid institutions for the care of the sick, well endowed and excellently equipped for the charitable work they carry on. Naturally the great majority of those who seek the ministrations of the hospital Sisters are non-Catholics, and the considerate kindness they experience as well as the unfailing religious spirit filling the active lives of the sisters create a wonderful change in their Protestant prejudices. Of course, good progress has been made in other lines of charitable activity. There are crèches and kindergartens and orphan asylums and houses of Mercy to meet fully the growing needs of Denmark's Catholic mission.

Nor has the venerable Vicar failed to devote his many-sided energy to the phase of Catholic development of particular concern in our day. To meet the social needs of his people his Lordship has given considerable thought to Catholic organization and following, in the main, the example of the Catholics of Germany, he has succeeded in building up a federation of Catholic societies which will be of invaluable help in the future spread of Catholicism in Denmark. The potential aid of a distinctively Catholic literature, too, has not been overlooked, and, though they who toil in this field can at present expect no great material reward for their labors, their efforts, nevertheless, have already won favorable notice among the cultivated classes of the nation.

Does the story of what one man, full of zeal for the spread of God's glory, can achieve within the brief span of fifty years astonish us? How that astonishment must grow and widen when, in the comfort of his own ease and care-free experience, one recalls that Bishop von Euch's resources to meet the multiplied demands his unceasing activity imposes upon him are but the slightest. A few kind benefactors whom he has interested in his work do something for him; the Lyons Association for the Propagation of the Faith and the Bonifatiusverein of Germany have been liberal helpers; for the rest the story of Denmark's vicariate is a repetition of that of many other fields of Catholic missionary enterprise; the story of a poverty that does wondrous deeds, because trust in God's goodness and a surprising eagerness to sacrifice self make those who labor there strong with a strength not of this world.

M. J. O'CONNOR, S.J.

Orestes A. Brownson, as a Man

The words, we sometimes meet in the Old Testament: "esto vir," "estote viri," "be a man," "be men," naturally come to our mind when we study the character of this great New England philosopher, theologian, and reviewer who struggled upward from the depths of many isms into the sheltering bosom of the Catholic Church. He ran through the whole discordant gamut of sectarianism, from the worse than Dantean hell of Calvinism to the phantasmagoric heaven of Universalism. In philosophy there was no error that he had not explored and temporarily accepted: scepticism, pantheism, socialism even, in some of its crudest forms. Deprived of religious faith, he was prone to fall a prey to every new creed. He once said that he never read an important book that its teachings did not hold him, at least for awhile. His noble soul, struggling in the coils of error, like Laocoon in the folds of the serpent, freed itself at last, thanks to the grace of God, and the courage, honesty, and humility of his natural character.

Intellectual courage and honesty specially characterized him. Starting out on his intellectual voyage with these two qualities, he followed the marsh-light of private judgment, in which as a good Protestant he trusted, into every swamp, and bog of error. He left the Presbyterians because he was too honest to pretend to believe their horrible doctrine of foreordination, and became a Universalist. From false doctrine the step is easy to false morality. Although always a moral man, he accepted the erroneous opinions of Robert Dale Owen on marriage.

After reading the works of Leroux and Saint Simon, he became, for a time, the champion of their socialistic theories; and went so far on the road of private judgment as to become an infidel. At this time he did not know the Catholic religion. Like many of his New England contemporaries, he did not think the Catholic Church worth consideration. She was a dead superstition, unworthy of an intellectual man's attention, for him, as she still is for many semi-educated Protestants who often admire and praise her work while refusing to consider the claims of the workmen; who praise the external beauty but do not take the trouble to investigate the internal beauty of the Bride of Christ.

Brownson was always honest; he followed the light wherever it led. If he followed the marsh-light, it was because he thought it was the light of the sun. But after much falling into pit and boghole, the true light shone on him because he was honest. Unlike Pusey, and so many others who saw, but closed their eyes so that they should not see, Brownson opened his eyes wide when he saw the truth, and had the courage to accept it no matter how hard the doctrine hit human pride and passion. Courage in an eminent degree produces in the natural order a virtue which seems to be a sequel of courage, and the best proof of strong manhood: natural humility. To brave the world, to cut loose from one's surroundings, to break with one's friends, to tell them: "All I have been writing is wrong," "I was mistaken and I have led you into error;" it takes a man of courage and of humility to do this.

When the bishop upon whom he called for instruction, gave him the little Catholic Catechism to read, the great philosopher and reviewer felt the humiliation but he courageously bowed and accepted the compendium of Christian Truth. This was an act of humility and it showed his strength of character. The respect shown to the Catechism by Dr. Brownson reminds one of the compliment paid to it by another well-known philosopher of the nineteenth century who, like the American reviewer, had run the scale of all the modern systems until he finally doubted his own existence. This was Jouffroy, who came back to reason and faith when he was on his deathbed, took up the Catechism, read its first question: "Who made you?" "God." "Who is God?" "The Creator of heaven and earth." "Why did He make me?" "That I might know Him, and love Him here on earth, and enjoy Him in heaven hereafter;" then laying down the little book he said: "There's more true philosophy there than in all the systems I have studied."

When towards the end of his life, he wrote some of his best work in the Catholic World, Father Hecker's blue pencil often put the old philosopher's humility to the test. The writer has never forgotten the evening when the Doctor and Father Hecker stepped into his room after a discussion which they had had on a theological statement in an article of the Doctor's about to be published. He was angry. A flush on his cheeks could be seen through the flowing gray beard that covered his leonine face; and the eyes flashed in his Socratic head. Father Hecker smilingly retired; but no sooner was his back turned than the Doctor exclaimed: "D—n it, he has cut the best thing out of my article." The act of submission to his censor on this occasion was all the more laudable because the passage eliminated simply expressed an opinion freely held in Catholic schools of theology.

The Doctor's style was always virile; clear and to the point. After he became a Catholic he wielded the very hammer of Thor upon the adversaries of the Church. As a controversialist he had few equals among the Catholic writers of the last century. In politics, he veered from Socialism, which he had imbibed from reading the works of the French Socialists of his time, to Conservative Republicanism towards the end of his life. He had edited a Review which in 1840 advocated the political ideas of the Democratic party; and over twenty years later, he published his opinions on government in a book called "The American Republic." But true to the natural honesty and manliness of his character, he changed many of his opinions as he found them untenable, so that toward the end of his life he became an ardent Republican. He denounced slavery and Secession, and thus lost so many of his old friends and subscribers that he had to discontinue the publication of his Review. Fidelity to conviction characterized his political as well as his religious life.

The work which best shows the qualities of the man is "The Convert, or Leaves from My Experience," published in New York in 1857. His voluminous writings from the beginning to the end of his career, show him to have had all the natural qualities of the true man; while after his conversion to the Catholic Church, these qualities were supplemented by a living faith, strong hope, and ardent charity, and made him an exemplary Christian.

H. A. B.

Revival of Medievalism in Sweden

It happens sometimes in the restoration of the old churches of Sweden, that the workmen discover very remarkable paintings which had, up to now, been hidden under a heavy coat of lime and plaster. Like the churches these pictures date from Catholic times. As for the lime and plaster, they are traceable to the iconoclasts of Protestantism who conscientiously set themselves to work to destroy everything which could recall in the slightest way, the Catholic life of the past.

In fact, everything connected with the Catholic life of the Middle Ages has met with the same fate as the pictures in the churches which were built by our Catholic ancestors. The plaster was a precaution to conceal, as it has done, what was noblest and greatest in the history of Sweden. But they are beginning at last to scratch off the plaster, and these old pictures are now making their appearance; and this is happening throughout the country. The number of old edifices which have reassumed their primitive appearance during the last twenty years is really surprising, and this movement of restoration is going on with increasing rapidity.

This summer in the presence of the King and the Royal Family, the solemn inauguration of the old Cathedral of Strengnas near Stockholm, took place. This Cathedral, whose construction was begun in 1134, had suffered the inevitable degradation which Protestant vandalism put upon it. To-day it has reappeared in all the splendor of a beauty which had been concealed for centuries. Not only are the walls free from the plaster which had covered them, but amid the ruins and rubbish of all kinds which filled its vaults and galleries, there have been discovered precious specimens of ancient woodwork, priestly vestments, statues of saints, one of which represented the Blessed Virgin with the Infant Jesus. It was found on an altar especially erected for it.

At the same time, the little city of Strengnas organized an exposition of the works of art which had been used in the worship of olden times. Six hundred and thirty-four articles in this exposition came from the single diocese of Strengnas, and one is surprised to see that there still exist so many things connected with the Catholicity of olden times. There are statues beautifully colored and gilded, and scarcely dimmed, by the dust and negligence of centuries. They still stretch out their hands as if to bless, and on some of them you can yet see the traces left by the smoke of the candles which pious hands had lighted before them four or five hundred years ago. The crucifixes, the Altar tables, the Tabernacles, the Baptisteries richly carved, rise before us side by side with splendid works of embroidery, chasubles and altar cloths alike. The connoisseurs are busy in discovering the imprint of this or that school, Flemish, Italian or French, while for the Catholic they call out of the past the times when each one gave the finest he had to ornament the house of God.

This exposition was a genuine success and resulted in a very considerable profit for those who had organized it. Tourists came in great numbers to the little city which up to that time was unknown, and newspapers discussed at length the question of the architecture and religious art of the Middle Ages.

The interest which the mere list of relics of ancient times has excited, and the taste which is continually developing for the most scrupulous reconstructions and restorations of these old churches, necessarily impart a very vivid understanding of what Catholic art of former days represented. It is no longer possible to treat them with the contempt, which Protestants formerly affected in their regard; they can no longer designate these venerable relics as Catholic idolatry. Indeed, sentiment has gone still further in that direction. For, who would ever have believed that in Protestant Sweden, a Protestant Parochial Council would have resolved to erect a statue of a saint upon its parish house? Nevertheless last winter the Parochial Council did so with the statue of St. Clare, whose monastery formerly existed in this locality.

The Protestant clergy no longer dare to speak against these traces of Catholicism in the same tone that they would have assumed scarcely ten years ago. Certain pastors even find it advantageous to study the religious Middle Ages of Sweden. Hence St. Bridget has found her historian in the country pastor whose work, although very defective in point of doctrine, nevertheless contains very curious details which give evidence of an extremely conscientious study of the subject.

The great figure of St. Bridget seems to grow more and more alive for her compatriots. An instance of it may be found in the Parliamentary vote this past winter. It was legislative action that saved from vandalism the buildings which still exist of the monastery of St. Bridget at Vadstena. But it must be remarked, that the ground had been prepared for this before hand. It would have been difficult for our legislators to have done otherwise after the publication of the luminous pages of one of our best authors, Werner von Heidenstam, who drew charming pictures of many of the episodes of the life of St. Bridget. Another, a great and learned work, richly supplied with facts and quotations, has also been published by Mr. Steffens. He has been devoting this entire year to give us an idea of the literary life of the Saint who has been properly called the greatest Swedish writer of the Middle Ages.

Nor have our literary men been the only ones to pay homage to St. Bridget. Our painters have endeavored to bring her back again and place her before the eyes of the world. Thus, for instance, a Swedish Protestant artist, Mlle. Amelia Lonblad, has, during her sojourn in Rome, and while under the influence of one of her compatriots who had been converted to Catholicism and who had afterwards become a Bridgetine nun, conceived the project of a painting representing St. Bridget with the different members of her order kneeling before the Blessed Virgin and the Infant Jesus. This painting which was recently finished was exhibited in Stockholm, first before the Christian Association of Young Girls, on which occasion one of our best known literary women, Madame Lydia Wahlstrom, read a learned and sympathetic paper on the influence exercised by St. Bridget. A splendid choir then sang Catholic hymns, among which was "Rosa Rorans Bonitatem." Later on the painting was exhibited at the festival organized in honor of St. Bridget by the society known as Concordia Catholica, at which the Bishop, Monsignor Biter, was present.

This revival of devotion to St. Bridget manifests itself also in the proposition which the Association of the Museum of St. Bridget has just presented to the king to transform one of the halls of the old monastery into a museum for installing all the articles of the church of the old convent which are now piled up in a heap in the sacristy of the Protestant church.

This remarkable renaissance of piety for the past is traceable, of course, to the development of intelligence and artistic taste and also to an increasing broadness of view which is the result of modern eclecticism. Foreign travel also counts for a good deal in the explanation of this phenomenon. Many a Swede who never left the shadow of the village steeple now finds himself in England, Belgium, France and Italy, and his national conceit gets a set-back when he sees that everywhere Christianity has expanded in what was splendid and beautiful, while in Sweden it expressed itself only in ugliness. That has set him on the trail of these vestiges of Christianity, and he has found everywhere in his own country, even in little out-of-the-way villages, treasures of Catholic art. His search has been rewarded with the result that most precious things are being gathered up by the descendants of the very men who destroyed the great monuments of which these treasures are the remnants.

Perhaps there is another explanation deeper still. In the souls of St. Bridget's compatriots, warped as they are at the present day with rationalism, individualism and socialism, there is a feeling of alarm when they see how all their aspirations have come to naught. Their pastors who admitted no authority outside of the Bible have been unsettled in their convictions by the researches of higher criticism, and now find themselves without guide or compass in spiritual things. Perhaps they are dreading also the moment when at the command of the King, or of the Parliament, which is largely made up of free thinkers and atheists, they will have to refashion their creed, revise their profession of faith and thus find themselves with no higher court to appeal to than the politicians of the country. For it must be remembered that the Swedish churchmen have never been anything else than government officials.

Perhaps what they called Catholic superstition is beginning to appear less absurd, and the obligation of submitting to a single head is less onerous than that of bowing to a parliamentary majority which changes at every moment.

If such is the interpretation to be given to the movement now in progress, it would not be the least of the miracles performed by the holy patrons of Sweden.

BARON G. ARMFELT.

It goes without saying that it is the duty of loyal and self-respecting Catholics to protest against public insults to their religion and take every legitimate means to make their protest effective. Mr. C. I. Denechaud, president of the Louisiana Federation of Catholic Societies, has sent a letter of indignant protest to "Puck," a professedly humorous magazine, which has been caricapturing our Holy Father, the Pope. Our attention was called some time ago to a similar offense in "Life." Mr. Denechaud has done well and officials of other Catholic organizations could fruitfully follow his example, but individual Catholics can do better by discarding such publications altogether, and thus improve their education. The Louisiana Federation has also called to account the "Cream of Wheat" Company for using a caricature of a Franciscan Monk to advertise their wares. The company's secretary had pertly replied to the editor of Men and Women that he had seen "exactly such fat old priests floating around Spain and Italy, not to mention this country. You certainly make me laugh." Now Catholics can effectively rebuke both the secretary and his company by refusing to patronize their food product. The consequent decline in profits on their patent would make them, and others of their class cease to "laugh" at Catholic sensibilities.

As mentioned last week the Turks were refused the loan of any French money, and now Hungary has a like experience until the use of the money be stated. This is regarded in Vienna as an attack on the Triple Alliance. It is indeed an effective obstacle to the aggressive advance of Austria with Germany behind her, through the Balkans into Turkey. The Triple Alliance would thus be greatly strengthened, but having no money it is unable to carry out its plans. So that what would formerly be settled by force of arms is now brought about by tying up the money bags, which is a more comfortable procedure for the world at large. In refusing to grant money to Turkey it prevented the union of Turks and Rumanians, and now it is playing the same quiet game with Austria. It is not mere finance, but politics, for the system is that when the French banks want to lend, and the Bourse approves, the Government steps in after all is said and done and decides whether or not the loan should be made. The sequel of this interesting affair is told in the German chronicle.

It is announced that the Hon. Thomas C. Dawson, United States Minister to Panama, has been directed to leave his post temporarily and go to Managua, the capital of Nicaragua, where he will arrange with provisional President Estrada for settling the claims arising from the execution of Cannon and Gross by the Zelaya administration. He will also advise the provisional government in matters of public importance, such as financial and commercial questions which are awaiting solution. Ex-President Madriz has reached the city of Mexico, where he has announced his withdrawal from politics and intention to take up the practice of law in Mexico. His supporters in Managua are so active that the Estradists are suppressing the news.

CORRESPONDENCE

"Old Catholics" in England

LONDON, SEPT. 23, 1910.

Some of the London papers have been attaching a very exaggerated importance to the doings of a misguided priest, who has for some time posed as the leader of an "Old Catholic" movement in England. I dare say what is published on the subject here in London finds an echo in the press of the United States. It may, therefore, be useful to put the plain facts of the case on record.

The Rev. Arnold H. Mathew was for some years a priest in one of the west of England dioceses. He belongs to a Welsh family, and devoted a great deal of energy to an attempt to make good a claim to represent the former Earls of Llandaff. The earldom has been for more than a hundred years in abeyance. Arnold Mathew held that he could prove his kinship with the last earl, and hoped for some time that he would be allowed to revive the title and take a seat in the House of Lords. This was one of many characteristic eccentricities, for to put the matter plainly he had the reputation of being somewhat of a crank. After exhausting the patience of his bishop he finally left the diocese.

Rather more than two years ago he appears to have formed a plan for securing notoriety in another way. Somehow he had got the idea that if only a leader could be found there would be a revolt against the bishops among the Catholic clergy of England. There never was a greater delusion, for the clergy of the English dioceses are a hard-working body of priests, thoroughly loyal to their spiritual chiefs and to the Holy See. But having got the idea, apparently from wild talk in some of the non-Catholic papers, he went to Holland, and on April 28th, 1908, received episcopal consecration at the hands of the schismatic Jansenist Archbishop of Utrecht, where a small group of Jansenists have held together since the troubles of the seventeenth century.

He returned to London and published a manifesto, in which he described himself as "Old Catholic Bishop of Chelsea," apparently because he had taken lodgings in that part of London. He had had till then a good many friends among the English Ritualists, but he was disappointed at finding that they did not welcome his latest escapade, and he was for a while in the disappointing position of a leader without any followers. The discontented priests whom he had expected to see rallying around his self-given pastoral staff did not put in an appearance. But at the beginning of 1909 he found allies in an unexpected quarter. A dissenting minister, who had formerly belonged to the Congregationalist body, the Rev. Noel Lambert, was running a small chapel in north London as an independent religious speculation. Mathew formed an alliance with Lambert, and ordained him a priest, and the chapel in River Street, London, N., was refurnished and provided with a notice board, on which it was described as "St. Willibrord's Catholic Church." Many of Mr. Lambert's congregation joined the new organization, and "Bishop" Mathew claims that he has now a flock of between five and six hundred. All of these are not local adherents. The congregation at St. Willibrord's is much smaller. The Old Catholics are made up of the ex-Congregationalists and a number of Ritualists who have drifted into the new movement.

In a press interview the "Old Catholic" leader claims to have ten "priests" under his self-assumed jurisdiction. One of these is the ex-Congregationist preacher. Four others are young Ritualist clergymen, who left the Church of England to take more certain orders from the new bishop. These four he styles the "canons" of his chapter. Of the five others I know nothing, but I am fairly sure they are not rebellious priests who have left their rightful bishops for this upstart schismatic. He has now ceased to call himself "Bishop of Chelsea." He has larger ambitions, and his title is "Old Catholic Bishop of Great Britain and Ireland." The addition of "Ireland" to his title is a piece of colossal impudence. The kind of crank that is likely to acknowledge the jurisdiction of "Old Catholic" prelates with Jansenist orders, officiating in a dissenting meeting house, is not to be found in Ireland.

After more than two years there is not the remotest sign that "Bishop" Mathew's hopes of a rally of revolting priests and laymen to his standard have the least chance of realization. Catholics simply leave him severely alone, and pray for him. Unfortunately "St. Willibrord's" is, and for some time yet will be, a centre for the profanation of holy things. Last Corpus Christi, Mathew, supported by his four ex-Ritualists, and a very small gathering of adherents, had a procession of the Blessed Sacrament in the streets near his church. Photographs of the ceremony in the London papers advertised his misguided activity.

It is not likely that the movement will last long. In the "bishop's" communications to the press there is an ominous reference to want of funds. A few weeks ago he was mentioned in the papers as having conferred episcopal consecration on two priests of the Diocese of Nottingham, Fathers Beale and Howarth. This is a scandal with which the Holy See will presently deal. Dr. Brindle, the Bishop of Nottingham (famous for many years as the Catholic chaplain to our troops in the wars of Egypt and the Soudan) has suspended the two priests, and they have appealed to Rome.

They have published a strange account of their conduct. They declare that they have not joined Bishop Mathew's petty schism, but desire to remain loyal subjects of the Holy See. It appears that some years ago they succeeded in obtaining the honorary distinction of Monsignor from Leo XIII, but the appointment was speedily cancelled on representations made to the Holy See by Archbishop Vaughan, then primate of England. They now say that their only object in obtaining episcopal consecration from Bishop Mathew was to secure a dignity that could not be taken from them by a stroke of the pen. The whole affair reveals the strange confusion of mind that some men are capable of. One could understand (while lamenting their act) the disappointed ex-Monsignori joining Bishop Mathew's schismatic conventicle. But it is impossible to understand the state of mind of priests who, while declaring that they mean to remain loyal to the Holy See, violate the most elementary of its prescriptions by going to a schismatic for consecration as bishops of nowhere in particular. The whole affair seems to reveal a want of ordinary mental balance in these thoroughly abnormal specimens of our English clergy. Perhaps the "want of funds" referred to above will be supplied by some fomenter of sedition.

A. H. A.

A Summer Incident

HASTINGS, ENGLAND, SEPT. 24, 1910.

Hastings is one of the oldest and best known of the towns that line the south coast of England. Besides its historical associations and monuments of the past, it boasts, like its neighbors, of its Parade, some three miles in length, its Piers and the various amusement places, calculated to attract the throng of summer visitors, whether they come for the season or merely to spend a "week-end" at the seashore. The city and the beach have their attractions, while various modes of conveyance provide easy access to points of historical interest in the neighborhood.

There is one feature of the summer season, however, which is somewhat unique and quite in contrast with the ordinary diversions. It is a religious festival which takes the form of a public pilgrimage in honor of Our Lady. A Catholic procession through the streets of an English city, and a busy watering place at that, may seem a strange phenomenon to one familiar with the course of religious history in this country during the past three centuries. One does not have to go back to the penal days when Catholics were obliged to conceal all evidence of the practice of their faith, and priests who dared to say Mass were liable to undergo the horrors of the scaffold; nor need one go back half a century and more, to the time of the reestablishment of the Catholic hierarchy, when the country was in an uproar over the latest form of papal aggression. One has but to recall recent demonstrations in the streets of Liverpool and the various devices employed by the Protestant Alliance to give evidence of its life and vigor, to realize the old spirit of bigotry is not yet dead.

Still on the whole things have changed wonderfully, and here in this corner of Sussex where Catholics are not numerous, the children of the Church have for over ten years past paid homage to Our Lady by marching in procession in the height of the summer season through the streets of their city when it was thronged with visitors in quest of pleasure or repose. This ancient and pious custom has, in fact, been revived in some other portions of England, but it was the writer's privilege recently to take part in the annual Hastings' pilgrimage. It was held under the auspices of the Guild of Our Lady of Ransom, which is laboring for the conversion of England, and was under the direction of Father Fletcher, director of the Guild, and the clergy of the local Parish Church of St. Mary Star-of-the-Sea.

It was on a bright summer's afternoon that the various parish organizations assembled in the church, where ranks were formed. The procession then, headed by a band, proceeded down through the old town towards the water-front, with banners flying and with a goodly number taking part in the singing of hymns. A statue of Our Lady, decked with flowers, was borne in the middle of the procession by four sturdy members of the Confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament in appropriate costume. The clergy in surplice and biretta, including a number of Jesuit scholastics from the French House of Studies in the city, brought up the rear. The event had been well advertised and a large crowd lined the streets. Cameras were, of course, frequently brought into requisition. A stranger would naturally wonder what conduct was to be expected in such a gathering. He could not be blamed if he should anticipate some ridicule or harsh remarks, or even jeers. But no. While it is true that a very small police escort preceded the procession and a stalwart "bobby" marched beside the statue of Our Lady, it must be admitted that there was no need of any special protection. The numerous spectators who lined the streets were indeed curious, for curiosity was evidently the motive which had brought most of them. But they were not disrespectful, and whatever their thoughts may have been they kept them to themselves, or at least, as far as one could observe, they did not express them in such a way as to be audible or offensive to the pilgrims.

Upon reaching the water-front the procession continued along the Parade, the sparkling banners and the costumes of the children and young people making a pretty sight in the summer sun. Entering the modern town the ascent began of the steep slope leading to the ruins of the old Norman castle of Hastings, which through the courtesy of the Earl of Chichester had been thrown open to the Pilgrims. Upon entering the historical precincts all who could, assembled in what remains of the ancient chapel of Our Lady, with its memories of St. Anselm and of St. Thomas à Becket, its first dean. The statue of Our Lady was placed on the spot where the high altar formerly stood and here, under the open sky and surrounded by crumbling walls, which if they could speak might have told of similar gatherings in the ages of faith, hymns were sung in honor of Our Lady and prayers recited for the conversion of England. The procession then reformed and returned to the church, where there was Solemn Benediction. Thus ended an interesting and edifying act of faith, a souvenir, as well as a revival of one of the prominent devotions of old Catholic days when England was proud to bear the title of Our Lady's Dowry, and also a pledge of the vitality of the old religion and a proof of the larger toleration which has begun to prevail.

H. M. B., S.J.

"Sentire cum Ecclesia"

MUNICH, OCTOBER 1, 1910.

A well-known German publicist, writing in a recent issue of the Allgemeine Rundschau, offers some excellent suggestions to Catholics the world over. At no period of the Church's experience, he contends, was there greater need to heed the old Catholic word: sentire cum ecclesia (to think and feel with the Church). The Holy Father is indefatigable in fulfilling the purpose marked out by him from the beginning of his pontificate: omnia instaurare in Christo (to renew all things in Christ); he works and prays and publishes encyclicals and decrees, which if rightly interpreted and exactly carried into execution, cannot but exert most wholesome influence in the renewal of all things in Christ. One needs but recall his letter on the Sillon, his enactments regarding Daily Communion and the Age of First Communicants, his decrees concerning the Amovibility of Pastors, his energetic campaign in the matter of the Heresies of the Modernists. Do we heed as we should, a coincidence marked in the promulgation of each of these documents by the Holy Father? Scarcely did they appear in the public press and with no opportunity being allowed for the official declaration of their texts, when the letters of Pius X, containing them, were made the object of ruthless and vicious attack by a so-called liberal press, eager to exploit their antagonism to everything Catholic.

"Catholics, it seems to me," the writer goes on to say, "do not meet these attacks with the courage and decisiveness their love of their Church demands. Nay, it happens that some of us are not at all careful to avoid hasty criticisms and judgments of these decrees and enactments better beseming the enemies of the Church, which coming from Catholics must always scandalize. Were it not well for us to remember that these directions and dispositions proceed from the prudent knowledge of the Pope himself, and that therefore, while they make no claim to infallible authority, they are nevertheless to be accepted by every loyal Catholic with reverence and respect, and that they are to be heeded with that alacrity of submissive obedience due to the representative of Christ and visible head of His Church on earth. Let us say it bluntly, we laymen have not the theological knowledge, we have not the necessary experience in pastoral ways, to form a judgment, as we read our favorite paper during our morning coffee, on the details of ecclesiastical polity which it contains, and then talk learnedly at our dinner table in the evening on the sequences that judgment implies. Let us, at all events, be fair enough to concede that Pius X has given more hours and days to a thorough discussion of the ordinances he has published for the good of the Church, than many of us give minutes to the forming of the cocksure judgment our criticism passes upon them. Or do we foolishly fancy, whilst we lightly pass in review the decisions of His Holiness, that we fully understand the mind of the Pontiff in its deep and wide concern for the Church? Are we silly enough to imagine that we know the jurisdictional and pastoral relations of the Universal Church better than the guardian whom the Holy Spirit has placed in the watch-tower to oversee them all with calm, clear gaze? Do we always remember that a senseless criticism coming from one reputed a Catholic may offend pious ears, may weaken the loyalty due to the Church in those who are misled, mayhap, by his superior cultivation, may inject the poison which will work the ruin of submission to authority, without which Catholic fidelity and Catholic Faith are unthinkable? All this many a 'clever' Catholic should bear in mind as he lightly fashions his judgment or poises his caustic pen in criticism of his Church's Head. It is easy, of course, to rise from the banquet board and, with a glass of generous wine in hand, to declaim a toast to the well-being of the Pope; it is easy, after listening to the enthusiastic outpourings of an eloquent speaker, to join in the wild applause that his reference to Pius X calls forth; but it is an altogether different matter, and surely far more worthy of a loyal Catholic heart, when unfounded attacks are made by unreflecting critics, openly to show one's fidelity and love for the Holy Father, and courageously to profess one's unquestioning acceptance of his every word."

MONACENSIS.

The Landtag of Bohemia convened and, as was expected, according to predictions made in the Chronicle, the opening sessions have run on without apparent friction. The agreement entered into by Germany and Czechish leaders, providing for a temporary truce in regard to questions apt to lead to a clash between the parties, will permit, it is hoped, the enactment of necessary legislation for the good of the kingdom. The bills prepared to this end have been referred to the proper committees for action with no sign thus far of the old obstruction methods from either Germans or Bohemians.

A M E R I C A

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1910.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1910, and published weekly by The America Press, New York, President, THOMAS J. CAMPBELL; Secretary, MICHAEL J. O'CONNOR; Treasurer, J. J. WILLIAMS.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Sq. W., New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

How It Happened

Shocked by what is occurring in Portugal, some nervous people are asking how it is possible that in a Catholic country, nuns can be assassinated, priests pursued like rats in underground passages, churches looted, the sacred vessels profaned, and the most indecent orgies carried on in the very sanctuary?

The same inquiry might be made about what took place in Jerusalem, when God's chosen people clamored for the Blood of Jesus Christ and then nailed Him to the cross? The Divine Presence in the Holy City did not prevent the national crime of deicide, nor did the remnants of the Church in Portugal check the abominations of the last two weeks. It is the mystery of sin; a frightful instance of the enormities which human passion when uncontrolled is capable of committing. It is the fight between light and darkness which must go on till the end of the world, and in which the light frequently will seem to be extinguished. But the fault is not with the light; it is with the human will, whose most frightful excesses God will not, in the present order, prevent.

Politically the blame of the dreadful outbreak in Lisbon, like that of old, in Jerusalem, is to be laid at the door of the Pontius Pilates who were in power in both places. The least show of administrative vigor would have swept the streets of the mob; but official timidity suggested compromise. The Government was unpopular, the disappointed Republicans, whose success in the elections had not been as great as expected, had to be conciliated, and so a free rein was given to the criminal classes, with the result that thousands who would never have dreamed of such excesses if the normal conditions of law and order prevailed, were swept into the maelstrom of riot and rapine when they saw that all official protection of life and property had been withdrawn. The same thing would happen in New York to-morrow if the mob were let loose, and the police force were paralyzed.

In the second place, years of misgovernment have been fashioning the people of Portugal for just such acts of savagery. The politicians who occupy the official posts in regular rotation have systematically plundered the treasury, piled up a crushing national debt, provided no schools for the people, until Portugal is on as low a level as Turkey, in the matter of illiteracy, while at the same time atheism is rampant among the so-called upper classes, and it has become fashionable to scoff at patriotism and to hold up Portugal's past to ridicule. Jonquiéra, the most brilliant poet of the moment, tells his countrymen:

"Our nation's glory is but infamy and shame;

"Thieves, pirates, murderers are the sires we claim."

With such sentiments applauded by the public, it is no wonder that the troops who enthusiastically acclaimed the young king on the historical battlefield of Bussaco on September 27, turned their cannons against his palace on October 3, and drove him out a fugitive and a beggar on the highways of the world. Theirs was a lesser crime than the butchery of scarcely two years before, when Carlos and the heir to the throne were ruthlessly murdered. Of that deed six successive ministries have never uttered a word of condemnation or done a thing to bring the criminals to justice. It was a grim lesson of assassination which they were teaching an ignorant and excitable people.

But why should the Church be assailed for all this? Because apart from the latent hatred of Christ which is always seeking for opportunities to give itself vent, the Church, in the minds of the people, seemed to be an integral part of the Government which was oppressing them. As a matter of fact, the Church is not united to the State in Portugal; she is chained to it. She cannot make an appointment, or formulate a policy in the remotest and most beggarly of the colonies, except as a State Department. It is no wonder, therefore, when a maddened and misguided populace, which has been wrought upon by designing politicians and secret societies, rises up to destroy a State which represents so much of what is hateful that it should first wreak vengeance on the weakest part of it, viz: the Church, and upon its most helpless and unprotected representatives, the monks and nuns, from whom they fear neither powder nor shot in defence or retaliation,—the ridiculous press to the contrary, notwithstanding. Of course, the Church will suffer frightfully in this dreadful cataclysm, but she will rid herself of the slavery in which successive Concordats have bound her, and will thank God for her deliverance, even at such a cost.

There is no doubt that she is now almost deserted by the nations which once formed what was known as Christendom. But she is not alarmed. She has never claimed that the nations which she converted and created would remain faithful to her till the end any more than she has guaranteed that the greatest saint whom she has ever illumined with divine grace will not become a reprobate. She has only one promise, namely, that she herself will remain till the end; that her light will never fail; and she knows that just as it is necessary for individual men to follow that light or be lost, so it is for the nations. Without it they never could have arisen from savagery; if they reject it, after its lustre has shone upon them, they descend into savagery again. Portugal is the last example of it.

The Chameleon

There is a very curious article written in the Echo de Paris, by Sr. J. Vasquez de Mella, a deputy of the Spanish Cortes, which deals with the political evolution of the man so prominent before the world at the present time, Sr. Canalejas. At this distance it is impossible to determine with how much reserve these revelations are to be taken, but Vasquez does not hesitate to name the persons,—some of them very distinguished in Church and State—who were associated with the Spanish Premier in the very remarkable changes of his public career.

Canalejas was brought up by his pious mother as a strict Catholic, but the impressions of childhood were afterwards somewhat affected by association with his uncle, Don Carlos, a professor in the University of Madrid. Not succeeding in his university career, he shut his books in disgust, and took to politics and the law. In politics he first trained with the Republicans.

After that the changes were rapid. He was for a time a royalist, and then developed into an outspoken partisan of a military dictatorship. He kept the press busy with articles in support of that idea, until he became the mouth-piece of Polavieja, the ultramontane General, who was for a time the idol and hope of the non-Carlist Clericals. At that time he was furiously anti-Liberal, when suddenly he vaulted clean over into the opposite camp, broke with the Church and published in Spanish the famous speech of Waldeck-Rousseau, at Toulouse.

The most important event of his career occurred in 1896. The Colonies were then in a state of collapse, the attitude of the United States was menacing, and Alfonso's health was a source of serious alarm. It was then that a plot was formed to bring back Don Carlos, by marrying Don Jaime, the son of Don Carlos, to Mercedes, the oldest daughter of Alfonso XII, and to make them sovereigns of Spain, under the active regency of Carlos VIII.

The writer gives the names of all participants in this plot and specifies their place of meeting. With the exception of two they are all living and will vouch for the truth of Vasquez's words. He himself, though not admitted to the secret sessions, was kept informed of the proceedings day by day, by two persons specially deputed for that purpose. One of those persons is still living and ready to confirm all the statements about this particular incident. In 1897, Sr. Vasquez was entrusted with a special mission by Don Carlos himself.

"The conspiracy failed," he says, "because Don Carlos, who was always averse to all such arrangements, refused even to listen to the envoy who was sent to him. Whereupon two of the conspirators withdrew from the meeting. One of the two was not Canalejas, who had been all along the most active agent in the scheme. He persevered until the end."

"In making these revelations," says Vasquez, "I have no desire to mortify Canalejas, or to seek to revive the fears of the Republicans, who doubt his sincerity. It is only to show that we must be on our guard against drawing any logical conclusions from the policies of Spanish Parliamentarians. Nor should we hope to find any logical sequence in their ideas. This is particularly true of Canalejas, who is a very amiable man, very polite, endowed with intelligence and rich in imagination. He has read much, perhaps too much, for he has gone too rapidly through books which were written very slowly. He is prodigal of assertions, penurious in reasoning, and deserves to a certain point the judgment passed on him by Castillo, who said he had too much stuff in his style to cover the very small substance of his thoughts. More than others, he is exposed to the suggestions of his environment. When under the influence of the journalist Figueroa, he was an ardent upholder of the Right; but when Figueroa gave way to Morote, the present anti-clerical program was drawn up. Morote had already developed it in the Freemason journals of Vienna. In brief, Canalejas wants to be first somewhere. He cannot be first among the leaders of the Right, for the place is preempted. So he has delivered himself up to the Left. But he is being dragged to the abyss."

If only half of what this Spanish deputy says be true, it is clear that Canalejas is not a man possessed of the great ambition of freeing his country from the thrall of clericalism; not a valiant knight cavorting on his charger to spear the monster Pope, but a shifty politician who is constantly out for office; who is all things by turns and nothing long. He is now hoping that his anti-clerical program will mollify the Spanish Republicans and prevent them from imitating their Portuguese neighbors.

Germany and Capital Punishment

Germany some time since undertook the task of the revision of the laws in force in its constituent states with the purpose of unifying as far as possible the different codes heretofore prevailing. The civil code which resulted has been in force throughout the empire for some years; and capable jurists are now formulating the changes necessary to introduce a criminal code which shall similarly simplify the now complicated court procedure in criminal trials. At a recent meeting of the lawyers of the empire in Dantzic a decided stand was taken on a question of serious import for those entrusted with the details of this revision. A committee had been charged with the preparation of a resolution regarding capital punishment, presumably to make clear the mind of those best qualified to pass judgment on the matter. The committee handed in a resolution, afterwards accepted by the full meeting, declaring it to be the sense of all "that capital punishment should not be more restricted than it now is." The committee's spokesman, in introducing the resolution, explained that the original purpose had been to recommend an extension of the death penalty, but that various reasons had induced the members to be content with a reaffirmation of the existing law.

The action thus taken marks a decided change of sentiment in Germany. In the sixties of the last century, as Germania notes, such a resolution could not have commanded a majority of votes in a similar gathering of jurists. One recalls how on the occasion of a thorough revision of the Prussian criminal law at that time, the Liberals, then controlling the Landtag, demanded the abolition of capital punishment. The masterful Bismarck, then Chancellor, declared he would not accept the revision proposed unless capital punishment remained the penalty for grave crimes. The death penalty continued, then, to hold its place on the statute, although its opponents were powerful enough to prevent executions under the law during the ten years that followed. The first to be carried out after the Prussian revision was that of Hoedel, who had made the infamous attempt on the life of William I. The death warrant in this instance was signed by the Crown Prince as Regent. The lamentable increase of crime in these latter years has aroused popular sentiment to a recognition of the needs of greater severity in dealing with criminals. This, no doubt, explains the stand taken by the jurists present at the Dantzic meeting, which will carry great weight with those now preparing the draft of the new criminal code.

It is not generally known that before a death warrant is signed in Germany, the whole case of the unfortunate condemned is thoroughly gone over by an extra commission. This review, independent of all court proceedings, is regularly made, whether pardon be sought or not, in order to discover mitigating circumstances whose existence might suggest a commutation of the penalty. It is not surprising, then, that the opponents of capital punishment were unable to adduce in Dantzic a single instance, within the last few decades, of an innocent man having been condemned to death.

The same problem confronts the legislators of France. The terrible outrages committed by the apaches in the very heart of Paris have given a rude shock to the humanitarians, and a demand has been made for a vigorous resumption of the death penalty. Some executions have taken place but crime can never be repressed by force alone.

A Memorable Page in School History

Catholic New York no doubt felt justly proud of the magnificent tribute paid to the memory of that great churchman and patriot, its first Archbishop, when St. Patrick's Cathedral was consecrated. There is another event in his remarkable career which should be commemorated.

It is now seventy years ago, namely, on October 29-30, 1840, since Bishop John Hughes, as the champion of Catholic education, went before the Board of Aldermen in the City Hall, with a magnificent argument for the justice of the claim of the Catholic free schools for public recognition, and an unanswerable plea for the rights of conscience which put to shame the cabal opposing him in that historic debate.

It should not be forgotten that the first public free school system of the city of New York was denominational. Under the direction of public-spirited men like DeWitt Clinton, the Public School Society, organized in 1805, for the management of the city's schools, distributed the money raised by taxation for school purposes, and in this distribution St. Peter's school, by an act passed by the legislature, March 21, 1806, participated.

As the years rolled on, and the Catholic parish schools increased, the Public School Society degenerated into a close anti-Catholic combination which voted the public money to all church schools except those that were Catholic. In 1840 there were eight Catholic free schools in New York: St. Peter's, St. Patrick's, St. Mary's, St. Joseph's, St. James', St. Nicholas' the Transfiguration and St. John's, with an attendance of about 4,000 children.

To the requests of the directors of these schools that they be given the financial compensation an honest interpretation of the law called for, the trustees of the Public School Society turned a deaf ear. It was then that the public hearing on the issue took place before the Board of Aldermen on October 29-30, 1840. The intolerance of the Public School Society was defended by three Methodist, one Presbyterian and one Dutch Reformed ministers, and two prominent lawyers. Bishop Hughes single-handed shattered their arguments, and upheld the Catholic position in one of the greatest oratorical efforts of his long and glorious career; but prejudice prevailed, and the Aldermen rejected the plea of the Catholic free-schools.

Convinced then that there was no immediate prospect of a change in the civic aspect, Catholic New York resolved to organize and maintain its own system of free schools. "Go," said Bishop Hughes, "build your own schools; raise arguments in stone with the cross on top; raise arguments in the shape of the best educated and most moral citizens of the Republic, and the day will come when you will enforce recognition."

The greater part of the Bishop's injunctions have been carried out to the letter, but evidently the day has not dawned which has enforced recognition.

THE RUSE OF FRAY DIMAS.

Taken unawares by Hidalgo's appeal to arms in the cause of Mexican independence, or, perhaps misled by the vague reports of conspiracy which were in the air, the viceregal government lost no time in mobilizing troops and setting them in motion against the intrepid priest and his large but unwieldy and ill-equipped force of Indians. One of the most capable and, at the same time, most trusted Spanish officers then in Mexico was Brigadier General Calleja del Rey, then stationed at San Luis Potosí, and therefore near enough to attack the patriot army or to be exposed to an attack from it. He made careful preparations for battle and then marched to encounter the enemy. The two armies met near the little town of Aculco, where Calleja's well drilled troops routed Hidalgo's army. The battle, if so it may be called, was fought on November 7, 1810.

Among the prisoners Calleja counted a number of religious who had followed Hidalgo's battle flag. He conveyed his prisoners and booty to Querétaro where he established his headquarters in the Franciscan convent and made ready to deal out harsh military justice. He listened to appeals for mercy in behalf of the religious, but he was deaf to all that could be said to him in favor of the other prisoners, one of whom was Pablo Armenta, a little drummer boy only twelve years old. In vain had the great ladies of the city knelt before him and besought clemency for the child. He had told them that the death sentence should be carried out on him as on the others. All hope of reprieve seemed lost, but there was one who determined to make one last appeal. He was a Franciscan friar, Fray Dimas Diez de Lara, a priest of high standing in the city, and well known for his energy as well as for his charity and self-sacrifice.

Fray Dimas sought an audience of the general. "I have come in the name of the worthy women of this city to beg for the life of Pablo Armenta who has fallen into the hands of his Majesty's troops; he is but a child and can hardly be judged accountable for his actions." "A child, yes, but he has the makings of as great a rebel as the country could be cursed with, so your Paternity may save your words for some other occasion; he dies with the others." "General," quietly answered the friar, "I have appealed to no purpose, but I give you fair notice that I shall do all in my power to save the boy from the consequences of your rigor." The General, not deigning to reply, bowed stiffly and waved the visitor out.

On the morning of the day appointed for the execution of the prisoners, they were conducted along the Alameda to the street leading to the hospital. Armed soldiers opened the way, surrounded the wretched group and brought up the rear of the sad procession. The people thronged the streets. With no show of violence, they crowded so closely around the soldiers that the officer in charge ordered them off, and even threatened them. They respectfully withdrew a little, but their pitying interest in those about to die prompted them to precede the marching soldiers and to fall in behind after the condemned men had passed.

As the soldiers turned with military precision to march down the street by the hospital, a very odd thing happened. The people, men, women and children, were clustered there in such numbers that the soldiers had to push them away with the butt-ends of their muskets. This so frightened the women and children that they began by dint of struggling to make their escape from the closely packed mass. Their action so increased the confusion that everybody seemed to be wrestling with the one nearest him. When the hubbub was at its height, the strong arm of a Franciscan friar reached in some way through the struggling and expostulating throng until it was close to little Pablo. With a mighty grip, a powerful hand seized some portion of the little chap's clothing, there was a tremendous jerk, and soon the people on the outer edge of the crowd saw a brown-robed Franciscan break from the throng and speed down the road with a bundle in his arms. A convenient corner soon hid him from view. The crowding and the noisy cries ceased as suddenly as they had begun. The soldiers were free to proceed, but without their diminutive prisoner.

General Calleja was once more at his headquarters. Without cloak or hat, with torn habit, Fray Dimas, panting and jaded, stood in his presence. "Most excellent sir," he gasped, "I have done as I said; the boy is gone, and I don't know where; I am in your hands." "I pardon your Paternity," said the general, "but remember that I pardon but once; let me never see you again."

H. J. S.

LITERATURE

Heroic Spain. By E. BOYLE O'REILLY. New York: Duffield & Company. Pp. 440, uncut, with illustrations.

So many books of travel are luminous examples of how such books should not be written that it is grateful and refreshing to scan the volume before us. We all remember the story of the successful milkman who, as a result of his impositions on his patrons, was able to tour Europe, from which he returned with glorious accounts of the stacks of clover in England and the long-horned cows in Switzerland, the rest having slipped his memory. Fitness for intelligent observation and sympathetic appreciation is stamped on every page of Heroic Spain. Not following beaten paths nor decorating the fringe of a "personally conducted" heterogeneous squad, the author has mapped out her course and has followed it, now and then with the patience which should attend adversity, oftener with the delight that comes with fair hopes more than realized. Beginning with the noble mountaineers, the Basques, she guides with none of the machine-made air of the guide-book through the joys and sorrows of the Spain of to-day and, as happy occasion offers, lifts the veil and displays the glories of the Spain that was. Castile, Andalusia and Aragon, each contributes liberally to our enjoyment, and the contributions vary as the high-minded Castilian, the pleasure-loving Andalusian and the fiercely democratic Catalanian differ from one another. Rare views of vast cathedrals, panoramic scenes from the busy city and the calmer life of village and field, little glimpses of the Spanish home, all are so gathered, not jumbled together, that we see with her eyes and hear with her ears and thrill with her enjoyment. We are not surprised that some religious customs struck her as unlovely, for everything in Spain seems to have come down unalloyed from a simple and artless antiquity. But if she would have the Spaniards forbear decking the statues of the saints, as is their wont, she would rock a choice phrase of all significance: "Merece quedar para vestir santos." Her little digression into the political field is not so happy, for we cannot see how the Cortes of Cadiz in 1810 could be said to represent the people of the kingdom of Spain and its colonies. Ample proof the Spaniard is strong, vigorous resourceful, far from decadent, is seen in the fact that Spain still is. What the future holds in store is beyond our ken, but we may well hope that the prolific mother of heroes and heroines may pass unscathed through the storm and sit in the beauty of peace. * * *

Correspondence on Church and Religion of William Ewart Gladstone. Selected and arranged by D. C. LATHBURY. 2 vols. New York: The Macmillan Company, 66 Fifth Avenue. Price $5 net.

To a very great many of his countrymen Gladstone's career has always seemed a succession of contradictions. They cannot understand how he who began life not only as a Tory but also as a man of strong religious principles could, retaining these, become the disciple of Palmerston and Lord John Russell and, as their successor, reduce their Liberalism to practice in England. In 1845 he wrote to Newman: "According to the old European and Christian civilization the state was a family and the governors had the position and the duties of parents. According to modern notions the state is a club; the government is the organ of influences predominating in the body. With us the state is on its path of transition from the former to the latter. The public men of the present day are engaged in regulating and qualifying and some of them in retarding this transition. But the work proceeds, and as to that work regarded as a whole, I view it with great alarm." In 1868 he became Prime Minister to begin that course of Radicalism which has brought the British state to the condition of a club he so much feared and has given a fixed place in the constitution to the principle that parliament is but the mandatary of the people whose mandates it is bound to carry out. Little wonder, then, that many minds are troubled.

The Church of England was not only astounded but also aggrieved, when it saw him whom it had counted on as one of its truest sons, foremost in its defence, faithful when his bosom friends, Hope-Scott and Manning, passed over to Rome, disestablishing the Irish Church, abolishing University Tests, opening parliament to atheists, and in the intervals of rest his functions allowed him, going down to Hawarden to give himself with evident relish to the Anglican service and the reading of its lessons Sunday after Sunday in the parish church.

Some put the apparent anomaly down to bad company. During the general election of 1868, which settled the fate of the Protestant Church of Ireland, Judy, a feeble imitator of Punch, parodied Southey in the following stanzas altogether execrable, which we quote from memory:

"You are old, Father William, the young man said,
Your locks they are turning gray,
Your looks, People's William, betoken remorse;
Now, tell me the reason, I pray.

"In the days of my youth, William Gladstone replied,
I stuck to the right strong and fast,
I abused not my country nor railed at my church
But those days forever are past.

"I am lonely and sad, did great William yet say,
My conscience it troubles me sore,
But Bright and his party have led me astray
And I can't be again as of yore."

This is nonsense. Two things are absolutely certain. Gladstone could not be led by the nose; and he never suffered a twinge of conscience for any of his great measures. The explanation, nevertheless, passed muster in many a hall and in nearly every vicarage and rectory at the time, though few would dream of offering it now. Others ascribe the seeming contradiction to ambition. But this implies unscrupulousness regarding the means of gaining and retaining power. Gladstone loved to be in office: what public man does not? Even Mr. Balfour would turn his back joyfully on the golf links to resume the familiar chair at the head of the table in Downing Street. But to imagine Gladstone unscrupulous is impossible. So many of his speeches and letters, labored and charged with conditions and explanations, prove that, if he found difficulty in forming his conscience, without its approval he never took a step. Others again say it was due to the absolute conviction that the good of the country required him to be at the head of affairs, a conviction strengthened by his wife; and that consequently he had to pay the price in the sacrifice of principles once held dear. Gladstone most probably was so convinced, and Mrs. Gladstone too, who had a good woman's greatest happiness, a husband she could believe in without any closing of eyes or straining of judgment. But this is not sufficient to solve the problem.

We see that Gladstone was changing in his policy. We hold, too, that if in his long career he did some good, he wrought no little evil. We reject the popular explanations of his mutability and maintain that in all this he was absolutely consistent to his principles, which remained the same from the day he entered public life in 1832 to the hour he breathed his last sixty-six years later. These principles are to be found in his famous book published in 1838. "The State in its Relations with the Church." In it he held England to be a Christian state, and bound to promote the religion of the established Church among the people. Hence he opposed the admission of the Jews to parliament and voted against the Maynooth grant. Public men looked upon the doctrine of his book as Romanism: as a matter of fact it was the very antithesis of Catholic doctrine. For him the state was supreme; the Church was its chosen organ for the discharge of its functions as a Christian state, and this supremacy of the state is the key to the whole of his public career.

In 1845 the Government proposed to increase the Maynooth grant. This was contrary to the assumption of his book. He therefore resigned office. But his eyes were opened. His letter to Newman was written on the discovery that the English state was not Christian as he had dreamed, that it had no real conscience, that he could not impose upon it his own conscience, that in it, "the ancient principle of reverence to truth is intercepted and crossed by the law of representation." He asks, "whether the work of government has not become absolutely unclean, and whether it should not be abjured?" He answers both questions in the negative, and resolves on his future course: "In all those cases in which the state acts as if it had a conscience, to maintain that standard as nearly as we can; and in other cases to take social justice according to the lower, but now prevalent, idea for a guide." Having thus formed his conscience, he went down to the House, voted as a private member for the increase in the Maynooth grant, and entered upon a new career.

At the Cambridge Church Congress the other day the Archbishop of York said: "To the majority of churchmen the conception of their church as a great spiritual society with its own faith to teach, its own witness to give, its own moral law to uphold, had scarcely appeared in the horizon." In other words the Archbishop affirmed the majority of members of the Church of England to hold the Protestant idea of the Church. This was Gladstone's condition which separated him from Hope-Scott and Manning by an abyss impassable. Like his countymen to-day he might have high views or low with regard to particular doctrines; but his view of the Church as an organization subjected it to the supreme state, which must judge of its efficiency, control its activity, terminate if needful its title to its property, which for Church and Churchmen, Presbyterians and Dissenters, for every individual whosoever he may be, is the absolute authority in all matters of political or public conduct. The principle is false, in its conclusions it is calamitous; but it gives unity to Gladstone's public life at first sight so contradictory.

The modest idea of the compiler of Gladstone's ecclesiastical and religious correspondence was apparently to supplement Morley's Life, which leaves virtually untouched Gladstone's religious side. To our mind the work of the former is of far more importance than Morley's. Gladstone was first of all a man of religious character and principles, and to attempt to know him without access to the letters in which that character and those principles appear most clearly is to waste one's time and energy. We therefore recommend Mr. Lathbury's work to all who wish to have an adequate knowledge of one who was one of the greatest forces of the nineteenth century.

H. W.

LITERARY NOTES

Jesuit writers of juvenile fiction seem to be very active at present. Benziger Brothers announce forthcoming volumes by Henry J. Spalding, S.J., David J. Bearne, S.J., R. P. Garrold, S.J., and J. E. Copus, S.J. Father Bearne's book is a collection of short stories, most of which have their plots laid in olden times. Father Garrold in his "Freddy Carr and His Friends," attempts to do for the English lad what Father Finn has done for young America. Present-day Kentucky with its night-riders furnishes the exciting setting of Father Spalding's story, "The Old Mill on the Withrose," while Father Copus, in his "As Gold in the Furnace," will depict college life as he sees it among the older students.

The Wiltzius Company also announce a forthcoming novel by Father Copus, in his historical vein.

Benziger Brothers announce the arrival of a new Jesuit novelist in Michael Earls, S.J. "Melchior of Boston" is the somewhat strange title of the story with which the latest candidate for honors in the field of fiction makes his bow to the public. The book will not appear before November, but the publishers' description of its contents raises high expectations.

Father Bernard Vaughan's recent visit to our shores ought to stimulate the sale of his new book, "The Matchless Maid: Life Lessons from Blessed Joan of Arc." Much has been written about the wonderful girl and her meteoric career; but Father Vaughan's treatment of his subject is new, giving more attention to the spiritual side of the episode than to the historical. That Father Vaughan gives us a sympathetic picture no one, who has heard him lecture on Joan of Arc, can have a doubt.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Argentina. By W. A. Hirst. Introduction by Martin Hume. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. Net $3.00.
 Lord Glenesk and the "Morning Post." By Reginald Lucas. New York: The John Lane Co. Net, postpaid, $6.25.
 John Winterbourne's Family. By Alice Brown. New York: Houghton, Mifflin Co. Net $1.35.
 My Mark Twain. By William Dean Howells. New York: Harper & Brothers. Net $1.40.
 Saint Thomas à Becket. By Monsignor Demimuid. Translated by C. W. W. "The Saints" Series. New York: Benziger Brothers. Net $1.00.
 Sermons of St. Bernard on Advent and Christmas. Compiled and translated at St. Mary's Convent, York, from the Edition (1508) in black-letter, of St. Bernard's Sermons and Letters. Introduction by Right Rev. J. C. Hedley, O.S.B. New York: Benziger Bros. Net 75 cents.
 Our Lady's Lutenist. By Rev. David Bearne, S.J. New York: Benziger Bros. Net 65 cents.
 Tales of Irish Life and Character. By Mrs. S. C. Hall. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. Net $1.75.
 Life in the Shadow of Death. By Rev. Andrew Klarmann, A.M. New York: Frederick Pustet & Co. Net $1.00.
 A Christmas Mystery. By W. J. Locke. New York: The John Lane Co. Net 75 cents.
 Pietro of Siena. By Stephen Phillips. New York: The Macmillan Co. Net $1.00.

Mr. Ingleside. By E. V. Lucas. New York: The Macmillan Co. Net $1.35.
 A Man's Man. By Ian Hay. New York: Houghton, Mifflin Co. Net $1.20.
 Whirligigs. By O. Henry. New York: Doubleday, Page & Co. Net $1.20.
 Max. By Katherine Cecil Thurston. New York: Harper & Bros. Net $1.50.
 A Winter's Comedy. By Halliwell Sutcliffe. New York: The John Lane Co. Net $1.50.
 The Turn of the Tide. By Mary Agatha Gray. New York: Benziger Bros. Net $1.25.
 World Corporation. By King C. Gillette. Boston: The New England News Co. Net $1.00.
 Building Your Boy. How to Do It; How Not to Do It. By Kenneth H. Wayne. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co.
 Children's Diet in Home and School. By Louise E. Hogan. New York: Doubleday Page & Co.

French Publication.

Notes sur La Médecine et la Botanique des Anciens Mexicains. Par A. Gerste, S.J. Deuxième édition revue et corrigée. Rome: Imprimerie Polyglotte Vaticane.

German Publications.

Der Spatz am Joch und Andere Erzählungen. Tiroler Berggeschichten. Von Hans Schrott-Fiechl. New York: Frederick Pustet & Co. Net 75 cents.
 Thomas Moore, die Irische Freiheitssänger. Biographische-literarische Studie. Von Alois Stockmann, S.J. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net 85 cents.
 Katholische und Protestantische Missionsalmsen. Von Anton Huonder, S.J. St. Louis: B. Herder.

EDUCATION

A condition has arisen in Altoona, Pa., which presents another evidence of the unfairness encountered by Catholics as a direct consequence of the present school-tax system. Altoona is a railroad town and its chief industries centre in the great shops of the Pennsylvania Company located there. Naturally a large majority of the boys growing up within its limits look to these shops and to the many trades therein exercised as the scene of their future toil. Quite recently it is said, the officials of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company made known their purpose not to receive as apprentices any boys but those who have taken the manual training course in the schools. The public schools of the city have such a course, equipped and paid for, of course, out of funds accruing from the school tax levied upon all citizens alike. Parents of Catholic children, who frequent parochial schools, are unable, under the stress of a double school tax which they pay already, to meet the further heavy outlay necessary to equip manual training classes in these parochial schools. Yet 70 per cent. of the Catholic school children will likely make application to enter the railroad shops.

Catholic parents thinking to have found an easy solution of the difficulty, made application to the Altoona school board to have their children permitted to enter the manual training classes of the city schools to enjoy the special training therein afforded. They were paying their share of the cost of this training, they argued, why should their children not be admitted to the advantages it offered. It would be an easy matter so to arrange hours of instruction as to have the permission for this special course cause no upsetting of the ordinary class periods of the public and of the parochial schools.

The petition has been denied and the Catholics of Altoona are making mighty protest against the decision of the board. Their protest appeals to a disinterested observer as very solidly grounded. The board's own lawyers are obliged to concede that there is no law forbidding the granting of the permission asked. Naturally these boys of the parish schools have every right in equity to the privilege their parents crave and since no law opposes their entering this special course, one is inclined to say: admit them at once in the name of justice and fairness. We shall await with considerable curiosity the outcome of the Altoona controversy, and it may be permitted us to express the hope that the Catholics of Altoona may find a like success in their efforts with that achieved by their Philadelphia fellow-religionists in the scholarship question some weeks back.

Dr. Morgan M. Sheedy, well-known for his zealous interest in the development of the parochial school system, tells a story that serves to point a much needed moral. While he was rector of a Pittsburg church some years ago, he had charge of a large parochial school. He insisted upon punctuality among his pupils and it was his self-imposed task to see that this rule of discipline was obeyed. Just as he was about to close the door of the school one day a mother, red-faced from the exertion, dishevelled and angry rushed up, dragging her son at the end of a rope with which the lad was lassoed, and flung the boy into the arms of the priest. "There," she said, "take him and make a man of him." It is an old principle that the primary responsibility of educating children rests with the home. The church and school can be of much assistance, and they are so unquestionably, but the moral obligations of parents cannot be shifted to others' shoulders. How many parents find themselves described in Father Sheedy's story. Failing utterly in their own duty to their offspring they want the state, or church, or schools "to make a man of him." If the home training and environment are not such as to inspire in the child a desire "to make a man of himself," and ambition to be a good strong and useful citizen, the best attempts of church and school will have poor results.

At the annual meeting of the Missouri College Union, to be held in November, at William Jewell College, Liberty, Missouri, Rev. Jos. P. Conroy, S.J., will read a paper on "The Spiritual Care of Boys." Father Conroy holds the important office of Spiritual Adviser to the Students of St. Louis University.

SOCIOLOGY

MISSION OF OUR LADY OF THE ROSARY.

Rev. M. J. Henry, Director of this organization, founded in New York City twenty-seven years ago to protect Irish immigrant girls, has published this statement of the works it aims to accomplish:

It exercises a moral influence over steamship lines to protect the Irish immigrant girls on board their vessels. It watches over, guides, and assists at the landing depot those immigrant girls who intend to proceed by rail or steamship to destination. It examines the claims and fitness of relatives or friends who call for the immigrant at the Home. It provides a home "free of charge" for those girls whose friends do not call on the day of arrival, or who have no friends at all, or who are unable to proceed on their journey. It tries to locate relatives of those who bring indefinite addresses. It secures positions in good families for those ready to go to work. It supplies the good offices of the priest whose presence and advice are so helpful to the Irish exile.

The immigration to the United States for the year ending last June 30 was unusually heavy. Of the immigrants who arrived, 786,094 were admitted. These included 23,174 Irish—12,489 males and 10,685 females. Almost all the Irish immigrants were in the prime of life; 21,216 were between the ages of 14 and 44, 1,248 were under 14, and 710 were over 45; 20,736 were going to relatives, 1,866 to friends, and 572 to others. They brought with them $675,589.

Irish immigrants went to every State in the Union, but New York received by far the largest number. Seven went to Alabama, 3 to Alaska, 12 to Arizona, 5 to Arkansas, 636 to California, 82 to Colorado, 1,057 to Connecticut, 47 to Delaware, 80 to District of Columbia, 14 to Florida, 14 to Georgia, 1 to Hawaii, 30 to Idaho, 1,555 to Illinois, 113 to Indiana, 143 to Iowa, 44 to Kansas, 32 to Kentucky, 23 to Louisiana, 25 to Maine, 59 to Maryland, 1,182 to Massachusetts, 123 to Michigan, 83 to Minnesota, 2 to Mississippi, 212 to Missouri, 180 to Montana, 85 to Nebraska, 12 to Nevada, 28 to New Hampshire, 1,935 to New Jersey, 3 to New Mexico, 11,367 to New York, 2 to North Carolina, 28 to North Dakota, 538 to Ohio, 12 to Oklahoma, 79 to Oregon, 2,724 to Pennsylvania, 2 to Philippine Islands, 176 to Rhode Island, 2 to South Carolina, 31 to South Dakota, 9 to Tennessee, 85 to Texas, 32 to Utah, 6 to Vermont, 46 to Virginia, 78 to Washington, 8 to West Virginia, 85 to Wisconsin, and 37 to Wyoming.

After arrival at the steamship piers the immigrants are taken to Ellis Island for final examination. Here representatives of the Mission interview the Irish immigrants and assist them as far as possible. The assistance thus given takes many forms. It may be a timely warning about new and doubtful acquaintances, expediting discharge to claimants, advice about the journey to out-of-town destinations, the sending of a telegram, the giving of a little money,—all welcome and encouraging services to those anxious girls from Erin.

For the benefit of intending immigrants and their friends it may be well to state that an alien, especially one whose destination is outside New York or vicinity, should have sufficient money on landing to comply with existing regulations. Irish girls not so provided suffer painful delay and inconvenience, being obliged in some instances to spend days at Ellis Island in strange and uncongenial company until the required sum is received from relatives or friends. Too often the blame for this is traceable to steamship agents in Ireland, who through ignorance or design fail to furnish their patrons with necessary information. As a rule an immigrant having from $20 to $25 in addition to railroad fare will be allowed to proceed, other conditions being satisfied.

Also a word on another topic. Of late there seems to be a considerable number of Irish girls coming to this country on the strength of promises of employment made them by visitors from America, not a few of whom are Irish by birth or descent. Girls should be very slow to accept such offers. With rare exceptions, employers who use such methods have their own selfish ends in view. This is borne out by the fact that almost invariably the wages arranged to be paid per month is from $3 to $5 less than the prevailing rate. One may rejoin that a girl need not remain with such an employer, but this is far easier said than done, particularly if the girl has to repay her passage money and has no relative near to advise or help her.

Supplementing the work of the Mission at Ellis Island is that done at the Home. Here the immigrants discharged to the Mission by the United States authorities are comfortably accommodated until claimed by relatives or placed in employment. Up to date more than 100,000 girls have been received at the Home, and employment secured for over 12,000—all free of charge. Happily owing to more prosperous conditions in Ireland, as well as to improved immigration methods at Ellis Island, the number discharged to the Mission is diminishing. Still there is undoubted need for the Home, and as long as there is, the Irish immigrant girl, Catholic or Protestant, will find in it welcome and hospitality.

As heretofore, the sources of support are the parish in which the Home is situated, the voluntary contributions of appreciative friends, and the Rosary Society. The cost of membership in this society is twenty-five cents annually and in return the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass is offered three times weekly for living and deceased members.

Canon Lepailleur of the church of the Child Jesus in Montreal has opened a free dispensary in his parish for the benefit of infants under fifteen months. He obtained the free use of the old St. Louis town hall on Laurier Avenue West and St. Lawrence Street, laid in a stock of medicines, provided for a supply of pasteurized milk, obtained the services of medical men and began operations. The average death rate of infants in his parish during the past six years has been about 14.5 per cent. His dispensary has been open only three months, and these the worst of the year for children, and the death rate is already much reduced. The physicians in charge look forward to a rate of only 2 per cent. when the dispensary is better known and frequented.

ECONOMICS

The Department of Commerce and Labor confirms the changes we have noticed already in the commerce of this country. In the eight months that ended with August last manufactures constituted more than half of the total exports. A year ago, though the exports for the corresponding period were less in value by 38 million dollars, the proportion of manufactures was only 48 per cent. Two years ago when the exports were valued at 1,075 million dollars, greater than those of this year by 48 million dollars, the manufactures were only 44 per cent. of the whole. Ten years ago their proportion was 35½ per cent; twenty years ago 21 per cent., and thirty years ago 15 per cent.

Some time ago AMERICA expressed the opinion in view of the continual agitation for higher wages, that the time must come when employers, no longer able to grant such demands out of their profits, will be obliged to raise prices in order to meet them. We read now that the four great brotherhoods of railway men with 350,000 members and representing 2,000,000 voters, have addressed a memorial to the President on the existing question of railway rates. They insist that congress and the state legislatures should treat the railways with consideration and allow them to make reasonable increases in their charges. Some profess to see in this such a recognition of community of interests between labor and capital as will be a pledge of industrial peace. We see in it rather the beginning of the fulfilment of our forecast.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

Arrangements for the unveiling of the monument to Father Corby, C.S.C., have been completed. The ceremony will take place on the Gettysburg battlefield on October 29. On the morning of the unveiling a solemn high Mass will be celebrated at St. Francis Xavier's Church, Gettysburg, at which a sermon will be delivered by the Rt. Rev. Mgr. Turner, V. G., of Philadelphia. The statue will be unveiled at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. Mr. Henry A. N. Daily, president of the Catholic Alumni Sodality of Philadelphia, under whose auspices the statue has been erected, will turn the monument over to the Battlefield Commission. The principal address will be made by the Rev. Charles W. Lyons, S.J., president of St. Joseph's College, Philadelphia.

The memorial is built on the rock from which Father Corby addressed the soldiers before they went to battle, and represents the priest in the attitude of giving them absolution. The memorial funds were supplied by popular subscriptions. A large number of persons are expected to witness the impressive ceremony.

As recently reorganized by Pope Pius X, the hierarchy of the United States of Brazil now consists of eight archbishops and thirty-five bishops. With the creation of three new dioceses and the elevation of two to the metropolitan rank, it is plain that the Church in Brazil has its full share of energy and zeal, and that it is keeping pace with the industrial and commercial progress of the most extensive of the South American republics.

The dedication of the new College Chapel at Mt. St. Mary's, Emmitsburg, on October 12, was one of unusual interest and solemnity in the history of the famous "nursery of bishops." The new edifice is said to be the largest and perhaps the most beautiful Catholic College Chapel in the land. The day was one of triumph for the mountaineers as the chapel was their gift, and its erection meant the realization of the hopes which they have entertained for many years. The sacred edifice represents an outlay of $150,000. His Eminence Cardinal Gibbons, of Baltimore, officiated at the dedicatory services, and Bishop Allen of Mobile, Ala., celebrated Pontifical High Mass. Mgr. William H. Byrne, of Boston, was Archpriest. The Right. Rev. Owen B. Corrigan, D.D., Auxiliary Bishop of Baltimore, and the Right Rev. Hugh McSherry, Vicar Apostolic of the Eastern Vicariate of Cape Colony were among those present, together with a large representation of the College alumni. The Rev. Henry C. Semple, S.J., of New York, preached the sermon.

Under the banners of the Holy Name Society, 30,000 men marched through the streets of Pittsburg on Sunday, October 16, as a demonstration of the Society's protest against blasphemy. The marchers came from every section of Western Pennsylvania. In front of the cathedral an estimated gathering of 50,000 persons knelt on the lawn at the conclusion of the parade, and assisted at Solemn Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament. Bishop Canevin of Pittsburg officiated.

SCIENCE

THE CONFERENCE ON MOUNT WILSON.

The editor of Popular Astronomy, H. C. Wilson gives in his October number a very interesting account of the Fourth Conference of the International Union for Cooperation in Solar Research, which was held on Mount Wilson, near Pasadena, California. Thirteen different countries, and 50 different observatories and astronomical laboratories were represented, and 83 members attended the meeting, exclusive of non-members' and visitors.

On Monday morning, August 29, the visitors were shown the offices, machine and instrument shops and the physical laboratory in Pasadena, by the Observatory staff. A 75 foot spectroheliograph, with its 150 foot tower telescope and coelostat mirror, was there under construction. There was likewise the machinery for grinding the 100 inch mirror, the glass of which, also present, had been rejected on account of flaws in its interior.

In the afternoon there was a garden party at the home of Professor Hale, the director, which enabled the visitors to become acquainted with one another.

Nearly the whole of the following day, Tuesday, was employed in the ascent of the mountain, on foot, on horses or mules, or in carriages. At the summit there was accommodation for all in cottages except for 20 who slept in tents.

The instrumental equipment of the Observatory is the best in the world. It consists of

1. A 60 inch reflecting telescope whose focus may be made to be 25, 80, 100 or 150 feet. One of its accessories is an 18 foot spectrograph.

2. The Snow horizontal telescope with a 24 inch mirror of 60 foot focus. Its accessories are an 18 foot solar spectrograph and a 5 foot spectroheliograph.

3. A (vertical) tower telescope with 12 inch lens of 60 foot focus. It has a 30 foot spectroheliograph.

4. A second tower telescope with a 12 inch lens of 150 foot focus. This gives a solar image 17 inches in diameter. Its accessory is to be the 75 foot spectroheliograph which is under construction.

The object of the Observatory is to study the sun in every way and, in the physical laboratory, to investigate the behavior of bodies under various pressures, in magnetic fields, and the like, as the solar observations would seem to call for. For this purpose the laboratory is supplied with every conceivable appliance.

The session was formally opened on Wednesday morning at 9:30. The director G. E. Hale, gave the address of welcome, explained the purpose of his observatory and the work it was doing, and called attention to many technical points upon which he expected the Conference to take action. In the evening, C. G. Abbot, of the Smithsonian Astrophysical Observatory, spoke of solar radiation.

The two following days were spent in discussions of many things too technical to be presented here. One of the resolutions adopted however is so interesting that it deserves to be quoted. It is "That the fund raised in Italy as a memorial to Father Secchi be devoted to the construction of a tower telescope."

There were two Jesuits present at the Conference, Father Richard Cirera, the director of the Ebro Observatory, near Tortosa in Spain, and Father Aloysius L. Cortie, of Stonyhurst College Observatory, England. The first presented a report on the classification of faculae, and on the part of the Spanish government, spoke in behalf of Barcelona as the next place of meeting in 1913. It was voted however to hold it in Bonn.

All the instruments of the Observatory were open to inspection at all times, and on two nights the giant reflector was turned upon the Hercules cluster, the ring nebula, certain double stars and the planet Saturn.

Saturday morning was occupied with the descent from the mountain. A banquet in the evening brought the meeting to a close.

WILLIAM F. RIGGE, S.J.

At the recent annual meeting of the Astronomische Gesellschaft held in Breslau, the Rev. John G. Hagan, S.J., Director of the Vatican Observatory, communicated a paper entitled:—"A new proof of the rotation of the earth."

J. C. Solá, while observing with the 38 cm. Mailhat equatorial of the Fabra Observatory Jupiter's first satellite Io, noticed a conspicuous polar flattening probably greater than that of any other known body in the solar system. Measurements showed that the equatorial plane of the satellite is coincident with the plane of its orbit. The flattening is rated in the ratio of one to four.

A new type of war dirigible has been designed by Count von Moltke, nephew of the great field marshal. It is of the triple Zorn pattern, containing within a single framework three dirigibles, each fitted with its own motor. These can be separated in two minutes and as quickly reassembled. The net effective lifting power is over five tons. The idea of the inventor is that one of the dirigibles should be the chief, and the other two should be scouts.

The seismographical observatory at Georgetown University, frequently makes public reports of earthquakes in various parts of the world long before the government Weather Bureau.

F. TONDORF, S.J.

PULPIT, PRESS, AND PLATFORM

SOCIALISM AND THE CHURCH.

In an article on British politics and Ireland's relations to England, James Boyle directs the attention of the Forum's readers to a fact that has as much significance for the rest of the civilized world as for the United Kingdom.

This fact is the attitude of the Irish people toward Socialism—their intense dislike and fear of the advancing English, Scotch and Welsh Socialism.

"Ireland alone," says Mr. Boyle, "refuses to join the aggressive army led by Robert Blatchford and Keir Hardie."

Why is this? Mr. Boyle answers. It is because British Socialism's "ultimate aim" is that the state shall own all the means of production, including the land. And like all other Marxian Socialism—which is the only sort that counts nowadays—it takes an absolutely agnostic and even atheistic position toward all religion.

"It is known of all men," then remarks Mr. Boyle, "that the Catholic church is absolutely opposed to this doctrine." It is "known of all men who know," would be a more exact statement. At the same time it should be known of all men, not only in the United Kingdom, but also in the United States.

The writer of these lines happens to be a Protestant; so he cannot be accused of undue prejudice when he says that, in this united opposition of the Catholic church to the political atheism and atheistic politics of the Socialists, he finds one of the wisest, timeliest and most foresighted pieces of religious statesmanship and church policy that he has observed in modern times.

When he sees how some churches temporize with the pure materialism of the Socialists, how some ministers even offer sacrifices to this lion in their path, how many Christian laymen seek to compromise their creed with the naked atheism of the Socialist propaganda, the writer's mind reverts to that grand old hymn, "Onward, Christian Soldiers," and he marvels that, with the enemy in sight and defiant, so many "Christian soldiers" close their eyes, fold their arms, and, instead of accepting the Socialist challenge, counsel compromise and sometimes even surrender to the foe.

Like a mighty army
Moves the church of God!

In time this will be, must be, the movement of all Christian churches against Socialism. To-day the only church moving thus against the Socialists is the Catholic church.

Mr. Boyle does well to direct universal attention to this fact, and every man who has public responsibilities for the future—whether as statesman, teacher, administrator or mere leader of a hundred men—will do well to keep the fact in mind in considering the problems that meet him or surround him.—Editorial from the Chicago Inter-Ocean, October 7, 1910.

PERSONAL

The dignity of domestic prelate of the Papal household was conferred upon the Very Rev. Dr. Dennis J. Flynn, president of Mt. St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg, at the dedication of the new chapel on October 12. The announcement was made by his Eminence Cardinal Gibbons, who congratulated Mgr. Flynn on the well-merited honor conferred on him by the Holy Father. The news of the appointment came as a welcome surprise to the many clergymen present at the services and to the alumni, students and friends of the institution. Mgr. Flynn was born in Louisville in 1856, and was graduated from Mt. St. Mary's College in 1880, with the degree of master of arts. He labored in the sacred ministry first as curate in St. Mary's, and afterwards as pastor of St. Patrick's Church, Wilmington. In 1897 he received the degree of doctor of laws, and in 1899 joined the faculty of his alma mater. He became president of the institution in 1904. For the last year Mgr. Flynn has been seriously ill, and the administration of the college and seminary has devolved upon Father Bradley, the vice-president.

Very Reverend Patrick Murray, General of the Redemptorists, who has been making a visitation of the houses of his Congregation in the United States and Canada, is the first Redemptorist General to visit America. He is also the first Irishman elected to the office. Born in Donegal, 1865, he made his theological studies at Maynooth, whence he joined the Redemptorists, receiving the profession in 1889. In Ireland he was noted as a missionary, speaking with equal fluency in Gaelic and English. On three occasions he declined the honors of a bishopric, and at the General Chapter held in Rome May 1, 1909, was elected Superior General and Major-Rector of his Congregation. The tenure is for life. Having completed the visitation of the Redemptorist houses in New York and Brooklyn, Father Murray will depart for Europe November 1.

OBITUARY

On October 3, the Church in Mexico suffered a great loss by what seemed the untimely death of the Rt. Rev. Jaime Anegasti y Llamas, Bishop of Campeche. In the early sixties, the deceased prelate's parents withdrew from Mexico, on account of the disturbed state of public affairs, and established themselves in Spain, of which country his father was a native, and there their son was born on May 23, 1863. When he was nine years of age, the family returned to Mexico and took up anew its residence in Guadalajara, where Jaime distinguished himself for his conduct, application, and progress in study. At the age of seventeen, he began his seminary course and received tonsure and minor orders four years later. Immediately after his ordination to the priesthood in 1886, he devoted himself with the generosity of a noble soul to the care of a poor parish where his zeal not only revived the piety of the people but also called into being a refuge for the abandoned children of the town and vicinity. It was his custom to pay a weekly visit to the prisoners in the city jail, where his amiability made him welcome. Consecrated on December 5, 1909, he devoted the following day to his customary visit to the prison. He reached his see on January 6, 1910, and began at once a visitation of the diocese; but his zeal and bodily strength were no match for the miasmatic climate of Campeche. Towards the end of September, he developed symptoms of that plague of the Gulf coast, yellow fever, and succumbed within a week. Campeche has had four bishops, of whom two have died of yellow fever.

The Rev M. McDonnell, of the Winona diocese, died recently at the Sacred Heart Home, Mankato, Minn., after a long illness. He and Sister Mary Joseph were the first settlers thirty-five years ago in what is now Iona, Minn. They established an industrial school for boys, and without state aid took care of 75 destitute children, boys and girls. Fifteen years ago Father McDonnell became totally paralyzed. The saintly and devoted priest was formerly connected with the diocese of Buffalo.

Make Stained Glass Out of Plain Glass

By Using
Windowphanie

which is a thin, translucent material perfectly reproducing all the rich coloring of the most beautiful stained glass. Easily applied by anyone to ordinary windows. Costs very little. Many ecclesiastical designs are to be had—exact reproductions of famous church windows, appropriate for seminaries, churches, or Sunday schools; also conventional patterns for the home, hotel or store. Send for free samples and catalog showing borders, panels, centerpieces, and filling in colors.

D. MALZ, 19 E. 14th St., New York

The American Carlsbad Sanitarium

Hydrotherapy according to the celebrated Kneipp system applied in all forms and up-to-date methods. All diseases, acute and chronic, scientifically and successfully treated. Testimonials and references furnished. First class accommodations for patients.

The famous Devonian Mineral water in use, a strong, sulphurated, saline, calcareous and magnesium water, the counterpart of the German Carlsbad.

Rates reasonable. Investigation solicited.

For information apply to

The American Carlsbad Co., Lorain, O.

JUST OFF THE PRESSLife in the Shadow of Death

ART AND PURPOSE OF LIVING

By Rev. ANDREW KLARMANN, A.M.

Author of "The Princess of Gan-Sar," "The Trial of Jesus Christ Before Pilate," "The Crux of Pastoral Medicine," "Felix Aeternus," "Nizra," etc.

80, 184 pages, cloth, net, $1.00

This new book of Father Klarmann's treats with stunning address the

ART AND PURPOSE OF LIVING

From the very nature of the subject here discussed, the book contains nothing that could be said to be new in the sense "novel or sensational," but we neither wish nor look for novel views on the greatest and most important of all arts, that of understanding and conducting our course of life, and we would disdain to see anyone toy and tamper with the hallowed ethical traditions both of practical experience and of the School, the ancient treasures of the race, and to substitute for them his own untried and unripe inventions and experiments, as is so often done in this age of mental insecurity, anxiety and doubt, to the utter confusion of the public mind.

On the other hand, it is no small pleasure to have an old painting scoured by an expert hand, and hung in the light and made accessible to the gaze of the many and to the enjoyment of the willing.

This has been accomplished by the author in behalf of the manifold and obvious verities of the ethical code, and in a manner worthy of his reputation of wielding an exceedingly facile pen.

As to the bookmaker's art applied to the modest volume, it may be said without blushing that neither expense nor skill has been spared to make it as handy and pleasant a companion of an idle hour now and then as may be desired by any lover of both book and burthen.

PUBLISHED BY FREDERICK PUSTET & CO.

Printers to the Holy Apostolic See and Sacred Congregation of Rites

52 Barclay Street, New York Ratisbon, Rome 436 Main Street, Cincinnati

Mayer & Co.

OF MUNICH and LONDON

47 BARCLAY STREET NEW YORK

STAINED GLASSStatues*Stations of the Cross

IN view of the fact that cheap plaster casts of our Statues and Stations of the Cross are offered for sale by some unscrupulous firms, we call attention to a small stamped metal plate, which is affixed to the base of all genuine Mayer-Munich Statuary.

Correspondence Invited

Silverware Almost Free

Full size Rogers' heavy silver plate, table spoons, tea spoons, bouillon spoons, forks—hand-some rose pattern in French Gray finish. Free from advertising. To get them simply save the metal caps from jars of famous

LIEBIG

Company's Extract of Beef

Send us one cap and 10 cents and we'll send you a tea spoon or a bouillon spoon, post-paid—send one cap and 20 cents for a table spoon or a fork. Get as many of each as you like.

Cook Book, by Mrs. Rorer, sent Free on request. Address Dept. S, Cornelle David & Co., 9 North Moore St., New York.

HEADQUARTERS FOR THE CLERGY*PHOTOGRAPHY! High-Class Work at Reasonable Prices.

Cardinal Vannutelli—Exclusive and only sitting in U. S.

Copies for sale; also Cardinal Logue

E. F. FOLEY 164 FIFTH AVENUE
Bet. 21st and 22d Sts.

Appointments

'Phone, 5995 Gramercy

MENEELY BELL CO

TROY, N.Y. AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY

BELLS

Telephone Call, 5922 Barclay

THE S. T. SMITH CO.

Manufacturers of

Ink, Inked Ribbons, Carbon, Manifold and Typewriter Linen Papers

Diamond Brand Typewriter Supplies

11 BARCLAY STREET

NEW YORK

'Perfect' Warm Air Heaters

"Perfect" Cooking Ranges

and

Richardson's Steam and

Water Boilers

Give splendid satisfaction

THOUSANDS IN USE

Send for Catalogue

RICHARDSON & BOYNTON CO.

31 West 31st Street

Chicago NEW YORK Boston

Sacred Heart Sanitarium

FOR REST, QUIET, RECUPERATION AND HEALTH

Unsurpassed results obtained in Nervousness, Rheumatism, Heart and Stomach troubles. No surgical, hospital nor insanity cases taken. A delightful, homelike, restful place—ideal for all run down conditions. Hydrotherapy, Electricity, Massage, Zander Gymnasium, Sun parlor; Swimming pools, billiards, bowling, etc. Gaited saddle horses, large indoor riding pavilion; suspended running track connected by tunnel with bath department. 17-acre park.

A staff of five physicians give their exclusive services to the patients.

WRITE SISTER SUPERIOR FOR BOOKLET X. MILWAUKEE, WIS.

LIBRARY SUPPLIES

Adjustable Book Covers—Library Numbers Gummed and perforated always in stock—also alphabets of various sizes.

For sale by stationers or by

THE VAN EVEREN CO.
60 Ann Street - New York

The Book Covers are made of tough, strong paper and are inexpensive, efficient and easily put on

$250. Reward

A reward of Two Hundred and Fifty Dollars will be paid for the arrest and conviction of any junk dealer or other person guilty, under the provisions of Section 550 of the Penal Code of the State of New York, of criminally receiving any property belonging to this Company.

$50. Reward

Fifty Dollars Reward will be paid for the arrest and conviction of any person who maliciously injures or interferes with the lines of this Company.

NEW YORK TELEPHONE CO.
15 Dey St., New York

JOHN H. CAHILL,
May 1, 1908 Vice-Pres't & Gen'l Counsel

$1.00 WILL BRING POSTPAID one of our

Fine Gold Filled
5 year guaranteed
ROSARIES

In any color. Order through your jeweler or direct. Catalogue free.
Wm. Purnell Co.
Mfg. Jeweler
37 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

THE CATHOLIC MIND

A periodical published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month.

Each number contains an article of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style.

These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is: one at a time and the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

$1.00 a Year (24 numbers)

5 cents a number

SPECIAL OFFER

SCIENCE AND HER COUNTERFEIT. By Rev. J. Gerard, S.J.
LORD KELVIN AND THE EXISTENCE OF GOD. By H. V. Gill, S.J.
SOCIALISM AND CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. J. F. Hogan, D.D. (2 Nos.)
MEANINGS OF THE WORD SOCIALISM. By C. S. Devas, M.A.
IMPRACTICABILITY OF SOCIALISM. By C. S. Devas, M.A.
CATHOLICS AND THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT. By Rt. Rev. Mgr. Parkinson, D.D.
THE CHURCH—THE STRONG SAFEGUARD OF THE REPUBLIC. By Most Rev. Wm. H. O'Connell, D.D.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE. By Robert Hugh Benson.
THE DELUSION OF CHRISTIAN SCIENCE. By Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J.
THE DOCUMENTARY EXPOSE OF THE RUPTURE OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS BETWEEN THE HOLY SEE AND THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT. (2 Nos.)
THE CONCORDAT OF 1801. By D. Moncrieff O'Connor.
THE FRENCH SEPARATION BILL. (Text.) PRIMARY EDUCATION IN FRANCE.
THE GENIUS OF CARDINAL WISEMAN. By Wilfrid Ward.
THE MASS AND THE REFORMATION. By Rt. Rev. J. Canon Moyes, D.D.
THE ATTITUDE OF MODERN PROTESTANTS TOWARDS THE VIRGINITY OF OUR BLESSED LADY. By Rev. A. J. Maas, S.J.
EXHORTATION OF PIUS X TO THE CATHOLIC CLERGY.

SINGLE COPIES, 5 cents

100 COPIES—SPECIAL PRICE—$2.00

THE AMERICA PRESS

32 Washington Sq., West New York City

NOW READY

AMONG THE HURONS

VOLUME II OF

Pioneer Priests of North America

Tells the heroic story of de Brébeuf and His Associates

"This book is a striking illustration of the truth of Shakespeare's well-known words 'Men's good is oft interred with their bones.' . . . We cannot then but feel grateful to Father Campbell for what he has done to assure the fame of those glorious confessors and martyrs from a threatened obscurity. . . .

"Missionaries such as these have a special work in this day of weak faith and widespread disbelief; for the story of their lives, while it stimulates the one, is a living protest against the other. Father Campbell's theme is a great one, and he has dealt with it well. The clear and simple language in which he recounts the wonderful heroism of these truly wonderful men, is more impressive and convincing than any elaboration of style, and surely more in harmony with the quiet, simple characters of the men of whom he treats."—The Tablet, London.

By Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J.

480 Pages. With Index. 24 Illustrations.

PRICE, $2.00

VOLUME I

This extremely interesting book consists of a series of 18 monographs of the missionaries who labored among the Iroquois Indians. Beginning with the life of Jogues in 1642, they continue up to 1710, when the Indians, just before their annihilation, passed over from French to English control.

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS:

"For lovers of history and biography, of the adventurous, the heroic, and the saintly, there is much to attract the attention in this volume of over 800 large, clearly printed pages."—The Sacred Heart Review.

"The adventures of most of the missionaries read like romances."—The New York Herald.

"One of the most interesting Catholic books we have ever read."—The Monitor (San Francisco).

Price, $1.60, postage prepaid

THE AMERICA PRESS 32 Washington Sq. W.
NEW YORK

CLEANLINESS OF OPERATION

Is one of the strong features that has helped to earn the present world-wide reputation and endorsement of the DAUS' IMPROVED TIP TOP DUPLICATOR. No printers' ink used thus avoiding soiled hands and clothing. No expensive supplies, too copies from pen-written and 100 copies from type-written original.

SENT ON TEN DAYS' TRIAL. WITHOUT DEPOSIT. Complete duplicator, cap size (prints 8 3/4 x 13 in.), contains 16 ft. of rolled printing surface which can be used over and over again. Price, $7.50, less special discount 33 1/3 per cent net $5. The Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co., Daus Bldg., 111 John Street, New York.

ATTENTION OF PASTORS!Catholic Mind Pamphlet*Holy Communion for Children

DECREE OF THE SACRED CONGREGATION OF SACRAMENTAL DISCIPLINE ON THE AGE OF THOSE TO BE ADMITTED TO RECEIVE FIRST HOLY COMMUNION

In envelopes ready for distribution
$4.00 per hundred. 5c each

THE AMERICA PRESS 32 Washington Square, W.
NEW YORK

HIGGINS'

DRAWING INKS
ETERNAL WRITING INK
ENGROSSING INK
TAURINE MUCILAGE
PHOTO MOUNTER PASTE
DRAWING BOARD PASTE
LIQUID PASTE
OFFICE PASTE
VEGETABLE GLUE, ETC.

Are the Finest and Best
Inks and Adhesives

For School, Home and Business Use

Emancipate yourselves from the use of corrosive and ill-smelling inks and adhesives and adopt the Higgins' Inks and Adhesives. They will be a revelation to you, they are so sweet, clean, well put up and withal so efficient.

At Dealers Generally

271 Ninth St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

Branches: Chicago, London

CHAS. M. HIGGINS & CO., Mfrs.

FINN BROTHERS

Manufacturers of

Roll Top Desks

STORE and OFFICE FIXTURES
Counters, Shelvings,
Partitions, Etc.

Estimates and Designs Furnished

Office 358 BROADWAY Salesrooms

59-65 FRANKLIN ST., NEW YORK

Telephones, 4855-4856 Franklin

Factory: 112-114 LEROY STREET

Telephone Connection

COWARD IDEALS

Comfort Quality

Style Constancy

Service Economy

BY ELBERT HUBBARD

This year, as in years past, I held a Convention here in East Aurora for men rated 'way up by the Advertising Profession. To one man I sent a very Special invitation. I pictured to him the Joys of the Weeding Party, and the Sport and Exercise to be had at the Woodpile. Discreetly, I suggested the Early Morning Milking Bee with Ali Baba.

The Man's name was James S. Coward.

Shortly I received his regrets. He could n't come.

And the Reason he gave was so peculiar, so near to my own sympathies, that I remembered it—remembered it word for word. And now I give it to you:

"The people put me here forty-seven years ago, in this same Old Spot, as a boy, fifteen years of age, and I never had a Journey of over one and a half days away from the Shop. The Other Fellow may have had a good time, but I am having a better one. I am making Coward Shoes."

In this day and age, when the almost accepted way to take a Vacation is to throw down your pen or sledge or shears or chisel, and hie away to the giddy whirl!—I bowed my head over James Coward's Note.

Then, for the First Time, I grasped the full meaning, the symbolism of Coward Shoes.

Lest you overlook it, friend, I want to write me here that this Loyalty to Craft is the same that moved the Mallet of Michelangelo and held Leonardo da Vinci to his Brush.

Can you doubt the Coward Shoe, made by a man who has worked his work, been Loyalty to his Ideals for forty-seven years? I can not—and I wear them.

¶ James S. Coward has one Store—but His Shoes are sent 'round the World!

¶ At the last, this may not be an advertisement, but it is the word of my Heart.

The Coward Shoe

FOR MEN, WOMEN AND CHILDREN

You Folks who have never been quite foot-suited should write to Coward for His Little Book, picturing the Coward Family.

Some Coward "Special" Shoes

The Coward Good-Sense Shoe (made especially for tender feet)
The Coward Straigh -Last Shoe (for slim, straight, slender feet)
The Coward Bunion Shoe The Coward Arch-Support Shoe
The Coward Corn-Room Shoe The Coward Orthopedic Shoe

JAMES S. COWARD

264-274 Greenwich St., N. Y. (Near Warren Street)

SOLD NOWHERE ELSE

Mail Orders Filled

Send for Catalog

Catholic Mind Pamphlet on "THE EUCHARISTIC CONGRESS AT MONTREAL"

5c Each, $4.00 per Hundred

The America Press, 32 Washington Square, West, New York

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF HENRY VAN RENSSELAER

Priest of the Society of Jesus

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF A WELL-KNOWN AND MUCH-BELOVED PRIEST
By Edward P. Spillane, S.J.

The volume is enriched with a fine photogravure portrait of Father Van Rensselaer, and with many other interesting illustrations.

Price, $1.00. By mail, 10 cents extra

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Square, W., New York

PRINTING OF EVERY DESCRIPTION
FOR Churches and Schools

Periodical Publications
Catalogues Programs
Stationery Etc., etc.

THE MEANY PRINTING CO.
8th Avenue, Cor. 11th St., NEW YORK

FREE SCHOLARSHIPS AT THE Leading Catholic Colleges Board and Tuition

Creighton University, Omaha, Neb.
Fordham University, New York, N. Y.
Georgetown University, Washington, D. C.
Niagara University, Niagara Falls, N. Y.

Notre Dame University, Notre Dame, Ind.
St. John's University, Collegeville, Minn.
University of Ottawa, Ottawa, Can.
University of St. Francis Xavier's College, Antigonish, Nova Scotia.

* * *

All Hallows College, Salt Lake City, Utah.
Columbus College, Chamberlain, S. Dak.
Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass.
Holy Trinity College, Dallas, Tex.
Sacred Heart College, Denver, Colo.
Sacred Heart College, Sacred Heart, Okla.
Seton Hall College, South Orange, N. J.

St. Ambrose College, Davenport, Iowa.
St. Bonaventure's College, Allegany, N. Y.
St. Joseph's College, Dubuque, Iowa.
St. Michael's College, Burlington, Vt.
St. Viateur's College, Bourbonnais, Ill.
St. Vincent's College, Beatty, Pa.
St. Charles College, Ellicott City, Md.

Tuition Only

Catholic University of America, Washington, D. C.
Benedictine College, Savannah, Ga.
Boston College, Boston, Mass.
Brooklyn College, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Canisius College, Buffalo, N. Y.
Christian Brothers' College, Memphis, Tenn.
Loyola College, Baltimore, Md.
Marist College, Atlanta, Ga.
Sacred Heart College, Prairie du Chien, Wis.
Sacred Heart College, Augusta, Ga.

St. Francis Xavier's College, New York, N. Y.
St. Mary's University, Galveston, Texas.
St. Ignatius College, Cleveland, Ohio.
St. John's College, Brooklyn, N. Y.
St. John Berchman's College, Toledo, Ohio.
Fordham University Law School, New York, N. Y.
Fordham University Medical School.
Georgetown University Law School, Washington, D. C.
Georgetown University Medical School.
St. Louis University Law School, St. Louis, Mo.

PREPARATORY SCHOOLS (Board and Tuition)

St. Ann's Academy, New York, N. Y.

St. John's Preparatory College, Danvers, Mass.

COLLEGES FOR YOUNG LADIES (Board and Tuition)

COLLEGE OF NEW ROCHELLE, New Rochelle, N. Y. MOUNT ST. JOSEPH'S COLLEGE, Dubuque, Iowa.
ST. MARY'S COLLEGE, Notre Dame, Ind.

N. B.—Other Colleges and Schools will be announced later.

These Scholarships may be obtained by securing subscriptions for AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week.

For further particulars address

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Square, West,
New York, N. Y.

ST. JOSEPH'S SANATORIUM

Silver City, New Mexico

Conducted by the Sisters of Mercy

A THOROUGHLY equipped institution for the treatment of all suitable cases of tuberculosis. Each room has two wide connecting porches, electric lights and all modern conveniences. Infirmary for febrile cases, also cottages for those desiring them. Trained nurses and resident physician in constant attendance. Climatic conditions ideal: cool summers and moderate winters. Annual precipitation 12 inches, with only 32 cloudy days. Altitude, 6,000 feet. All ethical lines of treatment, including tuberculin in suitable cases.

For Catalogue and particulars address either Sister Superior or Oliver T. Hyde, M.D., Medical Director.

Just Published

Three Historical Events in Maine

BY THE

REV. T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

Single Copies 15 cents

100 Copies $10.00

THE AMERICA PRESS 32 Washington Sq. W.
NEW YORK

INTERCHANGEABLE CARRIAGE?

Yes,

And best of all it takes but a few seconds to do it

It isn't necessary to send for a mechanic to come and file and fit and make a repair shop of your office; you or anybody can make the change, it's so simple.

If you are doing several copies of manifold work on the Victor and somebody wants a hurry message written, just stop where you are, slip out the carriage with manifold work, replace it with another carriage and you are ready for business.

Remember it takes but a few seconds to make the change.

VICTOR TYPEWRITER COMPANY
812 & 814 Greenwich St., New York

That Cold Room

on the side of the house where winter blasts strike hardest always has a lower temperature than the rest of the house. There are times when it is necessary to raise the temperature quickly or to keep the temperature up for a long period. That can't be done by the regular method of heating without great trouble and overheating the rest of the house. The only reliable method of heating such a room alone by other means is to use a

PERFECTION
SMOKELESS
OIL HEATER

Absolutely smokeless and odorless

which can be kept at full or low heat for a short or long time.

Four quarts of oil will give a glowing heat for nine hours, without smoke or smell.

An indicator always shows the amount of oil in the font. Filler-cap does not screw on; but is put in like a cork in a bottle, and is attached by a chain and cannot get lost.

An automatic-locking flame spreader prevents the wick from being turned high enough to smoke, and is easy to remove and drop back so that it can be cleaned in an instant.

The burner body or gallery cannot become wedged, and can be unscrewed in an instant for rewicking. Finished in Japan or nickel, strong, durable, well-made, built for service, and yet light and ornamental. Has a cool handle.

Dealers Everywhere. If not at yours, write for descriptive circular to the nearest agency of the

Standard Oil Company

(Incorporated)

F. JAMES REILLY
President

WM. F. REILLY
Manager

JAMES REILLY'S SONS' CO.

• General Electrical Repairs •

122-130 CENTRE STREET

Corner White Street

Telephone 881 Franklin

NEW YORK

INSTITUTION LINEN

of all kinds, also Sheets and Pillow Cases, Blankets, Bed Spreads, etc., etc

WRITE for SAMPLES and PRICES

H. W. BAKER LINEN CO. Dept. "K"
41 WORTH ST.
Importers and Manufacturers NEW YORK CITY

Mullins & Sons

78, 80, 82, 84 Myrtle Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

121-125 Newark Avenue, Jersey City, N. J.

218-220 Market Street, Newark, N. J.

Housefurnishings of Quality

Furniture, Pianos, Carpets, Rugs, Sewing-machines, China, Art Work, Gunn Sectional Book Cases, Arts and Crafts Furniture. Absolutely the finest displays in the East. Unequaled in quality and lowest prices.

$1.00 A WEEK FURNISHES THE HOME

DIRECTORY OF COLLEGES AND ACADEMIES

Georgetown University WASHINGTON, D. C.

Directory for Catalogues or Information

The College (Graduates and Undergraduate Schools)
The Registrar, 37th & O Sts., N. W.

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E. St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Joseph Himmel, S.J., President

LADYCLIFF

On the Hudson (Adjoining West Point)
Young Ladies' Academy

A department for small boys. Education thorough and practical. Location beautiful and convenient. Terms moderate. Send for prospectus. Address Sister Superior, Ladycliff, Highland Falls, N. Y.

New York State Regents' Examinations.

Academy of St. Joseph

In-the-Pines

BRENTWOOD, N. Y.

A Boarding School for Young Ladies,

Affiliated with the State University

PROSPECTUS EXPLAINS THE TERMS, ETC.

St. Mary's College

St. Marys, Kansas

BOARDING COLLEGE
Under the Jesuit Fathers

Two Courses of Study:
Classical and Commercial

For Catalogue, send to
REV. ALOYSIUS A. BREEN, S.J., President.

ACADEMY OF THE HOLY FAMILY

BALTIC, CONNECTICUT

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity

PREPARATORY, COMMERCIAL AND ACADEMIC COURSES

Prospectus explains terms, etc.

Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

Convent of the Holy Child

SHARON HILL, DELAWARE COUNTY, PA.
15 Minutes from Philadelphia

ACADEMY FOR YOUNG LADIES

Highest English Course. French, Drawing, Music by Certified Teachers. Preparation for foreign travel. As the numbers are limited, special care can be given to the formation of character and training of each child.
Address Mother Superior

COLLEGE OF ST. ELIZABETH

CONVENT STATION,
Near Morristown, N. J.

One hour from New York City.

A Catholic Institution for the Higher Education of Women

COLLEGE Four years' course leading to the degrees of B. A. and B. S.

SCHOOL OF PEDAGOGY

Required for entrance two years of College work

SCHOOL OF MUSIC. COURSE LEADING TO THE DEGREE OF B. M.

ACADEMY A High School Course of Four Years. Full College Preparatory Work. GRAMMAR AND PRIMARY DEPARTMENTS SEPARATE

REGISTERED

By the New Jersey State Board of Education and the University of the State of New York

Apply for Year Book to The Secretary

MT. ST. JOSEPH ON THE WISSAHICKON

For illustrated catalogue address MOTHER

CATHOLIC COLLEGE FOR WOMEN situated in the romantic Valley of the Wissahickon. Degrees conferred. Also Academic, Commercial, Intermediate and Elementary Departments. Very special advantages in Music and Art. The piano student possesses superior opportunities in the use of the Virgil Clavier Method pursued throughout the course. The Art Studio is admirably equipped, and every attention is given to the study of Art, both in theory and practice. Gymnasium perfectly equipped. Outdoor exercise, tennis, basket ball, fencing, etc.

SUPERIOR, Chestnut Hill, Philadelphia, Pa.

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE

WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Collegiate and Preparatory Departments

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $260 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra. Send for catalogue to REV. THOMAS E. MURPHY, S.J., President

Seton Hall College

FOUNDED 1856

South Orange, New Jersey

COLLEGE AND HIGH SCHOOL

Bayley Hall for Students of Grammar Course

FOR CATALOGUE ADDRESS
Very Rev. James F. Mooney, D.D., Pres.

"OUR LADY OF PEACE" RESIDENCE FOR LADIES

225-227 WEST 14th STREET, NEW YORK CITY

THE important residential institution under the management of the religious order of Jesus-Mary is now open to receive guests. This institution responds to a great need in our metropolis. 170 rooms at $8 to $12 per week are ready to accommodate ladies in the literary profession, retired teachers, stenographers, students and others desirous of a peaceful abode. All the rooms are cheerful, well heated, and furnished to give comfort to each one. Library, music room, large roof garden, sun parlor add to the enjoyment of the boarders.

The atmosphere of the house is homelike and attractive. Special price for suites.

School of music will open September 1st, 1910. Private courses in French for ladies and children also begin at same date. For further information, apply to MOTHER SUPERIOR.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

ADJOINING BRONX PARK, NEW YORK CITY

College and High School

ST. JOHN'S HALL, FOR SMALLER BOYS

The location affords the healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city

MEDICAL SCHOOL
in connection with Fordham Hospital

WRITE FOR CATALOGUE

LAW SCHOOL
at 20 Vesey St.
in the midst of the courts

COLLEGE OF ST. CATHERINE, ST. PAUL, MINN.

A CATHOLIC COLLEGE FOR GIRLS

Accredited by the Minnesota State Board of Public Instruction and by several prominent Universities.

SEVENTY ACRE CAMPUS.

FIREPROOF BUILDINGS

COMPLETE COURSES
IN THESE DEPARTMENTS

THE COLLEGIATE, leading to the degree of Bachelor of Arts.
THE ACADEMIC OR COLLEGE PREPARATORY. MUSIC
AND PAINTING in their various branches. DOMESTIC ART,
HOUSEHOLD SCIENCE AND COOKING.

YEAR BOOK FORWARDED ON APPLICATION, Address: THE SECRETARY

SPRING HILL COLLEGE

FOUNDED 1830 Spring Hill, Mobile Co., Ala. CHARTERED 1836

BOARDING COLLEGE CONDUCTED BY THE JESUIT FATHERS

Just the School for boys who wish to escape the rigors of the Northern climate. Mean temperature of the winter months, 52 degrees Fahrenheit.

HEALTHY LOCATION—EVERY CONVENIENCE OF A MODERN COLLEGE

CURRICULUM INCLUDES THE PREPARATORY, HIGH SCHOOL AND COLLEGE COURSES. DEGREES CONFERRED

Write for Catalogue to Rev. F. X. Twellmeyer, S. J., President

DIRECTORY OF COLLEGES AND ACADEMIES

ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS

COLLEGE FOR YOUNG WOMEN (TWO HOURS FROM INDIANAPOLIS)

FOUNDED IN 1840; INCORPORATED IN 1846. EMPOWERED TO CONFER COLLEGIATE DEGREES.
 Four Years' College Course. Academic and Grammar Departments. Elective Courses for Special Students. Conservatory of Music, with Vocal, Piano, Harp, Violin, Pipe Organ, etc.
 Oil and Ceramic and Water-color Studios. Modern languages by native teachers. New Gymnasium, with Natatorium, Running Track, Bowling, Basket Ball, etc., directed by a graduate of Dr. Sargent's school of Physical Training. Out-of-Door Sports—Horseback Riding, Boating, Archery, Golf, Tennis. For Catalogue and Illustrated Booklet,
 Address . . . SISTER SECRETARY . . . Box 70 . . . St. Mary-of-the-Woods, . . . Vigo County, Indiana

BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL Holy Cross Academy and High School

FOR GIRLS : : : 53d YEAR
 Conducted by the Sisters of Charity
 343-349 West 42d Street and 340-350 West 43d Street, New York City

Registered by the New York State Educational Department.
 Students prepared for College and the New York Training School for Teachers
 Preparatory Department for Young Children
 BOARDING SCHOOL FOR BOYS UNDER TWELVE YEARS

THE SISTERS OF CHARITY

Mount Saint Vincent-on-Hudson, New York City

ANNOUNCE THE OPENING OF

COLLEGE COURSES FOR WOMEN

Leading to Degrees, B. A. and B. S. Freshman and Sophomore Classes
 SEPTEMBER, 1910

Junior and Senior Classes to follow. Professors of distinction.

Equipment of the best.

Location healthful, convenient, one half hour from Grand Central Station.

DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS

Fall term begins September 29th, 1910. Write for Prospectus

Boarding & Day School HOLY ANGELS FORT LEE, New Jersey

CONDUCTED BY SCHOOL SISTERS OF NOTRE DAME
 Location beautiful, healthy and convenient.
 New Buildings. Large Gymnasium.
 Departments—Academic course of 4 years;
 Commercial course of 3 years; Grammar and Primary Departments separate.
 Special advantages in Music and Art.

FOR YEAR BOOK ADDRESS SECRETARY.

Laurel Hall School

184-186 Brooklyn Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Kindergarten, Elementary, High School
 and Culture Course.

Private Classes formed in French,
 German and Spanish

Expression and Gymnastic Dancing
 Tutoring in all branches by competent teachers.

Catalogues sent on application LAURA L. HOPPER, Principal

The Winona Seminary, Winona, Minnesota

JUNIOR COLLEGE : : : : FOR YOUNG WOMEN

Conducted by the Sisters of St. Francis

LITERARY DEPARTMENT: Collegiate Course leading to degree. ACADEMIC COURSES:
 Classical, Latin, Scientific, Modern Language.
 Accredited to the University of Minnesota.

DEPARTMENTS of Dramatic Expression, Art,
 Household Economics. Home life of the Student is ideal. Indoor and Outdoor Athletics.
 Literary, Musical, Dramatic Societies.

Conservatory of Music: Piano, Voice, Violin, Organ, Harp

CATALOGUE, BOOKLET OF INFORMATION, DEPARTMENT BULLETINS, MAILED ON APPLICATION

BOUND VOLUMES OF AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW
 OF THE WEEK

SIX MONTHS TO A VOLUME

$3.50

The AMERICA Press, 32 Washington Sq. W., New York

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

A RETREAT

WILL BE GIVEN AT

The Convent of the Cenacle

NEWPORT, R. I.

From Saturday evening, Nov. 5th,
 to Wednesday morning, Nov. 9th

Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

Mount St. Joseph Academy

2064 Main Street, Buffalo, N. Y.

FOR YOUNG LADIES

Delightfully situated
 Thoroughly Equipped New Building
 Chartered under State Board

Terms, $250 per year

Also Separate School for Young Boys

HELEN AUGUSTA HAYES

VOCAL INSTRUCTOR

342 West 55th Street, New York

OLD POINT COMFORT COLLEGE FOR BOYS
 Military, Academic, Commercial and Preparatory courses. Write for catalogue.
 BRO. MARCELLUS, Director,
 Fort Monroe, Va.

ST. JOHN'S PREPARATORY COLLEGE

DANVERS, MASS.

SELECT HIGH SCHOOL conducted by the XAVIERIAN BROTHERS
 Classical, Scientific and Commercial Courses
 Ideal Location All New Buildings
 New Equipment Competent Instructors
 Develops the Whole Boy

Send for Catalogue

Brother Benjamin, Director

IMMACULATA SEMINARY

MOUNT MARIAN, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Situated in the suburbs. Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of St. Mary-of-the-Woods.
 Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Conservatory methods in Music. Oil and Ceramic and Water-color Studios. Abundant out-door exercise. Sightseeing with experienced chaperons.

For Year Book address, Sister Secretary

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER"
 AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week
 32 Washington Square, West, New York City

Good Agents Wanted

WRITE TO

CIRCULATION BUREAU
 THE AMERICA PRESS

32 Washington Square W. New York

Pilgrim Walks in Rome

A GUIDE TO THE HOLY PLACES
 IN ROME AND ITS VICINITY

By P. J. CHANDLER, S.J.

Third edition enlarged $1.60, Postpaid

THE AMERICA PRESS

32 Washington Sq. W. New York

NOW READY
MARY ALOYSIA HARDEY

RELIGIOUS OF THE SACRED HEART

1809-1886

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY
THE REV. T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

440 Pages 16 Illustrations With Index

The Life Story of a Remarkable Woman

PRICE, TWO DOLLARS

By Mail 20 cents extra

"Had the Life of Mother Hardey not been published it would have been a positive loss for the history of the Catholic Church in the United States, where for more than fifty years she was such a conspicuous figure. Her biographer completed the work several years ago, but it was only after reiterated entreaties and expostulations that the manuscript was finally put into the hands of the printer."—From the Introduction.

Advance orders will receive prompt attention.

The America Press 32 Washington Square, W.
NEW YORK, N. Y.

Andros & Ephesus

A Fascinating Story of Early Christianity

BY THE

Rev. J. E. COPUS, S.J.

Author of "The Son of Siro," "As Gold in the Furnace," "Shadows Lifted," etc., etc.

With three beautiful illustrations by

A. J. VAN LESHOUT.

Attractively bound, with striking cover design

Postpaid $1.25

A splendid story, bringing out in sharp contrast the strength and simplicity of early Christianity and the empty glitter and magnificence of the worship of Diana, the Goddess of the Ephesians, with its riotous festivals and ceremonies. Through the novel runs the story of the love of the rich young Ephesian, Andros, for the beautiful Lydda, the daughter of a Roman General. Love, hate and rivalry, Christianity and paganism clash to a happy and satisfactory ending. A well-written, beautifully illustrated story of absorbing interest. Fr. Copus' latest and best work.

At all Book Stores or from the Publishers.

The M. H. Wiltzius Co.

413-417 Broadway
Milwaukee

7 Barclay St
New York

READY!

BY

READY!

RENÉ BAZIN

"France's premier novelist," says THE SAN FRANCISCO MONITOR, "and in the minds of many the greatest Catholic writer living."

The Barrier

(La Barrière)

Says AMERICA:—

"It is a charming tale, artistic and sincere, and vital with the breath of modern life. . . .

"The heroine of 'The Barrier' represents a lovely type of Catholic young womanhood. It has character to meet trials bravely, to face the blank dreariness of renunciation with the hope in the heart and a holy confidence, never disappointed, of ultimate peace and happiness. Such women have made the saints and the mothers of saints in the history of the Church."

$1.00 Net: Postpaid, $1.10

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, 153 Fifth Avenue, New York

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Vol. IV, No. 3

(Price 10 Cents)

OCTOBER 29, 1910

($3.00 a year)

Whole No. 81

CHRONICLE

Events in Portugal—Father Espinouze's Story—Panama Libel Case—Aerial Voyages—Census Frauds Discovered—New York Central Development—Canada—Great Britain—Ireland—France—Centenary of Berlin's University, 49-52

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

What Portugal Looks Like—The Catholic Church the Foe of Education?—Stone for Bread—A Russian Irishman53-59

IN MISSION FIELDS

Bagdad's School for the Blind—Speaking of Post Cards59

CORRESPONDENCE

Vitality of the Catholic Spirit in Spain—Catholic Schools in British Guiana60-61

EDITORIAL

A Portuguese Prelate Speaks—The Cardinal and the Children—Anglican Misrepresentation—Columbus Day and Puritans—Don Jaime on Canalejas—Another Trent Affair—Berlin Catholics Rebuke Mayor Nathan62-65

SATURDAY AFTERNOON66-67

LITERATURE

The Life of an Enclosed Nun—Lectures on the History of Religions—One Christmas Eve at Roxbury Crossing and Other Christmas Tales—Round the World—Footsteps in the Ward—Argentina—The Life of Blessed John Eudes—Traité Des Scruples—Direction pour rassurer dans leurs doutes les âmes timorées—Direction pratique et morale pour vivre chrétiennement—Books Received67-69

EDUCATION

Teaching Morality in the Public Schools—Knights of Columbus found College Scholarships70

SOCIOLOGY

The Anglican Church Congress on Social Questions—The American Gaelic Alliance70

ECONOMICS

Water Supply for Los Angeles, Cal.—Our Imports from the Tropics70

ECCELESIASTICAL ITEMS

Belmont, North Carolina, Made a Cathedral Abbey—Catholic Progress in South Carolina—Ninth National Convention of the American Federation of Catholic Societies—See of Natchitoches, La., Transferred to Alexandria71

PERSONAL

Congressman Kahn Advocates Statue of Father Serra for National Capitol71

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

New Orleans Picayune on the Republican Platform in Portugal—Woodrow Wilson on the Democracy of the Catholic Church71-72

SCIENCE

Work of the Manila Observatory Commended by Secretary of War Dickinson—The Observatory of Ebro, Spain—Father Hagen's Observations of Variable Stars—Woven-wire Masts on Battleships Unserviceable72

OBITUARY

Peter A. Cassidy—Rev. Louis L'Etourneau, C.S.C.72

CHRONICLE

Events in Portugal.—Upon the assembling of the Cortes of the kingdom on September 27, the opponents of the coalition ministry were conspicuously absent. In the speech from the throne, King Manuel outlined the policy of the cabinet as, among other things, aimed at the religious Orders and their effective (sic) control. Plans had been made to proclaim the republic on September 23, seize the king, force him to sign a renunciation of the crown and embark for some foreign country. The plot was revealed to the authorities, who took such measures to thwart it that action was postponed. The death of Professor Bombarda, at the hands of a crazy man, whom he had been treating, precipitated the outbreak. On October 2, when the king was presiding at a banquet, with which he had honored President-elect Hermes da Fonseca, of Brazil, two ships of the navy opened fire on the royal palace. The courtiers, counselors and nobles, who were present at the banquet, were thrown into a panic. They fled and left the king to shift for himself. He telephoned to the barracks for troops to keep the insurgents at bay, but there was no response. On October 4, the king was asked to place himself at the head of a body of troops that had remained loyal, but he declined to set one part of the army against the other. Rather than occasion bloodshed, he slipped away with the other members of the royal family to Gibraltar, where he was received in a manner becoming his rank. He will reside in England. A decree of exile has been pronounced against all the members of the royal family.

President Braga, the head of the new government, published a "fundamental decree" on October 8. Article 2 revives the decree of August 28, 1767, condemning the Jesuits to expulsion from Portuguese territory. Article 3, renewing the decree of May 28, 1834, suppresses throughout Portuguese territory all convents, monasteries, hospices and religious establishments of every kind. Article 8 directs that the goods of the religious be immediately placed under seal after being listed and appraised. The property of the Jesuits will be sequestered by the republic; that of the other institutes will be dealt with later, according to arrangements to be made between the republic and the Church. On October 10, occurred the funeral of Admiral Candido dos Reis, who had taken part in the revolution and had committed suicide in the persuasion that it had been crushed. The sacking of convents began on Monday, October 3, with the usual scenes of ribaldry, profanation and murder. Among those murdered were the Superior of the French Lazarists and Father Fragues, confessor of the Queen mother. Father Espinouze, also a Lazarist, disguised himself and effected his escape.

In most of the Portuguese colonies the proclamation of the republic was received with enthusiasm, and the republican flag of red and green was at once flung to the breeze, thus showing that it had been held in readiness.

President Braga announced a complete cabinet, but discord has entered its counsels. The most striking feature of the revolution was the large number of officers and men of the army and navy that took part in the plot.

The refusal on the part of the troops that effected the revolution to accept a prolonged furlough as offered by the provisional government, bodes ill for its peaceful permanence. The salary of Bishop Leite de Vasconcellos, of Beja, has been stopped, because he left his diocese without the necessary government permission.

Father Espinouze's Story.—On Wednesday, October 12, Father Espinouze, the Lazarist who escaped from the house of his Congregation in Lisbon, gave the following description of the events which came swiftly upon the heels of the proclamation of the republic: "It has been reported that the scenes of fury and anti-clerical hate and in particular the attack upon the convents were provoked by shots fired at the mob by the religious, and that on entering the convents fire-arms in greater or smaller number were found. It is an infamous calumny. Not to speak of anybody but ourselves, there was in the Lazarist residence of Arroios only one revolver with about sixty cartridges. That revolver and about half the cartridges I had brought with me from France a year ago. On entering the house, after killing the superior and Father Fragues, the rioters must have found about thirty cartridges, but no weapons, for I carried away with me the revolver and the other cartridges. It has been asserted that the attack on the religious houses was made on the spur of the moment and by separate bands. It is not true. There was a general movement directed and planned beforehand by a number of leaders. Throughout the city and at about the same hour, squads composed of soldiers, civilians and women surrounded all the convents. In every case the attack was made in the same way. I left our residence at about one o'clock in the afternoon of Monday, October 3, to find a retreat for our Fathers and clerical students; the rioters began to gather before three. They wished to prevent the escape of anyone, for they spread out while still at a distance and approached slowly. It was about six o'clock when they had gathered close to the house and began, soldiers, civilians and women, to fire at all the windows, while some wretches were cutting their way through the door. This done, they called for the superiors, Fathers Barros-Gomes, the local superior, and Fragues, the visitor. As soon as they appeared and before they had spoken a word, both were shot. From Wednesday afternoon until Saturday, the assassins were on my trail. Several times I changed my hiding-place, spending part of the time in a sewer; but Saturday evening, a cowherd gave me a wretched suit of clothes, put a Republican cockade in my buttonhole, and said good-bye to me at the door of his stable, which had been my last place of concealment. I went boldly through the city to the railway station, although more than once I thought that I had taken my last step. While on the way, I saw a crowd of men and women, the latter wearing liberty caps and carrying guns, in the act of driving some religious toward the Republican camp. There they were held as hostages. When I was buying my ticket, I feared that someone who knew me might penetrate my disguise, but the train started off and I felt reassured. At the frontier, I breathed freely, for I was in Spain. When the officers of the custom house asked me about my baggage, I told them that all I had was on me, and I was thankful that I had so much. What I shall never forget is the howling of that Lisbon mob as it went surging through the streets."

Panama Libel Case.—Briefs were filed in the Supreme Court of the United States on October 21, in what is termed the Panama libel case. It will be recalled that former President Roosevelt ordered the Department of Justice to proceed against the publishers of the New York World for giving currency to the charges that there was a syndicate of Americans, including Charles P. Taft, brother of the President, and Douglas Robinson, brother-in-law of former President Roosevelt, who received some of the $40,000,000 which the United States paid to the French company for the canal property and that the Administration at Washington was cognizant of and had supported the plans for the revolution in Panama as a result of which the present Republic of Panama seceded from the Republic of Columbia. Under orders from Mr. Roosevelt the Attorney-General instituted criminal proceedings in the courts of the District of Columbia against both the World and the Indianapolis News, the latter for re-printing the article from the World. An attempt to have the defendants removed from their homes to the District of Columbia for trial failed owing to an adverse decision of United States Circuit Judge Anderson. Because of the fact that the Press Publishing Company (the corporation owning the World) circulated copies upon the reservation at West Point, libel proceedings were then brought into the Federal courts. The case was tried before Judge Hough in January, 1910. Delancey Nicoll, counsel for the World, moved to quash the indictment on the ground that the Court had no jurisdiction in the case, and the Judge disposed of the case under that motion. On February 26, last, the Government entered an appeal and it is the subject of this appeal which is now the substantial question before the Supreme Court.

Aerial Voyagers.—Since Andrée's ill-fated attempt, in 1897, to reach the north pole by balloon no aerial enterprise has displayed more daring than that undertaken in Atlantic City, N. J., October 15, by Mr. Walter Wellman in an attempt to cross the Atlantic Ocean. Accompanied by an engineer and a crew of four men, Mr. Wellman ascended in the dirigible balloon America, skirted the coast in a northeasterly direction to a point off Nantucket, where he encountered adverse winds which drove him south and west. After remaining in the air for seventy-one hours and establishing a new record of 1,000 miles for dirigibles, the America was abandoned at sea at a point 375 miles off Norfolk, Va., and 250 miles northwest of Bermuda, where all the members of her crew were rescued by the British Mailship Trent.

The fifth international balloon race for the James Gordon Bennett Cup and $4,750 in prizes was started on October 17, when ten large airships, representing four different nations, ascended from St. Louis, Mo. The longest flight recorded is that accomplished by the German balloon Dusseldorf II, which landed at Kiskisink, Quebec, about 1,100 miles from the starting point. The fate of two New York aeronauts who sailed away in the America II is a matter of conjecture. It is believed that their balloon descended in the Canadian wilderness of the Northern Quebec Province.

Census Frauds Discovered.—Suspecting the returns of the new census which showed an enormous growth for a number of western cities, E. Dana Durand, the Director of the Census Bureau, ordered an investigation, the results of which appeared in an announcement that gross frauds had been perpetrated. A letter from President Taft to Mr. Durand directs that persons implicated in the frauds be prosecuted. Cities specifically mentioned as being affected by the false returns are Tacoma, Seattle and Aberdeen, Wash.; Portland, Ore.; Minneapolis, Minn.; Boise, Ida., and Fort Smith, Ark., but it is stated that there are many others. The result of a second enumeration of Tacoma gives that city a population of 82,972, an increase of 45,258 or an increase of 120 per cent, over the population of 1900. The first figures given for Tacoma were 116,268, which would have meant a further addition of 40 per cent. The discovery has tended to discredit greatly the census returns for the whole country. Attention was called to similar errors in former censuses, but there is here a great danger against which we have apparently no adequate safeguard.

New York Central Development.—The New York Central Railroad plans a six-track road across the state, of which several portions have already been completed. Since 1907 it has expended, or has arranged to spend, upwards of $1,500,000,000 on improvements in the state, and is able to handle more than twice the freight offered. This is the testimony of Chief Engineer Kittridge, of the New York Central, before the up-state Public Service Commission in defence of the road's petition for permission to build the Buffalo, Rochester and Eastern Railroad. Mr. Kittridge said that $22,790,000 had already been expended on the New York City terminal, which is expected to cost $100,000,000.

Canada.—The meeting called by the Archbishop of Montreal to condemn the insults of Nathan, mayor of Rome, was held in the Champ de Mars, 25,000 people attending. The City Council passed resolutions on the subject in the name of three-quarters of the population of the city. Five of the aldermen, Protestants, refused to agree. They were not present when the resolutions were proposed, though the mayor delayed the opening of the council for half an hour so as to ensure, if possible, a full attendance. Coming in later, they wished to make speeches. The Mayor, telling them the subject was no longer under discussion, allowed them to register their disagreement and nothing more. The Protestant Ministerial Alliance wrote to rebuke the council for interfering with what did not concern it. They might have remembered the comments of James I, in "The Fortunes of Nigel," on the admonishing of Dalgarno by Prince Charles and Buckingham. But it is hard to get out of ministers' heads the notion that they have a special commission to watch over the actions of the civil power. The Holy Father has telegraphed his acknowledgments to the Archbishop and the Mayor.—The ministers are still preaching valiantly, if not altogether sensibly, against Father Vaughan.—The students of McGill University had, with the approval of the University authorities, a theatre night. They marched in procession to the playhouse, where speeches were made by the President of the students and the Viceprincipal of the University, who is also Dean of the Faculty of Letters. The curtain then rose on the play selected for the entertainment and improvement of the young men. Its name was "The Midnight Sons;" its character may be known from the fact that it was styled, "The Latest Broadway Success." As some, at least, of the students, are not disinclined to reproduce in real life the scenes they saw enacted, their theatre night must have been most beneficial to their morals. The Protestant Ministerial Alliance seems to have had nothing to say on the subject.—Senator J. D. McGregor has been appointed Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia, in succession to the late Lieutenant-Governor Fraser.

Great Britain.—There is a prospect of the settlement of the shipyard lock-outs. Out of 20,000 miners on strike in South Wales, 9,000 have returned to work. The Government has yielded at last to public opinion and has appointed Lord Kitchener to the Committee of Imperial Defence.—The Trades Unions of Walthamstow have determined to oppose Sir John Simon, the newly-appointed Solicitor General, unless he promises that the Government bring in a bill destructive of the Osborne Judgment, which forbids the employment of Trades Union funds for the payment of members of parliament pledged to the Labor Council.—The Protestant Alliance is issuing a manifesto urging all representative bodies to petition the Government to enforce the provisions of the Catholic Emancipation Act of 1829, for the suppression and prohibition of religious orders in the United Kingdom. It declares that Britain is becoming the dumping-ground of such undesirables, and that inaction on the part of the Government may lead to serious trouble.—Heavy gales swept over the British Isles on October 13 and 14, and there have been many wrecks with much loss of life. Besides others the steamer Cranford was lost with all hands, 23 in number; the Heathfield, carrying 22, of whom only 2 were saved; the Ville de Rochfort, carrying 26, of whom 3 were saved; the St. David's life boat was also wrecked, losing 3 men, and there was great loss of boats and lives in the fishing fleet.—Prince Francis, of Teck, the Queen's brother, died October 22.—Two more Anglican ministers have come into the Church in consequence of the Brighton troubles, Messrs. A. G. Shoppee and E. R. Shebbeare. The latter was one of the curates of the Annunciation. A number of persons from the congregation of the two churches have also been received.—On the day after the Portuguese Revolution consols fell to 79½, the lowest figures since 1847. They are standing now at about 80.

Ireland.—There is now an apparent consensus of opinion that the Veto Conference has reached an understanding, and that Federal Home Rule is one of the questions agreed on. The London Chronicle, an authoritative Liberal organ, states that Ireland's claim is irresistible, and that the knowledge that Irish self-government is to be followed by similar measures for the other divisions of the Kingdom will secure a more general support for the Irish scheme.—Protests have been sent in by most of the public Boards, and there is a strong outcry in the country, against the action of the Government in seriously reducing the allocation to Irish public bodies out of the Local Taxation Accounts. This affects the maintenance of all public institutions depending on the rates. Educational grants are still further reduced, although the average cost per pupil was already down to $15 a year, while it was over $100 in England. The excuse is that most of these grants, especially those for education, came from the liquor tax, and that the revenue from this source has been greatly reduced. One complainant interpreted the Government's action as putting a premium upon intemperance, especially since, in spite of the decline in liquor, there was an increase in the general Revenue.—The annual Conference of the Irish Catholic Truth Society was held in Dublin, October 12 and 13, Archbishop Healy presiding. There was a large attendance of prelates, clergy and representative laymen. Papers were read by Bishop O'Donnell, of Raphoe, on "A Catholic's Knowledge of Catholic Truth;" by Rev. J. Gwynne, S.J., on "Our Waifs and Strays;" by Mgr. Hallinan, on "Primary Education in Ireland," and by Mr. Shane Leslie, on "The Social Position of Catholics." Practical action was taken in connection with the questions discussed in regard to Charity organization, the extension of religious teaching, Catholic control in education and the diffusion of Catholic literature.

France.—M. Briand appears to have extricated the country successfully from the danger which menaced it recently in the railroad strike. The attitude of the reservists in responding to the call for service though many of them were railroad men, has left the impression that the army, which is France's last hope, is still loyal. An English observer of the Picardy army maneuvers is convinced that the main body has not been affected by the efforts of Hervé and others to teach them rebellion. He adds that the corps of generals contain men whose professional attainments are equal, if not superior, to those of any army in the world. The same praise is given to the lower officers. The infantry alone needs toning up.

There is still another battle that Briand has to fight, viz., with his own party. Combes and Pelletan have declared open war on him. They convoked a Congress at Rouen, and formed a new group of Socialists and Radicals, thus separating themselves from the Alliance Démocratique Républicaine. Apart from their personal dislike of Briand their political grievance is opposition to his scheme of appeasement. Briand, however, protests that he is not surrendering to the Right. In the Congress, a division manifested itself on the subject of proportional representation, which was voted down by 3 to 1. This dissension is thought to forebode disaster for the new coalition.

The Petit Bleu gives a picture of the crime rampant in Paris at the present time. Assassinations during the day, stabbings at night; robbery, murder, assaults everywhere by organized gangs who commit crime just to show that "they have not white livers." The police are powerless; the enemy are too much for them. One of the most distinguished criminal judges, Albanel, informs the public that out of the 6,000 accused in his court, half were minors under 16. He was startled by the callousness of the young criminals. The number is increasing yearly.

Centenary of Berlin's University.—The celebration of the hundredth anniversary of the University of Berlin began October 11. One of the greatest gatherings of learned men from all parts of the world together with the royalty and members of the diplomatic and official life of Germany attended the impressive ceremonies. America took a large part in the celebration.—The generosity of American philanthropists in the matter of educational foundations has long been followed with keen interest by Emperor William, and last year he began a systematic effort to induce his own subjects, able to do so, to follow the example of American men of wealth. The effort proved so successful that the Emperor found it possible to make the University of Berlin on its hundredth birthday, a present of $2,250,000, the richest endowment ever collected in continental Europe for educational purposes. Other gifts, exceeding $100,000, were announced. The larger sum, as indicated by the Emperor in his presentation speech, will be used to create institutions where specialized scientific investigators could work without the burden of teaching. Because of a lack of such opportunity, he added, natural science investigation had not kept pace with the literary and other scholarly developments of the university.—The success attending the celebration of the first centenary of the University of Berlin has caused immense gratification to the Emperor and the Government, who did all in their power to make the celebration a splendid one.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

• What Portugal Looks Like

The Kingdom of Portugal, or the Republic of Portugal, or whatever it is now, has an area of about 34,528 square miles. It is thus a trifle larger than the State of Maine, which is about 33,000. From north to south it is in the vicinity of 360 miles long, and from east to west about 100, and is divided into six provinces. Forming an integral part of it, however, are the lands discovered by Prince Henry the Navigator, the Azores, which are 740 miles away in the Atlantic, and which contain 1,005 square miles; and also Madeira, which is 500 miles distant, and comprises 505 square miles. It has also colonies in Asia and Africa, which have an area of 639,285 square miles, with about three or four million inhabitants.

Some one has compared European Portugal to a huge fortress, and has suggested that as an explanation of how through so many difficult centuries the nation remained independent. Added to this, however, were two other elements of its success in achieving and holding this position: the hardiness of the people who sprung from such a soil and the advent of a great man at one epoch of their history, Alfonso Henriquez, who in the eyes of the Portuguese is equal to the Cid Campeador of Spain. His memory has always remained as an inspiration. At the present time, however, it is largely effaced from the national mind. Henriquez was very merciful to the Moors, though they were bitter enemies of the cross. Those who now rule Portugal delight in trampling on the cross and killing and expelling any Portuguese who is conspicuous for his or her Christianity.

Henriquez achieved the independence of his country about the time of the Second Crusade, and it is curious that the English, who have become so identified with Portugal, made their appearance in those struggles for national independence. John of Gaunt was there in the 14th century with 5,000 Englishmen fighting against the Castilians.

Geologically, Portugal is like a continuation of Spain, but it is more fertile, and has a milder climate. It has many rich valleys and alluvial plains watered by countless rivers and springs, and its tropical heat is tempered by the breezes of the sea and mountains. It was a great agricultural country in olden times, but on its farms of 20 acres to-day there are no means of using modern machinery, and hence the plough is still only a piece of hard wood which, after the work is over is carried from the field, slung on the neck of the oxen, so that the ploughman plodding homeward forms the same picture that Virgil gives us of the peasant of Italy in his day.

The popular idea of Portugal is that it is a second Spain; that the country is inaccessible, the people lazy, the language impossible, and the literature poor. You would get that impression from a Spaniard if he were speaking to you about the country next to his; but it must be remembered that Spain and Portugal are like two men sitting on a bench, back to back and not talking to each other. The Spaniards, however, are not alone in that harsh verdict about Portugal. A French diplomat who left it just before the recent revolution, does not hesitate to say very bitter things about its manners and methods. In a letter written a few days ago to the Editor of the Univers, while excusing himself to the Portuguese patriots, he says that everything in Portugal while he was there wore a sombre hue and put him in a very pessimistic mood.

The people seemed to him quite unlike the other Latin races; French, Spanish and Italian. They were hard and inhospitable, and gave scant consideration to foreigners. Possibly, he thought this was due to the high cost of living, which is greater at Lisbon than anywhere else in Europe; possibly, also, it was the result of long years of subjection to English domination that made them ready to regard any kind of an outsider as an enemy. As a matter of fact England is not its only master. Its railroads are owned by Frenchmen; the Lisbon tramways, which are extremely well managed, belong to Americans. The great Bank of Portugal is only a succursal of the Crédit Lyonnais. The other financial concerns are in the hands of Jews, who almost monopolize them; and all the great industries of the country are managed by English, French and Germans. The Portuguese are few and count for little.

While naturally resenting this servitude in their own country, they have nevertheless taken to copying foreign fashions, and like all imitators fall into ridiculous exaggerations. Thus they have adopted the French vapors about the Rights of Man, which are absurd enough in the literature and politics of France, but in Portugal are preached with a feeling akin to ferocity. So, too, Portuguese Freemasonry is more rabid, more secret and more underground in its workings. It is grossly fanatical, almost barbarous, and drums into the ranks of the order the worst ruffians of the slums.

The notorious corruption of their politicians has also contributed to spoil the temper of the people, and has made them ripe for the bloodiest kind of a revolution; but singularly enough the first blow in the present uprising was struck by the army and navy. No doubt there was as much discontent among the defenders of the nation as with the people; but they have acted like the man who jumped into the river to keep out of the rain. No one can foretell the consequences to the world at large of what has just taken place. Will such soldiers be guardians of the rights of civilians, and shall we have a military dictatorship?

Lisbon, the principal theatre of this national tragedy, is considered to be better situated as a city than any other capital on the eastern hemisphere, except, perhaps, Constantinople. As you approach by water the panorama is very striking. Before you the city rises tier over tier above the river which widens at its feet into a vast bay. But it is a city without monuments, and its water front is marred by industrial and commercial excrescences. The three royal palaces evoke no architectural interest in visitors, and the great royal residence of the Necessidades, which the fleet bombarded the other day, has the air of a barracks or a cloister; cold, gloomy and bare. The Government buildings are somewhat better, and seen from the Tagus form a fair enough group, but they cannot compare with what you see in other great cities. The churches are numerous but not artistic, except perhaps one, that of St. Jerome in the Belem quarter, and even that has a style all its own, or rather it has several styles, Gothic, Hindoo and Arabian. They call it Manuelian.

A peculiar thing about Lisbon, indeed a somewhat sinister arrangement in the light of actual happenings, is that the city is built on a number of separate hills. In the old town are depressions which are really gullies, though they serve as streets, which you have to descend and ascend continually by flights of steps, and which mortise into each other in the most irritating fashion. Some of them bore a very evil reputation for midnight murders in bygone times, and a revolutionist would not want a better place for a barricade or butchery.

Byron was there in 1809 but he turned away from it depressed, though his first impressions were favorable, for he says:

"What beauties does Lisboa first unfold!
Her image floating on that noble tide,
Which poets vainly pave with sands of gold,
And now whereon a thousand keels do ride.
But whoso entereth within that town,
That shining far, celestial seems to be,
Disconsolate will wander up and down,
'Mid many things unsightly to strange ee."

The city has 64 churches and about 200 chapels. The former monasteries, mostly magnificent buildings situated at the most elevated points, were long ago confiscated and the monks expelled. They are now taken for public purposes. There are plenty of schools, but the illiteracy of the country at large is very high. As much as 80 per cent. of the people can neither read nor write.

When one looks around at the splendid old ecclesiastical structures in Lisbon, which are no longer used for the service of God, but are abandoned or appropriated by the State, it is easy to see how absurd is the theory that the present revolution was chiefly a protest of the people against mortmain, or the tying up of large properties by the religious corporations. Whatever may have been the case in the past, there is now no mortmain in Portugal. For instance, the two houses of Parliament hold their sessions in the old monastery of St. Bento. The Carmo church has been converted into an Archæological Museum. The great National Library is filled, for the most part, with old theological works and ecclesiastical histories taken from the suppressed monasteries. The Academy of Fine Arts has a valuable and interesting collection of gold and silver plate which are spoils from the same sources. The monastery of Belem is used as a foundling asylum. The theatre of St. Carlos was formerly a dwelling for ecclesiastics. In a word, the question of mortmain has long been disposed of by Government robbery. Nor is there any hope of its ever being revived. The present Revolutionary Minister of Justice Costa proclaimed it 'only the other day to the entire world.

"The legislation of the Marquis of Pombal, which was made in the eighteenth century," he says, "still exists in Portugal as well as the law of 1834 for religious men, and of 1864 for religious women. In virtue of such legislation, no religious congregation has any legal existence in Portugal." Costa declares that first of all the Jesuits are considered to be traitors to their country and are forever banished from their native land. As we know, they were the first victims of the present revolt.

"The purely contemplative congregations," the Minister continues, "can allege no kind of pretext for having infringed the law of 1834 and 1864. Those who are devoted to teaching have been only tolerated in virtue of a dictatorial decree of 1901, but a dictatorial decree cannot be recognized in a Republic, and hence they are to be dissolved forthwith. Native religious are to be sent to their own cities if they so desire; the others are to be set at liberty, but precautions will be taken to prevent their coming together again in communities. Foreigners, men and women, will be expelled. As for the Jesuits, there shall be complete and immediate confiscation. For the present, inventories are to be made of the property of the other congregations," which means they are to be seized.

After such a pronouncement, it is simply absurd to talk about mortmain. For more than a hundred years, religious congregations have had no title to property in Portugal at all, and consequently could not very well tie it up. Nor can the unfortunate members of these congregations be charged with "competing upon unfair terms with taxed and wage-paying industries."

Looking over the list of industries in Lisbon we find that there are shops for gold and silverware and jewelry; there are spinning and weaving mills, iron foundries, and manufactories of silk, hats, boots, cutlery, stoneware, tobacco, chemicals, soap, paper, steel, etc. It would be very difficult to conceive how bodies of men and especially of women could compete in any of these enterprises, when they have no legal guarantee that they can remain twenty-four hours in the country. There is not even competition in the schools. Where the illiteracy of the people runs up to 80 per cent., it is clear that there are no teachers to compete with. Indeed Mme. G. Le Roy-Liberge, in her "Trois Mois de Portugal," informs us that in 1857 a venerable priest, finding that there was no one even to look after the sick poor, and that the street children were abandoned after the Spanish religious for one reason or another had given them up, called in some French Sisters who took up the work. They visited the poor, opened houses of relief, taught catechism and the like.

That went on till 1864, when a law was made closing up all their establishments. In some way or other it was ineffective, and then another similar law was passed in 1901. That, too, was made inoperative, chiefly because a rich woman, the Duchess of Pamela, who had opened a number of kitchens for the poor, and was spending 50,000 francs a year in that charity, went to the Government officials and told them: "If you close the House of the Good Shepherd, I shall stop my 50,000 francs, and let you look after your poor." Other influential women who were interested in the same way in other public charities did likewise and the operation of the law was stopped, but the law itself was not repealed.

It is chiefly against the Sisters of the Good Shepherd that the accusation is leveled of cutting into other people's work. But as these noble women devote themselves to protecting young girls from vice, and in sheltering the abandoned women of the streets, and giving them by means of laundry work and sewing an opportunity to exist, and enabling them when they leave the refuge, reformed and purified, to earn an honest living, thus saving the Government millions of dollars in hospitals and prisons for these castaways of society, they surely cannot be blamed. If that is cutting into other people's industries it is an offense that may not only be tolerated but encouraged.

It is very much to be regretted that the readers of newspapers accept as Gospel truths, the declarations of demagogues who are working solely for their own pockets or political preferment. To say, for instance, that the revolutionists of Portugal in expelling the religious are working in the interest of the secular priests, is simply mockery, and on the face of what is occurring in France, it is inconceivable how any one can dare to believe for a moment such travesties of the truth. If we are bidden by an American paper in the very far west not to declaim against such confiscations because even in our country, "the suppression of Episcopalian church endowments in Virginia by Thomas Jefferson caused baptismal founts to be used as horse-troughs," we are not going to admit that acts of such a nature which are worthy of the Huns and Vandals were prompted by purely economic or benevolent motives; nor is the whole wretched business going to enhance our respect for Thomas Jefferson who permitted such things to happen in the carrying out of his program of disestablishment. But it must be borne in mind that Jefferson merely disestablished. He did not confiscate the property of the Church, as the Revolutionists of Portugal are doing so shamelessly, and that is the real point at issue.

Such is in brief the condition of Portugal. The world is now wondering what the six months' dictatorship which is announced as absolutely necessary before the new Republic gets on its feet is going to do to remove the stigma of political corruption and fanatical anticlericalism which is on the nation. It wants to know what this bankrupt country is going to do to replace the voluntary educators and the devoted servants of the poor whom it has thrust out of their homes as unworthy to breathe the air of Portugal; and it wants to know how it is going to keep its hand on Madeira and the Azores which every body says are coveted by both England and Germany, and finally how it is going to retain possession of its African territory. Will there not be an International Conference convoked to consider whether it is not advisable for Portugal to relinquish its African possessions? English papers are already beginning to tell blood-curdling stories about the slave trade there. X.

The Catholic Church the Foe of Education?

It is not often that attention is given in these pages to newspaper reports of popular pulpit pronouncements, most of which have a merely ephemeral interest. If an exception is made in the case of a recent attack on the educational policy of the Church, it is not because of the damage that may accrue to us from an unproved accusation, nor because of the prominence or prestige of the man who made that accusation, but because, coming as it did in answer to an interview given by a distinguished visitor to our country, it calls for emphatic denial and prompt repudiation at the hands of American Catholics. It is, in a sense, a duty which hospitality imposes on us to put the matter before a fairminded American public and allow them to judge.

In reply to an interview dated October 11, given by Cardinal Logue, Primate of all Ireland, in which His Eminence expressed an optimistic opinion of the future of Catholicity in America, Reverend Doctor Aked, of the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, New York, came forward with the statement that "the Catholic Church, through all the ages, has been the unrelenting foe of liberty and education." He adds "Drive a Catholic into a corner by argument, ask him if Catholics are not less educated than Protestants, and he will say: 'Yes, but are you right sure that education has all the blessings that you ascribe to it.'" (The Washington Times, October 11, 1910).

It must, indeed, be a strange study of the history of education that results in such a conviction as Dr. Aked's. More remarkable still is Dr. Aked's expectation that educated people in this country will agree with him. Perhaps in England, whence he recently came, the history of education may be taught without mention of the work which the Catholic Church has done and is doing in the field of education. But here, let Dr. Aked know, every pupil in our normal schools, every teacher in our primary public schools, and many who have never specialized in educational matters could tell him of a chapter in educational history which apparently is a sealed book to him. Evidently he has never read of the sacrifices which the early Christians made to secure the education of their children at a time when it would have been so easy for the Church to maintain her alleged program of ignorance. He has never read the statutes and canons of councils, the decrees of popes, bishops and monastic chapters on educational matters. Seemingly he has never heard of Bede, Rhabanus, Gerbert, the monks of St. Gall, who, before and during the Carolingian revival of letters, put education in the foreground of their civilizing activity and rated it second only to sanctity. How, unless hopelessly behind the times in educational history, could Dr. Aked have the audacity, in a reply to the successor of St. Patrick, to cast a slur on the Church which in Ireland and through the instrumentality of Irish monks on the continent of Europe, preserved the Greek and Latin classics and handed down to the modern world the literary treasures of pagan antiquity?

The free parochial schools of medieval times, established and supported by the Church; the monastic schools for externs as well as for the inmates of the monastery; the universities that grew out of the cloistral and cathedral schools or were founded by explicit papal enactment; the interference of the Popes, over and over again, in favor of education;—these are but a few of the facts which every student of history knows, and which give the lie to Dr. Aked's accusation. The religious orders of men and women founded and maintained by the Church for educational work are living witnesses to refute his calumny. Perhaps Dr. Aked is American enough to appreciate the practical consideration that it costs the Catholic Church in America millions of dollars annually to maintain more than five thousand parochial schools in which 1,300,000 children are taught by a trained body of 30,000 teachers. If, as he contends, the Church is the unrelenting foe of education, why does she exact voluntary tribute for so large an undertaking from people who are already taxed by the State for educational purposes? Why does she assume the additional burden of supporting academies, high schools and colleges, and why does the hierarchy of the United States appeal year after year to the laity of the country for the upkeep of a Catholic University at Washington? The facts speak for themselves, and a fairminded American public is not slow to understand the import of these facts.

It is true we have in our Church a large number of illiterates. But, whose is the fault? In the countries from which the illiterates come education is, to a large extent, in the hands of the Church's enemies. In Ireland (from which but few of the illiterates come) Catholic education has been obliged during the last seventy years to build out of the ruins left by penal laws and tyrannical persecution. In Germany (from which, also, few of the illiterates come) in spite of the setback due to the Kulturkampf, Catholic provinces spend more on education to-day than do the provinces where liberalism and Protestantism proclaim the benefits of purely secular education. In other countries, from which the illiterates do come, nagging interference, unjust discrimination, the tyranny of petty officialdom, and ultimate confiscation and exile are the lot meted out to the Catholic teaching orders.

We do, as Dr. Aked contends, sometimes question whether education is always an unmixed blessing. Is all education good? Is there not a fallacy in the argument: the right kind of education is beneficial; this is education, therefore it is beneficial? Let the American people judge whether education which is not only non-religious but anti-religious and anti-moral, is something to be proud of. Let them judge in the light of recent revelations concerning what is taught in our universities, colleges and high-schools. Let them ponder the results of investigations into the moral conditions prevailing in schools to which little children are implicitly trusted by their parents, and out of which they sometimes come ruined in body and soul. A little more reflective thought, a little more consideration of the facts of history, a little more regard for logic and there would perhaps be a little less haste to fling taunts at the Church which has done so much for education in the best sense of the word.

WILLIAM TURNER.

Stone for Bread

At the Protestant Episcopal convention in Cincinnati the Bishops made unanimously the following declaration:

"In reply to a Memorial signed by over eleven hundred clergymen, addressed to the House of Bishops with regard to Canon 19, adopted by the General Convention in 1907, the Bishops would assure the memorialists of their sympathy with the anxiety expressed lest the clause in question should be misinterpreted as making light of the importance either of sound teaching in our congregations in accordance with the Church's received doctrine, or of a commission to teach in the Church's name.

"The clause which restricts to the Bishop the right to give permission to those who are not ministers of this church to make addresses in any of our churches on special occasions, was not intended to alter, and cannot be fairly interpreted as in the least degree modifying the position of the church as expressed in the prayer-book and ordinal, which restricts the ministry of the Word and the Sacraments in our congregations to men who have received episcopal ordination.

"The Bishops are disposed to regard this declaration as almost unnecessary except as a matter of courtesy and respect to the number and character of the memorialists; since the Canon, at first popularly misnamed and misunderstood as an 'Open Pulpit Canon,' and perhaps in a few instances misused, is now generally recognized as containing nothing to disturb the order or disquiet the peace of the church."

The clause in Canon 19 to which this Declaration refers reads as follows:—

"Provided, that nothing herein shall be so construed as . . . to prevent the Bishop of any Diocese or Missionary District from giving permission to Christian men who are not Ministers of this church, to make addresses in the church on special occasions."

The law that was amended in 1907 forbade any person to officiate in Episcopal churches "without sufficient evidence of his being duly licensed or ordained to minister in this church." The amendment certainly changed this. These bishops answer the petition of their children by a declaration which apparently is intentionally ambiguous so that it may be understood in a way to suit the Broad as well as the High Churchman, and bind no official to any one course of action. Nevertheless it does allow "ministers of the word and sacraments in" other "congregations," who have not received episcopal ordination, to make addresses to Protestant Episcopal congregations, and to see that in the inner minds of some at least of the Bishops such addresses are really a ministry of the Word, one need only note that the Chairman of the Committee which drafted this Declaration was Bishop Doane of Albany, who wrote the following interpretation of the Canon in 1907.

The Canon "does mean that there are men not in our Orders, not authorized in any technical sense to officiate in our churches, who have a message to deliver, a message from God, which our people need to hear, and can now, without any apparent violation of our Canon Law or any interference with the teaching of the preface of the ordinal." The learned prelate acted on this interpretation, it is to be supposed, when he invited a Presbyterian minister to address his flock.

Comparing then the Canon, the Declaration, the Interpretation and the action of the chairman, we must come to the conclusion, that either these bishops are lacking in ordinary intelligence, or else that they design to prevent their memorialists from abandoning the Protestant Episcopal church.

This latter seems more probable, in that they claim that the "Open Pulpit Canon" "is now generally recognized as containing nothing to disturb the order or disquiet the peace of the church." Therefore we are expected to conclude that there are no members of the Episcopal church who are disturbed or disquieted by principles which place their ministers, in the estimate of reasonable people, on the same level with other Protestant ministers. Surely catholic-minded Episcopalians are placed in a more ludicrous position by this Declaration than they were before; for now they have been made a laughing stock by being told by the bishops, high-churchmen chiefly, who drafted the Declaration, that it was "almost unnecessary except as a matter of courtesy" to their weak intelligences to declare that Canon 19 "cannot be fairly interpreted" by them "as in the least degree modifying the position of the church, etc."

The Associated Press also informs us that the Episcopalian bishops have put forth a "Decree," in which they assert that Jews who have been converted to the Episcopalian faith may continue the Jewish rites, festivals and ceremonies of their forefathers as historical and racial traditions, provided they do so as a matter of morality, or for sanitary reasons, but not as a form of religion."

Imagine St. Paul putting forth such a Decree. Far more certainly we would hear him saying to such Christians: "O senseless Galatians who hath bewitched you that you should not obey the truth." "You are made void of Christ. . . . You are fallen from grace" (Gal. 3: 5-4.)

Is it to be supposed now that we shall see Episcopalian churches opened on Saturdays and other Jewish festivals as synagogues for their Jewish-Episcopalians?

All these actions of the Protestant Episcopal church are only so many signs to the Catholic of the true character of that branch which was severed from the Trunk in the 16th century. It is Protestant as its name tells us and as the majority of its ministers and members believe. Even the leading newspaper of the high-church men is brought to admit this. After proclaiming loudly the title American Catholic for the past few months, one of them in a recent issue throws over the whole contention in the following remarkable words:

"When a vote on the name was commonly understood to be a purely educative measure with no real expectation that it would be adopted, it was proper that the enunciation of the Catholic character of the American Church should be expressed in the name proposed. Now . . . we simply will not take the responsibility for adopting, by a small majority, a measure that might disrupt the church in many dioceses."—(The Living Church, October 15, 1910).

Perhaps the following resolution which was passed at a Pre-convention Conference helped the Editor to change his views.

"As essential elements in that comprehensive character" (a very true description of the Protestant Episcopal church), "we receive the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as containing all things necessary to salvation, and as being the rule and ultimate standard of faith: holding . . . the Nicene Creed as the sufficient summary of the Christian Faith, etc."

Surely a body which can propose to put forth such statements is "Protestant to the core, and can never be anything more," as a prominent Episcopalian lawyer declared. A clerical delegate hit the nail square on the head when he said:—

"There is no question of the Protestantism of the Methodists or the Baptists, as they do not need to use the name 'Protestant' in their titles. But there are some in our church whose Protestantism is not greatly manifest and we need the word."

We can not do better in conclusion than to quote Cardinal Wiseman's description of the Anglican ship in 1851. "Of conflict and clamor it has enough. Within all is dissension, contention, strife. It is no wonder it does not move. If its chief commander set the sails in one direction, his mate will trim them oppositely on another mast. If one rows forward, the other strikes backward. And, still more strange, there are those who applaud, and think their bark is going bravely on, because one out of twenty engaged in its direction pulls alone against the rest."—(Essays, Vol. I, p. 339).

W. L. H.

A Russian Irishman

There is scarcely a country in the world where some Irish name of distinction does not call to mind the exiles who formerly sought freedom of worship far from their own sad isle. France, Spain, Italy, Austria, welcomed the O'Briens, O'Connors, O'Keefes, Taaffes, MacMahons, or FitzGerald. But the Irish pushed still further afield, and we find many citizens of Irish descent in Russia. The name of O'Rourke has been recently much in evidence in the Slav Press on the occasion of the centenary of the battle of Varvarin. In this and many other engagements an O'Rourke led the Russian and Serb battalions to victory, and a monument to him has just been erected on the plain where the Turks were routed in 1810. Of the many unequal combats in which the numerically inferior Christian forces defeated the Moslems, none has been more glorious than that of Varvarin. Therefore there is none in which the younger Serb generation takes more pride; and the commemorations were carried out with great pomp. Russia was officially represented and the family of the heroic Count Joseph Cornelius O'Rourke were specially invited by the Serb Government to attend. Count Nicholas O'Rourke, grandson of the famous general, although over seventy-six years of age, responded to the invitation, and traveled from his estate in the centre of Russia to witness the unveiling of the monument dedicated to his brave ancestor. In the presence of Church and State dignitaries a solemn requiem Mass was said for the souls of those who had fallen in battle, and an immense concourse then defiled before the stone on which the names of the most distinguished combatants are engraved. That of O'Rourke is first on the list of honor.

The family of O'Rourke had left Ireland after the battle of the Boyne and settled in France. In the reign of the Russian Empress Elisabeth a branch emigrated to the Baltic Provinces and became definitely acclimatized. The future champion of the oppressed Christian races was born in Dorpat in 1772, and received in baptism the characteristically Irish names Joseph Cornelius. He was early destined to the career of arms, for in accordance with prevailing custom for sons of the nobility he was while yet an infant inscribed in the ranks of the Imperial Guard. That he took kindly to his calling is evident from his participation in all Russia's wars of that time. As a young lieutenant he was appointed to the French Emigrant Corps and fought with them at Zurich against the Republican Government. He returned to Russia as colonel and then took a command under the famous General Kutusoff. In the campaign of 1805 he was decorated for signal bravery with the Order of Saint George.

In the terrible battle of Eylau O'Rourke again distinguished himself and at the proclamation of peace was entrusted with the formation of the Uhlan Regiment "Vollinsky." This was the regiment he led against the Turks at Varvarin. He had equipped it at his own expense and marched with it to the Balkan Peninsula as part of the Moldavian contingent told off to assist the Christian races struggling for freedom. O'Rourke assisted in the deliverance of Prahovo, and took part in the stiff combat of Bela Palanka. He next drove the enemy from Soko Gania and defeated them in the pitched battle of Jassika. An Imperial Rescript was forwarded to him on this occasion to express appreciation of his valor.

But it was at Varvarin that Count Joseph won his brightest laurels together with the prized Decoration of Saint Anne. In the face of great odds he decided to hold his ground, and threw up trenches to shelter his men and cannon. Under his inspiring command Serbs and Russians repulsed during four days repeated furious onslaughts of the Turks, treble their number. In a final desperate encounter O'Rourke not only beat back the attacking force, but chased them over the Morava River into the wilds of Albania. He now took the offensive and started to storm Gurgussovats (the present thriving town of Knajevats) which he conquered and kept. By obliging the Moslems to evacuate this stronghold he secured the freedom of eighty Serb villages hitherto under tribute. At the close of the war a gold sabre with jewel-encrusted hilt was presented to O'Rourke by the Christian populations he had delivered.

The career of a soldier—and more especially of a Russian soldier—was no sinecure in those days. O'Rourke withdrew from one battlefield only to enter on another. He was an active combatant in the repulse of the French invasion, assisted in the siege of Magdeburg, and in the cavalry charge of the first Leipzig. Here it was that he won the rank of Lieutenant-General. With the Northern Army he fought at Gross Beern, Dünevids, Wittemberg, and the second Leipzig. At Winzengerode he performed feats of valor that were rewarded with the Order of St. Alexander Nevsky. Cavalry-General Count O'Rourke died in 1849 at his country estate of Vesselub in the province of Minsk, leaving five sons to perpetuate his name.

Count Nicholas, his grandson, chose the navy as his profession. On the frigate Aurore, he sailed round the world and served with the squadron that so gloriously defeated the Anglo-French fleet in the Crimean War. He married a Princess of the royal native line of Roumania. Two of his sons are in the army so that the taste for soldiering is not extinct in the chivalrous line of the Russian O'Rourkes.

BEN HURST.

IN MISSION FIELDS

BAGDAD'S SCHOOL FOR THE BLIND.

The Very Reverend Leo Michael of the Cross, Superior of the mission of the Barefooted Carmelites, in the quaint, old city of Bagdad, gives some interesting particulars of his school for the blind. While such institutions are numerous and rapidly increasing in number in more favored parts of the world, there are but three, as far as he has been able to learn, in the great Turkish empire. These are at Constantinople, Jerusalem, and Bagdad. And yet in no other part of the world are they so much needed as in the Orient, for there the number of the blind is much more considerable than elsewhere. In the principal European countries, such as Great Britain, France, and Germany, there is one blind person for every eleven hundred of the population, while in the city of Bagdad alone, with its population of about two hundred thousand, the number of the blind is four thousand. A careful census of the city shows that there is one blind person for every thirty-five among the Mohammedans, one for every one hundred and eleven among the Jews, and one for every one hundred and thirty-three among the Catholics.

Six years ago, Father Peter of the Mother of God, while traveling in France, became acquainted with a family in Bordeaux, a member of which, though still a young man, had successfully passed his examination for the degree of bachelor of arts and sciences, although he had been blind from birth. Thinking of the blind of Bagdad, so numerous and so abandoned, so wretched and so forgotten, the missionary made haste to obtain a copy of the alphabet for the blind and a writing tablet such as is fashioned for their use. With these treasures in his possession, he returned to the mission, where Father John, now Archbishop of Bagdad and Delegate Apostolic, accommodated the alphabet to the Arabic language and began his professorial course with a blind Catholic boy as his class. The course consisted of reading, writing, a little arithmetic, and some notions of music. Thus he founded the school for the blind, which has since greatly extended its field of usefulness. As soon as the first student had made a little progress, he became in turn the teacher of another, and thus the attendance rapidly increased.

One of the missionaries journeyed to France and spent three months in a school for the blind, where he studied the details of administration. Upon his return to Bagdad, he began to teach spinning and weaving and the making of rugs and baskets, and soon had the satisfaction of seeing his pupils able to earn a trifle. He then determined to attempt the erection of a building for his boys, who had been crowded into a couple of spare rooms in the residence of the missionaries; but as he had absolutely no money at his disposal, he decided to make a public appeal to Christians, Jews, and Mohammedans. The result of the collection was a sufficient sum to put up two modest structures, one serving as a workshop and the other as a dormitory. Two Sisters of the Presentation have expressed their readiness to consecrate their services to the same noble work, but the scanty income of the school does not permit the extra expense which would thus be incurred.

Speaking of Post Cards

Who has not seen them of all kinds, persons, places and things, and for all occasions, sentimental, grave and gay? A post card is the handiest souvenir to send home while one is on a journey, for it is to be had in great variety at a modest price. Albums for post cards are sold to an extent that shows how general is the practice of collecting them and how widespread is the interest that they awaken.

There seems to be practically no limit to the subjects that appear on them. The plump Thanksgiving turkey and the Easter rabbit share with landscapes, patriotic devices and religious emblems the wide publicity that may come from the judicious use of one-cent postage stamps. Just the other day, we chanced to see a kind of post card that we should greatly like to see multiplied and spread broadcast. The subject was "Building a Mission Church in Togo, Africa." The edifice was of goodly proportions, some natives were gathered about, and there were the missionaries, one of whom was "snapped" as he stood, helmet in hand, mopping the perspiration from his brow. One-half of the card (the part reserved for the message) gave us the following information: "Togo, West Africa. Prefecture Apostolic. The Very Rev. N. Schoening, S.V.D., P.A. This is a very prosperous yet dangerous mission field, on account of the two dreadful enemies, fever and poison. This mission, opened in 1892, has 41 missionaries; 10 Brothers; 22 Sisters; 22 stations and 167 outposts; 27 churches and chapels; 8,180 Christians; 5,432 catechumens; 177 catechists and teachers; 180 schools with 5,949 pupils." Here, it strikes us, is a practical and attractive way of bringing the mission work of the Church home to those for whom the word has a vague meaning or perhaps none. Help for the missions and missionaries for them will come from a knowledge of them, for the human heart is generous and responsive.

The Society of the Divine Word (S.V.D.) which has charge of the Togo mission, maintains at Techny, Illinois, a town near Chicago, a missionary college where youths are trained and educated for the foreign missions. It has several American students.

CORRESPONDENCE

Vitality of the Catholic Spirit in Spain

TORTOSA, SPAIN, OCTOBER 6, 1910.

Sunday, October 2, witnessed a convincing proof of the vitality of the Catholic spirit in Spain. In recent correspondence the readers of AMERICA have been told of the extraordinary outburst of Catholic sentiment in Cataluña on August 28, when, as corrected and complete data now show, 600,000 Catholics, in 180 meetings held simultaneously on that day, raised a solemn protest against the introduction into Spain of French governmental programmes incompatible with their national spirit and the best interests of their country. Great as was the outburst of feeling in Cataluña, it was surpassed by the more than extraordinary Catholic meetings held on October 2 in all parts of the peninsula. No Catholic or fair-minded Protestant, reading the reports of Sunday's meetings, and bearing in mind the demonstration of August 28, can fail to see that Canalejas' press agents have deliberately misrepresented the sentiment in Spain in regard to his relations with the Vatican. Spain, as a nation, is opposed to the Government's policy. A combination of circumstances, as pointed out in previous correspondence, is responsible for the present ministry's power. American and English Catholics cannot easily grasp the political situation in Spain; their criticism of Spanish Catholics is inclined to be unduly severe. The dynastical question is so intimately bound up with Catholic history in the past century that it remains, and seems destined to remain for many years, the stumbling-block of Catholic political unity.

The meetings held last Sunday in Navarra and in the Basque provinces, Guipúzcoa, Vizcaya and Álava, surpassed even what was expected from that remarkable region of strong faith and piety. These fervent Catholics of the North have been at fever heat since August 7, when the Government prevented their demonstration in San Sebastián. On that day the Spanish army was called out to close all roads leading into San Sebastián; it was cool heads that prevented bloodshed. No pen can picture the wonderful scene of Catholic sentiment and of love for Pius X witnessed in Pamplona on Sunday. Though a city of only some thirty-thousand inhabitants, it saw ninety thousand Catholics and 275 town councils of Navarra gathered together to express their loyalty to the Vatican. Special trains, packed with men, came from Tudela, Castejón, Marcilla, Alsasua, Olite, Tafalla and Irurzun; while the roads leading to Pamplona were crowded with carts and with men on foot, some of whom had come from Luquin and had been on the road for more than thirty hours. Whole villages in mass, marched into Pamplona; only the women and children remained at home. Probably never has Navarra, the land of St. Francis Xavier, witnessed such an outburst of determined Catholic spirit as was seen on Sunday. There was no mistaking the sentiment of the manifestation. It was spoken openly: "Navarra is Catholic; its sons are prepared to sacrifice their property and shed their blood in defence of the Church." The same sentiment was voiced in the Basque meeting in Vitoria and at San Sebastián. 24,000 Basques at the meeting in Vitoria, and 30,000 at that of San Sebastián pledged their loyalty to the Vatican in the present crisis.

The vigor of the Catholic protest in Aragón was little less than that of Navarra and the Basque provinces. Besides the manifestation in Zaragoza, the capital of the province, to date I have seen notices of sixty-one enthusiastic meetings. The attendance in Tarazona, Calatayud, Agreda and Corella was especially notable. In the diocese of Huesca nine great meetings were held, while in the manifestation in Estercuel we find fourteen small towns united in an energetic protest against the Government. The ecclesiastical district of La Almunia witnessed forty towns united in five great meetings. Through the entire province there sounds a deep murmur of indignation from Catholics, such as has not been heard since the Carlist war. Reports have already come in of seven meetings in the district of Castellote, of five in Egea, six in Montalbán, four in Pino, two in Valderribes, three in Borja, and of three in Alcañiz. It is impossible to give at present a complete summary of all meetings held in Aragón, and to estimate the number in attendance. However, knowing the Catholic spirit of the province, one may prudently say, without fear of exaggeration, that the protest of Aragón will equal that of Cataluña.

While Aragón, Navarra and the Basque provinces were holding their great meetings, eight thousand Catholics of the province of León traveled through mud and rain, to the shrine of Nuestra Señora del Camino (Our Lady of the Way). At the same time in Riaño, Velilla, Liébana, Villada, Brezo, Villalpando, Mayorga and Villanueva del Campo, great demonstrations were being held. We find entire towns and their municipal government gathered in protest against proposed anti-Catholic legislation, and denouncing the Government for its conduct towards the Vatican. In all these meetings there was the strong and now universal demand: "Look to our agriculture; leave religious questions alone."

In Asturias, besides an enormous meeting of 40,000 in the capital, Oviedo, many other well attended meetings were held. Avilés, Corvera, Illas, Castrillón, Soto del Barco and Candamo were especially prominent for their vigorous protest.

Passing over the province of Galicia, with great demonstrations in Tuy, Aloja, Noja and Puenteáreas, and setting aside data of numerous meetings in the other well-known provinces of Spain, we must content ourselves for lack of space, with choosing at random other data which will show the universality and importance of the Catholic manifestation of October 2.

Twenty-thousand were present at the meeting in Valencia; 60,000 in Santander; 40,000 in Murcia; 25,000 in Burgos; 25,000 in Granada; 8,000 in Cadiz; 20,000 in Santiago; 10,000 in Seville; 25,000 in Orihuela; 5,000 in Toledo; 15,000 in Ciudad Real; 11,000 in Jerez; 17,000 in Oliva; 11,000 in Potries; 12,000 in Alcoy; 10,000 in Haro (Logroño); 10,000 in Alicante; 3,000 in Córdoba; 15,000 in Vigo; 7,000 in Palma de Mallorca; 12,000 in Chipiona; 15,000 in Don Benito, etc., etc.

In Valencia there were present representatives from 1806 societies; telegrams and letters of approval of manifestation were received from 125 mayors of towns and from 87 town councils. The Catholics of 204 towns and villages sent letters of union of purpose.

With all due fairness to Canalejas and his numerous statements in the anti-Catholic press, Catholics now warmly declare that they have proved that he has misrepresented the sentiment of Spain. The Catholic papers are inviting him to produce a similar movement in support of his policy against the Vatican and the Church. Certainly, Spain has never witnessed before such a general and united manifestation of Catholic spirit in support of the Holy See. Its importance cannot be overestimated. While it would be childish to see in these manifestations an augury of Catholic political union in the near future, yet one may see in them, without being unduly optimistic, an effective means of checking the hostile actions of a radical Government. The present struggle in Spain is not a question of religious tolerance; it is a battle between the Church and the enemies of revealed religion. Spanish Catholics know well the plans of the enemies of the Church and, with a clear knowledge of the past before them, are striving to save their country the horrors that followed upon previous ruptures with the Holy See. Unfortunately, Spanish history is but little known outside of Spain.

The repeated statement of the American press that Catholic intolerance has caused the present acute situation in Spain, shows but little knowledge of Spanish affairs. Spanish Catholics have little fear of Protestant propaganda. It is seventy-five years since George Borrow was commissioned by the Bible societies of London to start a vigorous Protestant propaganda in Spain, yet, without being unfair, the writer may state that sincere, bona fide converts to Protestantism are indeed a rarity in Spain. The energetic labors of Borrow, a simple, credulous man, as well as those of the more fanatical Methodist, William H. Rule, early flooded Spain with Protestant bibles and anti-Catholic books. However, it was in 1869 that a determined effort was begun to convert Spain to Protestantism. The Revolution, while warring against the Church, murdering her priests and burning her temples and most precious monuments of ecclesiastic art, had opened the country, in the name of Liberty, to an army of Protestant ministers and their co-workers. Since then Spain has literally been deluged with Protestant bibles and with books, tracts and pamphlets showing "the wickedness of Rome." One meets here in Spain the old, familiar diatribes translated into Spanish. "The Innovation of Romanism," "The Friar's Death-bed," "A Shipwrecked Soul," "The Confessional," "Biblical Catechism on Romanism" and a hundred and one others have been translated and published "to bring light and peace to Spanish souls." Personally, I have met the tracts of the Madrid missions, being distributed, from door to door, in the most fervent of Catholic villages as far north as the Ebro river. There is a sad side, however, to Protestant propaganda in Spain. Though misguided zeal and hatred of the Church are making few, if any, converts to Protestantism, yet the Protestant missions in Spain are helping, in no small way, the spirit of indifferentism and professed atheism now so evident in European cities. A Spaniard who loses the faith of his childhood does not become a sincere Protestant; he may draw for a time from the Protestant mission fund, but, when the temporal needs are satisfied, he either returns to the faith of his fathers, or drifts into the atheistical group which in Spain is only waiting for the day when it may loot and burn down both the Catholic and Protestant churches alike.

CHARLES J. MULLALY, S.J.

Catholic Schools in British Guiana

TAKATU RIVER, AUGUST 12, 1910.

As you wished to have some news from British Guiana for AMERICA, I am sending you this account, which may prove interesting. It relates to a new mission started last year at the extreme southwest of the colony on the frontier of Brazil. It is three weeks' journey from Georgetown. In the future I shall arrange so that you may get news regularly from this place.

I have just received a letter from the Bishop, posted on June 27th. This mission on the Brazilian frontier was established last December, when Bishop Galton went up the Essequibo and Rupununi rivers, a journey of three weeks by boat, accompanied by your humble servant, who was left in charge of the district, to start a mission among the Brazilian ranchers and the Macusi and Wapisiana Indians. On the Bishop's return some of the Sisters of Mercy volunteered to go to the new mission. They left Georgetown on April 14th and arrived on the Takutu river about the middle of May.

It is very different to what it was when the bishop was here before Christmas. Then it was nothing but a bare open space. There is now standing the convent, my small house and thirty Indian houses. Behind my house is an enclosure for the cattle. I have also a field, plowed, manured and planted about eighty yards by forty.

On Sundays there is always a fairly good congregation for the size of our school chapel. We have had as many as 250. Seldom has the number been below 100.

The school was started a few days before the nuns arrived. All the children know the alphabet and how to count well. They have all done reading from the card. Most read now in books. They also write, some remarkably well. Two of the nuns teach all the time. The other helps when there is need. The girls learn sewing, and seem to be getting on well.

The religious instruction consists chiefly in learning English prayers and hymns, which the children will understand later on, some simple questions and answers in the catechism, and some few prayers and occasional instruction in Macusi. Many of them are also getting lessons every day in agriculture, farming and carpentry. They are full of curiosity and eager to learn everything. They have already learned a good deal. When I first came here they had never seen a carpenter's tool of any sort or description. Most of them had never seen a nail.

The children are never allowed to be idle, and whatever they are doing, they are learning something. The girls are learning a good deal about housekeeping and cooking, of which they had no idea before, and the boys have to be taught how to plant even cassava to the best advantage. (The bitter cassava or manioc is the staple food of all the Indians in the Guianas and the valley of the Amazon).

There are eighty-three children on the books. The average attendance is about thirty-eight now, though in May there were sixty every day. Just at present there are comparatively few Indians here. Most are away working in their fields. This will give you some idea of how things are getting on.

CARY-ELWES, S.J.

Speaking recently at a farewell banquet, Lord Minto, the Governor-General of India, maintained that the education of Indians and the triumph of Japan over Russia have made the continuing of the old regime in that section of the British Empire, impossible. The claims of loyal unrest, as distinguished from sedition, he admitted, had to be acknowledged; and he thought that the extension of representation lately introduced the very best means of allaying it.

A M E R I C A

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1910.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1910, and published weekly by The America Press, New York, President, THOMAS J. CAMPBELL; Secretary, MICHAEL J. O'CONNOR; Treasurer, J. J. WILLIAMS.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Sq., W., New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

A Portuguese Prelate Speaks

"If the monarchy has fallen, it is because it could no longer maintain itself." Thus a Portuguese prelate of high rank, who, for the sake of his own welfare and that of his friends, preferred not to have his name published, began an interview which he gave to a representative of that staunchly Catholic newspaper, L'Univers. "During all these late years, the Conservatives (the party nominally devoted to religion and the monarchical regime) like the other parties, have not had in reality any other political program than their own interests, understanding the word in its lowest sense. The Portuguese are very good people, generally speaking. The farmers and villagers are very ignorant, without doubt, but they are laborious, and if the clergy had done their whole duty, they would be united to their parish priests and wholly devoted to the Church. Unhappily, too little attention, both in spirituals and temporals, has been given to a people naturally so well disposed. In spirituals, it is not so long ago that most of the clergy busied themselves in everything except the ministry. In the country, for example, the pastors exploited farms, and they were oftener seen at sales than in the sanctuary; in the cities it was the same thing, only in different ways. In fact, the government, like the old French monarchy, had brought the clergy under the yoke. From this point of view, it was in Portugal as it was in Brazil under the empire. The priests, it is true, had their civil status which will now be taken from them; the bishops sat by right in the Cortes. In army and navy, the Easter Communion was a duty, and at the holy season officers of both branches could be seen publicly fulfilling the obligation of the annual confession. On the other hand, there were not wanting priests who were Freemasons. The slavery was complete. To give a sermon or to sing a hymn before the Blessed Sacrament a permit from the civil authorities was necessary, for which a fee was charged; without the consent of the same civil power, no one could be ordained to the priesthood. It is only too plain that in these conditions the formation of an influential body of men was impossible; and they have ended by being found wanting. That which falls had to fall for want of a support. Considering things from a higher point of view, if the Portuguese Republic effects the separation of Church and State as it was effected by the Brazilian Republic, that is to say honorably, if one may use the word, namely leaving to the Church her full freedom of action without despoiling her as was done in France, one may say that in this sense, the change is for the better. Manifestly, everything leads one to suppose that the Portuguese revolution is too clearly masonic to effect the separation otherwise than it was done in France; but it will not be done off-hand. At the outset, the Republicans now in power must endeavor to pass as upright people; they will not dare begin their career with an injustice so great. Those who are effecting this revolution, or who have effected it if it is already effected, are no more than a handful of adventurers ready for anything. What is their intellectual worth? To judge of it, it suffices to read their manifesto, a string of adjectives, and to study one phrase, 'beneficent liberty, luminous in its virginal essence.' The whole manifesto would be a reflection on the intellectuality of the Haytians. On reading it, one fancies that Portugal is the antechamber of Africa. Those adventurers will not regenerate their people and their country. If they have obtained control, it is a proof that the Conservatives did not have a man; if they remain in power, it is a three-fold proof that the Conservatives have not a man. So it was in France in 1789. The truth, harsh and plain, is that good people are not always brave people. If they are afraid, what are you going to accomplish with them? No scheme succeeds, nothing is done, without the sacrifice of comfort, goods, possibly of life. It is not in Portugal alone that the good people are afraid and the good leader lacks followers. The fall of Portugal is one more sign of the proximity, if not of the imminence, of the catastrophes that threaten us. After Portugal, Spain. After Spain, whose turn is it? I believe that we shall be called upon to contemplate frightful things. And the haste with which Freemasonry is preparing for them makes me believe that we shall not have long to wait. The coming year with its exposition in Rome will have attractions that find no place on the official program. The Lisbon plot is but an episode."

The Cardinal and the Children

As His Eminence, Cardinal Vannutelli, bade farewell to America and Americans he left a parting message to the children. It was a happy thought and we believe entirely spontaneous that gave the children a prominent part in the greetings with which the representative of the Holy Father was received everywhere. From the day he landed at Quebec until he boarded the steamer at New York, the little ones were out in numbers and their bright and happy faces spoke a welcome which no other greeting could convey. As to the city of Champlain, it may be said that her children were her decorations. The great processions which marked the Cardinal Legate's reception in other places could not be rivaled in a city of fifty or sixty thousand inhabitants; but all the little ones of Quebec turned out to give the first glad greeting on American soil to the representative of the Father of Christendom. As the military escort provided by the famous regiment of papal zouaves wound their way to the upper city, the children lined the streets and were massed at every turn of the steep ascent. Thousands of boys under the care of the Christian Brothers, and as many girls from the schools of the various Sisterhoods, sang their carols and shouted their vivas and made the air vibrant with their jubilations. One of the prettiest sights in the streets of Quebec was witnessed in front of the old Basilica, where two lads dressed as pages of the French Court presented an address. His Eminence leaned over the side of his carriage to receive it, and with gracious smile he blessed them and then and there read their little address as if it were the most important part of his duty to do so. And how the song for the Pope rang out in French as the cortège moved on!

In Montreal the greeting was on a larger scale. One whole afternoon was given to the children. From twenty-five to thirty thousand of them marched to the cathedral before which His Eminence was enthroned. With waving flags and dipping bannerets they threw flowers at the foot of his throne and cheered with the warmth and lustiness of young hearts. All through the States similar scenes were witnessed, particularly in St. Louis, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Brooklyn and New York.

In St. Louis twenty thousand gaily dressed little ones from all the parish schools in the city marched through the city and were present at the Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament given by His Eminence. In New York the Cardinal celebrated Pontifical Mass in St. Patrick's Cathedral, where eight thousand youthful voices joined in chanting the Gregorian service. So touched was His Eminence with the unique character of the occasion that through the Archbishop he praised the children for their remarkable singing and promised that he would tell the Holy Father of that glorious day. Again the week before his departure the Cardinal rode through a great part of the city of Brooklyn and here too all the Catholic children of the districts through which he passed were in line to do him honor.

But the distinguished visitor did not by any means wait until the children presented themselves. He, on his part, with a paternal instinct sought them out wherever he went. In every city that was honored with his presence the hours of the morning and afternoon not given over to sacred functions and official duties were generously ceded to the lambs of the flock. Academies, schools, orphan asylums, houses of correction, children's wards in hospitals, industrial homes, wherever there was a gathering of children, particularly the children of his native Italy, there he was sure to go, encouraging the little ones with his gracious words and imparting a father's blessing before his departure. All this gives point to the last words he uttered on leaving our shores: "My heart has been filled with consolation in witnessing here the loyalty to and attachment for the Holy See and the love and affection for the Holy Father. One thing especially has moved and interested me in the many places I have visited, and that is the welcome given me by the children. None are so dear to Our Saviour as these little ones. Wherever I saw them their bright little faces beamed with that enthusiasm which shows the faith so well nourished in their hearts. And this is a strong factor in the growth, spread and progress of Catholicism in America."

Anglican Misrepresentation

That the conversions following the differences of the clergy of St. Bartholomew's and of the Annunciation, Brighton, with the Bishop of Chichester must be very irritating to Anglicans, needs no proof. That they alarm the High Church leaders, is clear from a letter of Mr. T. A. Lacey, the unsuccessful special pleader for Anglican orders at the time of the Commission of Leo XIII. Writing to the Times he pretends to gather from a letter the late Brighton vicars addressed to the public press, the following summary of their position:

"We are resolved to do and teach certain things. We realize that we should not do or teach them except at the bidding of a superior authority; therefore we have sought such an authority to which we will humbly submit ourselves."

He then adds: "Is this really what is meant by discipleship?"

This reveals the method that is being used to hold back wavering Anglicans from the Catholic Church. It is captious and insincere as the Bishop of London's famous Frogs' of Fulham Palace argument and his later apothegm: "Why am I not a Roman Catholic? Because, thank God, I am an English Catholic." Had Messrs. Cocks and Hinde resolved to do and teach certain things out of their own heads, as, for instance, to try to heal the sick according to Emmanuel ideas, or to teach their people that heaven is best to be reached by means of an airship, and forbidden to do so by the Bishop, had left the Church of England, to submit to some self-constituted authority for such vagaries, Mr. Lacey's gibe would have its force.

But the matter at issue was the Catholic doctrine of the Holy Eucharist. We are not ready to defend the Anglican careers of Messrs. Cocks and Hinde. That is the affair of the body that ordained them, instituted them and retained them in its ministry. It seems clear, nevertheless, that they held the continuity, not merely legal and historical, but real and doctrinal of the pre-reformation Church in the existing Church of England. Their position was that of the men of Cornwall: "We will have the Holy Sacrament hung up over the altar as in our fathers' time." And when the Bishop, whom they had taken to hold continuity as they did, answered them in terms savoring of the Articles rather than of the old Catholic Faith, they saw the truth. The doctrine of Transubstantiation which every authority in the Catholic Church must impose on its subjects was no part of the Bishop's creed, no doctrine of the Church of England. Neither he nor it was Catholic; and they must seek salvation in the one true Church which teaches with authority the doctrines committed to it by Christ.

Columbus Day and Puritans

It was doubtless a mere coincidence that the Congregationalists held their plenary council in Boston during Columbus week and that the great procession which marked the anniversary of America's discovery was the distraction thrust upon the Congregational delegates while they were assembled there. It was Boston's first observance of the new legal holiday. The 30,000 marchers, some say 50,000, others again 60,000, were almost entirely members of Catholic organizations.

It was not merely a spectacular exhibition of the numerical strength of Catholics—though presumably this intention was far from the mind of the organizers—but an ocular demonstration that the rank and file of the Catholic Church members in Boston, as in many other large centres in the country, are made up of the sons of toil. Perhaps the cosmopolitan character of the procession added inspiration to the Congregational ministers in session, for in their resolutions they were insistent that a better understanding between the Congregational Church and the workingman was a consummation devoutly to be wished.

With a heartiness and a unanimity which did credit to their earnestness, the convention pledged itself to emulate, not the Catholic Church, for that under the circumstances would be expecting too much, but the zeal and effectiveness of their Presbyterian brothers. Was this only a passing tribute to the church body from which they separated when they established not a church but a congregation that would keep its preacher but would steer its barque "without pope, prelate, presbytery, prince or parliament?" Certainly we are not aware that the Presbyterians have attained to any wide distinction in this department of Christian endeavor, and the information would be enlightening, if more specific.

The impression which the local Columbus celebration made on one of the visiting members of the Congregationalists, Dr. Washington Gladden, is told honestly by that clergyman in the Boston Transcript:

"The fact that this great concourse of the sons of the Puritans was punctuated by the festivities of "Columbus Day" was a coincidence which could not fail to provoke reflection. What would the men of Winthrop's day or the men of the days of Sam Adams have said if anyone had predicted that a time would come when an army of 50,000 Roman Catholics, with bands and banners, would march over Beacon Hill? Yet I have not been able to discover that these sons of the Puritans now encamped in Boston have been seriously disturbed by this exhibition. Considerable inconvenience was caused by the parade to many of them, but I have heard no ill-natured word spoken about it. Nor have I heard any outcry of alarm over this display of the power of the ancient Church in the stronghold of Puritanism. It would be difficult for any fair-minded man who watched that procession to feel that these thousands of clean-faced, well-dressed, orderly, self-respecting men and boys were a dangerous element in our society. We know that their essential loyalty to the fundamental principles of our democracy is beyond all question."

Don Jaime on Canalejas

Whatever may be the merits or the demerits of the Salic Law, by which females were excluded from the succession to the throne in Spain, all must admit that when Philip V introduced it, he acted within the limits of his recognized prerogative. It is likewise beyond cavil that Ferdinand VII had the same power over that particular enactment at the time when he is said to have revoked it, only to restore it again and then revoke it once more. The question that disturbs so many Spanish minds is whether, when Ferdinand last revoked the Salic Law, he was sufficiently in the possession of his faculties to know what he was doing. If the old king's will was to do away with the decree of his predecessor and fix the succession on his little daughter Isabella, thus excluding his younger brother Carlos, there is no flaw in the title of King Alfonso XIII, and Don Jaime, Alfonso's cousin, has not the shadow of a claim. But Jaime's political adherents maintain, and they will not be gainsaid, that Ferdinand was doddering and his spouse Doña Cristina manipulated the decree in the interests of herself and her friends. Who is to settle the dispute?

The gyrations of Señor Canalejas, the President of the Council, have called forth a lengthy expression of opinion from Don Jaime. He says that the ministry is frivolously inconsistent in its course, which is wanting in wisdom, prudence and sense. If Moret was unseated because he was thought too "advanced," his successor is much more "advanced," and has started on a career that is beneficial only to the foes of the dynasty. His pretended reforms are but playthings with which to amuse children. "Far be it from me," says Don Jaime, "to say that the Concordat cannot be bettered and that the relations between Church and State do not need certain modifications. My party, which is charged with being entirely in the power of the clergy and the Pope, which is reproached with being the party of intolerance, almost of the Inquisition, would know how to negotiate with the Vatican and bring about the needed modifications. But Canalejas, with his sudden and unexpected decrees, acts as if the Pope did not exist. The Supreme Pontiff is treated with a scandalous irreverence that would not be shown to an African kinglet. There are true reforms which are clamoring for the attention that rapidly succeeding cabinets have not given them: The development of roads and railways, reforestation, improvements in agriculture, a serious attempt at primary education. Spain is hungering for these reforms; to satisfy that hunger, the ministry proposes to feed a few friars to the nation. Parliamentary rule, as it exists in Spain, is the greatest of evils with which a country could be afflicted, for it is built up on infamous venality and corruption among voters and candidates. We Carlists wish to substitute for the present system the representation by groups, as was the case in the Cortes of ancient days. In those days, the successful candidates came with an imperative mandate from their constituents to discuss and settle certain definite questions and not to meddle with everything and end by accomplishing nothing. When a certain statesman begged Alfonso XIII to do something to relieve the distress of the country, his answer was, 'What am I to do? You always deal me the same hand and the cards are worthless.' It is much easier to take refuge behind a cabinet, invoke the Constitution and the king's powerlessness, and spend one's time at polo or golf and in winning cups at regattas. A king is always responsible before his people.

"What is the consequence of all this? Those who ought to guide the nation are losing ground daily. This powerlessness and sterility of the monarchy is the reason why the 'advanced' republicans and socialists are becoming more numerous. A republic is impossible in Spain, for it would degenerate swiftly into socialism and from socialism into anarchy. As legitimate heir to the throne of Spain, I shall maintain the rights that I received from my fathers; but the defence of those rights will never suggest to me to plunge my country into the horrors of civil war. But the day when public order is so disturbed that the country is brought face to face with the dilemma, revolution or restoration of the legitimate monarchy, no consideration will detain me; I shall know how to do my duty."

It looks very much as if Canalejas realizes the critical state of affairs in Spain and is trying to placate the radical element by waging war against the religious, for they cannot fight back; but he will know for certain, what he must now fear, that when the sleigh is pursued by wolves what is tossed to them simply whets their appetite, arouses their fury, and makes the pursuit hotter. And the chariot of state is too slow of movement to remain long at a safe distance ahead of the pack that is howling on its track.

Another Trent Affair

On November 8, 1861, Captain Wilkes, in the United States ship, San Jacinto, stopped the Royal Mail Steam-Packet Company's vessel Trent in the Bahama Channel, by firing a shot across her bows in the good old style. He then sent an armed boarding party which took out of her the Confederate Commissioners Slidell and Mason and carried them prisoners to the American warship. Thus the Trent became famous and gained the right to hand her name down to successors.

After nearly half a century, on October 18, 1910, the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company's vessel Trent was stopped on the high seas by Captain Wellman in the American ship America. This was an airship, not a warship, and the means used to stop the Trent was not the swaggering hostile shot across the bows but the suaver night signaling and the wireless telegraph. Captain Wellman had no thought of taking anybody from the Trent. He sought, on the contrary, to pass to her with his four companions from his airship on the point of foundering, if it be allowed to transfer a sea term to a vessel navigating the air.

The first Trent affair came near to causing war with England—we have to thank the wisdom of Lincoln on our side and of Queen Victoria on the other, that it did not—and the loss of countless lives. This Trent affair saved the lives of five rash adventurers who set out to cross the ocean in the air, and by enabling us to get the story of their adventure and to learn from it how unfit is any airship yet designed to cope with the storm winds of the Atlantic, it will, we hope, have the effect of saving the lives of many others by deterring them from such suicidal attempts.

Berlin Catholics held a meeting to protest against the insults which the Jewish Mayor of Rome had uttered against the Holy Father and the Church. A hall with a capacity of four thousand had been secured, but proved too small; a second hall accommodating two thousand was hurriedly hired for an overflow meeting, and yet a great crowd had to be content with an open air demonstration. The three speakers in the main hall were members of the Reichstag. One of them, Herr Erzberger, spoke on the international Kulturkampf against the Church. He concluded a strong speech by solemnly promising in his own name and in that of every Catholic in Berlin to say at least two rosaries and to offer a Holy Communion for the Holy Father. The Cardinal Archbishop of Cologne and several other bishops have published special pastoral letters, in which they exhort the faithful to liberal contributions to the Peter's pence as a testimony of their sympathy with the Pope in his present needs.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

When on a bright, sunny afternoon you turn east from Fifth avenue at Twenty-eighth street and go into St. Leo's Church, it is impossible for some little time to see anything but a faint blur of light at the altar behind the grille, whereon, lit by twelve candles, reposes in the Monstrance, Our Lord, Almighty God, in the Sacrament of the altar. Presently, as the eyes adjust themselves to the darkness around, you make out two motionless figures in robes of white and blue before the altar and by degrees the outlines of the church, the benches, the pictures on the walls and the people at their devotions become perceptible. The people—mostly women, and yet the majority is not so crushing!—are scattered through the benches. There is silence around you, for it is only a very faint, dull murmur of the outside world that filters in, and through this murmur come the chimes from the Campanile in Madison Square every quarter, wonderfully soft yet wonderfully clear. Occasionally some one comes in, some one rises and goes out, but there is very little of either movement or noise to distract one's attention. And always there are the motionless figures in white and blue kneeling before the altar.

The other afternoon I went in and on turning into what I supposed in my semi-blindness was an unoccupied pew I literally walked on someone who hastily moved along the seat murmuring:

"Come right in—don't mind me."

It proved to be the Rector, of all men, and he received my apologies with a smile. Ten minutes later we went out and I asked him what he was doing at five o'clock on a Saturday afternoon at St. Leo's Church, when he should have been in his box.

"My son, I'm on a holiday. I've got a mission in my parish and I left the Rectory over an hour ago, saying I was going hither and yon and would be home when I got back, maybe, and no one knows where I am but you. Moreover, we are going for a walk up Fifth avenue, for I haven't been on Fifth avenue on a Saturday afternoon in October in years and I don't know when I'll get a chance again. So come. Andiamo!"

We started up, taking the east side. It was a jam of automobiles and carriages, a stench of imperfectly combusted gasoline in one's nostrils, a roar and a rattle in one's ears and a stream of men and women that kept us dodging back and forth across the wide pavement. The restaurants had given up their luncheon crowds, the theatres were "out" and it was a holiday mob of men and women, all ages, all styles—and did anyone ever see the equal of this year's styles for making a pretty woman look like a French vaudevilliste, and a cheap one at that?—and all bent on pleasure, pleasure, pleasure as New York understands that word. Possibly it might have been the effect of the Rector's company upon my imagination that it seemed to me if I saw the World, the Flesh and the Devil perfectly expressed in humanity before me.

"Padre, when you think where we've just come from—" I said—

"And where I ordinarily am at this hour," said he, "'pon my word it makes me laugh—it actually does, and it's no laughing matter. What a town this is! What a town!"

We pushed along silently for a while and came to Thirty-fourth street and here the jam was worse than ever. We stood waiting our chance to cross and finally succeeded, just managing to avoid being run down by a huge touring car filled with fat Jewesses, tastefully attired in auto-coats, goggles and the other paraphernalia usual to the occasion. They laughed as they went by and it was as the sound of a buzz-saw working on a piece of brass.

"Dear me," said the Rector, "I wonder—" and then he stopped.

"What do you wonder, Padre?" I asked him. We were now more free from the crowd and were stepping out at a better pace.

"Well, it's very strange how the mind works. Those women in that car reminded me of an old parishioner of mine who died this week in St. Vincent's Hospital. It was a very curious case—no, I don't think it was curious, rather the contrary, in fact, but not usual. A fine old woman she was, too, seventy-five years old, tall, spare, with a large, grave, dignified face and a soft, low voice—an Irishwoman sixty years in this country and her brogue intact! South of Ireland, I fancy."

"Well?" I said, after a moment or two, as he didn't seem to be going on.

"She sent for me on Monday. The sister told me she had come in on the Friday before. It seems that on Thursday she went to the Dispensary and the Doctor found her with a temperature of 104 degrees and a very serious heart affection. 'You're a mighty sick woman,' he said to her. 'Can you go to the hospital?' 'Of course I can,' said she, 'I'm no charity patient either if I do come to the Dispensary.' 'In you go now, then,' says he. 'I will not,' says she, 'I never left a place yet without giving notice and I'm going back to tell them where I'm going. I'm twenty years with them,' says she, 'and it's their due,' and off she went. How she did it neither the doctor nor the sisters can imagine, but she did and she came back the next morning and went in. She insisted on being a paying patient and arranged for seven dollars a week. She asked the sisters to tell her how long she'd probably last. 'I've got eighty-five dollars with me,' she said, 'and plenty more in the bank and I want to be sure I've enough.' The sister asked the doctor to tell her, and the doctor did—two weeks at most. 'I've plenty then,' she said, 'and enough for the undertaker,' and she directed that he was to give her a plain coffin 'and no frills,' as she put it. I was sent for on Monday.

"She had only that moment been pulled out of a state of collapse, but when I came in she was able to talk. 'Well, Mary, I said, 'I suppose you'd like me to fix you up.' 'No indeed, Father,' she said, 'Father—did that for me Saturday. I wasn't much trouble, ayther, for you've taken good care of me all the years I've been going to you. That wasn't what I wanted to see ye about. I'm all ready to go any time and the Lord won't be hard on me. I'm not afraid—not a bit. Ready and willin', I am to go, whenever He says the word. Seventy-five years I've had and no sickness and no trouble. Never a drunken husband nor a bad boy or girl—an' me health! An' no one to sorrow over me whin I'm gone. Ready an' willin' I am.

"Now what do you suppose that good woman wanted of me? She told me she had some money in the savings bank and that I was to have it for my school, and I was to take all precautions before she died so that there would be no hitch about it afterwards. Catholic schools were her particular hobby. She could read and write herself—not much more—but all her life she had given generously for schools. I think there was some reason that she didn't tell me—some special personal reason—but I didn't learn it. Anyhow, I had then and there to draw a paper for her according to which her bank books should come to me to be used for my school, which I did.

"Now there's such a thing as presumption, and there's such a thing as despair, but I never saw in all my experience the like of her disposition for death. They were such an exquisite blend of humility, gratitude, and confidence! When I was going away I said I would say Mass for her recovery or happy death and she wouldn't have it that way. 'Ye won't dictate to Our Lord,' she said; 'just say Mass that His will be done—it's all I want and a Mass when I'm gone.' She died on Wednesday and we buried her yesterday. And how many people who had to do with her knew her for what she was? It must be such as she that keep the fire and brimstone from New York."

"Padre, what on earth put her into your mind just then? And what was it you wondered as we ducked that automobile?"

"Well, I wondered what those ladies would have of thought of old Mary, and what old Mary would have thought of them. And what they'll think of each other on Judgment Day. And—and, a whole lot of other things."

We had reached Forty-second street and the Rector stopped.

"I think I've had enough of this," he said, "and I'll go over to Sixth avenue and take a car back downtown. Besides I've got some good material for a special meditation and I want to give it to one of the missionaries."

"Meditation on what?" I asked.

"The Garden of Gethsemane," he said, as he waved me goodbye and started westward on Forty-second street.

ANDREW PROUT.

LITERATURE

The Life of an Enclosed Nun. By a MOTHER SUPERIOR. New York: The John Lane Company. Price, $1.00 net.

We more than approve of this book; we strongly recommend it. We cannot think of any class of readers who will not find it interesting and elevating. Its sweetness is the beauty of holy living told in the simple, half-reluctant accents of one whom the love of truth has urged forward from friendly seclusion to answer calumny and dissipate misunderstandings. We recommend this book especially—of course, we do not expect our recommendation to reach them—to the brood of modern poets who are searching for beauty in every place but heaven, and in every age except in a Christian age, and straining their fancy and, incidentally, language in the creation of extravagant characters and situations. The potential poetry of the little book before us could furnish forth a regiment of the thin-voiced poets, who eke a volume out of some poor little episode of pagan antiquity, or who spend their days and nights diligently sorting over the sins of humanity for the subject of a lyric. When we come unexpectedly upon a book like this, during an enforced course in contemporary literature, we take in deep breaths of contentment and sheer delight. Without very much hope or lively anticipation we find ourselves suddenly clear of the miasmas of the lowlands, up where the winds sweep, pure and wholesome and bracing, and the sun shines in a flawless sky. This may sound immoderate and exaggerated. Our excuse is the inherent beauty of this gentle "Life," and the violent contrast it supplies to so many of the books issued by our great publishing houses. The thirsty traveler in Sahara may be allowed, even though he were an Anglo-Saxon, a slightly demonstrative exhibition of feeling when he stumbles upon a spring of running waters.

The author of "The Life of an Enclosed Nun" is a convert. She tells us about her girlhood at home and in school, the manner in which the Catholic Faith came to her, her vocation, her entrance into a cloistered order of nuns, and her life in the convent during the twenty years from the time of her noviceship to the present. The picture which she draws of herself and of the convent life combines in a remarkable way frankness as to the facts and delicacy in the handling of them. She nowhere over-colors or strikes a false note. One might be tempted to describe the book as a plain statement of the case for conventual life, did it not manage in some manner to invest itself with the magical aura of literary art. One cannot help admiring the temper, judgment and ability of the author in the performance of a difficult task.

Her task was imposed upon her by circumstances. There seems to exist still in England a large residue of evangelical hatred and suspicion of the Catholic Church. It is impossible to determine exactly how much of this is due to ignorance and how much to mere malice. In our eyes it partakes more of the latter quality whenever it directs its pernicious energies against the convents of nuns, printing wild charges of inhumanity and even immorality against them, asking for official investigations, encouraging by bribes and promises fallen Catholics to appear against them on public platforms, and employing all those other vulgar methods of slander which prevailed in this country a long time ago and now survive happily only in backwoods districts, impervious as yet to the infiltrations of civilization. One might well be sceptical that such a condition of public mind could still exist in any large and cultured community. But the fact that this book exists is proof that the anti-Catholic virus is still working in the veins of modern Protestants at least in England. However, we feel indebted to the Protestant Alliance for being the occasion of a beautiful piece of Catholic art. The Mother Superior has answered the narrow critics of Catholic Sisterhoods after the manner of Cardinal Newman in his famous "Apologia pro Vita Sua." Instead of taking up one silly slander after another and answering it, she has simply given the world an account of her own life, especially as it has been spent within convent walls. As an apology for the gentle and useful and beautiful life of women consecrated to God, it is a most convincing narrative, and, as a description and explanation of a little-understood matter, ought to be read by many Catholics, as well as by all non-Catholics. Its sound common sense gives it, moreover, the character of a spiritual treatise that even a religious might not find unprofitable.

We feel that with the best of intentions we have not done justice to this gem of autobiography. Unless we take oversanguine views of the chances of a good book with the modern-reading public—especially the Catholic portion of it—this little book will have an effect out of all proportion to its size and unpretentious appearance.

We have only one criticism to make. The author tells us that, at the time of her profession, her father, who was not a Catholic, tried unsuccessfully to dissuade her from taking this final step; and she confesses that she was "convinced that family affection had already begun to wane." If we were not persuaded by the rest of the narrative that it was genuine and accreditable to the source stated on the title-page, this bit of confession would give us pause. We do not think it is at all usual or characteristic for a nun or a religious of any kind to allow family affection to wane. It is our experience that the religious life preserves it longer, as it preserves it purer, than is ordinarily the case under any of the normal conditions in which families exist. The exceptional experience, in this respect, of the author may have been due, of course, to the peculiar circumstances in which her family life was passed. As she describes it, her family was unsympathetic and strongly lacking in anything resembling religious spirit. This was a great misfortune which God used in her case to lead her to Himself. His ways are manifold and wonderful. But some hint should, it seems to us, have been thrown out, for the sake of unbelievers, that this is not the common soil for the flowers of religious vocation to grow in. Religious perfection of the highest kind does not involve the destruction of legitimate natural affections. The command, Honor thy father and thy mother, holds for religious, as well as for everyone else. The religious life only purifies and exalts and supernaturalizes the affections of the heart. It teaches us not to honor our parents less, but to honor God more; and, strange to say, while the honor due parents seems sometimes to suffer in a conflict with that due to God, it always turns out that, whenever the honor of God triumphs in the apparent conflict, the parental honor gains instead of losing; whereas, whenever the honoring of parents succeeds in opposing the clear calling of God to sacrifice and renunciation, the gain to parents is transitory and illusive. This is a mystery to non-Catholics.

The publisher tells us in a brief prefatory note that some simplifications of phraseology have been necessary in order to make the narrative comprehensible to non-Catholics. This has been done skilfully. We would, however, call attention to the probable misspelling of the Latin word, acedia, employed to describe those periods when nature hangs back heavily and stubbornly in the pursuit of supernatural ideals. The form, accidia, occurring twice in the course of the narrative, is strange and unmeaning. The printer, again, seems to have been taking liberties in the French sentence, "C'est onze-heure et demi: levez toi!"

JAMES J. DALY, S.J.

Lectures on the History of Religions, Vols. I-IV. B. Herder, St. Louis. 60 cents per vol. net.

Many in England are in continual fear of being attacked by Germany. Whether the fear is reasonable or groundless, time alone will tell. The chief organ of its expression is Lord Charles Beresford, who has just written two open letters to the Prime Minister on the insufficiency of the navy. Mr. Asquith's reply is in very kindly terms to the effect that the Government will do all in its power to provide for the nation's safety.

Unhappily for the Minister the problem seems almost insoluble. If Germany is really going to attack England, it can find any number of points to attack. It has this advantage that it can concentrate all its force upon one of these points; while the British fleet must be ready to concentrate in superior force at any point between the Straits of Dover and the Pentland Frith, and must keep an eye on the waters to the north, lest the enemy should slip round and come down on an unprotected western coast. Hence the expenditure for ships of war grows year by year to the disgust of taxpayers, and now seems to be near the limit, beyond which it cannot go.

The condition of the Church to-day is not unlike England's. Rationalism is arrayed against it, choosing the time and the point of attack, which at all times and in all places the Church must be prepared to meet. Its theology, the scientific exposition of its doctrines, is so vast, so profound as to be a sufficient employment for the intellectual energies of its ministers; and when one reflects that these must also have an acquaintance with profane letters from which come the graces of expression with which hearers more or less cultured require the Gospel message to be clothed, one sees that those energies are taxed to the full. The enemy making no account of this, avoiding all the fortresses of the faith, may direct his attack now by way of physical science, now by way of ethnology, now by way of some other science, now by way of some false science newly invented, and the Church must be ready always to meet it. Were the Church not supernatural, indefectible, strong not in human power but in the divine might, one could not be blamed for looking on its cause as almost hopeless.

A Rationalistic science falsely so called is that of a Comparative Religion. It is necessarily false because such are its first principles, the denial of a primitive revelation and the assumption of the degradation of primeval man. It is false because, science being the knowledge of things by their causes, the data in the matter are for Rationalists so limited as to make the investigation of causes an absurdity. Hence their Comparative Religion is nothing but a bundle of changing hypotheses as Father de Grandmaison well points out in the first essay of the series under review. For the Christian, God has revealed the origins of false religions, notably in the Book of Wisdom, in the first chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, in St. Paul's sermon to the Athenians, and with these we rest well content. Nevertheless, as error must be met, some must take up the ungrateful task of wading through the vain imaginings of the Rationalist. For this reason the gift of 100,000 francs made by the reigning Pontiff to the Institut Catholique of Paris has been applied to the founding of a chair for this purpose.

The lectures we are noticing have been published with the idea of putting before the student, by way of introduction to a Catholic investigation of the comparative history of religion, the facts of the religions of the world. Now and again comparisons are made, but this is not the purpose of the series. That the matter is dangerous to handle goes without saying. The danger to morals has been removed perhaps by the suppression of all unnecessary allusion to the diabolical foulness of most of the false religions. Should anyone doubt the danger to the humility of faith he need but read in the lecture on Buddhism: "See Buddhism as it is and you cannot dispute the superiority of Christianity. But let us carefully note that the superiority—at least to the extent to which a historian of religion is called upon to judge it—is primarily that of the western mind over the Hindu" (Vol. I, page 29). The latter assertion is patently false. The implication that the student of Comparative Religion ought, so to speak, to put off his faith, ignore the divine nature of Christianity, to constitute himself a judge and admit it to his court only on the same footing as the pagan religions, is nothing but Rationalism.

The lectures are so very elementary as to make it surprising that the editor recommends and allows others to recommend to their readers books by men far removed from the Catholic Faith. We have this advice to give to those that read this series. Study carefully sections v, vi and vii of the essay of Father de Grandmaison's essay in volume I, and the introduction of the editor; and take as your guides the thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth chapters of the Book of Wisdom and the first chapter of the Epistles to the Romans from the eighteenth verse to the end.

H. W.

One Christmas Eve at Roxbury Crossing, and Other Christmas Tales. By CATHRYN WALLACE. New York and Cincinnati: F. Pustet & Co. Price 75 cents.

Of the making of good, wholesome books for children there should be no end, for the reading public, as far as children are concerned, is interested and attracted by what is novel, and novelty means frequent change of persons and scenes. Four stories full of incident and lively dialogue make the plump little volume which the authoress here offers to juvenile readers, who will undoubtedly find much pleasure in reading them.

Round the World. A Series of Interesting Illustrated Articles on a Great Variety of Subjects; 87 Illustrations. New York: Benziger Bros. Price $1.00.

This is the eighth volume of the series and keeps close to the standard set in the first. It is really "round the world" in its scope, for Europe, Asia and America are laid under its contribution. The famous Irish pilgrimage, St. Patrick's Purgatory, rich in ancient memories and cherished now as of yore, life in the navy, Japanese art, the Chippewas, olive oil, and an American country home will give some notion of the rapidly shifting scenes that its two hundred and more pages present. We are sure that it will furnish interesting and helpful matter for the enterprising teacher to read to her class.

Footsteps in the Ward. By H. M. CAPES. London: Sands & Co. St. Louis: Herder. 50 cents net.

The title story is one of three tales of ghostly or preternatural visitations. They are well told, thoroughly interesting in matter and manner, and, whether founded on fact or purely fictitious, point a wholesome lesson. "The Curse of the Branscombes" makes a half-witted man pronounce while being hanged a prophetic curse in eight excellent anapestic lines and his wraith to continue to repeat them for centuries thereafter, but those who like ghost stories will find it thrilling. The printing, binding and illustrations are excellent.

* * *

Argentina. By W. A. HIRST, with an Introduction by MARTIN HUME, M.A. Map and Sixty-four Illustrations. Pp. xxviii, 308, uncut. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

The richest of the South American republics in the elements of future greatness in the industrial and commercial world has found a thoughtful and conscientious writer to present her claims to the reading public. With an Englishman's inborn distrust of superlatives he begins in a moderate tone and, depending on facts rather than florid expressions, tells us of Argentina as she is to-day, with enough of her past to explain her position and to justify her hopes. A bird's-eye view of the country's natural divisions introduces the reader to the period of Spanish domination, where he finds Spain's colonial system carefully unfolded and described. In a work which is intended to open the eyes of manufacturers and promote business interests, it is gratifying to note that he gives respectful attention and just praise to the work of the Church, and the influence of missionaries in providing for the spiritual and intellectual wants of the young colony and the native tribes.

His study of the War of Independence, its causes, progress and results shows the thinker rather than the more popular flamboyant stump-speaker or "jingoist." The career of the dictator Rosas finds no counterpart among the Spanish viceroys.

The sources of Argentina's coming preponderance in South America, some of which have thus far hardly been tapped, are set forth for the guidance of the capitalist, the manufacturer and the artisan. Cattle, sheep, cereals, the vine and the riches of unexplored forests are in turn treated with all the detail that a prospective settler might wish to find. In a country which extends from 22 degrees to 55 degrees, south latitude, and from sea-level to the snow-capped crest of the Andes, there is room for the greatest variety of natural and cultivated products as there is found the greatest diversity of topographical conditions.

The stay-at-home traveler will find well spent the time that he devotes to "Argentina;" the prospective investor will find it a sober, uncolored statement of actual conditions and future possibilities.

* * *

The Life of Blessed John Eudes. By the REV. MATTHEW RUSSELL, S.J. London: Burns & Oates. New York: Benziger Bros. Price 90 cents.

The life story of the Blessed John Eudes is unfolded in the present volume most interestingly and with wonderful completeness when one takes into account the extent and variety of all that was accomplished by this holy man. The years of missionary labor as an Oratorian, the several foundations of religious congregations, particularly that of the Good Shepherd nuns and the establishment of the Eudist Fathers, to take charge of Seminaries, and his pioneer work in the propagation of devotion to the Sacred Heart are so many testimonies to the zeal of this apostle of the 17th century and to the merit of his claim to the gratitude and veneration of Christendom.

The brevity of the life is not due to lack of materials. A loving disciple of the Blessed, as Father Russell informs us, has already written his life in French in four large volumes of more than two thousand four hundred pages. Within the last decade a complete edition of his writings has been in preparation, ten volumes of which appeared in 1905, and two more are soon to be published. The biography with which we are here favored would tempt one to peep into these voluminous remains, or at least into such an abridgment of them as has been given of the life.

The apostolic spirit is as needful now in the Church as in any period of her history. The humanitarianism of the day is working side by side with the supernatural activity of the children of the Faith. Enormous sums of money are spent in relieving the physical ailments of humanity, and many devote their lives to the work sometimes with meagre compensation but never with any thought of pleasing God, who has laid upon His followers the commandment to love one another. The life of Blessed John Eudes shows how an active life given over to the help of one's neighbor may be directed by the highest motive, that of promoting the glory of God and the eternal welfare of souls.

The personal charm which invests whatever Father Russell writes adds not a little to the beauty of the simple narrative. Knowing the wide extent of the Congregation of our Lady of Charity of the Good Shepherd throughout the United States, we could wish for a more extended reference to the work which its numerous houses with their thousands of inmates are doing in America, and which is adding daily to the glory of their Blessed founder. Father Russell deserves our gratitude for making known to English-speaking Catholics the story which he tells so attractively of this wonderful servant of God.

E. S.

I. Traité Des Scrupules, par L'ABBÉ GRIMES. Paris: Pierre Téqui, 82 Rue Bonaparte.

II. Direction pour rassurer dans leurs doutes les âmes timorées, par le R. P. QUADRUPANI. Paris: Pierre Téqui.

III. Direction pratique et morale pour vivre chrétiennement, par le R. P. QUADRUPANI. Paris: Pierre Téqui.

These little Baedekers for the spiritual life, as the booklets might not inaptly be called, are marked by sound doctrine, methodical arrangement and a charming simplicity.

If English readers ever become acquainted, through a translation, with the work of l'abbé Grimes, they will find in his brief pages a sane and correct exposition of the nature, symptoms, causes, effects and remedies of scruples, that tells all that he needs to know of that painful and at times dangerous disease.

The two other works are a translation from the Italian of Father Chas. Quadruvani. A century ago Quadruvani was one of Italy's most famous preachers, equally popular with the court of Turin and the shepherd-folk of Piedmont and Lombardy. Addressing in his first book the same class for whom l'abbé Grimes writes, Quadruvani quaintly tells his reader: "If you follow these instructions, you will have for guide and director not the one who writes these lines, but St. Augustine, St. Thomas, St. Philip de Neri, and especially St. Francis de Sales, men in whom all recognize great holiness, learning and experience, the three conditions necessary for a leader in the Church of God and a safe guide for souls."

In this treatise, as well as in the second, which is meant for the faithful in general, Quadruvani treads safely in the path of his great masters. Like the gentle Bishop of Geneva, he has the gift of unction, and knows how to make virtue and piety attractive.

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

BOOKS RECEIVED

"Just Folks." By Clara E. Laughlin. New York: The Macmillan Co. Net $1.50.

The Green Patch. By Bettina von Hutten. New York: Frederick A. Stokes & Co. Net $1.50.

The Attributes of God: Mirrored in the Perfections of Mary. New York: Benziger Bros. Net 90 cents.

The Life of an Enclosed Nun. By a Mother Superior. New York: The John Lane Co. Net $1.00.

Early Steps in the Fold. Instructions for Converts and Inquirers. By F. M. Zulueta, S.J. New York: P. J. Kennedy & Sons. Net $1.10.

Ordo Divini Officii Recitandi Missaeque Celebrandae. Cum Officiis Votivis Ex Indulto Tam Pro Clero Saeculari, Quam Pro Iis Quibus Kalendarium Proprium Clero Romano Concessum est. Pro Anno Domini MCMXI. New York: Frederick Pustet & Co.

St. Bridget of Sweden. By Francesca M. Steele. Preface by the Rev. G. Browne, D.D. New York: Benziger Brothers. Net 75 cents.

Gardens Near the Sea. The Making and Care of Gardens on or near the Coast, with Reference also to Lawns and Grounds and to Trees and Shrubbery. By Alice Lounsbury. New York: Frederick A. Stokes & Co. Net $4.20.

Periodicals and Serials in the Library of the Catholic University of America. 1910. Washington: The Catholic University.

EDUCATION

Is it not time that the ardent followers of the new movement looking to the teaching of morality in the public schools, morality, they hasten to explain, entirely distinct from sectarian religion, should pay some heed to the argument always insisted upon not only by Catholics, but by innumerable non-Catholics as well, who recognize that in the great practical world about us morality unsupported by definite religious creed is unthinkable? We have every sympathy with the disposition of heart that prompts the purpose of the strong association which is now at work in the land to secure moral teaching as a regular feature of the school system. Yet we regret that their efforts can have no lasting satisfactory results. In whatever schools religion is not taught, morality is not taught, and where morality is not taught, the heart, conscience and will are not sufficiently educated for the duties and conflicts of life. Daniel Webster emphasized this nearly a century ago, when, in his famous speech in the Girard case, he said: "It is a mockery and an insult to common sense to maintain that a school for the instruction of youth from which Christian instruction by Christian teachers is sedulously and religiously shut out is not deistic and infidel in its tendency." The basis of the Catholic position is thus tersely stated by a correspondent of the new York Times. "Either the school admits, in its teaching, that God exists or that He does not exist, or that it does not know whether He exists or not. If it admits that He exists, then it is theistic; if it suppose that He does not exist, then it is atheistic; if it proposes not to know whether He exists or not, then it is agnostic. In every one of these cases the school is still sectarian. Now, are our public schools influenced by the principles of any sect? Most certainly they are. They are influenced by the principles of the sect which wishes to have schools without religious instructions." Still more emphatic are the words of a Protestant clergyman of New York: "If, to-day," he says, "Christ were on earth and should enter almost any public school house in the country, the teacher, acting under instruction, would show Him the door. If, on the other hand, He were to enter any of the parochial schools, He would be worshipped by teacher and scholars on bended knee."

A year ago Columbus Chapter, representing the fourteen Councils of the Knights of Columbus in northern New Jersey, observed the eve of Columbus Day by holding its inaugural Charity Ball. The proceeds amounting to $1,500 were generously handed over to the Trustees of St. Peter's College, Jersey City, for the foundation of a perpetual scholarship for poor boys. Encouraged by the success of last year, Columbus Chapter of the same district of New Jersey invited its friends to another social gathering on October 11, and has now founded a second scholarship at St. Peter's for the same laudable object. Cardinal Gibbons sent a kindly letter with his blessing to the Chairman, Mr. Joseph F. S. Fitzpatrick, for the good work.

SOCIOLOGY

The Anglican Church Congress, meeting lately at Cambridge has, in the discussion of social questions, gone to lengths somewhat scandalous in the eyes of old-fashioned Christians. A Dr. Shuttleworth remarked that it would be impossible to revive the old Spartan way of dealing with feeble infants, and that philanthropy and medical science vied with each other in thwarting Nature's methods of eliminating the unfit. It is not certain that he regretted these facts, so he must be given the benefit of the doubt. He recommended the forcible segregation of feeble-minded persons, persons of criminal antecedents, persons subject to intemperance etc., so as to prevent them from marrying. He seems not to have perceived that all these categories are matters of more or less. When the defects indicated are of a certain degree, public authority has long been accustomed to lock their subjects up. What advanced sociologists want is the segregation of those whom some irresponsible committee chosen from among themselves may think ought to be shut up. As there is no fixed standard of social fitness or unfitness, such a committee might fix its own, opening up possibilities of tyranny that make one tremble.

A Mrs. Pinsent complained of the cost to the community of the children who can never be useful citizens, and alleged this to be the cause of the diminishing birth-rate. She brought neither facts nor figures to prove her extraordinary assertions.

The Bishop of Ripon advised the urging of the classes mentioned not to marry, and the urging of the fit to marry as soon as possible. He held that in this matter men and women should think imperially. A man of an alcoholic family or a woman of criminal stock should remain unmarried through motives of patriotism which, on the other hand, should compel all of clean antecedents to marry early. Should patriotism be inefficacious to restrain the former they should be locked up. What should be done to the latter should they not hurry patriotically to have the banns published, he did not suggest. Neither had he a word to say on the religious aspects of these questions, though evidently they touch religion very closely. Nevertheless his utterances, worthy of an Anglican bishop, were received with cheers.

Mr. Fionan McColum and Rev. M. O'Flanagan, delegates of the Irish Gaelic League, are at present in New York, engaged in establishing an organization in support of the Gaelic Revival movement in Ireland, to be called the American Gaelic Alliance. Its object is to secure the co-operation of American sympathizers in preserving and spreading the Irish language, publishing Irish literature, fostering Irish industries, music and pastimes and reestablishing a distinctively Irish as opposed to an Anglicized Ireland. The United Irish Societies of New York have appointed a committee to cooperate with the delegates, and arrangements are being made for co-operation in other centres. Mr. John D. Crimmins has placed an office at Mr. McColum's disposal, at Emmett Arcade, 624 Madison avenue, New York, to which all communications should be addressed.

ECONOMICS

Los Angeles is a growing town. Perhaps it is not growing quite as fast as its friends are in the habit of saying. Few western towns really attain the lofty stature claimed for them until ten years or so after the claim has been made. Still Los Angeles is growing fast enough, and must have a water supply proportionate to its population of fifty years hence. The streams flowing west from the Sierra Nevada cannot suffice for both the irrigation of the country and the supply of the town. Owens lake, therefore, in Ingo county, to the east of the Sierra, has been taken as the source of a new water system. One may see from the map that the Sierra Nevadas end in Southern California with a sharp turn to the west, so that a line can be run along their flanks from Owens lake to the coast without meeting any serious engineering difficulties. The water will be carried by canals and closed aqueducts and tunnels through the Coast Range Mountains and at points in its fall from the high elevation of its source, it will be used to produce electric energy. The work will cost about 23 million dollars, and will take five years.

Forty per cent. of the imports into the United States in the last fiscal year came from the tropics, and was valued at 636 million dollars. Of it 96 million dollars worth came from the possessions of the United States. The chief items were sugar, 172 million dollars; rubber, 101 million dollars; coffee, 69 million dollars. It is worth noting that the importation of raw cotton is growing, the value of last year's imports being over 17 million dollars.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

On October 18, Belmont Abbey, North Carolina, was created a Cathedral Abbey, "Abbatia Nullius," the first of its kind in America. Founded in 1876, under most unpromising circumstances, the Abbey and College of Belmont developed marvellously in prosperity and fruitful influence under Abbot Leo Haid, O.S.B., who in 1887, was consecrated Vicar-Apostolic of North Carolina. In recognition of the extensive missionary and educational apostolate conducted by the Benedictines of Belmont, His Holiness, Pius X, has raised the Abbey to Cathedral rank, giving it independent jurisdiction. On Tuesday, Archbishop Falconio, the apostolic delegate, preceded in solemn procession by Bishops Haid, Northrop, Monaghan, Keiley, Van de Vyver, Kenny, and other church dignitaries, entered the Cathedral, and having celebrated solemn High Mass, formally published the decree of erection and imparted the Papal Benediction. Bishop Haid, O.S.B., is Arch-Abbot of the monastery, over which he has presided since its foundation.

An event significant of Catholic progress in South Carolina was the dedication of a new and handsome church at Anderson, October 17. Anderson is a progressive manufacturing town; but, like most places, in that State, outside of Charleston, contains few Catholics relatively to the population. Some Irish families settled there in the eighties, fitted up a chapel and secured the occasional visit of a priest, but growing in numbers, wealth and influence, they determined to erect the most imposing church in the town, and did so unaided. Bishop Northrop, of Charleston, dedicated the church last Sunday, and appointed a permanent pastor. Bishop Monaghan, of Wilmington, preached the dedication sermon. Bishop Keiley, of Savannah, paid a well-deserved tribute to the generous and sturdy faith of the Catholics of Anderson.

The American Federation of Catholic Societies will hold its ninth National Convention at New Orleans, November 13 to 16. The Louisiana Federation, under the direction of Archbishop Blenk and President Denechaud, have completed preparations for the reception of delegates who will be welcomed by Governor Sanders and Mayor Behrman. Archbishop Falconio, the Apostolic Delegate, will be present, and among the other prelates who have promised to attend are Archbishops Farley, Glennon, O'Connell and Messmer, Bishops McFaul and Monahan, and all the bishops of the Southern States. Bishop Morris, of Little Rock, will preach the opening sermon in St. Louis Cathedral, where a uniform Rank Company of Catholic Knights of America and the Fourth Degree Knights of Columbus will take part in the ceremonies. Two public mass meetings will be addressed by speakers of national repute. The Northern States will be well represented, among the delegates being two chiefs of the Dakotas on the part of the Catholic Indians. Representatives will also attend from Porto Rico, the Philippines and the Hawaiian Islands. Applications for credentials and particulars should be addressed to the National Secretary, 407 Victoria building, St. Louis, Mo.

At the request of Bishop Van de Ven the Pope has sanctioned the transfer of the See of Natchitoches, Northern Louisiana, established in 1853, to the city of Alexandria, and the Bishop took possession there on October 11. The new diocese of Alexandria, of which Bishop Van de Ven will be the first incumbent, will have the same boundaries as that of Natchitoches, which it supersedes, and St. Francis Xavier's has been designated as its Cathedral church. The change has been made because of the greater accessibility of Alexandria by railroad to the various portions of the diocese.

PERSONAL

Congressman Julius Kahn, of San Francisco, is in favor of having in the national capitol a statue of Father Junipero Serra. "Every State in the Union is entitled to place two statues of its citizens in the Statuary Hall" says the Congressman, "and most of the States have done so, except California. This is not a private hall of fame, but one that was started by the Federal Government. When the old hall of the House of Representatives was abandoned as a meeting place it was set aside as a hall of statuary. I have always contended that one of the two statues from California should be that of Father Junipero Serra. He blazed the way for Caucasian civilization on the Pacific Coast, and it would be eminently fitting that this statue should be one of those selected by California. The legislature will, of course, have to appropriate what funds would be necessary for erecting the statue." Mr. Kahn is a native of Kuppenheim, Grand Duchy of Baden, Germany, and has already served six terms as a member of Congress. It may seem strange that a German Jew should be so outspoken in behalf of a Franciscan friar, but those who know Congressman Kahn will not be surprised at his advocacy of the claims of the great missionary. The record of bigotry made by those who opposed the acceptance of the Marquette Statue makes the stand taken by this unprejudiced Israelite all the more noteworthy.

PULPIT, PRESS, AND PLATFORM

THE REPUBLICAN PROGRAM IN PORTUGAL.

If anybody has heretofore entertained the least doubt as to the character of the Portuguese revolution, the announced program of the small coterie of advanced philosophers, free thinkers, agnostics and Socialists who have proclaimed a republic should serve to dispel it. One of the leading points of the program is the expulsion of the religious orders, male and female, and the confiscation of their extensive properties; another is lay or secular instruction which means that no teaching by religious associations will be permitted, and still another is the separation of church and state, presumably on the French plan, which includes the confiscation and plundering of the church property.

In order that no one may doubt their good intentions, these revolutionary leaders and so called Republicans have not waited for the assembling of either a constitutional assembly or a parliament to authorize legal procedure, but have proceeded at once to commence the operation of plundering. Several monasteries and religious houses have already been attacked, and all religious orders, men and women alike, have been ordered to leave Portugal within twenty-four hours. Here is human liberty and equality with a vengeance.

These being the sort of men that have undertaken the task of shaping the destinies of Portugal, it is evident that stormy times are ahead unless generations of bad government have made materialism as rampant in Portugal as it has become in France. It is surely a spectacle worthy of a "proud" people to see thousands of helpless women driven from their quiet homes stripped of their property and sent into exile on the plea that their further residence in the country is dangerous to the state. It is fine service for a supposedly chivalrous soldiery to batter down the doors of peaceful monasteries and nunneries and turn their inmates over to the tender mercies of a maddened mob. If such are the signs and tokens of Republican government then it is of a brand with which the free people of this the greatest of the world's republics are totally unacquainted and which all chivalrous and generous people should repudiate.

True, separation of church and state, which leaves the church as free to pursue its way in peace as the state itself, is most desirable in every free country. Such complete separation we have in the United States, but as separation is understood in some European countries, including the new Republic of Portugal, it means the full freedom of the state to plunder the church and persecute its adherents ad libitum.—Editorial. New Orleans Picayune, October 10, 1910.

During his speech at Lakewood, last Friday, Woodrow Wilson, in referring to his belief in democracy—with a small "d"—and not in a partisan sense—made the following comment upon the democracy of the Catholic Church:

No society is renewed from the top; every society is renewed from the bottom. I can give you an illustration concerning that, that has always interested me profoundly. The only reason why government did not suffer dry rot in the Middle Ages under the aristocratic systems which governed them, was that the men who were the efficient instruments of government—most of the officials of government, the men who were efficient—were drawn from the Church, from that great Church body which was then the only Church, that body which we now distinguish from other church bodies as the Roman Catholic Church.

The Roman Catholic Church, then as now, was a great democracy. There was no peasant so humble that he might not become a priest, and no priest so obscure that he might not become Pope of Christendom. Every chancellery in Europe, every court in Europe was ruled by these learned, trained and accomplished men, the priesthood of that great and then dominant Church.

So, what kept government alive in the Middle Ages was this constant rise of the sap from the bottom, from the ranks, from the rank and file of the great body of the people through the open channels of the Roman Catholic priesthood.

That, it seems to me, is one of the most extraordinary illustrations that could possibly be adduced of the thing that I am talking about.

SCIENCE

According to information received at Washington, October 14, Secretary of War Dickinson, who recently visited the Philippine Islands on his round-the-world trip, highly commended the work being done by the Jesuit fathers at the Manila Observatory. He expressed his own appreciation and that of his government of the services of these men who gave up their Spanish citizenship to serve the United States as its official weather forecasters in the Philippines. At the time of American assumption of the reins of government there, the Jesuit fathers were the only men in the Islands capable of carrying on scientific weather investigations.

The Scientific American of October 15, prints on its editorial page a very laudatory description of the Observatory of the Ebro, near Tortosa, Spain, which is under the direction of the Jesuits. It says the observatory "is probably the unique example of a great institution devoted entirely to the study of the interrelations of solar and terrestrial phenomena." And "this fine institution is an embodiment of an idea that is every day gaining ground among progressive meteorologists; viz., that fluctuations in the activity of the sun find a more or less immediate response in many phenomena of the earth's atmosphere—in addition to the effects long since recognized upon the earth's magnetic field."

Popular Astronomy for October contains a review by Paul S. Yendell of the publication by Father Hagen, of the Vatican Observatory, of observations of variable stars made during 37 years by Edward Heis and those made during 39 years by Adalbert Krüger. The first made nearly 7,000 observations upon about 30 stars, and the second about 1,500 observations upon about 36 stars. The reviewer commends the publication very highly for its invaluable data and the pains taken to present them in accessible form.

The same journal contains also an article by R. G. Aitken, of the Lick Observatory, on No. 24 of the Publications of the Astronomical Laboratory at Groningen, by J. C. Kapteyn and H. A. Weersma, on the masses of visual binary stars. While the data are confessed to be very meagre, they have been selected with great care. The conclusion drawn from 26 binary stars is that, while the masses differ enormously in different systems, the majority are of the same order as that of our sun. The average mass of 24 systems is 33 times that of our sun, 5 being larger than 40, and 4 smaller than 0.3.

Percival Lowell, the director, in Bulletin No. 48, of the Lowell Observatory, investigates the velocities of different parts of the tail of Halley's comet, and says that these velocities increase with distance from the nucleus, and hence concludes "that the knots measured, which showed the action of a repulsive force exerted from the sun, were chiefly composed, not of solid particles, but of molecules of gases." He adds that "if we turn to comet Morehouse we shall find this deduction, not only corroborated, but intensified."

Woven-wire masts on battleships have been found unserviceable. The vibration of the platform at certain speeds makes observations, calculations and communications extremely difficult.

Waldemar Poulson, a Danish electrical engineer, is credited with the success of lighting incandescent lamps by aid of the wireless transmission of the electrical current.

WILLIAM F. RIGGE, S.J.

OBITUARY

Peter A. Cassidy, a prominent Catholic layman, died recently in Albany, N. Y., aged 80 years. In Volume I of "The Catholic Encyclopedia" under the heading "The Diocese of Albany," a carefully written summary of the most important events of that diocese, by the Rt. Rev. Mgr. John Walsh, of Troy, Peter A. Cassidy is mentioned among those "in the field of charity and Catholic usefulness where fidelity to Catholic interests was and is the dominating principle of conduct." Mr. Cassidy was born in New York City, July 13, 1830, where he attended the parochial school of St. Patrick's old cathedral in Mott Street. In 1845 he enlisted in the Mexican war and was a soldier in the Fourth Infantry, of which General U. S. Grant was at that time a second lieutenant.

After an honorable discharge from service at the end of the war, Mr. Cassidy made Albany his home, and from that time took an active interest in the charitable and religious societies of the State Capital. He was the first prefect of the Cathedral Young Men's Sodality, and until illness prevented about a year ago, he was a faithful attendant at all the exercises of the Sodality held at the Cathedral. Fifty-three years ago Mr. Cassidy became connected with the St. Vincent de Paul Society, and served as a vice-president of the general conference. It was as a member of this society that his great works of charity were done. Every moment of his spare time was given to the relief of the poor and the aid and comforting of the afflicted. For forty years he visited every Sunday the penitentiary where he administered to the wants of the prisoners. During a typhus plague in the city, some years ago, when it was impossible to get nurses, Mr. Cassidy volunteered and risked his life for the sufferers at the pest house and continued to serve the stricken until the last case had been taken care of. No record of his charities was possible except by the recording angel, but the memory of his good deeds and of his exemplary life will be cherished by his friends and will be a stimulating influence for his fellow Catholics.

On October 19, the Rev. Louis L'Etourneau, C.S.C., died at Notre Dame, Ind., age eighty-two years. Father L'Etourneau was born on October 2d, 1828, at Detroit, Michigan. He received his education at Notre Dame, and on September 20th, 1857, was ordained to the priesthood. He held with signal success a number of important positions in his community. He saw Notre Dame in nearly every stage of its development. He knew Father Sorin intimately and lived in close relationship with Father Granger.

An Expert will examine Your Feet FREE

For forty-seven years, at the same store, James S. Coward has studied remedial foot-needs. He is an expert in foot anatomy and shoe-craft.

If you are troubled, or think you are troubled with: weak ankles, falling arch, 'flat-foot,' pain in the foot muscles; a bunion, callouses, or any ailment that can be corrected or relieved by proper footwear——have your feet examined, without expense to you, by James S. Coward.

M. S. Coward's advice and the remedial help of the

The Coward Shoe

have enabled thousands, suffering from foot ailments, to walk again in comfort.

SOLD NOWHERE ELSE

JAMES S. COWARD

264-274 Greenwich St., N. Y.

(NEAR WARREN STREET)

Mail Orders Filled | Send for Catalogue

WITH GLACIER WINDOW DECORATION

YOU CAN GET

Stained Glass Effects
on Ordinary Windows

Suitable for Residences
Churches and Schools

Special Ecclesiastical Designs

Write To-day for Booklet 6

Address WM. B. QUAILE, 752 Broadway, New York.

—Just Published—

Three Historical Events in Maine

BY THE

REV. T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

Single Copies 15 cents

100 Copies $10.00

THE AMERICA PRESS 32 Washington Sq. W.
NEW YORK

Moisture Will Spoil Ordinary Soda Crackers

NO matter how good the ingredients or how careful the baking, once expose soda crackers to the slightest dampness of air and they lose their taste and much of their food value.

That's why bulk crackers kept in barrels, boxes and cans get tasteless and tough and hard to swallow. They absorb moisture, and they also gather dust, germs and store odors. What a pity that this most nutritious of flour foods is so contaminated!

But there is a soda cracker too good, too perfect to be thus treated! After baking, Uneeda Biscuits are immediately placed in dust tight, moisture proof packages which preserve their crispness, flavor and nourishment.

NATIONAL BISCUIT COMPANY

(Never sold in bulk)

5c

for a package

McCray Refrigerators

We make a specialty of Built-to-Order Refrigerators for SCHOOLS, HOSPITALS, INSTITUTIONS, etc.

Style No. 171

Write for our free Catalogs,
Number 48 for Institutions
" 87 " Residences
" 59 " Meat Markets
" 72 " Florists
" 67 " Grocers

Branch offices in all principal cities

MCCRAY REFRIGERATOR CO.

38 Lake Street

KENDALLVILLE, INDIANA

New York Office, 231 West 42d Street

Sacred Heart Sanitarium

FOR REST, QUIET, RECUPERATION AND HEALTH

Unsurpassed results obtained in Nervousness, Rheumatism, Heart and Stomach troubles. No surgical, hospital nor insanity cases taken. A delightful, homelike, restful place—ideal for all run down conditions. Hydrotherapy, Electricity, Massage, Zander Gymnasium, Sun parlor; Swimming pools, billiards, bowling, etc. Gaited saddle horses, large indoor riding pavilion; suspended running track connected by tunnel with bath department. 17-acre park.

A staff of five physicians give their exclusive services to the patients.

WRITE SISTER SUPERIOR FOR BOOKLET X. MILWAUKEE, WIS.

The Largest Retailer of Hats in the World

E. N. MURPHY, 4 Myrtle Ave., BROOKLYN, N.Y.

BROOKLYN, 4 Myrtle Ave. 1605 Broadway.

NEW YORK: 207 Broadway, entrance on Fulton St. 1415 Broadway.
241 West 125th Street.

Telephone Connections.

Catalogue on request

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER"
AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week
32 Washington Square, West, New York City

THE CATHOLIC MIND

A periodical published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month.

Each number contains an article of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style.

These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is: one at a time and the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

$1.00 a Year (24 numbers)

5 cents a number

SPECIAL OFFER

SCIENCE AND HER COUNTERFEIT. By Rev. J. Gerard, S.J.
LORD KELVIN AND THE EXISTENCE OF GOD. By H. V. Gill, S.J.
SOCIALISM AND CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. J. F. Hogan, D.D. (2 Nos.)
MEANINGS OF THE WORD SOCIALISM. By C. S. Devas, M.A.
IMPRATICABILITY OF SOCIALISM. By C. S. Devas, M.A.
CATHOLICS AND THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT. By Rt. Rev. Mgr. Parkinson, D.D.
THE CHURCH—THE STRONG SAFEGUARD OF THE REPUBLIC. By Most Rev. Wm. H. O'Connell, D.D.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE. By Robert Hugh Benson.
THE DELUSION OF CHRISTIAN SCIENCE. By Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J.
THE DOCUMENTARY EXPOSE OF THE RUPTURE OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS BETWEEN THE HOLY SEE AND THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT. (2 Nos.)
THE CONCORDAT OF 1801. By D. Moncrieff O'Connor.
THE FRENCH SEPARATION BILL. (Text.)
PRIMARY EDUCATION IN FRANCE.
THE GENIUS OF CARDINAL WISEMAN. By Wilfrid Ward.
THE MASS AND THE REFORMATION. By Rt. Rev. J. Canon Moyes, D.D.
THE ATTITUDE OF MODERN PROTESTANTS TOWARDS THE VIRGINITY OF OUR BLESSED LADY. By Rev. A. J. Maas, S.J.
EXHORTATION OF PIUS X TO THE CATHOLIC CLERGY.

SINGLE COPIES, 5 cents

100 COPIES—SPECIAL PRICE—$2.00

THE AMERICA PRESS

32 Washington Sq., West

New York City

The American Carlsbad Sanitarium

Hydrotherapy according to the celebrated Kneipp system applied in all forms and up-to-date methods. All diseases, acute and chronic, scientifically and successfully treated. Testimonials and references furnished. First class accommodations for patients.

The famous Devonian Mineral water in use, a strong, sulphurated, saline, calcareous and magnesian water, the counterpart of the German Carlsbad.

Rates reasonable. Investigation solicited.

For information apply to

The American Carlsbad Co., Lorain, O.

Simplicity

is a prominent feature
of the

VICTOR

It is not necessary to make a lot of adjustments before doing special kinds of work.

The Victor is always ready without special adjustment, because its special devices are built in the machine—not extra attachments.

Send for the No. 2 Catalogue to-day

VICTOR TYPEWRITER COMPANY

812 Greenwich Street

NEW YORK

NOW READY

AMONG THE HURONS

VOLUME II OF

Pioneer Priests
of North America

Tells the heroic story of
de Brébeuf and His Associates

"This book is a striking illustration of the truth of Shakespeare's well-known words 'Men's good is oft interred with their bones.' . . . We cannot then but feel grateful to Father Campbell for what he has done to assure the fame of those glorious confessors and martyrs from a threatened obscurity. . . .

"Missionaries such as these have a special work in this day of weak faith and widespread disbelief; for the story of their lives, while it stimulates the one, is a living protest against the other. Father Campbell's theme is a great one, and he has dealt with it well. The clear and simple language in which he recounts the wonderful heroism of these truly wonderful men, is more impressive and convincing than any elaboration of style, and surely more in harmony with the quiet, simple characters of the men of whom he treats."—The Tablet, London.

By Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J.

480 Pages. With Index. 24 Illustrations.

PRICE, $2.00

VOLUME I

This extremely interesting book consists of a series of 18 monographs of the missionaries who labored among the Iroquois Indians. Beginning with the life of Jogues in 1642, they continue up to 1710, when the Indians, just before their annihilation, passed over from French to English control.

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS:

"For lovers of history and biography, of the adventurous, the heroic, and the saintly, there is much to attract the attention in this volume of over 300 large, clearly printed pages."—The Sacred Heart Review.

"The adventures of most of the missionaries read like romances."—The New York Herald.

"One of the most interesting Catholic books we have ever read."—The Monitor (San Francisco).

Price, $1.60, postage prepaid

THE AMERICA PRESS 32 Washington Sq. W.
NEW YORK

A New Idea— Individual Libraries

One of the many advantages of Globe-Wernicke Bookcases is the creating of individual libraries in any room, enabling each to have his or her books where they are instantly accessible.

Globe-Wernicke Elastic Bookcases

are fully described in our new 1911 Catalogue, which contains many practical suggestions for clever decorative effects, and tells in detail the many points of Globe-Wernicke superiority. "The World's Best Books" is a valuable guide in selecting a library, and contains authentic lists prepared by prominent literary authorities.

"Those who love books will find this volume of genuine service, and its selections made on a broad basis of wisdom."—BUFFALO NEWS
A copy will be mailed free with the 1911 Catalogue on request.

The Globe-Wernicke Co. Dept AM. Cincinnati, U.S.A.

WARD & CO. Fulton Ave. & East River ASTORIA, NEW YORK

Telephone 22 Astoria

Shipbuilders
Shipwrights
Machinists

Saw Mills
Planers
Blacksmith Shops

DRY DOCKS

Established 1876 : : Estimates Cheerfully Furnished

LIBRARY SUPPLIES

Adjustable Book Covers—Library Numbers Gummed and perforated always in stock—also alphabets of various sizes.

For sale by stationers or by

THE VAN EVEREN CO.
60 Ann Street - New York

The Book Covers are made of tough, strong paper and are inexpensive, efficient and easily put on

For Entrances, Corridors or Floor-Spaces
Exposed to Hard Service, Dirt or Wet

Cary's Everlasting Flexible Steel Mats

The United States Government uses and specifies for this mat in all their buildings.

None so Clean, Durable and Sanitary for Churches, Hotels, Apartment Houses, Banks, Stores, Restaurants and Public Buildings.

Made of the Best Cold Rolled
Steel. Rust Proof
Reversible, Self-Cleaning.

PATENTED
IN THE UNITED STATES AND FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Made in rolls and eight regular sizes. Special sizes to order.

We have equipped the Church of Our Lady of Mercy, Fordham, N. Y., with 270 square feet of these mats. Also St. Cecilia's Church with nearly 400 square feet. Circular upon request.

CAN YOU AFFORD TO BE WITHOUT THESE?

CARY MANUFACTURING CO. - 19 to 23 Roosevelt St., New York
(Telephone Worth 1445)

Mullins & Sons

78, 80, 82, 84 Myrtle Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

121-125 Newark Avenue, Jersey City, N. J.

218-220 Market Street, Newark, N. J.

Housefurnishings of Quality

Furniture, Pianos, Carpets, Rugs, Sewing-machines, China, Art Work,
Gunn Sectional Book Cases, Arts and Crafts Furniture. Absolutely
the finest displays in the East. Unequaled in quality and lowest prices.

$1.00 A WEEK FURNISHES THE HOME

F. JAMES REILLY
President

WM. F. REILLY
Manager

JAMES REILLY'S SONS' CO. General Electrical Repairs

122-130 CENTRE STREET
Corner White Street

Telephone 881 Franklin NEW YORK

INSTITUTION LINEN

of all kinds, also Sheets and Pillow
Cases, Blankets, Bed Spreads, etc., etc

WRITE for SAMPLES and PRICES

H. W. BAKER LINEN CO. Dept "K"
41 WORTH ST.
Importers and Manufacturers NEW YORK CITY

BOUND VOLUMES OF AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW
OF THE WEEK

SIX MONTHS TO A VOLUME

$3.50

The AMERICA Press, 32 Washington Sq. W., New York

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF HENRY VAN RENSSELAER

Priest of the Society of Jesus

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF A WELL-KNOWN AND MUCH-BELOVED PRIEST
By Edward P. Spillane, S.J.

The volume is enriched with a fine photogravure portrait of Father Van Rensselaer, and with many other interesting illustrations.

Price, $1.00. By mail, 10 cents extra

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Square, W., New York

Pilgrim Walks in Rome

A GUIDE TO THE HOLY PLACES
IN ROME AND ITS VICINITY

By P. J. CHANDLERY, S.J.

Third edition enlarged $1.60, Postpaid

THE AMERICA PRESS

32 Washington Sq. W.

New York

FREE SCHOLARSHIPS AT THE Leading Catholic Colleges Board and Tuition

Creighton University, Omaha, Neb.
Fordham University, New York, N. Y.
Georgetown University, Washington, D. C.
Niagara University, Niagara Falls, N. Y.

Notre Dame University, Notre Dame, Ind.
St. John's University, Collegeville, Minn.
University of Ottawa, Ottawa, Can.
University of St. Francis Xavier's College, Antigonish, Nova Scotia.

* * *

All Hallows College, Salt Lake City, Utah.
Columbus College, Chamberlain, S. Dak.
Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass.
Holy Trinity College, Dallas, Tex.
Sacred Heart College, Denver, Colo.
Sacred Heart College, Sacred Heart, Okla.
Seton Hall College, South Orange, N. J.

St. Ambrose College, Davenport, Iowa.
St. Bonaventure's College, Allegany, N. Y.
St. Joseph's College, Dubuque, Iowa.
St. Michael's College, Burlington, Vt.
St. Viateur's College, Bourbonnais, Ill.
St. Vincent's College, Beatty, Pa.
St. Charles College, Ellicott City, Md.

Tuition Only

Catholic University of America, Washington, D. C.
Benedictine College, Savannah, Ga.
Boston College, Boston, Mass.
Brooklyn College, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Canisius College, Buffalo, N. Y.
Christian Brothers' College, Memphis, Tenn.
Loyola College, Baltimore, Md.
Marist College, Atlanta, Ga.
Sacred Heart College, Prairie du Chien, Wis.
Sacred Heart College, Augusta, Ga.

St. Francis Xavier's College, New York, N. Y.
St. Mary's University, Galveston, Texas.
St. Ignatius College, Cleveland, Ohio.
St. John's College, Brooklyn, N. Y.
St. John Berchman's College, Toledo, Ohio.
Fordham University Law School, New York, N. Y.
Fordham University Medical School.
Georgetown University Law School, Washington, D. C.
Georgetown University Medical School.
St. Louis University Law School, St. Louis, Mo.

PREPARATORY SCHOOLS (Board and Tuition)

St. Ann's Academy, New York, N. Y.

St. John's Preparatory College, Danvers, Mass.

COLLEGES FOR YOUNG LADIES (Board and Tuition)

COLLEGE OF NEW ROCHELLE, New Rochelle, N. Y. MOUNT ST. JOSEPH'S COLLEGE, Dubuque, Iowa.
ST. MARY'S COLLEGE, Notre Dame, Ind.

N. B.—Other Colleges and Schools will be announced later.

These Scholarships may be obtained by securing subscriptions for AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week.

For further particulars address

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Square, West,
New York, N. Y.

TRY IT YOURSELF FOR 10 DAYS WITHOUT DEPOSIT

If not satisfactory, return it and no questions asked DAUS' IMPROVED LIP TOP DUPLICATOR is the result of 25 years' experience, and is used and endorsed by thousands of business houses and individuals. 100 copies from pen written original—CLEAR, CLEAN, PERFECT. Complete Dupliator cap size (prints 8 3/4 x 13 in.). Price $7.50, less special discount 33 1/3 per cent, net $5.

The Felix G. Daus Dupliator Co., Daus Bldg., 111 John St., New York

MENEELY BELL CO.
TROY, N.Y. AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.
BELLS

'Perfect' Warm Air Heaters
'Perfect' Cooking Ranges
and
Richardson's Steam and Water Boilers
Give splendid satisfaction

THOUSANDS IN USE

Send for Catalogue

RICHARDSON & BOYNTON CO.
31 West 31st Street
Chicago NEW YORK Boston

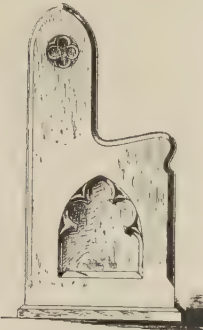

DR. A. J. WALSH
DENTIST
Specialist in Plates and Bridges

265 West 42d St., N. E. Cor. 8th Ave.

ST. JOSEPH'S SANATORIUM
Silver City, New Mexico
Conducted by the Sisters of Mercy

ATHOROUGHLY equipped institution for the treatment of all suitable cases of tuberculosis. Each room has two wide connecting porches, electric lights and all modern conveniences. Infirmary for febrile cases, also cottages for those desiring them. Trained nurses and resident physician in constant attendance. Climatic conditions ideal: cool summers and moderate winters. Annual precipitation 12 inches, with only 32 cloudy days. Altitude, 6,000 feet. All ethical lines of treatment, including tuberculin in suitable cases.

For Catalogue and particulars address either Sister Superior or Oliver T. Hyde, M.D., Medical Director.

Ecclesiastical Furniture
PEWS · PULPITS · FONTS · VESTMENT CASES ETC.
Built to secure harmony with the general architectural and decorative scheme, from the finest, exquisitely hand-carved to the simpler, more inexpensive styles. Styles and Prices to meet any requirements.
Illustrations or special designs to harmonize with the architecture and arrangement of your Church gladly submitted to those interested.

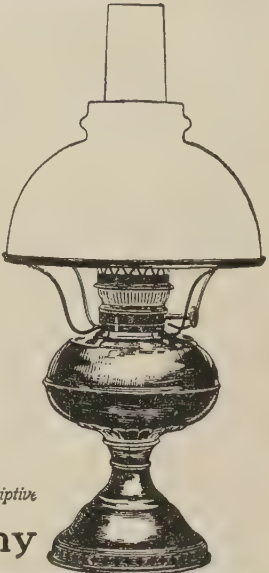

American Seating Company Address Dept. B.X.
215 Wabash Ave. CHICAGO
NEW YORK BOSTON PHILADELPHIA PITTSBURGH
19 West 18th St. 70 Franklin St. 1225 Arch St. 824 Lewis Bldg.

The Famous Rayo
Is the Lamp of Real Beauty
because it gives the best light of all lamps. The Rayo gives a white, soft, mellow, diffused light—easy on the eye because it cannot flicker. You can use your eyes as long as you wish under the Rayo light without strain.
The Rayo Lamp is low-priced, and even though you pay $5, $10 or $20 for other lamps, you may get more expensive decorations but you cannot get a better light than the low-priced Rayo gives. A strong, durable shade-holder holds the shade on firm and true. This season's new burner adds strength and appearance.

Once a Rayo User, Always One.

Dealers Everywhere. If not at yours, write for descriptive circular to the nearest agency of the

Standard Oil Company
(Incorporated)

HEADQUARTERS FOR THE CLERGY
PHOTOGRAPHY! High-Class Work at Reasonable Prices
Cardinal Vannutelli—Exclusive and only sitting in U. S. Copies for sale; also Cardinal Logue

E. F. FOLEY 164 FIFTH AVENUE
Bet. 21st and 22d Sts.
Appointments 'Phone, 5995 Gramercy

Telephone Call, 5922 Barclay
THE S. T. SMITH CO.
Manufacturers of
Ink, Inked Ribbons, Carbon, Manifold and Typewriter Linen Papers
Diamond Brand Typewriter Supplies
11 BARCLAY STREET NEW YORK

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 32 Washington Square, West, New York City

FINN BROTHERS
Manufacturers of
Roll Top Desks
STORE and OFFICE FIXTURES
Counters, Shelvings, Partitions, Etc.
Estimates and Designs Furnished

Office 358 BROADWAY Salesrooms
59-65 FRANKLIN ST., NEW YORK
Telephones, 4855-4856 Franklin
Factory: 112-114 LEROY STREET
Telephone Connection

We can supply anything in the line of Kitchen and Bakers' Utensils

Catalogue "M" FREE upon request

French Cooking Ranges and Broilers
JAMES Y. WATKINS & SON 16, 18, 20, CATHERINE ST. NEW YORK N. Y.

Cooking Equipments of Every Description

DIRECTORY OF COLLEGES AND ACADEMIES

Georgetown University WASHINGTON, D. C.

Directory for Catalogues or Information

The College (Graduates and Undergraduate Schools)
The Registrar, 37th & O Sts., N. W.

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University
Rev. Joseph Himmel, S.J., President

LADYCLIFF

On the Hudson (Adjoining West Point)
Young Ladies' Academy

A department for small boys. Education thorough and practical. Location beautiful and convenient. Terms moderate. Send for prospectus. Address Sister Superior, Ladycliff, Highland Falls, N. Y.

New York State Regents' Examinations.

Academy of St. Joseph

In-the-Pines

BRENTWOOD, N. Y.

A Boarding School for Young Ladies,
Affiliated with the State University

PROSPECTUS EXPLAINS THE TERMS, ETC.

St. Mary's College

St. Marys, Kansas

BOARDING COLLEGE
Under the Jesuit Fathers

Two Courses of Study:
Classical and Commercial

For Catalogue, send to
REV. ALOYSIUS A. BREEN, S.J., President.

ACADEMY OF THE HOLY FAMILY

BALTIC, CONNECTICUT

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity

PREPARATORY, COMMERCIAL AND ACADEMIC COURSES

Prospectus explains terms, etc.

Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

Convent of the Holy Child

SHARON HILL, DELAWARE COUNTY, PA.
1½ Minutes from Philadelphia

ACADEMY FOR YOUNG LADIES
Highest English Course. French, Drawing, Music by Certified Teachers. Preparation for foreign travel. As the numbers are limited, special care can be given to the formation of character and training of each child.
Address Mother Superior

COLLEGE OF ST. ELIZABETH

CONVENT STATION,
Near Morristown, N. J.

One hour from New York City.

A Catholic Institution for the Higher Education of Women

COLLEGE Four years' course leading to the degrees of B. A. and B. S. SCHOOL OF PEDAGOGY Required for entrance two years of College work

SCHOOL OF MUSIC. COURSE LEADING TO THE DEGREE OF B. M.

ACADEMY A High School Course of Four Years. Full College Preparatory Work. GRAMMAR AND PRIMARY DEPARTMENTS SEPARATE

REGISTERED By the New Jersey State Board of Education and the University of the State of New York Apply for Year Book to The Secretary

MT. ST. JOSEPH ON THE WISSAHICKON

For illustrated catalogue address MOTHER

CATHOLIC COLLEGE FOR WOMEN
situated in the romantic Valley of the Wissahickon. Degrees conferred. Also Academic, Commercial, Intermediate and Elementary Departments. Very special advantages in Music and Art. The piano student possesses superior opportunities in the use of the Virgil Clavier Method pursued throughout the course. The Art Studio is admirably equipped, and every attention is given to the study of Art, both in theory and practice. Gymnasium perfectly equipped. Outdoor exercise, tennis, basket ball, fencing, etc.

SUPERIOR, Chestnut Hill, Philadelphia, Pa.

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE

WORCESTER
MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Collegiate and Preparatory Departments

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $280 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra. Send for catalogue to
REV. THOMAS E. MURPHY, S.J., President

Seton Hall College

FOUNDED 1856

South Orange, New Jersey

COLLEGE AND HIGH SCHOOL

Bayley Hall for Students
of Grammar Course

FOR CATALOGUE ADDRESS
Very Rev. James F. Mooney, D.D., Pres.

"OUR LADY OF PEACE" RESIDENCE FOR LADIES

225-227 WEST 14th STREET, NEW YORK CITY

THE important residential institution under the management of the religious order of Jesus-Mary is now open to receive guests. This institution responds to a great need in our metropolis. 170 rooms at $8 to $12 per week are ready to accommodate ladies in the literary profession, retired teachers, stenographers, students and others desirous of a peaceful abode. All the rooms are cheerful, well heated, and furnished to give comfort to each one. Library, music room, large roof garden, sun parlor add to the enjoyment of the boarders.

The atmosphere of the house is homelike and attractive. Special price for suites.

School of music will open September 1st, 1910. Private courses in French for ladies and children also begin at same date. For further information, apply to MOTHER SUPERIOR.

ST. JOHN'S PREPARATORY COLLEGE IMMACULATA SEMINARY

DANVERS, MASS.

SELECT HIGH SCHOOL conducted by the XAVIER BROTHERS

Classical, Scientific and Commercial Courses

Ideal Location

All New Buildings

New Equipment

Competent Instructors

Develops the Whole Boy

Send for Catalogue

Brother Benjamin, Director

MOUNT MARIAN, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Situated in the suburbs. Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of St. Mary-of-the-Woods. Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Conservatory methods in Music. Oil and Ceramic and Water-color Studios. Abundant out-door exercise. Sightseeing with experienced chaperons.

For Year Book address, Sister Secretary

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

ADJOINING BRONX PARK, NEW YORK CITY

College and High School

ST. JOHN'S HALL, FOR SMALLER BOYS

The location affords the healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city

MEDICAL SCHOOL
in connection with Fordham Hospital

WRITE FOR CATALOGUE

LAW SCHOOL
at 20 Vesey St.
in the midst of the courts

SPRING HILL COLLEGE

FOUNDED 1830 Spring Hill, Mobile Co., Ala. CHARTERED 1836

BOARDING COLLEGE CONDUCTED BY THE JESUIT FATHERS

Just the School for boys who wish to escape the rigors of the Northern climate. Mean temperature of the winter months, 52 degrees Fahrenheit.

HEALTHY LOCATION—EVERY CONVENIENCE OF A MODERN COLLEGE

CURRICULUM INCLUDES THE PREPARATORY, HIGH SCHOOL AND COLLEGE COURSES. DEGREES CONFERRED

Write for Catalogue to Rev. F. X. Twellmeyer, S. J., President

DIRECTORY OF COLLEGES AND ACADEMIES

ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS A RETREAT

COLLEGE FOR YOUNG WOMEN (TWO HOURS FROM INDIANAPOLIS)
FOUNDED IN 1840; INCORPORATED IN 1846. EMPOWERED TO CONFER COLLEGIATE DEGREES.
Four Years' College Course. Academic and Grammar Departments. Elective Courses for Special Students. Conservatory of Music, with Vocal, Piano, Harp, Violin, Pipe Organ, etc. Oil and Ceramic and Water-color Studios. Modern languages by native teachers. New Gymnasium, with Natatorium, Running Track, Bowling, Basket Ball, etc., directed by a graduate of Dr. Sargent's school of Physical Training. Out-of-Door Sports—Horseback Riding, Boating, Archery, Golf, Tennis. For Catalogue and Illustrated Booklet.
Address . . SISTER SECRETARY . . Box 70 . . St. Mary-of-the-Woods, . . Vigo County, Indiana

WILL BE GIVEN AT
The Convent of the Cenacle
NEWPORT, R. I.
From Saturday evening, Nov. 5th,
to Wednesday morning, Nov. 9th
Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL
Holy Cross Academy and High School

FOR GIRLS : : : 53d YEAR
Conducted by the Sisters of Charity
343-349 West 42d Street and 340-350 West 43d Street, New York City
Registered by the New York State Educational Department.
Students prepared for College and the New York Training School for Teachers
Preparatory Department for Young Children
BOARDING SCHOOL FOR BOYS UNDER TWELVE YEARS

THE SISTERS OF CHARITY
Mount Saint Vincent-on-Hudson, New York City
ANNOUNCE THE OPENING OF
COLLEGE COURSES FOR WOMEN
Leading to Degrees, B. A. and B. S. Freshman and Sophomore Classes
SEPTEMBER, 1910
Junior and Senior Classes to follow. Professors of distinction.
Equipment of the best.
Location healthful, convenient, one half hour from Grand Central Station.
DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS
Fall term begins September 29th, 1910. Write for Prospectus.

The Winona Seminary, Winona, Minnesota
JUNIOR COLLEGE : : : : FOR YOUNG WOMEN
Conducted by the Sisters of St. Francis
LITERARY DEPARTMENT: Collegiate Course leading to degree. ACADEMIC COURSES: Classical, Latin, Scientific, Modern Language. Accredited to the University of Minnesota.
DEPARTMENTS of Dramatic Expression, Art, Household Economics. Home life of the Student is ideal. Indoor and Outdoor Athletics. Literary, Musical, Dramatic Societies.
Conservatory of Music: Piano, Voice, Violin, Organ, Harp
CATALOGUE, BOOKLET OF INFORMATION, DEPARTMENT BULLETINS, MAILED ON APPLICATION.

HELEN AUGUSTA HAYES
VOCAL INSTRUCTOR
342 West 55th Street, New York
OLD POINT COMFORT COLLEGE FOR BOYS
Military, Academic, Commercial and Pre-paratory courses. Write for catalogue.
Bro. MARCELLUS, Director,
Fort Monroe, Va.

ATTENTION OF PASTORS!
Catholic Mind Pamphlet
Holy Communion for Children
DECREE OF THE SACRED CONGREGATION OF SACRAMENTAL DISCIPLINE ON THE AGE OF THOSE TO BE ADMITTED TO RECEIVE FIRST HOLY COMMUNION
In envelopes ready for distribution
$4.00 per hundred. 5c each
THE AMERICA PRESS 32 Washington Square, W. NEW YORK

Only 75 Cts. Each, Postpaid
Keep every number of
AMERICA
A Catholic Review of the Week
IN A HANDSOME
Adjustable Binder
of boards and maroon cloth
THE AMERICA PRESS
32 Washington Square W.
New York City

MARY ALOYSIA HARDEY
READY RELIGIOUS OF THE SACRED HEART READY 1809-1886
WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY THE REV. THOMAS J. CAMPBELL, S.J.
440 Pages 16 Illustrations With Index
THE LIFE STORY OF A REMARKABLE WOMAN
“Had the Life of Mother Hardey not been published it would have been a positive loss for the history of the Catholic Church in the United States, where for more than fifty years she was such a conspicuous figure. Her biographer completed the work several years ago, but it was only after reiterated entreaties and expostulations that the manuscript was finally put into the hands of the printer.”—From the Introduction.
PRICE, TWO DOLLARS
By Mail 20 cents extra
THE AMERICA PRESS 32 WASHINGTON SQ. WEST NEW YORK CITY

ROYAL BAKING POWDER

Absolutely Pure
The only baking powder
made from Royal Grape
Cream of Tartar
No Alum, No Lime Phosphate

A Clear, Perfect Skin

RESULTS ONLY FROM A

Skin Kept Clean, Very Clean

A BATH WITH

HAND SAPOLIO

thoroughly cleanses and invigorates every pore, revives circulation and exhilarates the entire body. Delicate enough for a babe's skin.

All Grocers and Druggists

WILL YOU REPRESENT AMERICA

A Catholic Review of the Week

WE want a reliable man or woman in each city and town to act as our agent. No experience or capital required.

THIS opportunity is open to you no matter where you are situated, as
 AMERICA is a national publication.

Will You Join Our Staff?

NOW IS THE TIME

Write at once, giving reference

AGENCY BUREAU

The America Press 32 Washington Square W.
 NEW YORK, N. Y.

Interlocking Rubber Tiling

3-8 INCH THICK

Noiseless Sanitary Indestructible
FOR

*Aisles, Sanctuary, Vestibule
ETC.*

Special Ecclesiastical Designs

Send for Beautiful Illustrated Catalogue "A"

The Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co.

Headquarters Tiling Department

64th STREET AND BROADWAY, NEW YORK CITY

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Vol. IV, No. 4

(Price 10 Cents)

NOVEMBER 5, 1910

($3.00 a year)

Whole No. 82

CHRONICLE

Portuguese Republicanism—Triumphs and Mishaps in Air—High Office for Negro—Brigade Honors Chaplain—A Doubtful Victory—Porto Rico Prospers—Butchery in Mexico—Canada—Great Britain—Ireland—France—Navy is too Small—Germany's Industrial Troubles ...73-76

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

All Souls—The French Strike—The Secret of Catholic Educational Influence77-82

IN MISSION FIELDS

Before a Pagan Judge82-83

CORRESPONDENCE

The Truth About Portuguese Republicans—Catholic Influence in Holland83-85

EDITORIAL

The Secret Passages—The Logical Jew—An Insult from Current Literature—The Courage of Conviction—A Great Dominican Prelate...86-88

AFTER MANY DAYS89

LITERATURE

Adam Mickiewicz, the Polish Poet—Catholic Books in French—What's Wrong with the World—Lord Glenesk and the "Morning Post"—St Bridget of Sweden—The American Jewish Year Book—Life of Bishop Timon—Messenger of the Sacred Heart in Gaelic—Building Your Boy—Books Received.....89-93

EDUCATION

Annual Meeting Boston Teachers' School of Science Association—Scientific and Literary Study for Novices of Orders and Congregations93-94

SOCIOLOGY

Deaths by Pneumonia and Suicide—Procedure in the Crippen Case94

ECONOMICS

Manitoba's Rat Invasion—Fall in Consols—Coal

Discoveries in England—The Output of Artificial Coal94

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

Centenary of Boston's First Bishop—Memorial to Father Scully—Toronto's New Seminary—The Founder of Lisbon's Irish Dominican College—Rev. Dr. Poels in Holland.....94-95

PERSONAL

Fray Enrique Vacas-Galindo—Commander John Luby—Sir William Christie95

SCIENCE

Life Germs Carried by Meteorites—X Rays and Vitality95-96

OBITUARY

Madame O'Meara—Rev. Samuel Cahill, S.J....96

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Goldwin Smith's Vagaries96

CHRONICLE

Portuguese Republicanism.—The provisional government has abolished all titles of nobility. As some of these had been obtained at a considerable cash outlay, the purchasers or their heirs are the losers. It has also decreed the separation of Church and State, and the secularization of education. The University of Coimbra, which dates from 1290, has been temporarily closed on account of riots among the students, who attacked their professors and tore off their academic hoods and gowns in a demonstration which they made in favor of immediate reforms and modifications at the hands of the Braga administration. Manhood suffrage and divorce by mutual consent have been declared a part of the program of the new regime. No steps have yet been taken to summon a constitutional convention or other body representing the people. The republic has already been recognized by Brazil and Liberia and it is not yet a month old. It is now known that the convent of Quelhas, from which it was alleged that bombs were hurled at the mob which attacked it, had been deserted by the inmates three days before the assault.—Five men have been arrested on the charge of having killed Admiral dos Reis, who was reported as having committed suicide on account of the supposed failure of the revolutionary movement.—Alfredo Vicenti, manager of El Liberal, of Madrid, is of the opinion that a ministerial crisis in Portugal is needed to clear the air, so that the useless officials may retire, "beginning, perhaps, with President Braga, whose learning exceeds his discretion." The Jesuits of the College of Campolide are still detained in prison. The London Times attributes the revolution to the joint action of Protestantism and Freemasonry.—Owing to the numerous and painful vexations that the Conservatives were obliged to endure under the Teixeira cabinet (all their remonstrances and protests to the King being of no avail) Dom Manoel gets so little sympathy that scarcely anyone sorrows over his fate. Though among the great mass of the citizens there is little liking for the republic, nobody seems at all anxious to have the king return.

Triumphs and Mishaps in Air.—The balloon America II, which sailed from St. Louis with two Americans, on Oct. 17, in a contest for the James Gordon Bennett cup, landed in a dense Canadian forest, fifty miles east of Chicoutimi, P. Q. During the forty-five hours and fifty-eight minutes it remained in the air it reached an altitude of 16,000 feet, and covered a distance of 1,355 miles, thus establishing a new world record for a continuous balloon flight. The account of the exploit combines to an unusual degree the elements of hazard, daring and success. As a contribution to the romance of adventure it makes interesting reading, but it seems to have been a useless feat in other respects.

The international aviation tournament at Belmont Park, L. I., was of greater importance as far as scientific results are concerned, and is said to have been the most successful events of the kind. Claude Grahame-White, the English aviator, won the international trophy, with a purse of $5,000, at Belmont Park, beating the world's aviation record for 100 kilometres, or 62.1 miles, which he covered in 1 hour, 1 minute, 43½ seconds, an average speed of 61 miles an hour. Moisant, the American, made the best time of three aviators in the Statue of Liberty flight and won the Thomas F. Ryan $10,000 prize, beating Grahame-White by forty-three seconds and Count de Lesseps by seven minutes. On the last day of the international aviation meet, another triumph was won for America by Ralph Johnstone, who beat Wynmalen's world record of 9,186 feet, made in France, by soaring into a cloudless sky to the height of 9,714 feet.

The science of aviation reaped a rich harvest of death in Europe, the victims including Captain Madiot, who was instantly killed at Douai, France, while making his first practice flight; Lieutenant Monte, at Magdeburg, Prussia, and Lieutenant Saglietti, at Rome, Italy.

High Office for Negro.—President Taft has decided to appoint a negro to the highest office in an executive branch of the government ever held by a member of that race. William H. Lewis, at present an assistant District Attorney in Boston, is to be made an Assistant Attorney General of the United States. This, says an Administration organ, is in line with President Taft's policy of recognizing negroes in the government service, but not making these appointments, if possible, in Southern States, where friction has been caused in the past by negro Federal office holders.

Brigade Honors Chaplain.—In presence of several thousand survivors and friends of the Irish Brigade, which fought so gallantly in the battle of Gettysburg, the memorial statue to its chaplain, the Rev. William Corby, C.S.C., was unveiled last Saturday on the historic battlefield and dedicated with appropriate ceremonies. The memorial, a bronze figure of the priest in the act of giving absolution to the entire brigade, is placed on the very rock on which the priest stood when a few moments before one of the most desperate charges of the fight he performed the religious rite, which has gone down in the history of the battle of Gettysburg as one of the most impressive incidents of the three days' battle. There were addresses by Rev. Charles W. Lyons, S.J., President of St. Joseph's College, Philadelphia, and by Henry A. Daily, President of the Catholic Alumni Sodality of Philadelphia, the latter turning over the memorial to the National Park Commission.

A Doubtful Victory.—The Hague International Arbitration Court awarded to the Orinoco Steamship Company, of New Jersey, $46,867 and costs against the Venezuelan government for damages suffered by the company through the forfeiture of its concessions by Venezuela during the administration of President Castro. This is the final settlement of a controversy which for years has disturbed the relations between the United States and Venezuela, and at one time threatened to lead to war. The company originally presented a modest claim for $1,400,000. An umpire, to whom the matter was referred, reduced the amount to $28,000. The American government then agreed with Venezuela to submit the matter to the tribunal at the Hague, with the result noted. Venezuelans will probably hail the decision as a victory for them.

Porto Rico Prosperous.—The annual report of the Governor of Porto Rico shows that the island has a denser population than any American State or Territory, except Massachusetts, and the census just taken will show a population of over 1,100,000, or 310 a square mile.

Branches of 22 foreign corporations, capitalized at $11,110,112, were established during the year, and 32 new domestic corporations, capital $5,608,000, were organized. Half the lands are under cultivation. Public school students have quadrupled in number in the past decade. A campaign against the hook worm disease has been conducted with island funds. At the 55 dispensaries 49,407 patients were treated, resulting in 19,423 complete cures and the improvement of 6,966 cases. In the mountainous districts the number still afflicted is estimated at 300,000.

Butchery in Mexico.—Particulars of a bloody occurrence in Zacatelco, a town in the State of Tlaxcala, Mexico, while celebrating the centenary of Mexican independence, state that the trouble began when the official procession and that of the partisans of Madero, the late candidate for president, who was then out on bail, met in the streets of the town. The mayor approached a young woman who was carrying a Madero banner, and ordered her to surrender it. As she refused, he tried to wrest it from her, but she drew a revolver and fired at him. He was not wounded, but he telephoned to the Governor of the state, "The anti-re-electionists are shooting us down." The chief of police of Tlaxcala was at once sent forward at the head of one hundred men, and Governor Cahuantzi followed quickly with reinforcements. When they reached the town, they began to fire indiscriminately at groups of people, wherever they saw them. The militia completely lost their heads and raged like wild beasts. A mother who was raising a loud wail over her little child, who had been shot, was attacked by a militiaman and killed on the spot. The soldiers looted stores and spread panic throughout the town. Governor Cahuantzi was slightly wounded, and his aid was slain. Before quiet was restored there were forty corpses in the streets. The number of wounded was far greater.

Canada.—The by-election in the Drummond-Athabaska constituency due to the transfer of Mr. Louis Lavergne to the senate is being fought vigorously. Both candidates are Liberals and the issue is exclusively the naval policy.—In a by-election for the local legislature at Fernie, British Columbia, W. R. Ross has been returned with a majority over his Socialist opponent of 200. The majority of the coal miners voted for the latter.—A fire in Victoria, British Columbia, destroyed an entire block in the heart of the business quarter. The loss is about two million dollars.—The Niobe of the Canadian Navy reached Halifax October 21. It is said that she will take the Governor-General to the West Indies during the winter.—The Montreal Star is the medium of an offer by leading Canadians of both parties to pay the expenses, up to $10,000, of an English delegation to investigate the truth of the reports circulated by Liberal papers in England that Canada is prepared to exchange protection for free trade. The English freetraders do not seem inclined to accept the invitation.—The Canadian protests against Nathan's attack on the Church and the Pope have so impressed him that he has attempted to explain his words in a bundle of meaningless generalities. Alderman Judge has given notice of a motion to censure the City Council for its resolution against Nathan and in sympathy with the Holy Father.

Great Britain.—The attempt to make a parliamentary reversal of the Osborne Judgment the leading question in the impending by-elections will probably be unsuccessful. William Crookes appeared for two days as a candidate at South Shields for this purpose, but withdrew on account of dissensions in the local trade unions on the subject. Nevertheless the committee of the Labor party has issued a manifesto proclaiming the Osborne judgment to be destructive of Trade Unionism.—The Suffragists are working against Sir John Simon at Walthamstow because he refuses to promise that the Government will allow the Female Suffrage Bill to go forward in the session of Parliament about to open. Sir John Simon answers them and those who demand a similar pledge regarding the Osborne Judgment, very reasonably, that he is not a member of the cabinet but its secondary legal adviser, and can not, therefore, interfere with its policy. It is not thought that these matters will affect his re-election.—Mr. Balfour has made an important speech at Glasgow, identifying the Unionist party with the demand for a greatly increased navy and, if necessary, a loan for the purpose of building it.—The Government has complained to the Persian Government of the insecurity of the southern trade routes from the Persian Gulf. It gives the latter three months in which to make them safe. If this be not done it will organize a local force under Indian officers for the purpose and will take 10 per cent. of the customs to pay the cost. Russia declares itself in sympathy with the demand. The German press is very indignant, declaring the action of Great Britain to be the beginning of a scheme for the partition of Persia. The Turkish press takes the same line. Persia is reported to have rejected the demand at, according to the English press, the instigation of Germany.—The Royal Mail Steam Packet Co. has determined to stop its mail line to the West Indian islands on account of decrease of subsidies; the Imperial direct line to Jamaica is to be stopped for the same reason. British merchants in the West Indian trade are much concerned as they see that the stoppage of close communication with the West Indies means the turning of its commerce to the United States. The Royal Commission on relations between Canada and the West Indies recommends a mail line via Canada; but this, if it is ever organized, will need time.—King Manoel of Portugal, and his mother, Queen Amélie, are with the Duke of Orleans at Wood Norton.—The hopes of a settlement of the shipyard lockout have been disappointed, the workmen having voted against the proposed arrangement. They are persuaded that some of the builders who are taking large contracts will have to open their shops very soon.—The Religious Tract Society calls attention to the opportunity of spreading the Gospel in Portugal, given by the revolution, and asks the public for £3,000 to make known the Gospel of Christ to a people hitherto in intellectual and religious bondage.

Ireland.—The declarations of Mr. Redmond and Mr. T. P. O'Connor, in regard to Federal Home Rule, are the main topics of discussion in the Irish papers and the elective public bodies. In repudiating a portion of his interview with the London Daily Express correspondent, Mr. Redmond says: "Our minimum demand is for an Irish Parliament with an executive responsible to it, and full control over all purely Irish matters." He has no objection to England, Scotland and Wales having Parliaments of their own and to the Irish measure being so framed as to fit in with a general system of federation later on, "but Ireland cannot wait until England, Scotland and Wales have made up their minds to get Home Rule for themselves. Home Rule for Ireland first. We will not tolerate any postponement of the question nor any watering of our demands." The financial features of Gladstonian Home Rule, which Mr. Redmond's article in McClure's pronounces acceptable, is adversely criticized on the ground that English control of Irish customs and excise while Ireland contributes one-fifteenth of the whole to the British exchequer and a proportionate share to the upkeep of army, navy and diplomatic corps, would bankrupt the Irish Government. This contention is strengthened by the statement of Lloyd George, that England is now running Ireland at a loss of $10,000,000 a year. The Federal Home Rule theory on the basis of the relations between the Canadian provinces and the Dominion Parliament, which Mr. O'Connor has been advocating in Canada, is denounced by Mr. Dillon as "gas and water Home Rule." The scheme outlined last week in Dublin by the Imperial Home Rule Association, consisting chiefly of Irish Protestants not connected with the National Party, is much broader than Mr. O'Connor's and from the financial viewpoint more satisfactory than Mr. Gladstone's measures. England would regulate and collect the excise and customs but turn over the amount to the Irish executive, which could use the same for the encouragement of Irish industries by means of bounties.—The Master of Elibank, chief Liberal Whip, speaking at Edinburgh, October 19, indicated that the Government has some Home Rule scheme in view. He recalled that the South African settlement was the chief glory of King:

Edward's reign and he hoped that the settlement of the Irish question, "which shall remove from our constitutional midst the shame and peril of discontented Ireland," might be "one of the bright stars of the reign of King George." He hinted at a settlement on Federal lines.—A criticism of the condition of Dublin streets at night by a speaker at the Catholic Truth Society Conference, brought out the helplessness of the Dublin Corporation. They referred the matter to the police authorities as they had recently done in regard to undesirable exhibitions at theatres and music halls. This was the limit of their power as they have no control over the policing of the city, the Metropolitan Police being ruled directly from the Castle.

France.—It was confidently predicted by his enemies that Briand was at the end of his tether. In the debate on the great strike he was bitterly assailed by the Socialists. The session is said to have been as violent as any of those in the National Convention before the Revolution of 1789. Jaurès, the Socialist leader, and the relentless foe of Briand, was the chief aggressor and he so angered the Prime Minister as to wring from him the admission that he would have used even illegal means to restore order. Fierce cries of "Dictator, resign," came from both Socialists and Radicals; the Chamber was a bedlam and one member endeavored to fight his way through the mob to strike Briand, who stood cool and defiant. The peculiar aspect of the situation is that a few years ago Briand was the idol of these very Socialists, and was violent in his advocacy of the general strike which he had just been called upon to suppress—and which he did by forcing thousands of the strikers to assume the uniform of the army, as reserves. When at last the opportunity came for him to explain his course of action he made the plea that appeals to every Frenchman: the country was in danger and he would not hesitate to go beyond the limits of what was strictly according to law to save it from destruction. Though one hundred Radicals voted with the Socialists against him he won by a great majority and is yet in control.—The attempt made by Pelletan and other members of the Chamber of Deputies to glorify Ferrer, the Spanish anarchist who was put to death last year, ended in a manner quite the reverse of what was expected. A meeting was held and a motion was put asking that Spain should be requested to free herself from the yoke of the Church, to reverse her criminal procedure and to rehabilitate the name of Ferrer. To the amazement of Pelletan the proposal aroused a number of Anarchists to fury. They stormed the platform with sticks and chairs and a general fight ensued, which was ended only by somebody switching off the electric lights. The rioters declared that they were opposed on general principles to parliamentarians, and that Pelletan and his associates would probably have voted to shoot Ferrer.—An excellent example of defiance of tyranny was given the other day by the Bishop of Grenoble. One of his priests had been fined by a civil court for referring to Joan of Arc, Galileo, Giordano Bruno, the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, etc., during a catechism class. The bishop went to the place, taught catechism for two hours and not only spoke of what subject he pleased, but launched out into a scathing denunciation of certain historical and ethical text books used in the public schools. A policeman was present but did nothing.—The budget of this year calls for the startling sum of four milliards and two hundred and sixty-nine millions. This is an increase of eighty-three millions above the expenses of last year. Nor is this all. M. Klotz announces that the increase is to continue. In 1912 there is to be an addition of one hundred and sixty-three millions for public expenditures; in 1913, two hundred and ten millions, and perhaps more; in 1914, two hundred and seventy millions, so that in 1914 the budget will call for four milliards and five hundred and thirty-nine millions. These figures, says the Univers, seem like the measures of space that astronomy employs in telling us of the movement and distances of the planets. What the moon and the stars may do, however, does not practically disturb the denizens of earth, but these numbers proclaim the bewildering sums of money which the patriots of France have to furnish to uphold their glorious republic.—The general strike has failed but there are still loud cries of resistance.

Navy is Too Small.—Austrian and Hungarian delegates began in Vienna the constitutional session in which the program of the common interests of the two countries is discussed and formulated. Following the general review of the situation of the empire's affairs presented by Graf von Aehrenthal, Imperial Minister of Foreign Affairs, special consideration was given to the state of the navy. A carefully prepared report was laid before the delegates, and the claim was made that a study of the details therein presented would show that the Austrian navy was entirely too weak to meet the interests of the empire. A new naval program involving wide and extensive emendations of the navy. It is significant that the famous Haeckel was not invited to the celebration.

Germany's Industrial Troubles.—The strike of the dock hands in Hamburg has been brought to a happy ending. As announced in the Chronicle the strikers and employers alike feared the further extension of a struggle which has caused much loss and suffering. The close of the strike in Hamburg averted a similar struggle planned for Bremen. But the latter Hansa town is facing the effects of a strike of street car employees; which threatens to develop into a serious calamity for this busy emporium.—Three deaths from cholera have occurred in Dantzic, and fifteen more persons have been seized with the plague. An investigation of the cases reported in Hamburg showed no presence of cholera. The water of the river Elbe, which has been thoroughly analyzed is found to be not infected.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

All Souls

In the hundreds of miles of subterranean city, now known as the Roman catacombs, it is calculated that there are six millions of slumbering inhabitants who trust in the Lord and await the resurrection. The rude, as well as the ornate inscriptions over the tombs, the varied symbolism of the period, concealing from the profane while disclosing to the initiated the sacred truths of the new dispensation, remain to-day among the most treasured monuments of the early Church. They bring to us the message of those remote ages and set forth in visible form the mysteries of that faith which welds the present with the past, testifying to the unity and the continuity of the Church of the twentieth century with the Church of the first. Says a recent writer: "Not the doctrines only, but the history and the religious observances, the jurisdiction of the Church's pastors, the order and grades of the ecclesiastical hierarchy and of the ministerial offices, the high honor in which virginity was held, and the rite by which it was solemnly consecrated, are all set before us with an evidence that admits of no doubt that we are reading the records of the forefathers of the Faith."

Countless inscriptions bear witness to the belief of the early Christians in the doctrine of Purgatory, a place where the souls of the departed if they be not free from the stain of sin or from the temporal punishment due to sin are detained for a time awaiting the happy moment of deliverance. Among the prayers inscribed over the tombs we meet frequently with the words: Rest in Peace; May God Give Refreshment to thy Spirit; May He Refresh thy Soul. Scratched in the mortar beside a grave in the Cemetery of Praetextatus, is a Latin inscription written with Greek letters, as the German Jews to-day write their German jargon in Hebrew characters. It is peculiar, too, for containing a testimony to the divinity of Our Lord, as well for expressing a prayer for the refreshment of the departed: "To the Well-Deserving Bona. . . . Christ God Almighty Refresh thy Spirit in Christ." A bereaved husband ends the inscription, "To Lucifera his dear wife," with these words, "Whosoever reads this inscription, let him beseech God that the holy and innocent soul may be taken to God." Here then is a fact, patent and palpable, attesting the antiquity as well as the actuality of the belief that the prayers of the faithful bring light in darkness and relief in suffering to those "who have gone before us with the sign of Faith and sleep the sleep of peace."

Whatever the anguish of the widow of Naim when the staff on which she leaned was broken, or the grief of Mary and Martha when Lazarus was taken from them and their home made desolate, they were not without the knowledge of a consoling truth. It was an accepted article of Jewish belief that, by prayers said and good works done in its behalf, the blessed spirit of the departed might be brought from darkness into Abraham's bosom. The scripture taught "it is a holy and wholesome thought to pray for the dead that they may be loosed from their sins." The words that they may be loosed from their sins imply that they are bound by sin or the punishment due to sin. The phrase would be meaningless were there no Purgatory. Even apart from revelation the passage bears witness to the prevalent belief of the whole Jewish people. They could pray for the departed, and the prayer of the heart laden with sorrow would rise all the more surely to the throne of the Mighty Father.

One of the most violent assaults of the sixteenth century innovators was on the doctrine of Purgatory. With Luther, prayers for the dead were a mask of Satan in flat contradiction with the fundamental belief in the all-sufficiency of Christ as opposed to the merit of the works of men. This denial with its frank acceptance by so many who fell away from the Church has left them without even the shreds of revelation which were common enough among pagan nations, who had lost the true notion of the Redeemer to come. The burial service of the Protestant Episcopal Church is not a prayer, but an instruction for the living, to be recited by the minister at his discretion, which declares that all those "who have finished their course in Faith do now rest from their labors," but of supplication there is never a word. "I am the Resurrection and the Life," recites the minister, to the assembled mourners who are invited to dwell on the day when all shall rise again like Christ, with never a thought suggested of what may be happening in the meantime.

The bereaved Catholic hears the same consoling truth of the Resurrection, but he joins in the supplication, the same that was made by the Christians of the Catacombs: Eternal Rest grant unto him, O Lord! and let perpetual light shine on him! May he rest in peace! Jesus! spare this soul which is so dear to Thee! Hasten Lord his hour and bid him come to Thee!

In some "high" churches where so-called masses for the dead are celebrated, the rules of the Established Church are not allowed to mar the higher law of Catholic custom. They borrowed the missing prayers for the departed directly from the Roman Ritual. Yet the Collect for the dead was precisely the form of prayer which the Reformers were most careful to remove from the Anglican formularies. In the Prayer-Book of 1549 there was an intercession for the "whole state of Christ's Church," followed by a prayer for the souls of the faithful departed. The compilers of the Prayer-Book of 1552 carefully expunged this remnant of the ancient Catholic service. That their meaning might be clearly understood they limited the expression "whole Church" by the words "militant here on earth;" and as for the prayer for the dead they simply swept it out of their liturgy. To make their intention perfectly clear, they inserted in the Articles of Religion an approbation of the Homilies as "godly and wholesome doctrine," while they put forth in the Homilies thus approved the plain statement:

"Neither let us dream any more that the souls of the dead are anything at all holpen by our prayers; but as the Scripture teacheth us, let us think that the soul of man, passing out of the body, goeth straightways either to heaven or else to hell, whereof the one needeth no prayer, and the other is without redemption." (Stan. XIX). But why should we omit the XXII Article of religion, which is quite clear on this point. It reads: "The Romish doctrine concerning Purgatory . . . is a foul thing vainly invented and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the Word of God."

The tenacity with which the pagans preserved the fragments of revelation which came down to them is in startling contrast to the anxiety of a modern world to have none of them. "Those who appear to have lived neither well nor ill," says Plato, "go to the River Acheron, and embarking in any vessels which they may find, are carried in them to the lake, and there they dwell and are purified of their evil deeds; having suffered the penalty of the wrongs which they have done to others, they are absolved, and receive the reward of their good deeds, each of them according to his deserts." The words are strangely akin to those of the Council of Lyons in the thirteenth century, though the mystery is solved when one remembers that the light of truth was dim in the one case and shone with the fulness of revelation in the other. "If truly penitent," says the Council, "they depart in charity, before giving satisfaction by worthy fruits of penance for their sins of commission and omission, these souls are purified after death in the cleansing sufferings of purgatory."

St. Justin Martyr tells us that many of the Greek authors had borrowed from the Jewish writings whatever correct ideas they possessed concerning divine truths, and mentions explicitly Plato and Homer. Virgil, too, represents Æneas as he meets the shade of Palinurus, with other spirits of the dead, wandering on the hither bank of the Styx. And the Roman poet tells us:

"The ghosts rejected are the unhappy crew
Deprived of sepulchres and funeral due:
The boatman Charon; those, the buried host
He ferries over to the farther coast;
Nor dares his transport vessel cross the waves
With such whose bones are not composed in graves.
A hundred years they wander on the shore
At length, their penance done, are wafted o'er."

The monuments of Egypt disclose that three thousand years before the Roman poet sang, the Egyptians believed in a nether world where the departed lived awaiting the coming of the solar barque that they might bathe in the radiance of the sun-god, and lead him with rejoicing through the long caverns of their dark abode. In the splendor of the nightly heavens the dweller on the Nile saw a field of lentil in the northeast, where the departed dwelt in security and peace. It was not given to everyone to reach this fair abode of the blessed, for it was surrounded by water. Some few the sun-god would bear across in his barque; many, the appointed ferryman, but no one would be so favored except him of whom it was said "there is no evil which he has done."

Religion to-day outside the Catholic Church largely resolves itself into the cult of humanity, a love for mankind in general, or a "humdrum effort to better the conditions of the human race." Of the future these humanitarians care but little. But the traditions of the nations and the supernatural revelations accepted for two thousand years are in full accord with reason, and the promptings of the human heart. If nothing defiled can enter heaven, and if many depart from this life with the image of God in their soul, not destroyed but blurred, why should there not be some transitory state in which the soul is purified and the image restored to the brightness of its original representation? If the Church is one, if we are all members of the same body whose head is Christ, in whom all fulness dwells, why is it unreasonable for those who can pray and merit for themselves, to believe that they may share their prayers and their satisfactory merit with those of their brethren who have passed the shoals of time and stand expectant on the shore of an eternity beyond?

Sir Thomas Browne, the distinguished author of "Religio Medici," and a devout member in the seventeenth century of the Church by law established in England, gives his honest opinion of what he thinks of the prayers for the dead and admits his unwilling compliance with the doctrine and practice of the Anglican Church. "There is an error," he says, "which I did never positively maintain or practise, but have wished that it had been consonant to truth, and not offensive to my religion, and that is the prayer for the dead; whereunto I was inclined from some charitable inducements, whereby I could scarcely contain my prayers for a friend at the ringing of a bell, or behold his corpse without an orison for his soul: it was a good way methought to be remembered by posterity, and far more noble than a history."

Samuel Johnson would be a good Catholic, and at the same time a good Anglican. So he uttered this duly qualified prayer for his wife: "O Lord, so far as it may be lawful in me, I commend the soul of my departed wife; beseeching Thee to grant her whatever is best in her present state, and finally to receive her to eternal happiness." Nor did Boswell hesitate to put in writing that the devotions of his master proved unquestionably that "he in conformity with the opinion of many of the most able, learned and pious Christians in all ages, supposed that there was a middle state after death, previous to the time at which departed souls are finally received into eternal felicity."

Mr. Gladstone's prayer, quoted approvingly by the Standard over ten years ago, may in part be recalled here. "O God, the God of the spirits of all flesh, in whose embrace all creatures live, in whatsoever world or condition they be, we beseech Thee for him whose name and dwelling place and every need Thou knowest. Lord, vouchsafe him light and rest, peace and refreshment, joy and consolation, in Paradise, in the companionship of saints, in the presence of Christ, in the ample folds of Thy love." Yet Gladstone believing firmly in this doctrine of the Catholic Church never shook off the fetters of a Church which denied it.

The gift of faith is better appreciated by those who through no merit of their own have received it, when they witness the sad gropings after truth of those who in the long ago were lost in the darkness of a pagan world, as well as of those who living in the fulness of revealed truth are blind nevertheless, because they will not open their eyes to the light.

And what is the Catholic view of the state of the soul confined in Purgatory? "We may certainly say without fear of exaggeration," writes Father Coleridge in his "Prisoners of the King," "that no sudden calm that ever fell upon sea or lake . . . could compare with the wonderful change to peace and perfect tranquillity which takes place at the moment of death in the case of those who die in the state of grace. This calm and peace is not in the case of the Holy Souls a passing, but a permanent state, it lasts as long as they remain in the holy prison of Purgatory; in some respects, it becomes more intense as their period of purification draws towards its close, and then it merges itself into the Beatific Vision."

November is well known to Catholics as the Month of the Holy Souls. Many a Mass will be offered, many a prayer said, many an alms given that the soul of father, or mother, husband or wife, or dear friend, nay the soul of the unknown stranger or friendless one, may receive mercy and deliverance at the hands of a gracious Lord. The thought of Purgatory, like the thought of heaven, is full of hope, for the happy soul therein confined "is safe; consumed, yet quickened, by the glance of God."

E. SPILLANE, S.J.

The French Strike

The strike which has just taken place in France is full of menace for the future. For several days all the northern lines, and a part of those in the east were tied up, and many other supplementary strikes were taking place in different parts of the country. We were within an ace of having all traffic stopped; our great industrial establishments closed; in a word, our entire social and civil life disrupted. The whole plan had been made with that object. Indeed the program is still being carried out, for there is a great permanent Workingmen's Association which strives continually and without disguise to bring this plan to perfection; hoping one of these days to make it completely successful.

If this time the enterprise failed, it was not precisely because of the military measures which the Government was compelled to adopt, but chiefly because the movement started from only one of the syndicates affiliated with the General Workingmen's Confederation. With regard to this Confederation, the strikers on the Northern lines had, so to say, kicked over the traces. They gave the signal for the strike instead of waiting to receive it. The central committee of the Federation was annoyed and chagrined but could do nothing else than approve of the strike; though it was aware, because of the insufficient preparations, that it was destined to fail.

There were already troubles in the Confederation itself; but the disagreements between the Revolutionists and the Reformers, who are called Modern Syndicalists, are getting worse and worse, and this dissension may probably put off for some time the terrible menace of a general strike. Nevertheless while remaining partial, these strikes will continue. Even with these divisions the Confederation will keep a firm hand on the different sections. The preparation of strikes is an essential element of its program, and there is no doubt that we shall see strikes in department after department all over France. There will, so to speak, be a permanent condition of restricted strikes. The readers of AMERICA will welcome, I think, some details about the General Workingmen's Confederation, which is at the back of the movement.

It is a union of several syndicates and other analogous groups. It represents 300,000 workmen, perhaps more, and is divided into two sections. First, the Confederation of Workingmen's Exchanges, and second, the Confederation of Industries and Trades, which are called Syndicates. The Workingmen's Exchanges direct bureaus, whose purpose is to procure work, and to create or administer other kindred organizations. The Confederation of Industries and Trades has for its special object the inauguration and promotion of strikes, and also the forming of syndicates which are to be available as instruments in the social struggle.

For a long time these two sections kept their autonomy and developed by means of their own resources and their special organizations. To unite them was the first object of the Revolutionists. That purpose was effected by establishing the General Workingmen's Confederation, and it was brought about in 1902, after efforts which called for great persistency and perseverance. It was effected by preserving the character and internal organizations of the two branches, and has already been in operation for seven years. Its central committee is made up of delegates designated by each one of the component associations: the Exchanges and the Syndicates, and has three permanent commissions, each of twelve members. The first is the Literary Commission, whose chief organ, a weekly, is the Voir du Peuple. Second, the Commission on Strikes. Third, the Commission of Control. The budget is supplied by fees which are very small, but very numerous.

Their members have a badge of affiliation. It is called the Label and represents two hands stretching across the world with the device "Prosperity and Liberty." There is a paper edited by Citizen Delesalle, which contains information about the use of the badge. It reminds the wearers that it is a sign intended to impart strength to the struggle by the proper distribution of assistance in the fight. Thus when an appeal for help is received, the Syndicates know whom they ought to help, for each one of them will be able to understand immediately where to send the aid that is demanded, if the petition bears the stamp of the Confederation. This help will be distributed always with a preference for the Syndicates which employ the label. Thus, if a Syndicate is forced to begin a strike, its appeals, stamped with the mark of the Association, will declare to the other bodies that it is their duty to be on hand with the needed help. As a matter of fact, the Confederation does not wait for the Syndicate to announce that a strike has been ordered, for it is continually urging and promoting strikes. It has a special permanent commission established, which concerns itself with that object exclusively. The sixteenth article of its rules says, that the Commission on Strikes and on the General Strike, has for its object, to study the movement of strikes in the whole country. It gathers subscriptions from all the members and guarantees the distribution of money among those who need it. It endeavors besides to use every means to persuade the workers of the necessity of a general strike. For that end it creates or suggests the creation of sub-committees for the same purpose wherever it is possible. It not only sends subsidies, but it furnishes lecturers.

In order to understand the importance which the Confederation attaches to this strike propaganda, we need only read the pamphlet which is published by Citizen Delesalle, and which is copied everywhere by other publications. He says, "To fight always without cessation and without respite, to keep the spirit of revolution always alive in the minds of the workingmen, never to be satisfied—and can workers ever be satisfied as long as they are the victims of society?—such are, without contradiction, the only tactics in this war of the classes. Repeated strikes are for the proletariat both an excellent exercise and a powerful and efficacious means of education."

The Confederation inculcates direct action, which means, besides boycotting, the frightful practice of sabotage, which consists in purposely doing poor work, in spoiling good work that has been done by other workmen, in tampering with machinery, and sometimes destroying it. The motto of sabotage is, "For bad pay, bad work." The Confederation professes in general free thought and atheism. It is also antagonistic to the idea of patriotism and the support of the army. Only the other day, at the close of the Congress of Toulouse, where the most revolutionary of the members of the Congress went, of their own initiative, to begin the strike on the railroads of the north, the Confederation passed a motion of anti-militarism. This motion invited the soldiers, not only to throw aside their rifles when called out against their brother workers, but also recommended a general strike in case of war.

Such is the dominant spirit of the Confederation. Nevertheless there is one section of it which, although not numerous, is considerable in its importance. Its members are known as the Reformists. In general they assist in the strikes, but not in all of them. They are opposed to the system of sabotage. They preserve their love of country, and respect for the army. If, in spite of divergences of opinion, they continue, nevertheless, their membership in the Confederation, it is because they represent a great power which at times they have been able to exercise. They strive to prevent anything like violent action. In many cases they have shown a great deal of courage in attempting to reason with the majority. It is not probable, however, that their efforts will meet with any substantial success. Nevertheless, they hope that circumstances will, in the long run, give them more influence. It is just possible that the events of the recent strike, and also what may happen in the future, will produce a crisis in the ranks of the Confederation which the Government will know how to utilize.

In order to combat the Revolutionists, Mr. Briand finds himself now struggling with a condition of which he himself was the creator. Only seven years ago he was associated with the most violent members of the party. He began his career and continued it for some time shoulder to shoulder with these men. In some of the Socialist Congresses, he advocated a general strike and riots. The men whom he faces to-day are his former comrades. That shows the difficulty of the situation, and also throws light upon the skillfulness of the minister. He is gifted with extraordinary suppleness and tenacity. He made use of both these qualities in order to hold his office among the most violent of his party, and then to break with them after having become, through their help, a man of importance in the country. During the three years of his ministry, and especially since he was made the head of the cabinet, Briand has been able to keep his balance by his extraordinary skill. He is a man without principle. With regard to religion, he has long ago expressed himself in a way that is not only hostile, but contemptuous. The other day, at the end of a political discourse, he declared that he wished to respect all beliefs. For him everything depends on the circumstances. It is thus that he reached his present position, and he is availing himself of every opportunity of keeping it. As the public are tired of religious strife, which has been going on for a quarter of a century, he is trying to respond to the call of peace which the country demands. Nevertheless, he as head of the ministry, refuses to modify in the least, the laws which have laicized the schools, and which have been formulated precisely for the purpose of making them hostile and indifferent to religion. To-morrow, if a direct fight against the Church should appear to be opportune, Briand would give the signal to begin, just as easily as he utters to-day his words of peace and reconciliation. He is an Atheist, but has not the excuse of being prompted by the ardent passions of Atheism as Clemenceau. The Atheism of M. Briand is determined by circumstances.

To-day a great number of Moderates, and even of the Conservatives, show themselves disposed to regard Briand as a defence against the advance of demagoguery, but the protection he offers has nothing solid in it. Moreover, its importance for him depends altogether on the vote which the Deputies will give him in some moment of bad humor or caprice.

EUGENE TAVERNIER,
Editor of the Univers.

The Secret of Catholic Educational Influence

At a recent educational conference a president of a secular university remarked to a Catholic rector: "You people get a hold on your students that we can never compass, try how we may; and your hold of them is as strong outside the classroom as in it. You get into their hearts and minds and stay there when they go out into the world. How do you manage it?"

The rector despaired of finding an answer that would be intelligible to his questioner, but replied: "By being a Catholic institution. Our hold on our students is the Faith we hold in common, or rather its hold upon us—a vivid conscious, definite Faith that is mutually and equally binding. Regarding the effect it generates, I would say the secret is reverence. Catholic teaching and practice had been instilling this reverence in our students from their cradles, and when they come to us it is a lever ready to our hands."

"Well," said the secular educationalist, "we have no such lever, and if we had we should not know how to use it."

The answer had not greatly enlightened him, but it marks well the spirit that differentiates the religious from the secular system. The Catholic child in a truly Catholic household grows up in an atmosphere of Faith. Its mysteries are to him as real as his surroundings. He knows and feels as by physical contact the presence of God, of His Holy Spirit, of Christ the Saviour, of His Virgin Mother; and the household of God—the saints and angel spirits whom he is taught to invoke—is as near to him as his own.

To him the Church is God's house, not an earthly edifice, for he knows that as he kneels God comes down upon the altar, and to the upraised Host he bows in adoration as he would before the Throne of Heaven. And the priest, whose mystic words have wrought the wondrous mystery, he regards not as a man. He is the anointed of the Lord, empowered to call on the Divinity, and lo! day by day his God is present to his summons. With the office of washing away the primal stains; with power to bless and teach and save, to free the souls of men from sin and fill them with grace from sacramental fountains, God has dowered him. To him the Catholic doffs his hat, not as an act of conventional courtesy, but of religious reverence, and the appellation, "Father," springs spontaneous to the lips. He may possess or lack personal distinction, but wherever the Catholic finds a priest ordained and sanctioned by the Church, he reveres him as God's minister. He reveres his Church because it is God's; he respects his government and laws because their authority is from God; he respects his neighbor, his own soul and his own flesh because they are from God. By its relation to God his respect for everything in heaven or on earth is measured.

This spirit of reverence, unconsciously informing heart and mind and strengthened by transmission through generations, accounts for many things in Catholic lands, which to strangers reared in other traditions are an enigma. Mr. Birrell declared recently in the British House of Commons that the inmates of a miserable hut in Connaught know how to welcome a stranger and dispense hospitality with a civility and grace unsurpassed by any class in the King's dominions. He apparently deemed this phenomenon peculiar to Ireland, but had he read a work issued a few weeks previously by another distinguished Englishman, he could have appraised its origin more accurately. In his "Life Lessons from Joan of Arc," Father Vaughan attributes the ease of the peasant maid, "as though to the manor born," in the King's entourage, to this Catholic spirit of reverence which "lends a strangely wondrous grace even to the peasantry," and has produced "the refinement and charm of manner that belong to the land-tillers in Normandy, in Ireland, and in other places where the people have not been robbed or starved out of religion."

The genuineness and warmth of this politeness spring from the sincerity and intensity of a reverence which, vivified by a thousand acts of adoration and never withered by scepticism or sin, has been dowered by the inpouring of grace with more than earthly charm. It is this peculiarity which so pleases while it mystifies strangers accustomed to the pale courtesies of conventional life. The politeness of society is a superstructure built on the surface by the architects of convention; it is a painting more or less perfect, but artificial at its best. The Catholic peasant's courtesy is an outgrowth from a religious root, the living flower of the tree of Faith and Charity; and its bloom is perennial, for it knows no winter unless sin should nip its blossoms. It is the outward expression of the supernatural within; it is grace of manner flowing from the Grace of God.

The Catholic student, in less or greater measure according to his character and rearing, brings this grace-nurtured reverence to school, and finds there a teacher whose vocation is the cult of reverence. At the start there is between the two a bond which the friction of life and divergences of taste and temper cannot sever. The student may not have been reared in the ideal Catholic household; he may have failed to respond to the influences of Catholic environment and his sense of reverence may be of the slightest, but so long as he has Faith there is means and hope for its development: there is a foundation on which to build, and in the sacraments there is ample material for the builder. The student goes forth from the school of reverence; whatever unpleasant emotions he may bear with him are soon ground out in the mills of time, but the reverence remains, strengthening with the years. Grievances are forgotten, surface wounds, if any, are healed and leave no mark, and he returns to seek out the teacher who had devoted to him his life and whom he now recognizes as his truest friend, the friend of his soul. The jars and jolts are a subject of laughter, the teacher an object of reverence.

There are, of course, exceptions to this rule. Not all Catholics avail themselves of their opportunities and not all Catholic students attain the ideal before or during college life. There have been non-Catholic teachers, too, who have inspired respect and affection, and Catholic teachers who have not; but it is only those who have consecrated their lives to the cause of Catholic education who can win from their pupils a holy, it might be called a sacramental reverence. It is a phenomenon that Catholics easily understand, and there are not a few non-Catholics, even outside those who send their children to Catholic schools, who recognize, though they may not comprehend it. It solves the university president's difficulty and also explains the progress, multiplication and development, in the face of otherwise insurmountable obstacles, of Catholic educational institutions.

An incidental passage in Canon Sheehan's novel, "Luke Delmege," is pertinent in this connection. Entering a school, whose pupils were noted for their courtesy and conduct, Father Delmege overheard the teacher thus address them:

"Reverence is the secret of all religion and happiness. Without reverence, there is no faith, nor hope, nor love. Reverence is the motive of each of the Commandments of Sinai—reverence of God, reverence of our neighbor, reverence of ourselves. Humility is founded on it; piety is conserved by it; purity finds in it its shield and buckler. Reverence for God, and all that is associated with Him, His ministers, His temple, His services—that is religion. Reverence for our neighbor, his goods, his person, his chattels—that is honesty. Reverence for ourselves—clean bodies and pure souls—that is chastity. Satan is Satan because he is irreverent. There never yet was an infidel but he was irreverent and a mocker. The jester, and the mime, the loud laughter and the scorner, have no part in the Kingdom."

The teacher was asked, "How many pupils on the rolls?" He replied, "Fifty-six." How many in attendance?" The reply was the same, "Fifty-six." It is the teaching and practice of reverence that wins and holds the pupils of all ages to School, to Church and to God.

M. KENNY, S.J.

IN MISSION FIELDS

BEFORE A PAGAN JUDGE.

The church of Kidangur, British India, has the distinction of having been built from foundation to roof in the course of a single night. The need of the church was not so pressing as to demand such desperate haste, but there was another consideration which could not be ignored, namely, the opposition of the Hindoos, who were very numerous while the Catholics were a mere handful. The Hindoos were quite irritated by the presence of the church, and were not soothed by the thought of how it had been raised while they were asleep. They petitioned the government for its removal and searched the statutes for some means of outwitting the Catholics, but as their efforts were fruitless, they brought a criminal charge against them. The facts of the case were as follows:

A Hindoo of the Nayar caste owned some land adjacent to the site of the church. During a recent survey of the district a part of the church property was surveyed as forming part of the Nayar's land. This was, however, unknown to both parties; but at the time of their investigations to get up a case, someone probably with access to the government's records discovered the point and a criminal case was brought forward by the Nayar. The indictment was that the Christians had forcibly and by night trespassed upon the property and had built a church there. The accused were the Rev. Thomas Mapiledeth, who had been deputed by the bishop to say the first Mass there, and seven of the neighboring Catholics.

The Tahsildar began the trial. After two hearings the priest was acquitted, but the seven parishioners were only let out on bail. The circumstances of the case and the nature of the trial were such that the Catholics had every reason to fear the worst. Some important documents produced by the claimant, the fury of the Brahmins and of the various castes, the aid given by the pleaders of the Talug, with one exception, the remarks of the Tahsildar when the case was being tried, all these seemed to point to an unfavorable verdict. The one hopeful consideration was that the Tahsildar, although of the Nayar caste, had proved himself a just and unprejudiced man.

Every morning during the trial, Mass was sung in the new church and this was followed by the recital of the Rosary to ask the protection of Our Lady Help of Christians.

On the last day of the trial when the pleader for the accused closed his speech, the Tahsildar made such severe reflections on the case, that the accused and their party thought there was no hope. The seven defendants returned to the church and promised seven Masses in honor of the Seven Dolors of Our Lady. It followed, of course, that if they were condemned, the church would have to be removed, and there was little chance of establishing another in Kidangur.

On the following day when the decision was to be given, a great number of Christians attended the Mass and Rosary, and several went to Holy Communion. The Tahsildar appeared in court. Although the pleader for the prosecution repeatedly urged him, he would not proceed to give judgment in this case. A huge crowd had gathered, the accused were at last called, and excitement was intense.

In his summing up the Tahsildar briefly reviewed the facts of the case, while the Hindoos looked on in exultation like so many Shylocks awaiting Antonio's sentence. And in fact the end of the case was similar to that, for in acquitting the seven accused the Tahsildar remarked that the whole accusation was merely got up on account of the Hindoo feeling against the new church. The case was thus quietly terminated.

The promises were kept by the accused, and the Feast of Our Lady Help of Christians was celebrated with great rejoicing.

The organ of the Panama Masonic lodges, El Nivel, undertakes to throw a little light on Freemasonry and succeeds to admiration, for it informs us that "the Masonic creed is in perfect antagonism with the Catholic creed," that "Masonry combats dogma," and that it "rejoices that the temporary president, Sr. Mendoza, (since succeeded by Sr. Arosemena) belongs to our grand institution of Masonry, and following the doctrine that it teaches, he will effect the happiness of the people of Panama."

This is one more proof, though by no means needed, of the wisdom of the Church in warning her children to choose between her and Freemasonry, since they cannot belong to both. Whether a Catholic will adopt this or that profession or embark in this or that business venture may be purely a matter of choice or sagacity; whether he will join the Freemasons or not is a question whether he will exchange his Church for something that necessarily cuts him off from the Church.

Here a question of principle is involved: Catholics may fail in practice while still holding fast to the Faith; but when they adopt another religious system, they renounce their faith.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Truth about Portuguese Republicans

From the impartial pen of a staff correspondent of the Westminster Gazette, of London, we have the following account of the barbarous methods of the rabble of Lisbon in their treatment of the unfortunate religious of the Portuguese capital. It is printed in the issue of that paper of October 18:

The Portuguese Government has done serious harm to its own cause by its ill-treatment of the nuns and by allowing its soldiers and sailors to pillage several churches, monasteries, and convents. Before describing these mistakes in detail I must first say, however, that no people in the world is entitled to reproach the Portuguese in these matters. The Cromwellians and the French Revolutionists acted with far more violence though also with far more manliness and greatness, and, considering everything, the Portuguese Revolutionists exhibited extraordinary self-restraint when they got the upper hand.

Two wrongs, however, do not make a right, and undoubtedly the treatment of the nuns was disgraceful and barbarous. Granting that they had no legal right to exist as communities, the Government should have notified them of that fact and given them ample time to make preparations for going to their homes or for embracing some other profession.

"But," said a marine officer to me, "we had got to protect these nuns from the mob, therefore we brought them as soon as possible to the arsenal."

Now there was not the faintest disposition on the part of the mob to attack the convents. Most of the attacking was done by the soldiers and bluejackets. The Irish convent of Bom Sucesso at Bêlem, the Dominican convent, the Irish Dominican monastery of Corpo Santo, and others are still protected by a few soldiers. All the other convents could have been protected in like manner. I say nothing of the monasteries and especially of the Jesuit establishments. I confine myself to the case of the nuns, and I think that case was hard.

From Thursday to Sunday the nuns were brought through the streets in open motor-cars and carriages. These vehicles were filled with armed men, some of them displaying naked swords. The shouts of the crowd and the jeers of the soldiery frightened these unfortunate ladies nearly to death. Some of them wore their religious habits, most of them wore the national mantilla, probably many of them had never been outside the convent since they were little girls. No small number of these ladies were of noble birth and of refined appearance. Some of them were very young, some of them mere novices. To entrust them to the care of drunken—or, at least, very excited—bluejackets, to drive them through howling mobs, was a cruel and an unmanly thing to do. I have since discussed the matter with foreigners, all of them Atheists save one, who is a Lutheran, and they cannot find words strong enough to express their contempt and loathing for the "Dagos," who have treated delicate and helpless women in this disgraceful manner.

If only grown-up women were concerned, the matter would not be quite so bad. But the girls and children who had been boarding in the convent schools, the orphans and the poor whom the nuns had been taking care of, were similarly escorted to the arsenal or to the railway station. I saw one child carrying in her hand a doll.

Before her swaggered a truculent bully with an un-sheathed sword. Around her surged a villainous-looking gang of sailors and civilians.

Even if it had been necessary to remove the nuns to some central place of safety, why send them to the arsenal? Could they not all have been collected in some one large convent or other building on the outskirts of the city? If the Republican Government wished to protect them from the mob, why did it expose them to the jeers of the mob by taking them through the heart of the city.

His Excellency, Senhor Affonso, rushed to the arsenal, seated imposingly in his motor, and surrounded by a mob of journalists. In the Rua Ouro he stopped and entered a house where Cardinal Dom José Netto, the venerable Patriarch of Lisbon, was confined, having been arrested by two civilians while leaving the city with two of his clergy. Senhor Affonso questioned the aged Prince of the Church as to his name, his profession, and the religious Order to which he belonged. The old man answered every question. He was by profession a Cardinal. He belonged to the Order of St. Francis of Assisi. Would he promise not in future to live in community? The Cardinal promised, and the Minister with his bodyguard of journalists left, somewhat crestfallen. Sooth to say, they had all cut a very poor figure in the presence of the venerable ecclesiastic, whose great age made him indifferent to death and whose amused smile visibly galled them. Certainly there was ample reason for that smile. The Cardinal had been on his way to Leiria when two ragamuffins pounced upon him and dragged him back to town. After the interview, Cardinal Netto again left for Leiria, where he is now residing.

Affonso Costa next visited the imprisoned priests, and questioned them in the same way as he had questioned the Cardinal. A Franciscan, questioned as to his occupation in the monastery, said that he was a musician.

Senhor Affonso then rushed in his powerful motor-car to the arsenal. Here in the hall, where Marshal Hermes da Fonseca had lately been banqueted, where only two or three days before King Manoel had represented Portugal for the last time (perhaps), hundreds of Sisters were now crowded together. At last Affonso was in his element: He could swagger before these simple-minded women. He could roar at them, gesticulate furiously, glare. He called the Superiors of the different Orders before him and sternly interrogated them. He made them tell how novices were received, how they became professed Sisters, what was the color of their religious habit, the name of their novitiate, the date of their organization, etc., all of which information he could have got in any book of reference. Three hours did the Minister of Justice spend in this frivolous questioning, while in the background stood a solid wall of journalists, with note-books in their hands. They admired the astute, the relentless, the valorous Affonso. In O Mundo of October 10, four solid columns and several tremendous headlines tell how the great Republican leader browbeat the nuns, wrenched from them their names, their ages, and other profound secrets. How splendidly Citizen Affonso cowed them with his magnetic eye, overwhelmed them with his imperious gestures, made them tremble at his Napoleonic frown.

One does not need to be a lawyer or a Lord Chief Justice to realize the imbecility of all these proceedings on the part of a Cabinet Minister at a time when his country is anxiously awaiting for some evidence of constructive statesmanship. Let him expel all the monks and nuns if he wants to, but let him refrain from wasting whole days by personally playing the Lord High Executioner in order to drive fear into the hearts of a few old men and women.

Worse remains to be told, however. The Republican and atheistical newspapers, whose editors now rule Portugal, printed details of alleged immorality on the part of the nuns, details so revolting, so exaggerated, and so contradictory that they overshot the mark and deceived nobody.

On Saturday last I entered the pillaged convent of Quelhas, and certainly the sight was most pitiable. The place had been a boarding-school for poor girls. Their little bedrooms had been turned topsy-turvy, their school-books, their sewing and embroidery, their half-finished socks, their little toys, their linen, their humble under-clothing, hats, and books, lay strewn on the floor. Few of the statues and religious emblems had been injured, and evidently the heroic and valorous looters of the place had been out "after" loot alone. The open drawers, the smashed cupboards, the broken writing-desks, spoke only of a search for hard cash and for gold ornaments. On the occasion of my visit the house was filled with a civil and military rabble, still hunting for loot. The soldiers and bluejackets were armed, of course; some of the civilians flourished long, naked daggers in a manner that suggested drink or insanity.

How a Government worthy of the name could allow its regular troops to take part in such an orgie is incredible. Why the place was attacked at all would be difficult to say, were it not the fact that the Minister of Justice and the Republican authorities have obligingly furnished us with an explanation. As this explanation applies to the attacks on the adjoining Jesuit house and on the Church of Santos last Saturday night, I shall consider it in some detail. It is that the Republican troops were fired on from these establishments, with the result that several of them were killed and wounded. In the case of Quelhas, the firing is said (by La Lucta, October 9) to have taken place on Friday. In the case of Santos it must have taken place later, since that church was pillaged on Saturday night. Now all these establishments were deserted at the time the firing is alleged to have taken place. The Jesuits and the nuns had fled. The church had been closed and locked for days. And even if the priests and nuns were still concealed in their former houses, why should they begin firing on the Republicans three or four days after the monarchy had fallen and all resistance had been crushed? The Portuguese Republicans must have had an exceedingly low idea of the level of intelligence and credulity outside Lisbon when they started this story. I discussed the subject with a naval officer on duty in the arsenal, and, though our conversation was interrupted from time to time by another naval officer (drunk) periodically "butting-in" to assure us in an offensive manner that Portugal was still the greatest naval power in the world, I gathered a very clear idea of the officer's views on the Quelhas question. They were that three days after the fighting had ceased the Jesuits had begun to amuse themselves by throwing "small pieces of dynamite" at bluejackets passing in the street below. There I shall leave the matter. There is no use in going any further on such evidence as this. None of the correspondents wired it, I think, though the censor did his best to make them do so. "I don't want those fantastic tales about the bluejackets firing on the convent," said that gentleman to a friend of mine, a German journalist: "I shall certainly not allow such wires to pass. What I want is the truth. Now, if you tell the truth and say that the friars threw bombs at the troops, well, I shall let that pass with pleasure."

On the strength of this story, the nunnery and the Jesuit establishment were both riddled with bullets. The great tower of the convent is pitted all over with rifle-balls, and the firing at this empty house continued for hours.

Catholic Influence in Holland

AMSTERDAM, OCT. 19, 1910.

Holland is a Protestant country, that is to say, the majority of its population professes the Reformed Religion. Side by side with sixty per cent. of Protestants, there are thirty-five per cent. Catholics. Nevertheless the Protestants are divided into two great parties. The Believers or Orthodox, and the Moderns. The Orthodox are again divided into many sections, of whom the Calvinists and Lutherans are the principal. The Moderns, on the contrary, are for the most part Rationalists, and have little or no belief.

The Orthodox Protestants strive to apply their religious principles to their political action, which results in their forming two political factions. One, the Anti-Revolutionists, of whom Dr. Kuyper is the head, and the Free Anti-Revolutionists, whose leader is Mr. Savornin Lohman. Like the Protestants, the Catholics make their principles affect their politics, so that both Catholics and Protestants find themselves in opposition to the anti-religious tendencies of the Liberals, who, on that point are sustained by the Socialists. Nevertheless each of the two Christian parties is too feeble independently of each other to make head against the Anti-Christians. This was particularly noticeable in the second half of the last century, when the fight was on against the Liberal School Law of 1857. Their helplessness made them see that the two Christian parties would be stronger if they stood by each other in electing Protestant or Catholic representatives, who would defend in Parliament the common interests of both sides.

Among the statesmen who devoted themselves most earnestly to bring about this coalition were Dr. Kuyper among the Protestants and Dr. Schaepman among the Catholics. Dr. Schaepman was a priest, and a member of the lower house. He died but a few years ago. Nevertheless, their efforts to effect this coalition evoked a great deal of opposition among the Catholics. Their feeling in this matter was intelligible when we recall that the ancestors of these Catholics from the very beginning of the Reformation were oppressed and persecuted by the ancestors of the Protestants. On that account the coalition was denounced by its enemies as the Monster League, because it seemed so contrary to the nature of the two parties. But in spite of this opposition the union, especially since 1879, has become an accomplished fact, although no formal contract was ever drawn up. There is a tacit convention by which both sides agree to so combine their votes on a Catholic or Protestant representative. They are thus sure their interests will be defended in Parliament.

The first result of this cooperation was the victory at the polls in 1888, when forty-five Liberals, twenty-seven Anti-Revolutionists, twenty-six Catholics, one Conservative and one Socialist were elected for the lower house. The consequence of this election was the anti-Liberal ministry of 1888, presided over by Mr. Mackay. But, unfortunately, in the year 1891, a law was proposed for the reorganization of the army, in which the principle of personal service was involved, and that was the shoal on which this coalition was wrecked. Worse still, it also gave rise to a disagreement in the Catholic party. The anti-Revolutionists were for personal service, and a part of the Catholics against it. This gave rise to the Bahlman faction. Another party of Catholics followed the lead of Schaepman and rallied with the anti-Revolutionists. But before the debate on the military question was over the general elections of 1891 proved that the disagreement between the two Christian parties had ruined the majority, for the new house was composed of fifty-five Liberals and forty-five anti-Liberals. Mackay was replaced by Trenhooer Tak van Poortoleet. This ministry revoked the military law of Mackay, and personal service was admitted only in 1898.

Nevertheless, in the course of time the coalition was again reestablished, and in 1900 another anti-Liberal ministry, that of Dr. Kuyper, took the reins of government. This ministry did a great deal to repair the iniquities committed by the Liberals in dealing with the Christian parties. But its principal work was that of revising the school law as regards university and primary education. Catholics and Protestants could not send their children to the State schools because the so-called neutral education was, generally speaking, openly anti-religious. For that reason the two parties decided to erect private schools, both for the Protestants and Catholics. These schools, however, received no subsidies from the State; consequently, while supporting their own schools, they had, like other Netherlands, to pay their taxes for the public schools. Kuyper, however, revised the school law, providing that the universities and primary schools should receive a subsidy from the State. Private universities besides, would have the power of conferring degrees, which would have the same civil effects as the degrees obtained in the State Universities.

When this was obtained, Kuyper wanted to propose a similar revision for the high schools, but before that the election of 1904 had thrown him out of office. Dr. Kuyper was then made the scapegoat of the Right, electors going to the polls crying out, "Down with Kuyper." The result was that the Left won by a small majority. Nevertheless, the Liberal ministry of de Meester, which took the reins of government, could do nothing with its small majority. Besides, it was made up of men who had no political ability, so that the Liberal Party broke into many factions and on several questions were unable to agree.

The consequence of this was that the de Meester ministry, after a precarious and pitiable existence of three years, gave way to the ministry of the Right. But because Kuyper was so objectionable to the Liberal Party, it did not seem prudent to put him at the head of the new ministry. Mr. Heemskerke succeeded in forming a ministry which had the complete confidence of the Right, and which had three Catholic members. At the beginning Heemskerke had but a small majority in the house, but because of his exceptional ability and prudence and vigor, he triumphed over the first difficulties. In 1908 his position was notably strengthened by elections for the lower house when sixty members of the Right were elected against forty of the Left, and in the upper chamber there were thirty-two members on the Right and eighteen on the Left. The first solicitude of Heemskerke was to complete the revision of the school law for higher education, so that like universities and the primary schools they might receive subsidies from the State.

BATAVUS.

A M E R I C A

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1910.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1910, and published weekly by The America Press, New York, President, THOMAS J. CAMPBELL; Secretary, MICHAEL J. O'CONNOR; Treasurer, J. J. WILLIAMS.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Sq., W., New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

The Secret Passages

As was to be expected, the Portuguese Revolution furnished the usual opportunity for setting up the battered old Jesuit scarecrow. It is always good stage property, even if it be as grotesque as the children's Halloween pumpkin. On this occasion, almost to as great an extent as the army and navy, these historical unfortunates, the Jesuits, have been dragged into prominence. Thus, the very last act of the poor little King was to sign a decree suppressing them, though the London Spectator is kind enough to inform us that "the Jesuits were very much in sympathy with his regime." Alas! he never imagined that the cannon of the fleet would that very night be thundering against his palace of the Necessidades, announcing his own suppression. The wonder is that someone has not insisted that the gunners of the fleet were Jesuits. When the King fled, the first act of his successors was to expel the Jesuits and confiscate their property—a political conjunction which always occurs, and is self-explanatory. When the mob broke loose, they made straight for the Jesuit house, and after looting it, pursued a few invisible old men through underground passages which never existed, though the Philadelphia Ledger of last Sunday gives us a snap-shot picture of a group of sharpshooters perched on the coping of the roof preparing to shoot the first Jesuit who might pop his head out of the dormer window. It is Jesuit, Jesuit, everywhere, till the average Jesuit who is not in Portugal throws aside his paper more in sorrow than in anger and wonders if the folly will ever cease.

The persistency of the superstition about the Order is a curious phenomenon. No matter how absurd, or how frequently refuted, the most atrocious misrepresentations and calumnies are accepted as absolutely true. They never fail to whet the public appetite. They are as old as the Reformation, and custom cannot stale their infinite variety.

In the non-Catholic mind they amount to an obsession, and suggest holy water, if the subject were fit; but sometimes even Catholics have a lurking suspicion that there is something wrong under it all. Where there is so much smoke, there must needs be some fire. Indeed, a respectable French Catholic paper tells us that a good many people in Portugal believe that Jesuits are not mere men, but sorcerers or demons, who dwell somewhere between heaven and earth and practice hideous rites in subterranean caverns. Their principal diversion is to kidnap little children, and make oil of them by boiling them in cauldrons. If credulity of that kind is rife in Portugal a revolution was inevitable.

One might conceive such a condition of mind as possible, at least remotely, in the man behind the hoe on the Lusitanan mountains; but what shall we say of the wise, the intellectual, the infallible, the omniscient London Times; which cherishes similar illusions and proclaims them to the world?

"The Collegio Campolide," it says, "has every modern educational appointment, cubicles worthy of a hotel, salons that would have graced a city guild, a kitchen equal to a modern restaurant." The Times' scribe forgot to say that it had a Museum of Natural History unequalled for its richness by any in Europe; that it had seven or eight hundred pupils, and was for the most part free. "But nevertheless," he continues, "this institution, which is the seat of Jesuitism in Portugal, has under the cloak of educational functions, practiced all the monastieral intrigues and seclusions that are illegal in the country." It is somewhat of a puzzle, but "monastieral intrigues and seclusions" is good. "Search parties," he says, "disclosed a quaint blending of Inquisitorial mysteries and educational appointments. There was a maze of subterranean passages, crypts and caches that would have done credit to the Bastille."

It was quite useless for Archbishop Bourne, who knew the college well, to go to the trouble of informing the great paper that "the caches and the crypts" were simply coal-bins and potato cellars; the same persistency in folly will continue. Nor would it avail for any Jesuit who is ipso facto a discredited witness, to protest that there are no secret passages in any Jesuit house for "monastieral intrigues and seclusions;" for, in the first place Jesuits are not monks, and secondly they would be puzzled to know what is meant by "seclusions." The Order has much against its will enriched many a government of Europe with handsome establishments for public libraries, museums, barracks and the rest, but underground dungeons have not yet been discovered in any of them. As for "intrigues," men who have grown old and have held high offices in the Order know of them only in the silly romances which they are sometimes forced to read for their sins; and one who has been not only in "the seat of Jesuitism in Portugal," but who has lived in "the seat of Jesuitism" of the whole world, viz.: the castle of Loyola in the heart of the Pyrenees, where for four months seventy-two representatives from all the Provinces of the Order sat and deliberated, would if he were believed, relate, how during all that time, no more malicious intrigue was suggested or entered upon than a scheme to prolong the studies of theology, or to make the practice of poverty even stricter than it is, or to select the men to be sent to the forests of Africa, or to the snows of Alaska and the like.

There were wild disturbances going on in the world while that Congregation was in session; there were even Anarchist riots in near-by Madrid, but a newspaper seldom came over the mountains and few glanced at it. Those serious men were thinking of more important things than political intrigue. When the work was over they went home to carry out the mandates that were formulated for the spiritual progress, both of themselves and of those committed to their charge. Politics were never mentioned.

It may be of interest to know that the Portuguese Jesuits, who have occasioned so much trouble, number 150 priests all told. Of these, 32 are in the missions of Asia, Africa and America. In the Quelhas Residence, which figured so extensively in the outbreak, there were only 8 priests, one of them 66, and another 80 years of age. We have no doubt that bombshells were found in their rooms, just as the gold cup was found in Joseph's meal-sack, but we do not believe that they escaped by underground passages, one of which was a couple of miles long, or by the sewers. The ordinary Jesuit is cunning enough to go out by the front door. The house was empty when the mob arrived, but the last reports we have, tell us they were all safely landed in jail, where some of them are to be tried by court-martial. Possibly there may be a desire on the part of the Portuguese insurgents to propitiate the manes of Ferrer, who was put to death in Spain a year ago, not by the Jesuits, but by the Government. When the veil lifts later on we shall know something more of the infamy that has settled upon once glorious Portugal.

The Logical Jew

If a Jew is Mayor of Rome to-day it is only because Italy is paying a political debt. There never could have been a united Italy without the help of the Hebrews. Ermanno Loevissen, whose name reveals his race, makes this clear in an article entitled "Camillo Cavour e gli Israeliti," which he contributed to the Nuova Antologia on the occasion of the recent Cavour celebrations.

Cavour's closest friends were Giacomo Dina, Constantino Nigra, and Isaac Artom, all Jews. Artom, who was his private secretary, was particularly serviceable to the great conspirator at the most critical moment of his career. The King and Garibaldi were furious against Cavour because he had ceded Nice to France. Nicè was Garibaldi's birth place and Cavour's career seemed to have come to an end but Artom succeeded in preventing the breach and for that and other reasons was honored with the Senatorial laticlave. He was the first Jew to win that distinction.

Of course, the Jew bankers, both Italian and French, were indispensable in financing the enterprise. Emile and Isaac Pereire, the Avigdors of Nice and the Rothschilds of Paris opened their money bags and supplied the necessary funds without stint. "In a word," says Loevissen, "the Israelites who were most distinguished for their learning, culture, wealth and patriotism associated themselves with this moderate and liberal-minded gentleman who was altogether free from any sectarian prejudice."

The world has almost forgotten the storm that swept over the world from 1858 to 1860 in the affair of the Jew boy Mortara. On that occasion Cavour was conspicuous for his ferocious abuse of Pius IX. It was not done merely for political effect though incidentally it served that purpose, but Cavour was intensely and we suppose sincerely Judaic in his affections. Had he not written a Jeremiad over their misfortunes as far back as 1839? They had repaid him with devotion. So that if the Italians are proud of the unification of their country they ought to be satisfied if the men who brought it about are not only rewarded with the highest honors but control its destiny. It is written in the bond. But the end has not yet come. The Italian Masonic Review declared twelve years ago: "We have not yet the Third Rome that we fought for when our cannon made a breach in the Porta Pia." Victor Emmanuel is enthroned on the Quirinal hill, "but we must continue to undermine the rock of the Vatican till we smother the Papacy." Perhaps the last blast of Sr. Nathan is one of the final attempts. Meantime, however, the Quirinal itself is being undermined and royalty may also be smothered.

An Insult from "Current Literature"

For the instruction and edification of its readers, Current Literature reproduces a cartoon which is an insult to every Catholic. A bishop and a monsignore are pictured as walking arm in arm, near a church which forms the dark background; the bishop, low-sized, of unseemly girth, with broad-brimmed clerical hat which throws in relief his repulsive features; his companion, the monsignore, tall by contrast, with pendent jowls, bespectacled, wearing an outlandish academic head gear and strutting along by the side of the unshapely bishop. This is the conversation:

"The Bishop: What do you think of the Pope's letter?

"The Monsignore: I don't think at all. I'm not a Modernist."

The picture is a German caricature of French ecclesiastics. Its very obvious interpretation is that only men deficient in intellectuality and who are physical degener-ates are opponents of Modernism which is supported by the whole world of thinkers and "intellectuals."

It is a poor excuse to say that the cartoon is merely a reproduction from the Munich Jugend. The patent animus of the German towards the French ought to have sufficed to exclude it. Whatever the pretext, the cartoon and the legend are insulting. Whether the insult originated with the Munich Jugend or Current Literature the malice is the same and the offense equal. Had Current Literature expressed its disapproval or explained that its purpose was to show to what depths of degradation the anti-clerical press will descend to revile and besmirch the papacy, some palliation might be found for the gross offense. But the reproduction presented as it is without comment of any kind is an attack on the religion of fifteen millions of Catholics in the United States.

The Courage of Conviction

Perhaps the most noteworthy article in the November issue of the Ecclesiastical Review, is the Reverend W. J. McGarvey's on "The Convert Clergyman and the Ecclesiastical Seminary."

As our readers will remember, Dr. McGarvey was one of the Episcopalian clergymen who came into the Church about three years ago. The opening by the Convention of 1907 of Episcopalian pulpits to preachers of other sects showed them how impossible it was to keep up the pretence of Catholicity for a body that seemed never to lose an opportunity of ranging itself among the Protestant denominations. They therefore made their submission and Dr. McGarvey, with some of his disciples, entered the Overbrook Seminary to prepare for sacred orders. He was already of middle age. His Episcopalian ministry had filled out twenty-two laborious years, during the greater part of which he had been a leader of his people. But God gave him the grace to become as a little child for the sake of the kingdom of heaven, and he who outside the Church had been a teacher took his place amongst its pupils. His experiences as such he sums up in the article we are noticing, and he proves convincingly his conclusion, that the discipline of the seminary is not merely useful, but also necessary for the convert clergyman aspiring to the priesthood. The tone of the article is beautiful. Its thoroughly Catholic spirit and expression show what the seminary has been to its writer.

One can conceive that of the many Episcopalian ministers who, the writer assures us (and none can know the facts better than he), "are standing trembling on the banks of divine mercy, needing only the impetus of fortitude to plunge into the current which will carry them to the City of God," at least some are held back by the prospect of the years of retirement and apparent uselessness the inevitable seminary involves. They are doing a good work, they think, even a great work. Can they give it up? Few will dare to say that their position is that which Dr. McGarvey once held or that their work is comparable to that which was carried on at St. Elizabeth's, Philadelphia. We hope that such will be able to learn from this article that for him the retirement of the seminary has been as St. Paul's sojourn in Arabia from which he returns to do a work inside the Church with which whatever he did in his former condition is simply incommensurable, and that it may be the same for them.

A Great Dominican Prelate

The Right Reverend Fray Marcolino del Carmelo Benavente, O.P., Bishop of San Juan de Cuyo, Argentina, died in Buenos Aires on September 28. Born in the province of Buenos Aires in 1845, he entered the illustrious Order of Preachers at the age of seventeen. His ability as a pulpit orator showed itself so plainly that at the age of twenty-one, before being raised to the priesthood, his superiors permitted him to preach. As a priest, his eloquence drew throngs to hear him whether in the church or on the platform, for he was a deep student of sociological questions and lectured on them to delighted audiences. His sermons and addresses were listened to with avidity, not only in his native Argentina, but also in Uruguay, Paraguay and Chile, whither his fame had preceded him, and even in Spain and Rome, which he visited in 1878. In 1889, he founded a college in Buenos Aires, remaining its President for six consecutive years. In 1898, the Senate of Argentina, having placed his name first on the list submitted to the executive authority for nomination to the then vacant See of San Juan de Cuyo, he was preconized by Pope Leo XIII, in January, 1899, and was consecrated two months later. He at once took possession of his See, where he toiled with all the energy and zeal of a devoted shepherd until a lingering illness incapacitated him for further active labors. It was due to him that the monument to Christ the Redeemer was completed on the crest of the Andes, as a gauge of lasting peace between Argentina and Chile. Very appropriately, the most striking floral offering at his funeral was a beautiful crown from the South American International Peace Society. Robed in the holy habit of the sons of St. Dominic, the deceased prelate's body lay in state in the Dominican Church, where his eloquence had so often held the faithful spellbound. His labors in behalf of the workingmen brought throngs of them to his obsequies; his well-earned reputation as a thinker, writer and orator drew the élite of the city, while his great love, nay, predilection, for the little ones of the flock called the children to take a last fond look at the peaceful countenance that had so often beamed upon them. On the day of the funeral, at which Archbishop Espinosa, of Buenos Aires officiated, the national flag, by order of President Alcora, was displayed at half-mast on all the public buildings of the capital.

AFTER MANY DAYS.

Some years ago, a certain priest who had been tried at several kinds of the rough pioneer work which monopolize the time and sap the strength of the patient and laborious clergy in the missionary dioceses of the western part of the country, found himself in a small mining town where men, though whole-souled, are rough, and human life is cheap. The sudden change from summer sun to winter chill, which in that mountain town came as often as daylight gave place to darkness, was a severe tax on the strength of the priest, who had just finished a year of hard, ungrateful, and ill-requited labor. The result was that one fine, balmy afternoon, Doctor M—— was summoned to attend the missionary, who complained of a peculiar tightness in the chest and difficulty in breathing. It was only pneumonia, which at an altitude of over 6,000 feet was a trifling ailment for a corpulent patient of fifty-odd cyclonic summers.

With no store laid aside for that or a similar occasion, it would have fared ill with him had it not been for a hospital which some good Sisters conducted at the cost of much personal labor and many hardships, for the injured miners and such others as might claim their tender and unremitting attention. Even with their devotedness which so ably seconded the physician's skill and attention, the outcome was for a time in doubt; but even pneumonia had to give way before such a combination, and the tide turned in favor of the patient.

Now, words may be a picturesque way of expressing gratitude, but all are forced to admit that they are pitifully unsubstantial and evanescent; yet, such was the charity of physician and sisters, that they were quite satisfied with the priest's thankfulness and would entertain no thought of other reward. It was well for him, just at that time, that they were so disposed, for he would have gone to a debtor's prison, had there been such a refuge, if they had demanded pecuniary compensation.

With health impaired and faculties dulled by years of more than one kind of hardship, he attracted the pitying attention of a prelate, who offered him a humble but welcome position in an eastern city, where he could be useful in a small way and be free from the hardships on which sturdier and more rugged spirits thrive.

The step downward was a move upward, for the retired missionary soon felt as much at home in metropolitan life as if he had always been accustomed to pavements and uniformed policemen and fire engines and death-dealing taxicabs and like city luxuries.

One fair day in this Indian summer of his life, the postman brought him a letter bearing the postmark of the little mining town in the mountains where he had battled with grievous illness. Brief was the missive and traced by an unsteady hand, yet every word told, for it was wrung from a grief-stricken heart. The tale was an old one, yet ever new in the sorrow that sobbed through its tremulous lines. "He was the wild boy of the family, but at the same time he was my favorite, for he was so good-hearted and generous." To look him up, to relieve to some extent his bodily pains, to see that his soul, nearing the long journey, should not go forth unshriven; what a grateful task! The gentle little nun who had so assiduously cared for the sick in that wild rough town, should know that her own were not abandoned in their extremity. "I have always striven to be good and kind to all the poor boys who come under my care," she writes from the miners' hospital, "so that should any of my own dear ones need help, Almighty God would inspire some one to be kind to them, and I feel sure that He has already heard my prayer."

Blessed trust in Him of whom the prophet spake, "The bruised reed he shall not break!" Sown while ministering to the sick and injured stranger, the day of reaping came when the word of the Lord went forth, "Put ye in the sickles, for the harvest is ripe." And her brother, that wayward son, who had grieved an old mother's heart to breaking, the brother for whom she had toiled and watched and prayed, went forth refreshed, strengthened, out of this world which had been for him a troubled dream, into the adorable presence of the Good Shepherd of souls.

H. J. S.

LITERATURE

Adam Mickiewicz, the Polish Poet

Adam Mickiewicz, the leader of the great romantic school of Polish literature, the splendid poet who gave fresh beauty to the noble Polish tongue, was born in Lithuania in 1798. After well nigh a life-long banishment, he died on the eve of the Crimean war. Since his youth, he never again saw the country for which his days were one unceasing sacrifice, one passionate yearning.

Two master motives are the chief inspirations of Mickiewicz's muse: his love, in his case the love of a great artist, for his own soil, and that anguish for his nation's misery with which the Polish poetry of the nineteenth century is impregnated. As a child, he drank in the folk-tales and romantic traditions of Lithuania. In early manhood, before imprisonment and exile had torn him away from them forever, he wandered through the forests of the countryside, and watched the sun setting, the storms sweeping, over his native marshes. The result was that he has left descriptions of nature which are among the finest in the world's literature.

Had it then been merely for his great gift of song, the name of Mickiewicz would have ranked where it does, at the head of Polish literature: but he lives, enshrined for all time in the hearts of his people as the poet whose genius was consecrated to the cause of Poland, who voiced the sufferings of his nation in the greatest lines of her literature, who, in the famous words of Krasinski, bore the torments of thousands in his one soul. His three chief poems, "Konrad Wallenrod," the "Ancestors," and "Thaddeus" are three different, and widely differing, expressions of the ardent patriotism that consumed his being.

At the age of twenty-five, Mickiewicz entered the way of exile and proscription which was the inheritance of nearly every Polish poet of that day. From his prison walls he went to a five years' banishment in Russia, where he lived surrounded by spies, dogged by the Russian police. Freed by his bondage, he wrote the poem that gave to the Polish language the new word "Wallenrodism," expressive of the burning moral question that it raises. Out of his servitude, the captive poet bids the conqueror beware lest the down-trodden race shall be driven by oppression to defend itself by cunning and revenge, by the stealth and treachery of the fox.

Mickiewicz uses the form of allegory in "Konrad Wallenrod." Allegory, in those troubled years of Poland's history, was a method frequently employed by her poets as a safeguard for themselves and their readers, and as the only means of protecting their work against the rigorous Russian censorship. "Konrad Wallenrod" is the tale of the Lithuanian who sacrifices conscience, love, the joys of life in his native land, in order to bring about the ruin of Lithuania's deadly enemies, the Teutonic Knights. Plotting against the Order, he is enrolled therein under a false name, and in time is raised to the Grand Mastership. This gives him the moment for which he has schemed so long. He leads the Knights into Lithuania and there betrays them. Doomed to death by the Order, he commits suicide rather than die at their hands, with his last breath uttering words of wild exultation not at the triumph of his countrymen, but at the havoc that he has wrought on their foes.

"The mother shall sing to her child the glories of thy deed," such is the Lithuanian farewell to the dying Konrad, "and in the future from this song shall arise the avenger of our bones."

Mickiewicz is said to have written the poem more as a relief for the intolerable mental sufferings of his life in his enemy's country than with any direct didactic purpose. As it is, "Konrad Wallenrod" stands as the fiery warning to the oppressor, and also as an eloquent illustration of the terrible moral dilemma to which a conquered nation is exposed. Only flight from Russia saved its author from Siberia.

By the time that the wonderful Third Part of the "Ancestors" came to be written, two events of the most far-reaching influence on Mickiewicz's work had befallen. In the first place, he was free. In the second, that sea of desolation had swept down upon Poland that banished joy from his heart forever. The "Ancestors" is the greatest monument that has ever been dedicated to the sorrows of that "nation in mourning." Moreover, it is a piece of Mickiewicz's autobiography, for not only does he tell here in language of burning living fidelity what he and his comrades had undergone in prison, but, against a strange unearthly background, he gives a glimpse of his long spiritual struggle. His second Konrad's despair had once been his.

He, too, was drawn from the pit by a kindly hand, even as he has described in that celebrated scene of the play. His sufferings, the agony of his nation, find their supremest expression in Konrad's great "Improvisation." This magnificent piece of writing is the cry of anguish of the Pole who, maddened at the sight of his country's tears and blood pleading in vain for vengeance, declares eternal war against heaven for the sake of Poland. Then, borne down with horror at the sound of his blasphemy, he falls unconscious on his prison floor, the prey of the demons. We may conjecture something at least of what passed in Mickiewicz's soul as he uttered the "Improvisation," which besides being his highest poetic inspiration is also the bitterest outburst of despair and grief that ever left his pen, from the fact that after the night in which he wrote it he was found lying unconscious like his Konrad.

But, far from being a sceptical drama, the "Ancestors" resolves itself into a grand Christian poem. In scenes of singular beauty, angels entreat for mercy upon the sinner who sinned, not for himself, but for the nation that he loved, and we leave Konrad starting on "a far and unknown way," where he will find salvation for himself and his people. That this noble play remains unfinished is one of the many tragic silences of literature.

A few years later, while he was still young, Mickiewicz wrote his last poem, "Thaddeus." Oppressed to the heart by the troubles of his sad life and by those of his brother exiles, he composed for his solace and for theirs a tranquil golden epic of the Lithuania of his boyhood, of her types and customs that were even then no more. The word paintings of nature for which "Thaddeus" is so famous are in themselves enough to place Mickiewicz among the greatest poets of Europe. As we read, the roar of the wind rushing over the wild primeval forests is in our ears; the cries of the wild geese, the beat of the eagle's wing in the sky. A brilliant work of art, "Thaddeus" eternalizes the old Lithuania. Through an irreparable disaster, it was the death-song of Mickiewicz poetic genius.

M. M. GARDNER.

Catholic Books in French.

Struck by the popularity of Victor Hugo, M. l'abbé Duplessy, in his "Victor Hugo Apologiste" (Paris: Piérre Téqui, 82 Rue Bonaparte) has garnered from the writings of the erratic genius an imposing array of passages, in which the truth and beauty of the Christian revelation are frankly recognized. Methodically classified these extracts form a course of apologetics at once novel and forceful. Some of these tributes, those, v. g., to the Divinity of Christ, the dignity of the priesthood, the efficacy of prayer, are startling in their vigor and lofty inspiration, the cry of a soul naturally Christian and Catholic, but whose accents were too often stifled by the spirit of rebellion and pride. Even the flowers culled by M. l'abbé Duplessy, are in their original setting frequently choked by the rank and poisonous growth around them.

When American Catholics, on the occasion of the Brownson celebrations may be thumbing "Liberalism and the Church," the republication of Sardá's classic "Liberalism a Sin" is quite timely. ("Le Libéralisme est un Pêché, par Don Félix Sardá y Salvany. Paris: Téqui.) The learned Spanish priest is a relentless logician. It will be hard either to deny his premises or escape his conclusions; but he is always chivalrously fair. Weak Catholics, too ready to dip their colors to error, will find the book unpleasant reading, for the author knows no compromise, and gives his opponent no quarter. The book was once denounced to the Congregation of the Index. Instead of censure, it met with hearty approval. The Liberalism Sardá condemns, is the Liberalism condemned in the Syllabus of Pius IX.

Paul Ker has evidently seen the terrible Jesuit at close range. In a series of letters written when a boy, but refurbished a little, he paints a lively picture of college life in a Jesuit institution ("En Pénitence chez les Jésuites," par Paul Ker. Téqui). The Jesuits he meets are not the Jesuits of fiction, sly, crafty, oily and hypocritical, but kind masters and efficient teachers. The Jesuit college to which he is transferred from a State "Lycée," does not turn out to be the jail he expected, but a home where mind and heart and soul are purified and strengthened. Paul is quite witty, perhaps too witty at times; but the letters are picturesque and boyish in tone, though here and there the "fixing" is evident. Paul is ever loyal to his masters and stoutly champions their methods; but he is quite willing to admit that it cannot be expected that they should succeed with all their pupils.

The instructions outlined in "Plans d'Instructions, pour le diocèse de Nevers" (Téqui), embrace the whole cycle of Christian truths. The plans are clear, brief, orderly; pithy and solid in substance and matter, suited to the needs of a modern audience and quite practical.

"L'Evangile et Le Temps Présent," by M. l'abbé Elie Perrin (Téqui), is the work of an original thinker and a vigorous writer. Gospel in hand—so says the ecclesiastical censor of the diocese of Besançon—M. l'abbé Perrin answers the questions and the sneers of the age, offers a solution to its doubts, calmly rebukes its vices and shows in the lessons of the Master a remedy for its miseries and sins. These pages are splendidly actual. M. Perrin gives to the old truths new and at times striking applications. He is not only a theologian of sound views, he is also a keen observer of men. He knows his countrymen, their illusions, their hopes and dreams, the religious and social problems of the hour. He has read Leroy-Beaulieu, Brunetière, Fouillée, Le Play to good account. The book has a mission; it will do good.

The rationalistic theories of Ritschl and Sabatier have weakened and perverted in many minds the traditional notion of the Mystery of the Redemption. In "Le Mystère de la Rédemption," by Rev. Edouard Hugon (Téqui), a learned and distinguished Dominican, we have a telling answer. Such difficult questions as the nature of mysteries, the Atonement of Christ, His Sacrifice, His Priesthood, are treated with the logical sequence, the sureness of grasp and extensive erudition of a trained theologian. As a companion volume to "The Dogma of Redemption," by M. J. Rivière (Lecoffre), the book will be most welcome.

The Venerable Marie de l'Incarnation stands among the foremost of that band of heroines who, with Madame de la Peltrie, Margaret Bourgeois, Madame d'Youville and Mademoiselle Mance, recalled amid the snows of Canada all the virtues of the early Church. ("La Vénérable Marie De l'Incarnation, Ursuline, Fondatrice du Monastère de Québec," par Une Religieuse du même Ordre. Téqui.) The humble and unknown Ursuline Nun who writes her life has done the work well, with winning simplicity and charm of style. With great tact, she allows the Venerable to speak for herself, when possible, in letter and journal, and thus gives us a thorough knowledge of this noble soul. The work is a valuable contribution to mystic theology. As we close this truly edifying biography, a prayer springs to our lips that one day we may be allowed to pay the more solemn honors of the Church to the valiant heroine who is not inaptly called the Theresa of New France.

On the façade of the famous Breton shrine of Ste. Anne d'Auray, the statue of the once terrible Pierre de Keriolet ("Pierre de Keriolet," par le Vte Hippolyte Le Gouvello. Téqui), stands opposite that of the saintly peasant Nicolazic, an eloquent reminder that if few enter heaven by the path of innocence, all may reach it by that of repentance. Viscount Le Gouvello's book teaches the same lesson.

Rarely does a biographer find such a hero. Swashbuckler and soldado, duellist and thief, soldier of fortune and apostate, blasphemer and well-nigh devil-worshipper, laughing at heaven, defying hell, the scandal and terror of his native Brittany, Pierre de Keriolet is brought to his knees by a miracle of God's grace on witnessing at Loudun those diabolical manifestations which, about the year 1635, stirred France to its depth. Then, a brand snatched from the burning, penitent, priest, apostle, Pierre turns his ancestral manor into a hospital, and as humble and as mortified as he had been ungovernable and proud, dies in the odor of sanctity. Romance! many will exclaim. Yet the facts seem to be vouched for on good authority. Viscount Le Gravello brings out into bold relief the glaring contrasts in the life of his hero, at times even with a wealth of details which to some may appear excessive.

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

What's Wrong with the World. By GILBERT K. CHESTERTON. New York: Dodd, Mead & Company. Price, $1.50.

When we are reading a book by Mr. Chesterton we unfailingly think of Ruskin. Both are prophets and preachers, and one would imagine that there the comparison ended. But, so it seems to us, it can be carried further. Chesterton does not employ Ruskin's sæva indignatio, nor his scriptural power of warning and denunciation, nor his high courtesies and dignities of manner; but now and then we have a suspicion that he could use them if he wished. In the days of Ruskin the reading public was more conservative and aristocratic than at present. It had time and leisure and cultivation to take its literature seriously. Nowadays there is no leisure for the idle, with so many magazines and newspapers to be hurried through; and no leisure for the industrious under the economic pressure which has been developed in commerce. A man now wants vaudeville in his books as well as in his theatres, something to ease an over-strung mind or give a fillup to jaded nerves. If tragedy be introduced, then let the author be never so flippant as when he is most tragical. Covering our tears under a mask of laughter is strictly de rigueur. If Mr. Bernard Shaw wins large audiences over to his socialism by executing a brilliant pas seul, what remains wherewith to win them back to something like sanity, but to duplicate Mr. Shaw's dazzling exploit with reversed flourishes?

We wish Mr. Chesterton were freed from the limitations of his audiences; but, as we face a condition and not a theory, we are thankful for him and to him. He may not have the undisguised seriousness and splendid airs of Ruskin; but he has a surer instinct for the truth. And, if he attaches too much importance to such trifling matters as the gaudy advertising posters on the hoardings, we can recall how the elder writer could read the rise, prosperity and decline of a nation in the carved foliage of a capital or the colors of a painted canvas.

Mr. Chesterton has a rational man's dislike for the modern reformers, not because they wish to oil the wheels of society and abate a little the clangor and the cruelty, but because their intellects are unable to keep up with their generous impulses. The office of a human mind is to cast a torch into the darkness and give the impulse a direction and an object. Modern reform scorns intellect and logic and like the foolish virgins, neglects to fill its cruse with oil, because—and here it differs from the foolish virgins—it thinks a lamp is useless luggage. It rushes into the dark, gropes about blindly in a dozen directions, hurts itself and others, and succeeds only in making the muddle thicker. The end, as Mr. Chesterton foresees it, will be an increase in the clangor and the cruelty.

The author of "What's Wrong with the World" does not deride reform or deem it unnecessary or visionary. He is at one in his earnest desires with all the leaders of reform whom he attacks so resolutely. And this identity of purpose may explain a great deal of what has been taken for smart paradox in Mr. Chesterton's writings. In the present volume, to cite one or two examples, he opposes woman's suffrage and the socialistic ideal of a state. He does not differ at all from Mrs. Pankhurst in her desire to secure women in their rights; it is precisely because he agrees with her in her main purpose that he sets himself against her in her methods of warfare and proves that she is destroying the very thing she advocates. Again, he does not differ from socialists in their rebellion against the dehumanizing tendencies of our economic system; but he points out very clearly that their plan of campaign will, should it ever succeed, dehumanize men on a scale never dreamt of by the exploiters of private capital. Those who have read "Orthodoxy" are familiar with the style of argument. Mr. Chesterton sympathizes with the unbeliever who wants "intellectual emancipation," but he points out in striking and divers ways that by adopting an attitude of religious denial the despiser of creeds simply loads his mind and soul and body with heavy shackles. It seems to be an effective way of meeting an adversary, but at the same time it is not unattended with danger. When your opponent professes entire sympathy with you and apparently gives his whole case away until, at a moment when you are off your guard, he turns on you and demolishes you, he may leave you dazed and bewildered, but yet unconvinced. You may be crushed, but you suspect that it was a trick that did it. In some such wise we can imagine a suffragist or a socialist being transfixed by Mr. Chesterton's shafts of argument, but still inclined to ascribe the defeat to Mr. Chesterton's cleverness rather than to the truth of the cause which he pleads.

In the present volume Mr. Chesterton displays his usual pointedness and alertness of manner—staccato movement throughout, each short sentence tumbling over the heels of another and propelled by a vigor of utterance that saves it from tameness. A style like this is so fertile in epigrams that we wonder no one has yet compiled the wit and wisdom of Mr. Chesterton. The following is our first choice in the pages before us: "Men have not got tired of Christianity; they have never found enough Christianity to get tired of." It has all the good qualities of an epigram without any of its defects; for most epigrams, as has been observed, are half lies. When Mr. Chesterton lays it down as a fundamental principle that "in everything on this earth that is worth doing, there is a stage where no one would do it, except for necessity or honor," he is profound as well as sensible and brilliant. His chapters on education are well worth reading in a book in which no chapter has not something illuminating or of general interest.

JAMES J. DALY, S.J.

Lord Glenesk and the "Morning Post." By REGINALD LUCAS. The John Lane Company, New York. Price $6 net, postage 25 cents.

This is a history of three generations of Borthwicks, editors of the famous London journal, the Morning Post. To-day the Morning Post is a penny paper; but for many years it was, for the ordinary man, one of the constituents, so to speak, of aristocracy. It was the daily chronicle of the great, and to have one's dinner party or ball or wedding recorded in it was a patent of much more than respectability. From it might be learned the politics of the West End as well as the lighter things of the world of fashion. But even in its politics it was decorous and high-bred. The Daily Telegraph, the Daily News, the Times itself could not but reproduce in their columns something of the noise and bustle of that city in the environs of which they were born nightly; for the Morning Post there must have been a newspaper vale of Avilion untouched by storms, where in some fairy palace its editors, not by vulgar toil and clattering press, but by the waving of a magic wand, provided the journal fit for the breakfast tables of Mayfair.

One with such notions will not be prepared for the revelations of Mr. Lucas, and the story of the difficulties of the Morning Post in the middle years of the nineteenth century, sordid, newspaper difficulties regarding money and circulation, pressing so heavily on the first of the Borthwicks as to bring him to an early grave. And the "lachrymae rerum" will fill one's eyes as one reads it in the letters, patient when patience was needful, hopeful when this was possible, of a noble woman and helpmate, the first Mrs. Borthwick, to her son Algernon, afterwards Sir Algernon and later still Lord Glenesk, the founder of the paper's fortunes, who was to raise it from the lowliness of a daily circulation of 2,500 copies in 1851, to the rank of a metropolitan journal of the first order.

But this is not all the book tells us. It shows how statesmen can obtain by judicious flattery a journal's service. The Morning Post supported Palmerston, Disraeli and Salisbury, especially in their foreign policies; but it seems to have had nothing substantial in return, not even a share of government advertising, and when the last of the three complimented Lord Glenesk, retiring from public life, on his personal services to the Conservative party, he had not a word to say of the Morning Post. This made its way by its merit and the enterprise of its proprietor, for such Lord Glenesk became, not through any official patronage. We learn from this most interesting book of the origin of the Primrose League, and how Winston Churchill passed from the Conservative to the Liberal party, and many other things not to be despised; and it gives us the Piccadilly view of foreign affairs for fifty years.

Yet the Morning Post was not a mere echo of the clubs. In the matter of the South African war it was a Cassandra foretelling unpleasant truths to readers who would not believe, and sometimes turned fiercely on it with the charge of lack of patriotism. This clear-sightedness came to it with the third Borthwick, Oliver, Lord Glenesk's only son, who had taken his father's place in the editorial rooms.

The book begins sadly with the struggles of the first Borthwick. It ends still more sadly. Successful in his career and full of honor Lord Glenesk lost what under such circumstances a man prizes most. Looking upon his son so full of promise, he might have said with reason: "Tu Marcellus eris." But, alas! it was not so to be. The "fata aspera" stood firm, they could not be broken through, and only the "Manibus date lilia plenis" was left to the stricken father. For too brief a time the young man had eased his parent's shoulders from the burden, and then was cut off by an untimely death. Lord Glenesk lingered for a few years until his seventy-eighth year, when he too passed away and his honors perished. "Vanity of vanities and all is vanity!"

It is a fascinating book, well constructed, and its illustrations are excellent. We feel that many fleeting years have slipped by us and that around us are Pharaohs who know not Joseph, when, on page 25, we find one whom in the consulship of Plancus all men knew, Major Goliah O'Grady Gahagan, masquerading as "the preposterous Major Gahmagan." H. W.

St. Bridget of Sweden. By FRANCESCA M. STEELE. New York: Benziger Bros. Price 75 cents.

Sainthood is so often and so erroneously viewed as something hazy, ethereal and out of reach, as if we had nothing in common with the saints but a dimly distant relationship, that it is positively refreshing to happen upon a truly human saint. Not that all saints were not truly human with more or less liberal sprinklings of poor mortality, but their biographers so seldom show the human side and so often dazzle us with the flashes of heavenly light which now and then rejoiced God's dearest servants. Here we have a life of St. Bridget, not a few snap-shots taken as she was entering a church, or leaving a church, or saying her prayers, or receiving the sacraments. She lived at a most interesting period, namely, while the Popes resided at Avignon, and ruled Rome by legates. Her influence over the religious life of her native Sweden, and her endeavors to induce the Roman Pontiff to reside on the banks of the Tiber, show a soul that was not only full of the spirit of God, but was active and energetic as well. One unique feature of her life is that under the Divine guidance she was the foundress of an Order which she did not enter, for she died as she had lived, a tertiary of St. Francis. In her life the woman of the world can see how to serve God in spite of the world; the religious can learn precious lessons of devotedness in God's service. * * *

The American Jewish Year Book. 1910-1911. Edited by HERBERT FRIEDENWALD. Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society of America.

This is a most useful publication for all who wish to know about the Jewish race and the large part they are playing not only in the United States but also throughout the world. Nearly eighty pages are taken up with an exhaustive article, "In Defence of the Immigrant." One may not agree with everything it contains, but with much of it all right thinking people will be in sympathy. It is well worth reading.

Some twenty years ago a "Life of Bishop Timon" was compiled by Charles G. Deuther and published in Buffalo. It has long been out of print, but the Buffalo Catholic Publication Company announces that a new edition will be printed if it can get 150 subscribers at $1.50 each. The volume is an invaluable record of early Catholic history in the western section of New York, and of one of the heroic pioneer Lazarist missionaries whose work extended as far south as Texas before he became the first Bishop of Buffalo.

An instance of the great progress the revival of the ancient language is making in Ireland is afforded in the announcement of the coming publication in Dublin of an edition of the Messenger of the Sacred Heart in Gaelic.

Building Your Boy; How to Do It, How Not to Do It. By KENNETH H. WAYNE. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co.

"A boy is an animated bundle of well-nigh infinite possibilities," says the author in his brief foreword. Then follow bits of sane and safe advice distributed through chapters with such suggestive titles as "Contented Mediocrity," "The Wrong of Inattention," "Do Not Spy on Your Boy," "Do Not Nag at Your Boy," and "Choice of Life-work." Though not written precisely from the Catholic view-point it contains many valuable suggestions which, if prudently adopted by fathers and those who take their place, would lighten the lot of the boys and the consciences of their guides.

* * *

The London theatre-goer seems to be tired of the ordinary indecencies of the stage and to crave the stimulation of novelty for his jaded appetite. For this the managers go to the ancient Greeks and the modern slum. A modern version of Aristophanes' "Lysistrata," a ballet called "The Faun" and a play, "The Shop-worn Girl," are being produced with considerable success. They are said to be startling. To this nothing need be added in the way of description. We may remark that the condition of a society which seeks these things is sadly startling to those who pray and labor for its regeneration.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Modern Biology and the Theory of Evolution. By Erich Wasmann, S.J. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net $4.50.

The Concept Standard. A Historical Survey of What Men Have Concealed as Constituting or Determining Life Values. Criticism and Interpretation of the Different Theories, Together with General Educational Implications. By Anne M. Nicholson, Ph.D. New York: Teachers College, Columbia University.

The Soliloquies of Saint Augustine. Translated into English by Rose Elizabeth Cleveland. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. Net $1.50.

Meditations for Every Day in the Year. According to the Doctrine of St. Alphonsus Mary de Liguori, Doctor of the Church. For the Use of all who aspire to Perfection, Priests, Religious and Laymen. By Rev. Louis Bronchain, C.S.S.R. Two volumes. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net $5.00.

More Short Spiritual Readings for Mary's Children. By Madame Cecilia. New York: Benziger Brothers. Net $1.25.

At Home with God. Priedieu Papers on Spiritual Subjects. By Rev. Matthew Russell, S.J. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. Net $1.00.

Spiritual Counsels of Fénelon. Selected by Lady Anabel Kerr. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net 45 cents.

The Charity of Christ. By Rev. Henry C. Schuyler, S.T.L. Philadelphia: Peter Reilly. Net 50 cents.

The Story of Our Lord's Life Told for Children. By a Carmelite nun. New York: The Cathedral Library Association. Net $1.00.

A Poet's May. By F. M. Capes. New York: Benziger Bros. Net 50 cents.

The Adventures of Two Ants. By Nanny Hammarström. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Company.

Pamphlet.

Corruptions of Christian and Scriptural Names. By Rev. Francis Mersham, O.S.B. Collegeville, Minn. Net 10 cents.

EDUCATION

The principal business of the annual meeting of the Teachers' School of Science Association, held in the lecture hall of the Boston Society of Natural History, on Tuesday evening, October 25, was to listen to remarks by President A. Lawrence Lowell of Harvard University on "The University Extension Movement and Its Special Relation to Teachers and the Public Schools." Teachers and principals of the High Schools of Boston and vicinity were present in large numbers. President Lowell explained the history and the nature of the University Extension movement in Boston, its purpose, its courses, and the scale of fees fixed for, and the conditions for admission into, these courses.

We learn the following facts from President Lowell's remarks and from the circular issued by the commission on extension courses: The University Extension movement was suggested last year to President Lowell by Dean Ropes of Harvard. Its courses of college grade given by college professors and instructors are offered in the belief that there are many men and women in the neighborhood of Boston who desire to undertake serious work and to gain the intellectual outlook and the improvement in their own calling which can be obtained by college study. The courses will correspond as closely as possible to courses regularly given in the curriculum of the institutions interested in the Extension and will be conducted in the same way with lectures, written and laboratory work, recitations and practical exercises of various kinds, and the work will be tested by examination and marked on the same scale as in college courses. The courses will carry credit toward the degree of Associate of Arts. The degree of Associate of Arts (A.A.) is not the same as the degree of Bachelor of Arts (A.B.) for the reason that no entrance examination and no terms of residence are required for it. It is, however, equivalent to the degree of A.B. and is already recognized as such by the School Board of the city of Boston.

The hours of the courses are set in the evening, in the late afternoon and on Saturday. Many of the afternoon classes are of special interest to teachers, but they will be found equally valuable for those engaged in other pursuits.

The work of the Extension movement includes the Lowell Institute collegiate courses and the courses of the Lowell Institute Teachers' School of Science, and is supported partly from the endowment of the Lowell Institute, partly by gifts from friends of the enterprise. The fee for the lectures is $10, $15 or $20 a year, according as one takes a one-hour, or a two-hour or a three-hour course. The terms of the Lowell Institute trust limit the amount of fees to be charged for the courses sustained by that foundation, and accordingly it is possible to offer the courses designated as Lowell courses at the reduced fee of $5 for each course, without regard to the number of hours of instruction given.

The courses are open to men and women and a student may take one or more. But students will not be allowed to attend a course unless qualified to profit by it; and accordingly, if under twenty years of age, they must have graduated from a high school or an institution of equal grade, and if over twenty must either have so graduated or show in some way a sufficient degree of education. Applicants must fill out blanks stating their name, age, occupation and school work, or the kind and extent of reading they have done.

The courses are arranged in four groups: (a) Languages and Literature; (b) Natural Sciences; (c) History, Political and Social Sciences; (d) Philosophy, and Mathematics; and are divided into (1) evening courses, (2) afternoon and Saturday courses. It is supposed that a serious student may in this way succeed in completing the required number of courses for the A.A. degree in ten years, especially if he or she attends the summer sessions as well.

The Commission on Extension Courses includes the following names: James Hardy Ropes, A.B., D.D., Dean of the Department of University Extension, Harvard University, chairman; Arthur Fairbanks, Ph.D., Litt.D., Director of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts; Thomas Ignatius Gasson, S.J., Ph.D., D.D., President of Boston College; Caroline Hazard, M.A., Litt.D., LL.D., President of Wellesley College; William Edwards Huntington, Ph.D., LL.D., President of Boston University; Henry Lefavour, Ph.D., LL.D., President of Simmons College; Richard Cockburn Maclaurin, M.A., LL.D., Sc.D., President of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Frank George Wren, A.M., Dean of the Faculty of Arts and Sciences, Tufts College.

The Sacred Congregation of Religious has issued a decree, dated August 27, 1910, which prescribes a certain amount of time to be given to scientific and literary pursuits by the novices of all Orders and Congregations. Except on holy days, they are to have an hour of study. Their teacher will have a conference with them for an hour on three days of the week. In such conferences the teacher will procure the progress of the novices in the branches which correspond to the particular Institute, special attention being paid to Latin and Greek among those who are to be raised to the priesthood, with occasional practice in translating from the vernacular into Latin. The teacher will note in writing, for the benefit of the general superior or provincial, the progress of the novices, as a part of the report to be made before they are admitted to the vows.

SOCIOLOGY

According to the Health Statistics of the United States pneumonia carries off every year about as many persons as tuberculosis, and what is worse, it seems to be increasing. As the campaign against the latter seems to have had some success, it might be well to lay the foundation for a campaign against the former by looking into the causes of its growth amongst us. Another cause of death is assuming alarming proportions. The average yearly number of suicides from 1901 to 1905 was 4,548. In the years from 1905 to 1909 inclusive, it was 5,438, 5,853, 6,745, 8,332 and 8,402. Making all allowances for the increase of population, these figures show a shocking growth in a readiness to take one's own life, the more to be deplored since suicide generally means not only temporal but also eternal death. But with this our scientific sociologists cannot grapple. Only a revival of faith can check it.

The Montreal Star compares the procedure of Canadian courts very unfavorably with that of the courts of England, as seen in the late Crippen trial. It says that the four days this case lasted would hardly have been sufficient in Canada for the empanelling of the jury and the opening statements. Then would have followed long-drawn-out cross-examinations of witnesses to show the lawyers' sharpness and wit, and long-winded speeches to show their oratory. The trial would have resulted probably in a disagreement and a repetition of the performances in court. The Star knows Canada better than we do; nevertheless we may hope that its description is exaggerated. Otherwise it becomes necessary to recognize that Canadian criminal procedure has degenerated frightfully in twenty years. For it is just twenty years since the Birchall case, in some respects not unlike the Crippen, was settled in Woodstock, Ont., to the admiration if not of the world, at least of North America, in just two days.

ECONOMICS

The new White Star steamer Olympic was launched at Belfast on October 20, and will take its place on the New York Southampton route early next summer. Its sister ship, the Titanic, will be ready for service some three months later.

It is generally known that the common rat is an importation into the western hemisphere. It is not so generally known, perhaps, that the Canadian West has been until lately without that pest. It is several years since it crossed the border from the United States, advancing northward. The Deputy Minister of Agriculture in the province of Manitoba announces that it has reached Oak Bluff, twelve miles southwest of Winnipeg, so 'it may be expected in that city next year. Considering the damage these animals do, one would have expected the Manitoba authorities to have taken measures to check its advance. But probably this would have been to attempt the impossible.

Consols have fallen again in London. On October 26 they were quoted at 78¾, never having been so low since the panic of 1847 and to find a lower quotation one must go back to 1831. The Unionists attribute this decline to Lloyd George's financial policy, while the Liberals put it down to the demands of the Unionists for a loan to be expended on the Navy. Difficulties in Asia and in Egypt may have something to do with it also. It should be noted too that consols bear interest now at the rate of only 2½ per cent., while before 1884 the rate was 3 per cent., that since the South African war England has been a large borrower, that the loans of County Councils, growing, some think, immoderately, though not included formally in the national debt, are no insignificant item in the nation's responsibilities, and that there are many first-class investments to-day more profitable than consols. It is said that the English banks are considering the advisability of writing off out of profits their investments in consols above a price of 75.

Some years ago the discovery of coal in Kent, England, was announced. The field has been examined very carefully and is declared to contain at least a billion tons, of which some is superior to the best Welsh steam coal. The proprietors will apply at the next session of parliament for a bill authorizing them to connect their mines with the South-Eastern and the Chatham railways. Another recent discovery is a large field near Talcahuano in Chile.

The report of the United States Geological Survey, just published, estimates the total output of artificial coal for the year 1909 at 139,661 tons, valued at nearly $500,000. This production represents the yield of sixteen briquetting plants, five of which were admittedly in the experimental stage, while two furnished briquets of peat only. The above figures indicate an increase of more than 50 per cent. in quantity and 40 per cent. in value over the manufacture of 1908. The material used in briquetting consists mainly of anthracite culm, slack coal, coke breeze, lignite and peat. The latter two represent an incomplete stage in the natural coal formation process, and the artificial methods supply nature's deficit in the form of heat and pressure. Though but 1 per cent. of natural coal mined annually is represented by the foregoing figures, still the industry is bound to grow in lieu of the gradual mining out of the higher grade coal, and also of the availability of the necessary ingredients in sections far remote from the coal areas. The main drawback to the industry is the high price of labor in this country and the enormous supply of cheaper fuel. At all events, the above figures bid fair to reassure the ultra-conservationists who are ever foreboding the chilliest future.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

On November 1 the Catholics of Boston commemorated the centenary of the consecration of their first Bishop, the great Jean Lefebvre de Cheverus—missionary priest of New England, Bishop of Boston, Bishop of Montauban, Archbishop of Bordeaux and Cardinal. Born of noble parents in 1768, he was ordained when the horrors of the Revolution were devastating his native France. He was in exile in London when an appeal for help from the saintly Father Matignon called him to Boston, where he arrived October 3, 1796, and was received by Matignon "as an angel sent from heaven to his aid." They were the only priests then in all New England, and when Boston's Bishop was consecrated there were only two churches in the same territory, Holy Cross in Boston and St. Patrick's at Damariscotta Mills, Maine, the latter dedicated by Cheverus himself, July 17, 1808, and built by the pious Hanlys, Cottrills, Kavanaghs and their fellow Irishmen located there. In 1823 Cheverus went back to his native land and two nations mourned his death thirteen years later.

A memorial foundation to the famous Father Scully, so long Pastor of St. Mary's Church, Cambridgeport, Mass., was unveiled there with an imposing ceremonial on October 23. On the same evening a fine new building, a gymnasium costing $80,000, to take the place of another burned down in May, 1909, was opened for St. Mary's Catholic Association. Appropriate addresses were made by the Rector of the parish, Father Michael J. Doody, Archbishop O'Connell, Mayor Brooks of Cambridge, and Lieutenant-Governor Frothingham.

"The Church," said Archbishop O'Connell in his address, "has never been a puritan, forbidding enjoyment, and she has never been libertine, counselling pleasures when discipline was necessary, but she has preserved this wonderful, sane plan of life and the cultivation of the very highest ideals, the mortification oftentimes of the senses, and nevertheless, side by side with that mortification, the bringing up, the education, the drawing out of all those wonderful faculties of man, of heart and soul and body, which constitute the ideal man."

"If the representatives of the city and State here present," he added "find, as naturally they do, cause for profound congratulation in this splendid building and the institutions it houses, it is because they see it will do something for government, for the stability and the order of citizenship. We Catholics see all that; but we see something more than that. We see that in this building the name of God will be spoken, and the presence of God recognized; and the young men who partake of the advantages of this building will do so under Christian auspices." The Archbishop dwelt strongly on the fact that proper association for Catholic young men was a need of the hour. He instanced the fact that the troubles in France, Spain and Portugal were begun by evil associations, and he rejoiced at the erection of a building such as the new gymnasium, where the Catholic faith of those who attended would not be weakened but strengthened.

Mr. Eugene O'Keefe is to pay for the building of a new seminary located about nine miles from Toronto, Canada, the corner-stone of which was laid by Archbishop McEvay, on October 23. It will cost $300,000. Mr. O'Keefe is eighty-three years of age and has resided in Toronto since he was brought there from Ireland a lad of six by his parents. Some time ago he built the Church of St. Monica, and has been lavish besides in his donations to many local charities.

The Irish Dominican convents in Lisbon, which were protected by the British flag from desecration by the revolutionary rabble, were founded by Father Dominic O'Daly, a native of Kerry, to provide a place of education for Irish students driven from their native land by the Penal Laws. When the Braganzas in 1640 ascended the throne of Portugal Father O'Daly was appointed confessor to the Queen, and was also employed on important diplomatic missions. In 1655 he was ambassador to Louis XIV of France, and died in Paris in 1662. In his wildest dreams he could hardly ever imagine that three centuries after his college was founded in Lisbon its safety would be ensured by the same government whose anti-Catholic laws were the immediate cause of its inception.

Rev. Dr. Poels, who returned to his native country last year, after having been for many years Professor of Exegesis in the Catholic University of America, at Washington, was named by the Bishop of Roermonde, Counselor General of the miners in the southern part of Limburg. Consequently he will look after the material and social interests of these workingmen, and in order to fit himself better for the work, he has already set out to visit some of the mining districts of Germany. Dr. Poels, who was the Vicar of Venlo before setting out for America, had done a great deal of good for the working classes, and was especially successful during the railroad strike of 1904 in effecting a settlement. Doubtless he will now, by his personality and influence, do a great deal of good for the miners.

PERSONAL

The boundary dispute between Ecuador and Peru is a long standing affair which has more than once vexed the diplomats of both countries and threatened to result in war. The administration of President Alfaro in Ecuador has not been accused by its most pronounced opponents of anything smacking of "clericalism," as it is called, that is, of any tendency towards favoring religion, yet when there was question of arguments in support of Ecuador's contention in its controversy with Peru, the person selected to search for them was one of those "ignorant friars" of whom we hear so much and know so little. It is now four years since the Alfaro administration commissioned the Dominican Fray Enrique Vacas-Galindo to examine the Spanish archives in Seville for documents bearing on the controversy. The result of his labors is a collection of one hundred volumes of documents, which will be brought forward in support of Ecuador's claim. The distinguished Dominican had served a hard apprenticeship in preparation for the task, for the best years of his life had been consecrated to mission work in the pathless forests that lie on the confines of the two republics. At the recent exposition of science and the arts held in Quito, the missionary exhibited a map of Ecuador, for which he was honored with a gold medal and a diploma of honor. O the ignorant friar!

Commander John Luby, of the United States cruiser Des Moines, who figured prominently in the details of the outbreak of the recent revolution in Lisbon, is a son of the well-known Irish nationalist of Fenian times, the late Dr. Thomas Clarke Luby.

After twenty years of untiring service, Sir William Christie has retired from the position of astronomer royal for England. He is succeeded by Prof. Frank Watson Dyson, astronomer royal for Scotland.

SCIENCE

LIFE-GERMS CARRIED BY METEORITES.

A favorite theory concerning the origin of life on earth has long been to assert that life came to us from other planets in the shape of microscopic germs carried by meteorites, these germs then developing by evolution into all our present multifarious genera of plants and animals. While this theory did not really solve the problem of the initial creation of life somewhere, it disposed of it in the case of our earth, and that was a thesis well worth establishing in some quarters. But recent science, pure natural science itself, unadulterated by anything supernatural or the metaphysics of the old schoolmen, now makes a deadly thrust at this favorite theory, as the following quotation will show, which we clip entire from the Scientific American of October 15, under the head of "Panspermia and Life Germs."

"Recent experiments of M. Paul Becquerel seem to prove that life germs could not have been brought to the earth, for instance, from an outside point in the universe. The theory that such germs could travel across the interplanetary space has been upheld by numerous scientists such as Helmholtz, Van Tieghem, Lord Kelvin and others, and was recently affirmed by Arrhenius. According to the last, microscopic germs from an atmosphere of planets were carried off under the pressure of luminous radiations into the interstellar space and floated there for ages until they encountered other worlds which could thus receive life germs. In this attractive theory one of the most important factors in life-preservation is neglected, this being the effect of ultra-violet rays emitted by burning stars. We know already that rays from quartz mercury lamps will destroy bacteria and humid spores in a few seconds at some inches distance. Will this be the same when dry and in vacuo at low temperature? M. Becquerel wished to verify this point and used the different kinds of spores and bacteria which were specially hard to kill by the rays. Contained in vacuum tubes, they were plunged in liquid air and placed near the lamp. Most of the spores were destroyed in the first series of experiments. Special precautions were taken to obtain the best possible state of dryness. The last spores, such as the Aspergillus, which had held out before, were finally destroyed after six hours exposure to the ultra-violet rays in vacuo and at the temperature of liquid air. Even though drying and extreme cold are favorable for the germs and allow them to keep their life in a suspended state, as previous researches showed, they are not invulnerable, so that the destroying action of the rays may be said to be quite universal. Seeing that the germs would, no doubt, be destroyed when in the inter-planetary space, which is rich in ultra-violet rays, the above-mentioned theory as to the origin of life on the earth's surface seems to be seriously shaken."

WILLIAM F. RIGGE, S.J.

When applied for a short time the X-Rays stimulate vitality. When applied for a long time they impair and even destroy it. A Dr. H. E. Schmidt soaked beans in water for six hours, subjected different portions of them to the X-Ray for different times, and then planted them. The beans that had been longer under the ray either did not come up at all, or had but a feeble growth, whereas those that had been under it for a short time only grew up hardy and produced a larger crop. Dr. Schmidt suggests that the same results follow the application of X-Rays to animal life, and consequently that when X-Rays are used on sluggish ulcers, the exposures should be short, while in the case of malignant growths, which are to be destroyed, the exposures should be longer.

OBITUARY

Madame O'Meara of the Religious of the Sacred Heart, whose death occurred recently, was born in St. Louis, where she was educated by the Visitation Nuns. Graduating at the age of sixteen she at once entered the Sacred Heart, and soon showed herself to be, not only a pious and zealous religious, but also a woman of extraordinary intellectual powers and administrative and executive ability. She soon reached that high place in her Congregation which she retained to her death.

Perhaps no Religious of the Sacred Heart was known to more persons in this country than Mother O'Meara. During her long and useful career she ruled communities from the Atlantic to the Pacific, winning everywhere the esteem and respect of the religious, the pupils, the children of Mary, the clergy and the prelates of the Church. Maryville, in St. Louis, and Eden Hall, in Philadelphia, are among the many houses she governed, and in 1888 she was chosen to introduce her Congregation to the Pacific Coast by the foundation of the Academy of the Sacred Heart in San Francisco.

Mother O'Meara was stricken with her last illness on the Feast of St. Ignatius; she passed away on the Octave of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin. The two to whom she had been most devout during her life seem to have taken under their special patronage her passage to eternity.

The Rev. Samuel Cahill, S.J., Superior of old St. Joseph's Church, Willing's Alley, Philadelphia, died in St. Joseph's Hospital of that city, on October 23. Father Cahill had been pastor of St. Joseph's for four years. He was born in Ireland, July 24, 1844, and came to this country when he was four years old, his parents making their home in New York City. In 1868, he entered the Society of Jesus, at Frederick, Md., and after his preparatory studies there took up his course of philosophy at Woodstock College. Following this he spent several years as a professor at Georgetown University, returning to Woodstock for his studies in theology. After his ordination, Father Cahill held various positions at different intervals in New York and Georgetown, until through ill health he was compelled to seek the milder climate of New Mexico, where he labored in the ministry for several years. Shortly after his return to the East he became President of Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass., and was appointed to Holy Trinity Church, Georgetown. Before his assignment to St. Joseph's he was attached to the College of St. Francis Xavier, New York City.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

GOLDWIN SMITH'S VAGARIES.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The New York Sun has recently published some Oxford reminiscences of the late Goldwin Smith covering a period in the middle of the nineteenth century. They make a most interesting document in that they throw a bright light on the mental processes and condition of the Professor himself. It is worth while to extract a couple of specimens.

"I was unlucky in never hearing Newman preach. . . . I heard him read the service, which he did in a mechanical monotone, that he might seem to be the mere mouthpiece of the Church. His face, I always thought, betokened refinement and acuteness much more than strength. He was always in quest, not of the truth, but of the best system, presenting a sharp contrast to his brother Francis, whom also I knew well, and who through all his changes of opinion sought the truth with singleness of heart. The "Grammar of Assent" is an apparatus for making yourself believe or fancy you believe things which are good for you but of which there is no proof. It may be doubted whether, when the hot fit of conversion was over, Newman was a hearty Roman Catholic or believed, as he vowed he did, in St. Januarius and the House of Loretto. . . .

"Manning I saw ascend the pulpit, a most imposing figure, looking like an apparition of the middle ages: but I thought him a tinkling cymbal, as in fact he turns out to have been. That he would never have seceded if they could have made him a Bishop was the opinion of his brother-in-law Samuel of Oxford. . . ."

The vogue that the late Professor Goldwin Smith enjoyed for some time before his death was one of the neatest pieces of journalistic work ever done and shows great acumen on the part of the editor of the Sun. Almost every week for several years the Sunday edition contained some short encyclical or allocution—the words come inevitably to the pen—on matters religious or philosophical, usually printed with double-leads and signed by Professor Smith. These would usually refer to Hildebrand, St. Januarius, the Index, "Jesuitism," "St. Bartholomew," the Inquisition, and so on, and seventy-five per cent of them would contain a phrase to the effect that the writer was not a "teacher" but a "seeker after truth." Correspondence was invariably provoked by these outgivings and for at least ten years previous to his death Goldwin Smith bulked large in the "thought" of those who still swear by "those clever editorials" of the Sun, and are enormously impressed by double-leads.

Is it not a wonderful demonstration of the enormous ignorance and enormous self-confidence of the average supposedly educated and "thinking" person of to-day that Goldwin Smith as he now reveals himself in his autobiographical recollections should have been ranked for a time as a great thinker upon matters of philosophy and religion? Not that these revelations were needed by those who did know how to think upon such matters, for the calm dogmatism of this self-styled "seeker" and "learner," and his utter inability to appreciate or even understand the force of the arguments on the other side had always placed him correctly in their eyes, and his place was a low one. But his remarks on Newman as one who was "in quest, not of the truth," and of whom it may be doubted whether he was "a hearty Roman Catholic or believed, as he vowed he did, in St. Januarius," and his delightful statement that Manning was "a tinkling cymbal, as, in fact, he now turns out to have been," ought to arouse even a third-class intellect, imperfectly nourished upon a diet of "clever" editorials and Sunday newspaper "science," to wonder whether after all this modern rationalistic Moses knew what he was talking about!

In the realm of the blind a man with one eye is king, surely enough, but even allowing for the prevailing conditions of "thought" it is remarkable that the late Professor should have been so long worshipped as a "thinker" and a judge of men and things!

T. F. W.

New York, October 31.

A MOST USEFUL AND ATTRACTIVE PRAYER-BOOK

Jesus Teach Me To Pray

For Children, Parents, Teachers and Converts

"Your prayer-book is undoubtedly the best we have in the English language; simple, attractive and eminently helpful withal. It is what I have been looking for this many a year."
A Pastor of New Orleans.

"'Jesus Teach Me to Pray' is the finest child's manual I have ever laid my hands on. Good taste, moderation, and simple but deep piety are on every page of this priceless volume."
Rev. W. Stanton, S.J.

Price, Cloth, 25 cents; Leather, 35 cents

For sale by Catholic Booksellers or

THE MISSION CHURCH PRESS St. Alphonsus Street
BOSTON, MASS.

MARBLE ALTARS, STATUARY AND BAPTISMAL FONTS

Statuary of Marble, Cement and Stone Composition

STATIONS OF THE CROSS

We are the Oldest Manufacturers of Statuary in the United States

Established 1849

To have been in the same line of business for upwards of sixty (60) years is in itself strong evidence that our work is approved. It is a guarantee of confidence, of fair dealing, high-class workmanship, of satisfaction given.

Let this record speak for our house.

Send for our Illustrated Catalogue No. 11

BERNARDINI STATUARY COMPANY

SALESROOMS:

3 and 5 Barclay Street

NEW YORK

Mayer & Co.

OF MUNICH and LONDON

47 BARCLAY STREET

NEW YORK

STAINED GLASS Statues Stations of the Cross

IN view of the fact that cheap plaster casts of our Statues and Stations of the Cross are offered for sale by some unscrupulous firms, we call attention to a small stamped metal plate, which is affixed to the base of all genuine Mayer-Munich Statuary.

Correspondence Invited

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

The Coward Shoe

Bunion Comfort

To have a bunion—and yet walk out sprightly, easily, without pain or discomfort in a pair of new shoes?

Yes! Quite possible.

How?

There's a science in the Coward Bunion Last that pacifies the swollen joint.

A perfect fit, in a few minutes, from a big stock.

$3.95 to $5.00.

SOLD NOWHERE ELSE

JAMES S. COWARD

264-274 Greenwich St., N. Y.
(NEAR WARREN STREET)

Mail Orders Filled | Send for Catalogue

$1.00 WILL BRING POSTPAID one of our

Fine Gold Filled
5 year guaranteed

ROSARIES

In any color. Order through your jeweler or direct. Catalogue free.

Wm. Purnell Co.
Mfg. Jeweler
37 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

FREE

Send a postal with your name on and we will send you LIEBIG Company's Cook Book by Mrs. Rorer, containing delicious recipes, and tell you how to get our beautiful PREMIUM SPOONS AND FORKS.
Table, Bouillon and Tea Spoons and Forks.
Address, CORNELL & CO.,
Dept. S, 9 North Moore St., New York.

Telephone Call, 5922 Barclay

THE S. T. SMITH CO.

Manufacturers of

Ink, Inked Ribbons, Carbon, Manifold and Typewriter Linen Papers

Diamond Brand Typewriter Supplies

11 BARCLAY STREET

NEW YORK

MENEELY BELL CO
TROY, N.Y. AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY
BELLS

Sacred Heart Sanitarium

FOR REST, QUIET, RECUPERATION AND HEALTH

Unsurpassed results obtained in Nervousness, Rheumatism, Heart and Stomach troubles. No surgical, hospital nor insanity cases taken. A delightful, homelike, restful place—ideal for all run down conditions. Hydrotherapy, Electricity, Massage, Zander Gymnasium, Sun parlor; Swimming pools, billiards, bowling, etc. Gaited saddle horses, large indoor riding pavilion; suspended running track connected by tunnel with bath department. 17-acre park.

A staff of five physicians give their exclusive services to the patients.

WRITE SISTER SUPERIOR FOR BOOKLET X. MILWAUKEE, WIS.

LIBRARY SUPPLIES

Adjustable Book Covers—Library Numbers Gummed and perforated always in stock—also alphabets of various sizes.

For sale by stationers or by

THE VAN EVEREN CO.
60 Ann Street - New York

The Book Covers are made of tough, strong paper and are inexpensive, efficient and easily put on

$250. Reward

A reward of Two Hundred and Fifty Dollars will be paid for the arrest and conviction of any junk dealer or other person guilty, under the provisions of Section 550 of the Penal Code of the State of New York, of criminally receiving any property belonging to this Company.

$50. Reward

Fifty Dollars Reward will be paid for the arrest and conviction of any person who maliciously injures or interferes with the lines of this Company.

NEW YORK TELEPHONE CO.
15 Dey St., New York
JOHN H. CAHILL,
May 1, 1908 Vice-Pres't & Gen'l Counsel

HAVE YOU GOT ONE ?

We sell a DAUS IMPROVED TOP Duplicator that ideal assistant always ready to quickly make 200 copies from pen written and 50 copies from typewritten original. Complete Duplicator, cap size, prints 8 3/4 x 13 in. costs $5.00 But we don't want your money until you are satisfied, so if interested just write us to send it enough, isn't it? Then send to-day. Circular of larger sizes upon request. The Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co., Daus Building, 111 John Street, New York.

10 TEN DAYS TRIAL WITHOUT DEPOSIT. That's fair request. The Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co., Daus Building, 111 John Street, New York.

THE CATHOLIC MIND

A periodical published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month.

Each number contains an article of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style.

These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is: one at a time and the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

$1.00 a Year (24 numbers)
5 cents a number

SPECIAL OFFER

SCIENCE AND HER COUNTERFEIT. By Rev. J. Gerard, S.J.
LORD KELVIN AND THE EXISTENCE OF GOD. By H. V. Gill, S.J.
SOCIALISM AND CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. J. F. Hogan, D.D. (2 Nos.)
MEANINGS OF THE WORD SOCIALISM. By C. S. Devas, M.A.
IMPRATICABILITY OF SOCIALISM. By C. S. Devas, M.A.
CATHOLICS AND THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT. By Rt. Rev. Mgr. Parkinson, D.D.
THE CHURCH—THE STRONG SAFEGUARD OF THE REPUBLIC. By Most Rev. Wm. H. O'Connell, D.D.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE. By Robert Hugh Benson.
THE DELUSION OF CHRISTIAN SCIENCE. By Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J.
THE DOCUMENTARY EXPOSE OF THE RUPTURE OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS BETWEEN THE HOLY SEE AND THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT. (2 Nos.)
THE CONCORDAT OF 1801. By D. Macrieff O'Connor.
THE FRENCH SEPARATION BILL. (Text.) PRIMARY EDUCATION IN FRANCE.
THE GENIUS OF CARDINAL WISEMAN. By Wilfrid Ward.
THE MASS AND THE REFORMATION. By Rt. Rev. J. Canon Moyes, D.D.
THE ATTITUDE OF MODERN PROTESTANTS TOWARDS THE VIRGINITY OF OUR BLESSED LADY. By Rev. A. J. Maas, S.J.
EXHORTATION OF PIUS X TO THE CATHOLIC CLERGY.

SINGLE COPIES, 5 cents

100 COPIES—SPECIAL PRICE—$2.00

THE AMERICA PRESS

32 Washington Sq., West New York City

NOW READY

AMONG THE HURONS

VOLUME II OF

Pioneer Priests of North America

Tells the heroic story of
de Brébeuf and His Associates

"This book is a striking illustration of the truth of Shakespeare's well-known words 'Men's good is oft interred with their bones.' . . . We cannot then but feel grateful to Father Campbell for what he has done to assure the fame of those glorious confessors and martyrs from a threatened obscurity. . . .

"Missionaries such as these have a special work in this day of weak faith and widespread disbelief; for the story of their lives, while it stimulates the one, is a living protest against the other. Father Campbell's theme is a great one, and he has dealt with it well. The clear and simple language in which he recounts the wonderful heroism of these truly wonderful men, is more impressive and convincing than any elaboration of style, and surely more in harmony with the quiet, simple characters of the men of whom he treats."—The Tablet, London.

By Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J.
480 Pages. With Index. 24 Illustrations.

PRICE, $2.00

VOLUME I

This extremely interesting book consists of a series of 18 monographs of the missionaries who labored among the Iroquois Indians. Beginning with the life of Jogues in 1642, they continue up to 1710, when the Indians, just before their annihilation, passed over from French to English control.

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS:

"For lovers of history and biography, of the adventurous, the heroic, and the saintly, there is much to attract the attention in this volume of over 300 large, clearly printed pages."—The Sacred Heart Review.

"The adventures of most of the missionaries read like romances."—The New York Herald.

"One of the most interesting Catholic books we have ever read."—The Monitor (San Francisco).

Price, $1.60, postage prepaid

THE AMERICA PRESS 32 Washington Sq. W.
NEW YORK

The Dayton White-washing and Cold Water Painting Machines

The Progress series of machines are especially adapted for applying white-wash, cold water paints and other wall coatings. They make ideal machines for use about Colleges, Academies and Schools. They can be used as well for general spraying in the Park, Orchard and Conservatory. They are all built on the same principle; varying only in size and construction details.

THE PROGRESS JR.

has a capacity of 12 gallons and is mounted on two wheels and two supporting legs. Price, with Galv. Tank, $21.00. Weighs 99 lbs. Brass 25.00.

THE PROGRESS

has a capacity of 20 gallons and is mounted on two wheels and two supporting legs. Price, with Galv. Tank, $30.00. Weighs 132 lbs. Brass 35.00.

THE PROGRESS HEAVY DUTY (Illustrated above)

has a capacity of 20 gallons and is mounted on three wheels. It is built very strong and will stand a lot of hard usage. It is recommended where there is a lot of whitewashing as well as a lot of spraying to do.

Price, with Galv. Tank, $35.00. Weighs 200 lbs. Brass 40.00.

For further particulars and detailed description address
McCORMICK M'FG CO., Dept. V, Dayton, Ohio

The American Carlsbad Sanitarium

Hydrotherapy according to the celebrated Kneipp system applied in all forms and up-to-date methods. All diseases, acute and chronic, scientifically and successfully treated. Testimonials and references furnished. First class accommodations for patients.

The famous Devonian Mineral water in use, a strong, sulphurated, saline, calcareous and magnesian water, the counterpart of the German Carlsbad.

Rates reasonable. Investigation solicited.

For information apply to

The American Carlsbad Co., Lorain, O.

Make Stained Glass Out of Plain Glass

By Using

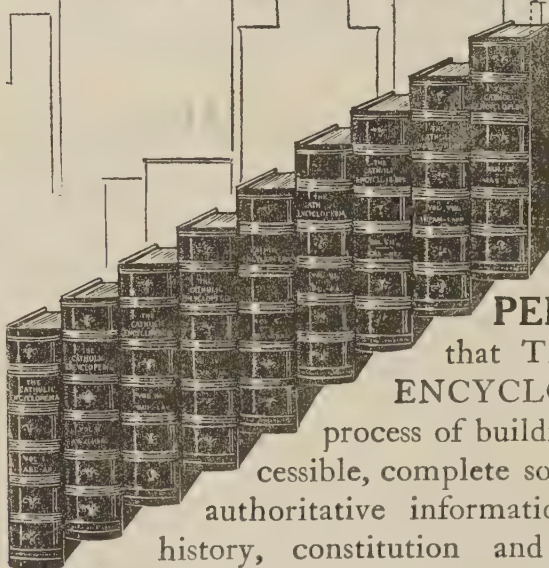

Windowphanie

which is a thin, translucent material perfectly reproducing all the rich coloring of the most beautiful stained glass. Easily applied by anyone to ordinary windows. Costs very little. Many ecclesiastical designs are to be had—exact reproductions of famous church windows, appropriate for seminaries, churches, or Sunday schools; also conventional patterns for the home, hotel or store. Send for free samples and catalog showing borders, panels, centerpieces, and filling in colors.

D. MALZ, 19 E. 14th St., New York

The 9th. Colossal Step into a New Book World

EVERY WELL INFORMED PERSON KNOWS

that THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA, now in process of building, is the first accessible, complete source in English of authoritative information concerning the history, constitution and doctrine of the Catholic Church, and all cognate subjects.

What is not so generally known is the fact that The Catholic Encyclopedia is just as interesting and valuable to non-Catholics, to adherents of all denominations—or of no religion—as it is to Catholics.

TO THE LAWYER, THE PHYSICIAN, THE ARCHITECT, THE ARTIST, THE MUSICIAN, THE STUDENT OF LITERATURE, of SCIENCE, or of CIVIC, SOCIAL and POLITICAL ECONOMY—in fact to every man who reads and who needs an authoritative source of information—this great Encyclopedia strongly appeals. In his own field he will find the pages veritable mines of knowledge. There is little of real value in history that is not to be found in this compendium of “the world of men and things that the Catholic Church affects.”

The Catholic Encyclopedia not only opens up new fields of knowledge, but it is all new in every page—not an article copied from any other source. Every one of its 30,000 subjects is treated specially and signed by one of its staff of over 1,000 contributors—the picked men of the world's qualified scholars.

VOLUME IX IS NOW READY

The beautiful new brochure of The Catholic Encyclopedia, elaborately illustrated, and full information, will be sent without charge, on application to

Robert Appleton Company
39 West 38th Street, New York

TEAR OFF HERE AND MAIL
ROBERT APPLETON COMPANY
39 W. 38th St. New York
AM. 11-10
Please send me at once, free of expense, the story of The Most Influential Institution in History, also your beautiful 200-page brochure of The Catholic Encyclopedia.

Name.....

Street.....

City.....State.....

For advertising rates, address “MANAGER” AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 32 Washington Square, West, New York City

Simplicity

is a prominent feature
of the

VICTOR

It is not necessary to make a lot of adjustments before doing special kinds of work.

The Victor is always ready without special adjustment, because its special devices are built in the machine—not extra attachments.

Send for the No. 2 Catalogue to-day

VICTOR TYPEWRITER COMPANY
812 Greenwich Street
NEW YORK

Rolling at Side.

Wilson's Rolling Partitions

A marvelous convenience and most effective method for dividing large rooms in Churches and School Buildings into small rooms, and vice versa; made from various kinds of wood; sound proof and air tight; easily operated and lasting. Made also with Blackboard surface. Fitted to new and old buildings. Used in over 25,000 Churches and Public Buildings.

Mention AMERICA for free pamphlet.

Also Venetian Blinds, Wood Block Floors, and Rolling Steel Shutters

JAS. G. WILSON MFG. CO., 3 & 5 W. 29th Street, New York

Rolling Above.

Just Published

Three Historical Events in Maine

BY THE

REV. T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

Single Copies 15 cents

100 Copies $10.00

THE AMERICA PRESS 32 Washington Sq. W.
NEW YORK

FREE SCHOLARSHIPS AT THE Leading Catholic Colleges Board and Tuition

Creighton University, Omaha, Neb.
Fordham University, New York, N. Y.
Georgetown University, Washington, D. C.
Niagara University, Niagara Falls, N. Y.

Notre Dame University, Notre Dame, Ind.
St. John's University, Collegeville, Minn.
University of Ottawa, Ottawa, Can.
University of St. Francis Xavier's College, Antigonish, Nova Scotia.

* * *

All Hallows College, Salt Lake City, Utah.
Columbus College, Chamberlain, S. Dak.
Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass.
Holy Trinity College, Dallas, Tex.
Sacred Heart College, Denver, Colo.
Sacred Heart College, Sacred Heart, Okla.
Seton Hall College, South Orange, N. J.

St. Ambrose College, Davenport, Iowa.
St. Bonaventure's College, Allegany, N. Y.
St. Joseph's College, Dubuque, Iowa.
St. Michael's College, Burlington, Vt.
St. Viateur's College, Bourbonnais, Ill.
St. Vincent's College, Beatty, Pa.
St. Charles College, Ellicott City, Md.

Tuition Only

Catholic University of America, Washington, D. C.
Benedictine College, Savannah, Ga.
Boston College, Boston, Mass.
Brooklyn College, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Canisius College, Buffalo, N. Y.
Christian Brothers' College, Memphis, Tenn.
Loyola College, Baltimore, Md.
Marist College, Atlanta, Ga.
Sacred Heart College, Prairie du Chien, Wis.
Sacred Heart College, Augusta, Ga.

St. Francis Xavier's College, New York, N. Y.
St. Mary's University, Galveston, Texas.
St. Ignatius College, Cleveland, Ohio.
St. John's College, Brooklyn, N. Y.
St. John Berchman's College, Toledo, Ohio.
Fordham University Law School, New York, N. Y.
Fordham University Medical School.
Georgetown University Law School, Washington, D. C.
Georgetown University Medical School.
St. Louis University Law School, St. Louis, Mo.

PREPARATORY SCHOOLS (Board and Tuition)

St. Ann's Academy, New York, N. Y.

St. John's Preparatory College, Danvers, Mass.

COLLEGES FOR YOUNG LADIES (Board and Tuition)

COLLEGE OF NEW ROCHELLE, New Rochelle, N. Y. MOUNT ST. JOSEPH'S COLLEGE, Dubuque, Iowa.
ST. MARY'S COLLEGE, Notre Dame, Ind.

N. B.—Other Colleges and Schools will be announced later.

These Scholarships may be obtained by securing subscriptions for AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week.

For further particulars address

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Square, West,
New York, N. Y.

'Perfect' Warm Air Heaters
"Perfect" Cooking Ranges
and Richardson's Steam and
Water Boilers
Give splendid satisfaction

THOUSANDS IN USE

Send for Catalogue

RICHARDSON & BOYNTON CO.

31 West 31st Street

Chicago NEW YORK Boston

ST. JOSEPH'S SANATORIUM

Silver City, New Mexico

Conducted by the Sisters of Mercy

A THOROUGHLY equipped institution for the treatment of all suitable cases of tuberculosis. Each room has two wide connecting porches, electric lights and all modern conveniences. Infirmary for febrile cases, also cottages for those desiring them. Trained nurses and resident physician in constant attendance. Climatic conditions ideal: cool summers and moderate winters. Annual precipitation 12 inches, with only 32 cloudy days. Altitude, 6,000 feet. All ethical lines of treatment, including tuberculin in suitable cases.

For Catalogue and particulars address either Sister Superior or Oliver T. Hyde, M.D., Medical Director.

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 32 Washington Square, West, New York City

FINN BROTHERS

Manufacturers of

Roll Top Desks

STORE and OFFICE FIXTURES
 Counters, Shelvings,
 Partitions, Etc.

Estimates and Designs Furnished

Office 358 BROADWAY Salesrooms

59-65 FRANKLIN ST., NEW YORK

Telephones, 4855-4856 Franklin

Factory: 112-114 LEROY STREET

Telephone Connection

You Can Work Near a Window

In winter when you have a Perfection Oil Heater. It is a portable radiator which can be moved to any part of a room, or to any room in a house. When you have a

PERFECTION SMOKELESS OIL HEATER

Absolutely smokeless and odorless

you do not have to work close to the stove, which is usually far from the window. You can work where you wish, and be warm. You can work on dull winter days in the full light near the window, without being chilled to the bone.

The Perfection Oil Heater quickly gives heat, and with one filling of the font burns steadily for nine hours, without smoke or smell. An indicator always shows the amount of oil in the font. The filler-cap, put in like a cork in a bottle, is attached by a chain. This heater has a cool handle and a damper top.

The Perfection Oil Heater has an automatic-locking flame spreader, which prevents the wick from being turned high enough to smoke, and is easy to remove and drop back, so the wick can be quickly cleaned. The burner body or gallery cannot become wedged and can be unscrewed in an instant for rewicking. The Perfection Oil Heater is finished in japan or nickel, is strong, durable, well-made, built for service, and yet light and ornamental.

Dealers Everywhere. If not at yours, write for descriptive circular to the nearest agency of the

Standard Oil Company

(Incorporated)

F. JAMES REILLY
President

WM. F. REILLY
Manager

JAMES REILLY'S SONS' CO.

General Electrical Repairs

122-130 CENTRE STREET

Corner White Street

Telephone 881 Franklin NEW YORK

INSTITUTION LINEN

of all kinds, also Sheets and Pillow Cases, Blankets, Bed Spreads, etc., etc.

WRITE for SAMPLES and PRICES

H. W. BAKER LINEN CO. Dept "K"
41 WORTH ST.
Importers and Manufacturers NEW YORK CITY

Mullins & Sons

78, 80, 82, 84 Myrtle Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

121-125 Newark Avenue, Jersey City, N. J.

218-220 Market Street, Newark, N. J.

Housefurnishings of Quality

Furniture, Pianos, Carpets, Rugs, Sewing-machines, China, Art Work, Gunn Sectional Book Cases, Arts and Crafts Furniture. Absolutely the finest displays in the East. Unequaled in quality and lowest prices.

$1.00 A WEEK FURNISHES THE HOME

DIRECTORY OF COLLEGES AND ACADEMIES

Georgetown University WASHINGTON, D. C.

Directory for Catalogues or Information

The College (Graduates and Undergraduate Schools)
The Registrar, 37th & O Sts., N. W.

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University
Rev. Joseph Himmel, S.J., President

LADYCLIFF

On the Hudson (Adjoining West Point)
Young Ladies' Academy

A department for small boys. Education thorough and practical. Location beautiful and convenient. Terms moderate. Send for prospectus. Address Sister Superior, Ladycliff, Highland Falls, N. Y.

New York State Regents' Examinations.

Academy of St. Joseph

In-the-Pines

BRENTWOOD, N. Y.

A Boarding School for Young Ladies,
Affiliated with the State University

PROSPECTUS EXPLAINS THE TERMS, ETC.

St. Mary's College

St. Marys, Kansas

BOARDING COLLEGE
Under the Jesuit Fathers

Two Courses of Study:
Classical and Commercial

For Catalogue, send to
Rev. ALOYSIUS A. BREEN, S.J., President.

ACADEMY OF THE HOLY FAMILY

BALTIC, CONNECTICUT

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity
PREPARATORY, COMMERCIAL and ACADEMIC COURSES

Prospectus explains terms, etc.

Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

Convent of the Holy Child

SHARON HILL, DELAWARE COUNTY, PA.

15 Minutes from Philadelphia

ACADEMY FOR YOUNG LADIES
Highest English Course. French. Drawing. Music by Certified Teachers. Preparation for foreign travel. As the numbers are limited, special care can be given to the formation of character and training of each child.
Address Mother Superior

COLLEGE OF ST. ELIZABETH

CONVENT STATION
Near Morristown, N. J.

One hour from New York City.

A Catholic Institution for the Higher Education of Women

COLLEGE

Four years' course leading to the degrees of B. A. and B. S.

SCHOOL OF PEDAGOGY

Required for entrance two years of College work

SCHOOL OF MUSIC. COURSE LEADING TO THE DEGREE OF B. M.

ACADEMY

A High School Course of Four Years. Full College Preparatory Work.

GRAMMAR AND PRIMARY DEPARTMENTS SEPARATE

REGISTERED

By the New Jersey State Board of Education and the University of the State of New York

Apply for Year Book to The Secretary

MT. ST. JOSEPH ON THE WISSAHICKON

For illustrated catalogue address MOTHER

CATHOLIC COLLEGE FOR WOMEN
situated in the romantic Valley of the Wissahickon. Degrees conferred. Also Academic, Commercial, Intermediate and Elementary Departments. Very special advantages in Music and Art. The piano student possesses superior opportunities in the use of the Virgil Clavier Method pursued throughout the course. The Art Studio is admirably equipped, and every attention is given to the study of Art, both in theory and practice. Gymnasium perfectly equipped. Outdoor exercise, tennis, basket ball, fencing, etc.

SUPERIOR, Chestnut Hill, Philadelphia, Pa.

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE

WORCESTER
MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Collegiate and Preparatory Departments

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $260 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra. Send for catalogue to

REV. THOMAS E. MURPHY, S.J., President

Seton Hall College

FOUNDED 1856

South Orange, New Jersey

COLLEGE AND HIGH SCHOOL

Bayley Hall for Students of Grammar Course

FOR CATALOGUE ADDRESS
Very Rev. James F. Mooney, D.D., Pres.

"OUR LADY OF PEACE" RESIDENCE FOR LADIES

225-227 WEST 14th STREET, NEW YORK CITY

The important residential institution under the management of the religious order of Jesus-Mary is now open to receive guests. This institution responds to a great need in our metropolis. 170 rooms at $8 to $12 per week are ready to accommodate ladies in the literary profession, retired teachers, stenographers, students and others desirous of a peaceful abode. All the rooms are cheerful, well heated, and furnished to give comfort to each one. Library, music room, large roof garden, sun parlor add to the enjoyment of the boarders.

The atmosphere of the house is homelike and attractive. Special price for suites. School of music will open September 1st, 1910. Private courses in French for ladies and children also begin at same date. For further information, apply to MOTHER SUPERIOR.

ST. JOHN'S PREPARATORY COLLEGE IMMACULATA SEMINARY

DANVERS, MASS.

SELECT HIGH SCHOOL conducted by the XAVIERIAN BROTHERS

Classical, Scientific and Commercial Courses

Ideal Location

All New Buildings

New Equipment

Competent Instructors

Develops the Whole Boy

Send for Catalogue

Brother Benjamin, Director

MOUNT MARIAN,

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Situated in the suburbs. Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of St. Mary-of-the-Woods. Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Conservatory methods in Music. Oil and Ceramic and Water-color Studios. Abundant out-door exercise. Sightseeing with experienced chaperons.

For Year Book address, Sister Secretary

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

ADJOINING BRONX PARK, NEW YORK CITY

College and High School

ST. JOHN'S HALL, FOR SMALLER BOYS

The location affords the healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city

MEDICAL SCHOOL
in connection with Fordham Hospital

WRITE FOR CATALOGUE

LAW SCHOOL
at 20 Vesey St.
in the midst of the courts

SPRING HILL COLLEGE

FOUNDED 1830

Spring Hill, Mobile Co., Ala.

CHARTERED 1836

BOARDING COLLEGE CONDUCTED BY THE JESUIT FATHERS

Just the School for boys who wish to escape the rigors of the Northern climate. Mean temperature of the winter months, 52 degrees Fahrenheit.

HEALTHY LOCATION—EVERY CONVENIENCE OF A MODERN COLLEGE

CURRICULUM

INCLUDES THE PREPARATORY, HIGH SCHOOL AND COLLEGE COURSES. DEGREES CONFERRED

Write for Catalogue to Rev. F. X. Twellmeyer, S. J., President

DIRECTORY OF COLLEGES AND ACADEMIES

ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS

COLLEGE FOR YOUNG WOMEN (TWO HOURS FROM INDIANAPOLIS)

FOUNDED IN 1840; INCORPORATED IN 1846. EMPOWERED TO CONFER COLLEGIATE DEGREES. Four Years' College Course. Academic and Grammar Departments. Elective Courses for Special Students. Conservatory of Music, with Vocal, Piano, Harp, Violin, Pipe Organ, etc. Oil and Ceramic and Water-color Studios. Modern languages by native teachers. New Gymnasium, with Natatorium, Running Track, Bowling, Basket Ball, etc., directed by a graduate of Dr. Sargent's school of Physical Training. Out-of-Door Sports—Horseback Riding, Boating, Archery, Golf, Tennis. For Catalogue and Illustrated Booklet, Address . . . SISTER SECRETARY . . . Box 70 . . . St. Mary-of-the-Woods, . . . Vigo County, Indiana

BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL Holy Cross Academy and High School

FOR GIRLS : : : 53d YEAR
Conducted by the Sisters of Charity
343-349 West 42d Street and 340-350 West 43d Street, New York City

Registered by the New York State Educational Department.
Students prepared for College and the New York Training School for Teachers
Preparatory Department for Young Children
BOARDING SCHOOL FOR BOYS UNDER TWELVE YEARS

THE SISTERS OF CHARITY

Mount Saint Vincent-on-Hudson, New York City

ANNOUNCE THE OPENING OF

COLLEGE COURSES FOR WOMEN

Leading to Degrees, B. A. and B. S. Freshman and Sophomore Classes

SEPTEMBER, 1910

Junior and Senior Classes to follow. Professors of distinction.

Equipment of the best.

Location healthful, convenient, one half hour from Grand Central Station.

DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS

Fall term begins September 29th, 1910. Write for Prospectus.

The Winona Seminary, Winona, Minnesota

JUNIOR COLLEGE : : : : FOR YOUNG WOMEN

Conducted by the Sisters of St. Francis

LITERARY DEPARTMENT: Collegiate Course leading to degree. ACADEMIC COURSES: Classical, Latin, Scientific, Modern Language. Accredited to the University of Minnesota.

DEPARTMENTS of Dramatic Expression, Art, Household Economics. Home life of the Student is ideal. Indoor and Outdoor Athletics. Literary, Musical, Dramatic Societies.

Conservatory of Music: Piano, Voice, Violin, Organ, Harp

CATALOGUE, BOOKLET OF INFORMATION, DEPARTMENT BULLETINS, MAILED ON APPLICATION

COLLEGE OF ST. CATHERINE, ST. PAUL, MINN.

A CATHOLIC COLLEGE FOR GIRLS

Accredited by the Minnesota State Board of Public Instruction and by several prominent Universities.

SEVENTY ACRE CAMPUS.

FIREPROOF BUILDINGS

COMPLETE COURSES

IN THESE DEPARTMENTS

THE COLLEGIATE, leading to the degree of Bachelor of Arts.
THE ACADEMIC OR COLLEGE PREPARATORY. MUSIC
and PAINTING in their various branches. DOMESTIC ART.
HOUSEHOLD SCIENCE and COOKING.

YEAR BOOK FORWARDED ON APPLICATION, Address: THE SECRETARY

Catholic Mind Pamphlet on "THE EUCHARISTIC CONGRESS AT MONTREAL"

5c Each, $4.00 per Hundred

The America Press, 32 Washington Square, West, New York

BOUND VOLUMES OF

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW
OF THE WEEK

SIX MONTHS TO A VOLUME

$3.50

The AMERICA Press, 32 Washington Sq. W., New York

A RETREAT

WILL BE GIVEN AT

The Convent of the Cenacle

NEWPORT, R. I.

From Saturday evening, Nov. 5th,
to Wednesday morning, Nov. 9th

Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

HELEN AUGUSTA HAYES

VOCAL INSTRUCTOR

342 West 55th Street, New York

Laurel Hall School

184-186 Brooklyn Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Kindergarten, Elementary, High School
and Culture Course.
Private Classes formed in French,
German and Spanish
Expression and Gymnastic Dancing
Tutoring in all branches by competent teachers.

Catalogues sent on application LAURA L. HOPPER, Principal

PEDAGOGY

There is only one school in New York City that offers correspondence instruction in pedagogy. Have you a friend who needs help in school or in teachers' examinations? We have made 3,181 students pass for licenses to teach in this city. Ask for "The Success of the Three Thousand."

BOOKS

We publish books that give you the essentials of subject-matter. Ten new ones on English. Do you know McEvoy's Methods in Education at $1.50, and McEvoy's Epitome of History and Principles of Education at $1.00?

THE McEVY SCHOOL

306 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Telephone, Main 5342

Pilgrim Walks in Rome

A GUIDE TO THE HOLY PLACES

IN ROME AND ITS VICINITY

By P. J. CHANDLERY, S.J.

Third edition enlarged $1.60, Postpaid

THE AMERICA PRESS

32 Washington Sq. W.

New York

The W. J. Feeley Company

Ecclesiastical Art Metal Workers

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

CHALICE No. 4618

Height 8½ inches

One of our new models with engraved medallions. Finish, Roman gold. Cup and high lights burnished. Price, with sterling silver cup and paten,

$50.00

Catalogues on application

Our new Scapular Medals are made in artistic forms and finish. We have ten different sizes and our die makers are at work on a number of new models.

No. 4606

Gold	- - - -	$8.00	each
Rolled gold plate	- - - -	75 cents	"
Electro gold plate	- - - -	10 "	"
Silver plate	- - - -	10 "	"
Aluminum	- - - -	4 "	"

No. 4606

HOLIDAY EDITIONS

HEAVENWARDS. By Mother Loyola.

Flexible Leather binding, gilt edges. Net, $2.00
(Postpaid, $2.12)

FATHER RYAN'S POEMS.

By Rev. Abram J. Ryan.

Flexible Leather binding, gilt edges. Net, $2.50
(Postpaid $2.65)

Ready November 15th

JESUS ALL GREAT. By Father Alexander Gallerani, S.J.

Cloth Binding, 4x6 inches, 50 cents. Leatherette Binding, gilt edge, $1.00.

This book is the second of a series by Father Gallerani, translated by F. Loughnan, and is made in style similar to the first volume "Jesus All Good," which was published in the fall 1908.

Just Published

ROSEMARY or Life and Death.

By J. VINCENT HUNTINGTON

New Edition. Clear Type. New Electrotype Plates.
Cloth Binding, 12mo, 525 pages. Price, $1.00

FOR SALE BY ALL CATHOLIC BOOKSELLERS

Address mail orders to

P. J. KENEDY & SONS

5 Barclay Street
NEW YORK

825 Arch Street PHILADELPHIA

NOW READY

MARY ALOYSIA HARDEY

RELIGIOUS OF THE SACRED HEART

1809-1886

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY
THE REV. T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

440 Pages 16 Illustrations With Index

The Life Story of a Remarkable Woman

PRICE, TWO DOLLARS

By Mail 20 cents extra

"Had the Life of Mother Hardey not been published it would have been a positive loss for the history of the Catholic Church in the United States, where for more than fifty years she was such a conspicuous figure. Her biographer completed the work several years ago, but it was only after reiterated entreaties and expostulations that the manuscript was finally put into the hands of the printer."—From the Introduction.

Advance orders will receive prompt attention.

The America Press 32 Washington Square, W.
NEW YORK, N. Y.

WILL YOU REPRESENT

AMERICA

A Catholic Review of the Week

?

WE want a reliable man or woman in each city and town to act as our agent. No experience or capital required.

THIS opportunity is open to you in matter where you are situated, as AMERICA is a national publication.

Will You Join Our Staff?

NOW IS THE TIME

Write at once, giving reference

AGENCY BUREAU

The America Press 32 Washington Square W.
NEW YORK, N. Y.

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Vol. IV, No. 5

(Price 10 Cents)

NOVEMBER 12, 1910

($3.00 a year)

Whole No. 83

CHRONICLE

The Elections—Free Portugal—Mrs. Harriman's Gift—French Line for Boston—Conditions in the Philippines—Great Britain—Ireland—The British Colonies—France—Belgium—Czar and Kaiser Meet—German Theatrical Manager Disgraced—Happenings in Germany—Bohemia 97-100

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

A Page of Early Politics—The Chorus Against Electivism—Jealousy of Catholic Growth—The Tabernacle Society—Signs of the Times—Helena Modjeska—Uruguay's League of Catholic Women—Episcopalian Practice and Principle 101-109

CORRESPONDENCE

From One of the Portuguese Jesuits—From the Wilds of Siberia—Duez to Be Brought to Trial 109-111

EDITORIAL

The Dungeons of Campolide—Canalejas and the Religious—The Voice of the People—Liberia's

Dream—Revolution and Religion—Two Kinds of Republics 112-115

LITERATURE

The Catholic Encyclopedia—Whirligigs—Jesus is Waiting—Hosanna, a Catholic Hymn Book; Organ Accompaniment to the "Hosanna"—The Princess of Poverty, St. Clare of Assisi—A Brief Grammar of the Portuguese Language, with Exercises and Vocabularies—The Adventures of Two Ants—Highways and Byways of the Rocky Mountains—Spiritual Counsels of Fénelon—Les Martires de Uganda—Books Received 115-117

EDUCATION

Some Unfortunate Tendencies Among State Universities—Censorship of Moving Pictures—Prizes for Parish School Pupils 118

ECONOMICS

Increase in Imports—The Causes of the High Cost of Living 118-119

SOCIOLOGY

Fatal Accidents to Aviators—International Congress for the Legal Protection of Workingmen 119

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

Expulsion of the Sisters of the Good Shepherd from Lisbon—Golden Jubilee of the Dominican Sisters in Louisiana—Lectures for the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine—Irish Dominican Nuns Home from Portugal—Chaplain Reaney Goes to the League Island Navy Yard 119

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

What is a Preacher without a Creed? 119

SCIENCE

A New Theory to Explain Variable Stars—Safeguards for Submarine Vessels—Comparisons Between Spectral Types and Parallax 120

OBITUARY

Prince Bishop Aichner—Hugh J. Grant 120

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Franklin on Official Chaplains 120

CHRONICLE

The Elections.—The elections held throughout the country Nov. 8, as indicated by despatches to the press, show that there was more than a Democratic landslide; it was rather a political convulsion. Democratic victories were won in those great States where Rooseveltism, the high cost of living, the Aldrich-Payne tariff, Republican extravagance and Republican corruption were the issues.

The indications Wednesday morning were that the Democrats not only succeeded in wresting the control of many of the States from the grasp of the Republicans, but that they will have a clear working majority in the lower house of Congress, from which many notable figures will pass into history.

They elected Governors in New York, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Connecticut and Ohio by surprising pluralities. The Sixty-second Congress will be Democratic by about 43 majority, the figures being, as far as can be made out from the first returns, 216 Democrats and 173 Republicans, with 2 Socialists. The Senate remains Republican with a majority of 12. In New York Dix defeated Stimson, Roosevelt's candidate, by a plurality of about 65,000, and the entire Democratic ticket was elected with him. In Massachusetts, Foss defeated Draper by about 30,000; in New Jersey, Wilson was elected by perhaps 37,000; in Connecticut, Baldwin by 5,000; in Ohio, Harmon by over 50,000. These figures, however, will vary somewhat later on. Iowa is probably Democratic. Tener, the Republican candidate for Governor in Pennsylvania was elected, as was also Hooper in Tennessee. Probably also New Hampshire and California are Republican. It is noted that those whom Roosevelt assisted in the west were defeated, but it is regarded as particularly significant that his own congressional district was wrested from Republican control. The instance of the two Socialists in the United States Congress is also worthy of note. They come from Wisconsin. In the New York Assembly the Democrats have a majority of 18 and in the Senate of 7.

Free Portugal.—The frequent declarations of the radical press of both Spain and Portugal to the effect that the dominions of his Most Faithful Majesty were overrun with monks and friars are shown to have been without foundation, for the whole number of Order priests, candidates for the priesthood and lay brothers is now known to have been under four hundred; and they were so hectored and nagged by the royal officials that it would be no exaggeration to say that they suffered unceasing persecution. It remains to be seen what the Braga government will do with the missionaries in the Portuguese colonies, who are also under sentence of expulsion. The Congregation of the Holy Ghost and the Salesians, as well as the Jesuits, have been active in that field. The last Jesuits in the kingdom, fifty in number, have left Lisbon to seek refuge in Calvinistic Holland. When their German brethren, at the time of the kulturkampf persecution, sought an asylum in the same country, the one question of the old king, Willem III, was whether they were self-supporting. When satisfied that they would not look to the Dutch government for maintenance, he raised no difficulty to their establishing themselves in Holland. The provisional government, exercising powers as absolute as any king could claim, has decreed the abolition of religious instruction in all the schools of the revamped kingdom.

Dom Manoel's last official act was to suppress the Jesuit house of studies at Barro, but he was on the way to exile before an attempt was made to carry out the decree. When a force of three hundred Republican troops approached the building, they acted as if expecting to stumble upon a masked battery while the Jesuits were amused spectators of their trepidation. At last, Father Alves, the Rector, went out and conversed with the officer, who haltingly informed him that the whole community were under arrest. They were conveyed to a fortress for safe keeping. The Republicans were particularly anxious to secure the Provincial, Father Cabral, and scattered printed descriptions of him far and wide, but he succeeded in escaping to Spain. His residence was the Collegio de Campolide in Lisbon, the finest Jesuit college in Portugal. Father Torrend, a French Jesuit who was one of the staff, was also a member of the Portuguese Academy of Natural Sciences. After the Jesuits had been imprisoned, he was liberated on the representations of the French consul and was enabled to proceed to England. The college with its immensely valuable physical cabinet, museum and library, became the prey of the disorderly soldiery and even of "souvenir" hunters, who were made welcome. In honor of the completion of one month of existence as a republic, President Braga has granted a general amnesty for political offenses and has reduced the terms of imprisonment in other cases.

Mrs. Harriman's Gift.—The park system of the metropolis and its environs received a magnificent addition by the formal transfer from Mrs. Harriman, widow of the late E. H. Harriman, of a tract of 10,000 acres of land to the Palisades Interstate Park Commission. This splendid gift, accompanied by a cash donation of $1,000,000 for the maintenance of the proposed park, insures the development along the Hudson of a great pleasure ground, surpassing that possessed by any other city in the world. To the Harriman tract have been added seven hundred acres of land on Bear Mountain, including the abandoned site of the new State prison. The donation of Mrs. Harriman, however, and various other private subscriptions, the latter amounting to $1,625,000, were contingent upon the approval by the people of a proposed State bond issue for the purposes of the new park. A referendum to that effect was presented to the voters on Tuesday and met with their approval.

French Line for Boston.—For the first time in the history of steamship travel a French boat is to call at Boston this month to take on passengers bound for the Mediterranean. On November 22, the French liner, Sant' Anna, will sail from New York and call the following day at Boston where she will take aboard one hundred and fifty cabin passengers bound for Marseilles, Naples and Genoa. This new service is due to the increased demand in New England for passage to the Mediterranean.

Conditions in the Philippines.—The Philippine Legislature was convened on October 18. In his message Governor Forbes congratulated the Government on the result of the Tariff bill, and said that the finances of the Philippines were satisfactory. The fiscal year closes with a surplus in excess of $1,000,000. The Governor-General recommends assistance to sugar planters by the erection of central depots for the housing and distribution of the product, the adoption of laws controlling labor, prohibiting involuntary slavery, providing pensions for civil servants, and a modification of the penal statutes in accordance with the judgments of the Supreme Court.

Canada.—Mr. Gilbert has defeated Mr. Perrault, the Government candidate in the Drummond-Athabaska constituency. The election turned exclusively on the naval policy.—A conspiracy has been discovered in Vancouver for the bringing in of Chinese under the guise of merchants. Forty such have just been stopped and returned to China. Each man thus entering the country means a defrauding of the Government to the extent of $500.—Dionne and Keiffer, owner and chauffeur, respectively, have been sentenced to six months' hard labor for the manslaughter of a woman run down by the former's automobile.—A. J. Lemieux lectured at St. Hyacinthe on the discovery of the secrets of the Emancipation Lodge. The lecture ended in a riot. There was fighting in the audience and a party of opponents seized the lecturer and ejected him from the hall. It will be remembered that Mr. Lemieux was on trial last September for highway robbery on Ludger Larose, secretary of the Lodge, and was discharged on account of defects in the indictment. Mr. Larose took no steps to have him reindicted.

Great Britain.—Judging from recent elections one may say that there are fewer signs of a Unionist reaction than there were a year ago. Both South Shields and Walthamstow returned the Liberal candidates with their large majorities virtually unchanged. The municipal elections of November 1 show gains for the Labor and the Social candidates.—The labor troubles in the South Wales collieries are growing. On November 1, 25,000 men were out and a general strike involving 200,000 men is probable.—The failure of the Charing Cross Bank shows assets of only £360,000 against liabilities of £2,500,000, due chiefly to poor depositors.—The bubonic plague is in Suffolk. Four deaths occurred prior to September 29. Since then no cases have been reported; but infected rats and rabbits are dying in several places. The authorities have undertaken the systematic destruction of such plague carriers.—Lord Morley has resigned the Indian secretaryship and is succeeded by Lord Crewe, whose place at the Colonial Office is taken by Lewis Harcourt.—The Persian Government has replied to the British note excusing itself with regard to the unprotected trade routes. Referring to the British proposal to police these routes and deduct ten per cent. from the customs to pay the cost, it asks for an increase of ten per cent. in duties and promises to apply the money to the purpose required. This does not commend itself to the British Government. A report comes from Berlin that the Imperial Government has demanded the re-embarkation of British marines, who had been landed at Lingah, just inside the Straits of Ormuz. A mass meeting of Turks and Persians at Constantinople have made a formal petition for protection to the German Emperor. This is likely to hamper German diplomacy unless the Emperor be resolved to take up the matter vigorously.—The Rev. W. H. Carey has been appointed to the Church of the Annunciation, Brighton, vacated by Mr. Hinde. A Protestant meeting called on the Bishop of Chichester to refuse institution till Mr. Carey guarantees that he will dissolve any connection, private or public, which he may have with the English Church Union, and will conform to the Thirty-nine Articles.—Mr. C. A. L. Senior, lately curate of St. German's Cardiff, has entered the Church.

Ireland.—The news from Ireland indicates a serious situation for the Home Rule party due to announcements received from the conference of the leaders of the Government and the Opposition to consider the question of the House of Lords. Early in the month reports began to come from excellent sources affirming that an understanding had been reached among the leaders of both parties that a broad constitutional convention would be held next year to deal with the whole subject of the federation of the British Empire. Ireland is, of course, the chief stumbling block. It is declared that even such radical members of the Government as Churchill and Lloyd-George are strongly opposed to giving to Ireland the measure of independence possessed by Canada and Australia. They are willing to concede to her relations to the imperial Government similar to those of Ontario with the Dominion of Canada. On this basis the Unionist leaders, it seems, are now ready to compromise and settle the Irish question. Pending its settlement and the working out of the details of local government for England, Scotland and Wales in the constitutional convention of next year, the announcements made affirm the existence of a mutual agreement between both British parties to deprive Mr. Redmond of all power to embarrass the Government, the Unionists, if necessary, promising to vote with the Cabinet. The report induced Mr. Redmond to cancel several speaking engagements in New York and Brooklyn and hurry back to London, where he will place himself at the head of his forces as leader of the Nationalist party, ready for the fray. Before leaving New York Mr. Redmond declared his late tour through the States to have been the most successful American tour he ever had. He refused to commit himself on the reported anti-Irish coalition or to discuss it. "Within the next three weeks or so," said Mr. Redmond, "you may expect news from England of the most dramatic kind. If the constitutional conference does not result in a curtailment of the powers of the House of Lords, Parliament will come to an instant stop and we shall be at once in the midst of a national crisis." Just before sailing Mr. Redmond sent the following message to the Associated Press:

"On the eve of my departure from America I desire, through your courtesy to thank the press of America for the uniform kindness and friendliness with which the mission of my colleagues and myself, representing the Irish Parliamentary party, has been treated. I wish to express the gratitude of the Irish people for this renewed expression of American sympathy with Ireland's cause."

The British Colonies.—In South Africa twenty-eight Indians have been sentenced to a fine of £25 or six weeks' hard labor for not producing registration certificates; nine others admitting previous conviction received the sentence of a fine of £50 or three months' hard labor.—The state elections of New South Wales have resulted in the defeat of the Liberals. The Labor party will have the narrow majority of two in the legislature.

France.—Some one has described Briand as not exemplifying the saying that "all things come to those who wait," but "all things come to him who lies in wait." He hoisted himself into power and place by means of the Socialists. He himself advocated the General Strike; but when he became Prime Minister he crushed it. The scenes in parliament after the strike were tumultuous, Jaurès, Guesde and others fiercely denouncing him but he succeeded in gaining a vote of confidence and was thought to be firmly in his seat, when on November 2 he announced to Fallières that the Cabinet had resigned. Ordinarily that would have been the end of the chief, but Fallières asked him to form a new one and on November 3 he presented a new ministry. The names of the two Socialists, Millerand and Viviani, who were conspicuous in the former cabinet, do not appear, though it is said that Briand was anxious to return Millerand. Besides Briand there are eleven individuals who compose this body. Ten of them never served before in any ministerial capacity. It is useless to give their names for they are unknown in this part of the world and may disappear from the scene to-morrow. The Minister of Public Works, M. Puech, who takes Millerand's place is the only one that seems familiar. Parliament was adjourned to November 8. What will happen then or what program Briand will present no one knows.

In the carving up of Persia by England and Russia France acquiesces. It is Hobson's choice, otherwise Germany and Turkey would be the executioners; moreover she has no commerce in that part of the world, or at least, only six per cent. of the imports and exports. Ten years ago there were three French business establishments at Teheran, now there is only one. The two that withdrew had made a million in twelve years; but no one was enterprising enough to continue the business. The French physician of the Shah has been succeeded by an Englishman, and Financial Adviser Bizot by some one who is not French.

While there is so much clamor for the right of even government employees to strike, Jules Roche contributes an interesting article to the Figaro, in which he cites the labor laws of the National Assembly of 1791 (namely, in the heat of the French Revolution), which show that one of the great principles of the Revolution was freedom to work and freedom of contract. The assembly prohibited in express terms the formation of trade unions or similar associations intended to interfere with the liberties of the citizens in their industrial relations including their wages and hours of labor. It is in violent contrast with present conditions.

Belgium.—The Socialist meeting which convened at Brussels to protest against the Kaiser's visit appears to have been a failure and the Liberal press are now, though somewhat late, disclaiming any connection with the assembly. We read in the Bien Public that the Socialist leader in Parliament, Vandervelde, was not present but wrote a letter in which he declaimed fiercely against the Emperor. Subsequently he also applauded the French strike and declared that its failure was only temporary and was due to the fact that its revolutionary character was too apparent. The unfortunate Jesuits come in as usual for the blame. The Etoile and the Dernière Heure maintain that the meeting, the posters, the articles in the Peuple were all the work of those wonderful agitators.

At the request of the Mayor of Brussels the bans of the marriage of Prince Victor Napoleon and Princess Clémentine of Belgium, which has been fixed for November 14, have been posted up by the Municipality of Moncalieri. Both the religious ceremony, which will be performed by the Bishop of Biella, and the civil ceremony by the Mayor of Moncalieri, will take place at the chateau there the residence of Princess Marie Clothilde, the mother of Prince Victor.

Czar and Kaiser Meet.—On November 4 occurred the long-heralded meeting of the rulers of Russia and Germany. Emperor William, accompanied by the Princes of his house, the Imperial Chancellor, Dr. von Bethmann-Hollweg, the members of the cabinet and a splendid retinue received Czar Nicholas at the railway station in Potsdam. The royal visitor had journeyed from Hesse, where he had been spending his vacation with relatives of the Czarina. The greeting of the two monarchs was mutually a cordial one. Accompanying Nicholas was Sergius Sasonow, the new Foreign Minister of Russia, and a numerous body of retainers. From the station the cavalcade passed through streets lined with troops to the New Palace. In the evening a banquet was held, at which the most distinguished personages of the empire paid their homage to William's guest. No speeches were made, but the Emperor made public his intention to honor many among the Czar's retinue with decorations and orders. The general tone of the press in commenting on the visit seems not to forecast any important political results from the meeting of the two emperors, although it is not denied that the relations existing between Russia and Germany could be made more cordial than they happen to be just now.

German Theatrical Manager Disgraced.—The sensation of the hour in Berlin last week was the revocation of the license held by Martin Zickel, manager of the Lustspielhaus, the Capital's leading comedy theatre, on the ground that his morals made him unfit to hold such a position. The prosecution was instituted by the police authorities, and the decision to revoke the license was made after a formal three days' trial in a local court. The verdict was pronounced by the presiding judge, who declared that the evidence proved Zickel to have repeatedly insulted women and girls engaged for his plays. In addition to losing his license, the disgraced Manager is condemned to bear the costs of the trial aggregating $12,500.

Happenings in Germany.—Whilst Emperor William entertained the Czar at the banquet in the New Palace, a number of Socialistic mass meetings were held in Berlin, during which formal protests were voiced against the visit of Russia's ruler to Germany.—On November 22 the German Reichstag will reconvene after a long vacation. In preparation for the work of the session a special meeting of the Bundesrath's Commission of Foreign Affairs had been called, and its convening is awaited with great interest, as it is customary for the Government to prepare for this Commission an exact statement of the political situation.—Despatches from Cologne tell of danger of floods again threatening the Rheinländer, due to the rising of the Rhine.

Bohemia.—The compromise agreement entered into a few weeks since between the German and Czech members of the Landtag, which at the time seemed to open the way to a speedy enactment of necessary legislation in Prague, has again disappointed the expectations of the Vienna cabinet. Everything appeared propitious when a sudden change of front on the part of the Czechs of the Radical wing destroyed the mutual understanding, which appeared to be awakened between them and the Germans. Leading parliamentarists in Prague have abandoned all hope of progress under existing conditions, but the Vienna Premier, Dr. von Bienerth, has been in conference with the more conservative German representatives and he announces that a basis for a new agreement has been accepted. Events will show whether his confidence is well founded. The Premier will not summon the Reichsrath to meet in Vienna until the difficulties in Prague will have been fairly settled.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

A Page of Early Politics

Half jokingly, half in earnest, Vice-President John Adams often spoke of himself as the heir apparent. He had remained staunchly loyal to the President at a time when others wavered or fell away entirely. Madison, the Father of the Constitution, had been recognized as the administration leader in the House of Representatives of the first Congress; but he had withdrawn his support from Washington's theories of government and had espoused the views of the Jeffersonians. Jefferson had never been heart and soul in sympathy with his chief. He was abroad in the interests of the infant republic during the sessions of the Constitutional Convention, in whose deliberations he could therefore take no part, and with the fruit of whose labors he expressed a mild satisfaction which was not enthusiastic admiration. He, too, drifted away from Washington, not without exposing himself to the charge of insincerity.

Jefferson was the leader of the Republicans. He was the advocate of strict construction of the Constitution and the apostle of equal rights. His adversaries charged him with hypocrisy and ambition. Certain it is that he had no rival in his party. None excelled him in working against opponents, in making strong combinations, in sowing seed while others slept, and in preserving throughout a calmness which closely resembled indifference.

John Adams was undoubtedly the strongest man with the rank and file of the Federalists. But the party leaders, who had opportunity to study him closely, saw in him an irritable and headstrong upholder of executive independence, no mere tool in the hands of politicians, but a man with views of his own on all the great party questions. In a private letter to Madison in 1788, Jefferson had given his estimate of Adams' character: "He is vain, irritable, and a bad calculator of the force and probable effect of the motives which govern men. He is disinterested, profound in his views, and accurate in his judgment, except where knowledge of the world is necessary to form a judgment."

Since the Federalist leaders durst not reject Adams as their candidate, they set about devising means to insure his defeat. Hamilton's fertile brain produced the first plan for "knifing" one whom his party affected to support. The scheme was simplicity itself. The Constitution provided that each elector should vote for two candidates without indicating which was his choice for president and which for vice-president. The candidate receiving the highest number of electoral votes, provided it was a majority, should be declared president, and the candidate receiving the next highest number should be declared vice-president. Adams' associate on the ticket was to be a popular southerner, Thomas Pinckney, of South Carolina; the northern Federalist electors were to vote for both; if, in addition, Pinckney could get a few scattered votes in the South, he would run ahead of Adams and beat him in the race to the presidential chair.

The result of the first real application of the constitutional provision for electing a president showed that it was unsatisfactory and disappointing. The northern electors did not support their two candidates equally, and the outcome was that Adams had seventy-one votes and Pinckney only fifty-nine, while Jefferson, the Republican leader, received sixty-eight. The new President of the Senate and possible successor in the presidential chair was, therefore, a man quite out of sympathy with the chief magistrate on all the great questions that divided the two parties. Aside from Hamilton's sharp practice, the opposition papers claimed that two electors chosen in the Republican interest had voted for Adams. Thus, the cry of fraud in elections was born in 1796; it is still young and vigorous and sound in wind and limb. In spite of Washington's announced retirement from public life, two electors, one in Virginia and one in North Carolina, placed him as their first choice for president. In the light of the events that speedily followed the publication of Washington's farewell address to his countrymen, we may well say that the first president had gauged wisely the temper and tendencies of the sovereign people.

Of Pennsylvania's fifteen electors, two were Federalists. Although they were not pledged to vote for any particular candidate, it was assumed that each elector would vote for the nominee of his party; but, to the disgust of all his political allies, Samuel Miles, one of the two Federalist electors, cast his vote for Jefferson. Considering that the election was bound to be close, Miles' action was branded as a betrayal of the trust reposed in him by those who had secured his election. Though in a few other cases, electors have not voted for their party candidate, Samuel Miles has the dubious honor of being the only elector whose defection jeopardized the success of the man in whose interests he had been chosen.

Only one vote above the number absolutely needed to elect him had brought John Adams to the presidential chair, yet he confidently looked forward to a second term. His first blunder as president was to retain in his cabinet the advisers who had assisted Washington during the tempestuous days that preceded his retirement to private life. As they had been accustomed to take counsel with Alexander Hamilton, whose influence over the first president had been considerable, they continued that practice in spite of the pronounced coolness between him and their new chief, who chafed and smarted under the trial.

The congressional elections showed a gain for the Federalists, who found themselves with a working majority once more. With a short-sightedness and disregard for the future, of which our history shows few more striking examples, they signalized their return to power by passing three measures which, by effectually estranging the common people from them, dealt the party a death blow from which there was no rallying. The Alien Law vested in the President discretionary power to expel obnoxious foreigners from the country. This act, though aimed at certain mischief-makers and demagogues whom the republic could well spare, was denounced as a piece of despotism by the opponents of the administration. President Adams discreetly left untouched his discretionary powers over aliens, of whom not one suffered molestation. Article XXXIII of the present Mexican Constitution secures to the President of Mexico the powers conferred upon Adams by the odious Alien Law.

Public indignation was still further aroused by the Sedition Act, which punished with fine and imprisonment any "false, scandalous, and malicious writings" against the Government of the United States, either house of Congress or the President, "with attempt to defame or bring any of them into contempt or disrepute," etc., etc. An odd, loquacious Irishman named Matthew Lyon, who had come over in 1759 at the age of thirteen from County Wicklow, and had seen service in the Revolution, was the first to taste the sweets of the Sedition Act. Being at the time a representative in Congress from Vermont, he published an address to his constituents, in which he charged President Adams with "unbounded thirst for ridiculous pomp, foolish adulation and selfish avarice." He was brought to trial and convicted, and sentenced to pay a fine of $1,000 and to spend four months in jail. He was still behind the bars when his admiring friends triumphantly reelected him to Congress. By act of Congress, the amount of the fine with interest was afterward returned to Lyon's heirs.

The term of residence as a preliminary to naturalization, which had been fixed at two years in 1790 and raised to five years in 1795, was raised under Adams to four years. Thus native Americanism became a part of the Federalist political creed and produced the natural effect of driving naturalized citizens into the Republican camp.

Some influential Federalists, seeing their party so handicapped for the presidential election, proposed to save the day by bringing out Washington from his retirement at Mount Vernon, but the project was not very generally considered. Alexander Hamilton, who saw nothing but disaster ahead of the Federalists, should Adams insist on a second term, printed and circulated privately among party leaders a violent and intemperate pamphlet in which he proved to his own satisfaction Adams' general unfitness and the advisability of agreeing on another candidate. Newspapers controlled by Jefferson's admirers secured a copy of this precious contribution to the campaign, and gleefully published copious extracts for the edification of their readers. However he may have read the signs of the times, Adams gave no intimation of withdrawing from the race. He was proposed for a second term and was defeated by the members of his own party.

D. P. SULLIVAN.

The Chorus Against Electivism

Since the removal of President Eliot from the scene, the protests against his favorite system are increasing in number and vehemence. Professor Lodge, of New York, does not hesitate to say in The Classical Weekly for Oct. 22: "Teachers of the Classics who have been for years striving by means of their work to develop the minds of the students under their influence and instil into them habits of exact and continuous study, have understood fully the fallacy of the elective system and the immeasurable damage done to the cause of pure culture by the work of ex-President Eliot, of Harvard University." The same writer further quotes Professor Manatt, of Brown University, who is even more vehement in the May number of The American College. "You know as well as I do," says Professor Manatt, "how the intellectual and spiritual climate has changed in our time; how our seats of learning have become seats of everything but learning." President Eliot closed his administration "as the advocate of a three years' course which might include such broad and liberal studies as coal mining, ore dressing, foundry practice and blacksmithing! Specialization making sharp men and dissipation making shallow ones had run full course, not at Harvard only, but in the college world at large." "Mr. Lowell," he continues, "has begun well by scotching the hydra that beset the springs—the myriad-headed monstrosity dubbed free election, which really spells damnation. But it remains to be seen whether even a Harvard president can graft a back bone into a jelly fish." We must return, is the Providence professor's conclusion, to "man-making studies," "just the good old humanities with their source and centre in Greek, but radiating out (as all Greek things do) into manifold developments of sweetness and light and power. We cannot with impunity drop Greek out of our national culture. That has been done more than once in history and always with disastrous consequences."

Sir Oliver Lodge came out strongly on July 9 last for Greek where we should least expect it, in the University of Birmingham, England. A representative of modern science was addressing a representative modern scientific university. His remark that "their most pressing need on the educational side was a chair of Greek," was greeted with applause. The London Daily News commenting two days after on the significance of this pronouncement says it need cause little surprise. "Sir Oliver Lodge justifies his demand by emphasizing the value to the world of poetry and literature generally, but the claim of Greek does not rest upon that ground alone. The truth is that there is no body of literature so inspiring and so suggestive to the intellect as that which is enshrined in Greek, and to dip into it is an indispensable part of the education of even the most practical person." "Even the most sternly realistic men of science," it goes on to say, "can profit by the Greeks, who make the mind pregnant and put it into a condition to bring forth the best that is within itself."

The reaction against the elective system has begun to show itself in other ways. The merits of the departmental system and its shortcomings are the subject of a thorough study in the October number of The Classical Journal. Just as electivism tends to eliminate Greek, which is a subject that presents the most initial difficulties to a young imagination, so it would seem that the departmental system has been found in practice to tend to injure all classical studies. The writer of the article, "The Classics and their Allies," very shrewdly observes that studies with a single specific result, such as commercial courses, typewriting, let us say, fare better under the system of separate teachers, but many-sided work, on the other hand, whose results are often unobtrusive, such as that which the classics are called to do, will easily appear like shooting with a blunderbuss—aiming at nothing in particular and hitting nothing in particular." An instant will show whether one can typewrite; a much longer time is needed to determine whether one can think. Trained fingers are more quickly evident than trained brains.

It is pitiful to read of the attempts of many teachers, whom the writer consulted, to bring together the different departments in teaching, and it is consoling to the Catholic schools, which have held to traditional methods, to find that the sad experience of others is convincing proof that they are not wrong in rejecting electivism and in refusing to adopt the department system of teaching. Chicago unites with Providence and New York in joining the universal outcry against Eliotism. The writer in The Classical Journal, after stating that the elective system has "left the course of study in an unbalanced and chaotic state," makes this remarkable admission: "The most effective way to correlate two lines of work is to have them both taught by the same teacher. This is the method of the German gymnasium, and it is only our departmental blindness which keeps us from seeing that it would be infinitely better for both the pupil and the teacher if the latter had several related branches to teach, instead of several sections of a class doing exactly the same work in the same subject, as is often done. In those cases where such a combination of several lines of work has been given a trial, the testimony is practically unanimous as to the excellent results to be obtained from it." Where could one find a more complete and more solid vindication of the traditional class system followed in most Catholic schools? Another modern educational idol topples from its feet of clay!

F. P. DONNELLY, S.J.

Jealousy of Catholic Growth

The magnificent demonstrations at the Eucharistic Congress and the Consecration of St. Patrick's Cathedral, of the virility and loyalty of American Catholicity have excited admiration in the general public, but in certain quarters not a little envy. The New York Independent, which pretends to intimate knowledge of Catholic matters and is greatly exercised over our shortcomings, is constrained to add its commendation, but, as usual, turns the eulogy into a comfortable coign of vantage whence to discharge its petty missiles of slur and innuendo. We have now attained a strength which such weapons cannot hurt, but as ignorance may inspire its methods we shall proceed to enlighten it.

Its leader on the Cathedral ceremony opens with, "It is a good rule in the Catholic Church that no church shall be dedicated until it is free from debt." Taking "dedication" as in our common use for "blessing," there is no such rule, and the writer seems to know it, but this gives him an opportunity of insinuating that the "good rules" of Catholics are made to be broken: "We do not observe that this rule prevents Catholic churches from contracting debts," and hints at scandals that follow. Having thus given proof of its knowledge and animus it forms another coign of vantage; "The Catholic Church has been a steadying influence for good character and for sound citizenship," but—we are good in the United States because the public schools and the free spirit of the day have chiseled us into shape, overturning the superstitions which our immigrants brought from Europe and "all that faith which rests on superstition."

How the public schools, even if their influence was not detrimental to faith and morals, could improve our character when, as stated in the same paragraph, an active parochial school is attached to nearly every church, may be set aside as a peculiarly independent problem, but a word on superstition is in order. To overturn the superstitions of paganism was the initial task of the Catholic Church, and to root out residual superstitions and combat new ones has been a large part of its work ever since. Our patronizing and pretentious critic could find in every catechism of any European language which it can command that superstition in every form is specifically condemned by the Catholic Church. If some immigrants and natives who are nominally Catholics are superstitious it is because they are ill-instructed or indifferent, having grown up in the atmosphere of irreligious schools or otherwise out of reach of their Church's influence.

The Independent, like most persons and organs that have no definite faith, has no definite knowledge of religious terms and confounds superstition with the Faith to which it entertains an inherited prejudice but to which superstition is radically opposed. Sneering at "the marchings and sprinklings, cleansings and blessings" of the Consecration ceremonies it affects "not to understand that belief in demoniac influences" is retained by us any more than by itself.

The Catholic immigrants who have built up our churches and schools, and their children and descendants who support and multiply them, are precisely those of our citizens who, because mentally and morally disciplined by the teaching and practise of true religion, are least amenable to the influences of superstition. They have learned in their catechisms that it is sinful "to attribute to any action or any thing a supernatural virtue which belongs to God alone." Hence it is not among Catholics that fortune-tellers make fortunes or that spiritist mediums, "Christian Science" healers and similar pedlars of superstition do a thriving business. Our superior critic still holds to the superstition that the Public Schools teach and generate morality, but, thanks to the growth of Catholic education, this also is moribund.

We, of course, believe in the Bible, believe in "demoniac influences," and also that Christ Who expelled the demons has given to His Church power to counteract them. We do not know whether "Luther saw the devil" but opine that Satan, if not in his vision, was well within its range. Lucifer, like Luther, was the leading independent of his day, and pride and scepticism accomplished his downfall. He is a mocker even yet, but a miserable failure even in his mockery.

Another of our critic's grievances is Columbus Day, which, it rightly concludes, has been made a success by Catholics of all nationalities. "It was created," it affects to believe, "for Catholics, chiefly immigrant Catholics and their children, the special Catholic holiday of the year." The discoverer of America merits equal honor from all Americans who take pride in their country's greatness. To deny him that honor because he was a Catholic would be on a par with refusing to honor Washington because he was not. Catholics honor Columbus, primarily, because they are loyal citizens of the Republic which his achievement made possible, and secondarily, because his character as a Catholic and a man was such that all good citizens should delight to do him honor. If Catholics have been the pioneers in such a worthy enterprise it is not the first time they have taken the lead in national movements which finally swept over or brushed aside narrow and unpatriotic bigotry. It is painfully distasteful to our critic that Catholics predominate in New York and Boston, seeing therein a sign that such predominance may become universal and that the ambition of Columbus to spread the Catholic Faith on this continent may be realized.

Well, we shall continue to hold and propagate the Faith, to consecrate our Cathedrals and churches, and to revere on Columbus Day the memory of the great Catholic Discoverer. Meanwhile we may yet behold the Independent following Catholic leadership in the growth of a national spirit. Such an apparent improbability has often come to pass.

M. KENNY, S.J.

The Tabernacle Society

Well, what is it and what about it? Is it a new-fangled name for the committee of ladies who look after the decoration of the altar, tidy up the sacristy and glower at the servers? In a well established parish, where the ladies' greatest trouble is to decide which robes are to be worn, which vases are to be placed on the altar, and how the candelabra are to be arranged for the solemn celebration, the Tabernacle Society may mean nothing; but there are parishes in which its name is in benediction and the memory of it will not pass away.

In the newly settled districts of the West and South, there are struggling congregations wrestling with the poverty which is almost inseparable from a start in an undeveloped country; then there are older congregations in districts where the Church has but a weak and feeble representation amid surroundings that are not favorable to expansion. If the priest belongs to some Order, he is sure of a modest living, for his superiors will not leave him hungry; and if the hardships of his charge undermine his health, there is some one of its houses which he can call home. The lot of the diocesan priest is far harder, for he must look into the future and provide for an old age that may be afflicted or helpless. Of course, there is the fund for aged and infirm priests, but in a new country it is inconsiderable and the missionary hesitates to claim for his relief what may soon be needed by one in greater straits.

One of these apostolic men, who rejoiced in the possession of a "guaranteed" income of twelve dollars a month from his ecclesiastical superior, was quite wealthy in his poverty, for he "had seen worse times," as he assured the present writer, and although the sum was small, he could depend upon it. This particular priest visited a number of out-of-the-way places where the people were few and poor and therefore could do little to swell his income. Yet those outlying stations imperatively demand attention, for distressing facts show that though the hardy pioneers persevere in the Faith, even in spite of adverse conditions, it is no proof that their children will recognize the Church as their Mother. That was a painful experience for the missionary in a western state, who, while administering the last sacraments to an old lady, was respectfully assisted by her two sons, both being dignitaries in local non-Catholic churches. They were quite satisfied with their mother's spiritual condition and with their own as well, for they were too ignorant of the Faith to see any incongruousness in their action.

It is to add to the decorum of Divine worship and to facilitate the work of the priests in poor districts that the Tabernacle Society has been called into being. How can the missionary priest obtain the requisites for the becoming celebration of the sacred mysteries in a district where the struggle with want is a part of the daily burden of the members of his little flock? In no way, if it were not for those good people, whose love for the honor and glory of God extends beyond the limits of their own parish or even diocese. Our Church Extension Society, which has been recently singled out so honorably by Pope Pius X, did well to learn from the Methodists when it began its career, which we trust will be long and glorious. The map of the United States is fairly speckled with Methodist churches. They may not be very sumptuous, but they are churches, and that is the principal thing; they are something that the Methodists can call their own, built for their own use. The map may not show many big splotches, but it does show myriads of specks. Methodist activity has reached into all corners of the country.

The Tabernacle Society follows the missionary on his journeys. It is affecting to see the delight of the older members of the little country congregation when they see for the first time in many years the altar furnishings which the Society sends to their humble chapel. It would be amusing if it were not so sad, to hear some of the comments of children, not mere infants but almost men and women, at sight of those wonderful "things," for they cannot name them. The monstrance, the cope, the shoulder-veil, what are they and what are they for? Rich is that chapel which can boast of the possession of chasubles of the rubrical colors. We recall now the amazement of a good little altar-boy (no, he wasn't very small) when, for the first time in his life, he saw a red chasuble, which the Tabernacle Society had presented to the chapel. With a boy's honest admiration, he feasted his eyes. At the lavabo, that youngster took a good, long look, forgetful of cruet and basin and water. Further particulars are unnecessary.

If the Tabernacle Society had no other object but to induce its members to give of their abundance or of their savings to promote the dignity of Divine worship, it would already be a great deal, as we see from the recent report of one of its branches, in which there is a list of articles devoted during the present year to the objects of the organization. Altar linens, surplices, albs, stoles, copes, and even two sets of dalmatics are some of the furnishings that have been provided. It may be that we have had the good fortune to happen upon a particularly earnest and devoted branch of the Society, but we hope for the sake of struggling churches that it has many similar centres of zeal in a cause so worthy. The Society aims, however, at the true spiritual benefit of its members in other respects besides almsgiving, for their object is "to make Jesus Christ in the Blessed Sacrament known, loved and perpetually adored; and to repair the many outrages that are committed against Him in the August Sacrament." Who could begin to enumerate the acts of religion that have been performed to the honor of God and for the welfare of souls by the establishment of the Tabernacle Society? While its own members have been drawn nearer to the Sacred Heart of Jesus by their generosity in His service, they have been instrumental in leading other souls to a knowledge and love of the Saviour of the World. Where the fruits of their labors have gone to cheer the missionary and encourage his little flock, there also are the members of the Tabernacle Society, present, as it were in the labor of their hands, a continual reminder of what we ought to do for God.

It is regrettable that a love of foolish display sometimes occasions extravagant expenditures as a sign of sorrow at a funeral, when a few days suffice to destroy those costly tokens of remembrance which were the tribute of loving friends. If we could do nothing better or more serviceable, it might pass, but it would be of far more benefit to our dear departed and at the same time helpful to our poorer brethren if we were to profit by an item in the report of the Tabernacle Society. Among donations received for the work of the organization we read: "The gift of a chalice in loving memory of a sister; and of another chalice in loving memory of the donor's parents." And again: "A chalice for the conversion of a brother." We know no further particulars, nor do we need to know them, but it does not take a poet's imagination to conjure up a sister who is working and praying and making sacrifices for the sake of a brother who has become entangled in the meshes of evil. It is good to have such a sister; may that brother prove worthy of her.

The Rev. F. Lasance, whose religious writings have brought him prominently before the public, has the general spiritual direction of the Tabernacle Society. This is in itself a sufficient earnest that its members will love the beauty of the house of the Lord, and that by their zeal in his Holy cause, they will receive the greatest of all blessings, to rejoice in the light of His countenance and to dwell in His courts forever.

H. J. SWIFT, S.J.

Signs of the Times

The Missionary Review of the World (Sept. 1910) can boast of an exceptionally keen-sighted observer of the "signs of the times." From across the big pond he sees things in Germany which those living in the Fatherland itself cannot see; for instance, the "surprising large number of Roman Catholic priests who have entered the Protestant ranks recently." One would think that there was an epidemic of clerical "conversions" to Protestantism in Germany just at present. It is true that every now and then one of the twenty-two thousand and odd German Catholic priests does become a renegade from the Faith; furthermore, that every now and then one of these apostates joins a Protestant sect, "convinced by the stomach argument," as one of them put it; but that six priests of the Diocese of Breslau, Silesia, have resigned their offices lately and avowed their purpose of becoming followers of Luther, is a piece of news that some reporter palms off on the gullible.

This same observer of the signs of the times, though he reads German religious papers, does not seem to be very strong in German. "The famous (?) Roman Catholic theologian, Hugo Koch, of Braunsberg," he tells us, "has published a book entitled 'Cyprian and the Romish Primate.'" Now Hugo Koch published a book entitled "Cyprian und der roemische Primat," which, translated into English, means "Cyprian and the Roman Primacy."

The "famous" Hugo Koch has indeed ceased, as our observer rightly informs us, to occupy the position of a Roman Catholic professor of theology, but not because he dealt with the question of Cyprian and the Primacy "according to the recognized results of historical investigation," but because, by denying the Roman Primacy—a doctrine which certainly does not stand and fall with Cyprian's attitude towards it, as Cyprian, great saint and teacher though he was, is not identical with the Church of his time—he ceased to be a Roman Catholic and had common decency enough to resign his professorship of theology.

Speaking of the Mariawites in Russian Poland the Missionary Review leaves its readers under the impression that a Catholic bishop has joined the sect. "A certain Bishop Ko(s)walski," they are told, "has joined Mary Koslowska, and both are actively working for a movement to lead the Roman Catholic people away from the Pope." The fact is that John Kowalski was the right hand of Maria Franzisca Kozlowska from the very beginning of the Mariawite heresy, i. e., about ten years ago, and he was only raised to the "episcopal dignity" last year by an Old-Catholic "bishop."

But our observer carries off the prize in the following sage utterance: "The Pope has 'withdrawn' certain statements in the Borromean Encyclical because they have given offence to Protestants in Saxony. Thus he confesses to his fallibility." The intelligent reader is at a loss to know which to admire most, the writer's cold-blooded distortion of an historical fact not two months old, or his supreme ignorance of what Papal infallibility is.

The same writer poses as the champion of "religious freedom," of the "progressive and tolerant spirit." He seems, however, to be under the impression that Spain and Portugal—I suppose he has altered his opinion about Portugal and is satisfied with its recent "progressive and liberal" account of itself—are the only reactionary countries in this respect. Perhaps he does not know that the spirit of religious tolerance has not yet alighted on sundry States of the great German Empire.

A study of the primary school legislation in force in the various German States (Brandis, Der Volksschulunterricht der Kath. Kinder in den deutschen Bundesstaaten. Hamm, 1910) reveals the following significant facts:

In only nine of the confederate States, viz., Prussia, Bavaria, Saxony, Wuerttemberg, Hesse, Baden, Alsace-Lorraine, Oldenburg and Waldeck, have Catholics the same educational rights and opportunities as their Protestant fellow-taxpayers. In the other seventeen States, which have a Catholic population of over 160,000, all the public schools are strictly Lutheran—teachers, text-books, religious instruction, prayers, hymns, in fact the whole atmosphere. Catholic religious instruction cannot be given in any of these schools. Yet to maintain these purely Protestant schools, the Catholics must pay proportionately as much as the Protestants themselves. If they wish to establish private Catholic schools, they must first obtain the permission of the respective Governments, and then erect and maintain them at their own expense. (In Bremen, Lübeck and Brunswick a subvention is annually granted by the State). The teachers employed in the private schools must be approved by the State and the schools are subject in all respects to the supervision of the State. As the number of private schools is very small—there are forty-five scattered through the seventeen States—and as the compulsory education laws are strictly carried out everywhere, it will be readily seen how many Catholic children are forced to attend Protestant schools, and how many Catholic parents are obliged to pay for the privilege of having violence done to their consciences.

Other sins of intolerance committed within the limits of the German Empire could be mentioned here, but I am sure the unpardonable one of forcing Catholic parents to pay for the Protestant education of their children is amply sufficient to arouse the indignation of the Missionary Review and to call forth flaming articles of protest, thereby hastening the advent of the day when "the growing sentiment of the world in favor of liberty, civil and religious," may find a lodgment even in the most backward States of the German Confederacy.

G. M.

Helena Modjeska*

All of us who are not mere children, knew Madame Modjeska. She was born in Cracow of middle class family, her father being a teacher in one of the high schools. It is not easy to discover the source of her artistic temperament. One trying to find it amongst the crags and forests and torrents of the Carpathians, the home of her father's people for generations, is disconcerted with the fact that her half-brothers, sons of her mother's first marriage to a worthy Cracovian burgher, were almost as artistic as she. We are therefore inclined to believe that it is to be traced through that mother, notwithstanding her bustling, business like, practical character, apparently without the faintest spark of romance.

Two of those half-brothers were on the stage and Helena wished to join them. She was told by one who ought to have been a good judge that she had not the capacity to succeed; and at about twenty she married Gustave Modrezejewski, whose name she afterwards simplified for western eyes and tongues into the form familiar to us. But in 1861 a charity performance and an approving word from a Warsaw actor opened to her the career she desired. Her circumstances were not prosperous, there were actors and actresses in the family; nothing was easier, therefore, than to turn the amateur company into one of traveling professionals. The thing was done in a moment and her husband became the manager. In 1862 she entered the regular company at Lemberg, making herself generally useful, and in 1865 she won recognition in her native Cracow.

* Memories and Impressions of Helena Modjeska. An Autobiography. New York: The Macmillan Company, 66 Fifth Avenue. Price $4 net.

In 1868 she married again. Her second husband was Karol Bozenta Chlapowski, a young patriot of noble blood. At that time too she achieved such a success as won her a life appointment at the Imperial Theatre, Warsaw. But she and her husband were close to the revolutionary movement; and as this was in a hopeless state, they resolved, with some of their associates, upon a co-operative settlement in California. By the end of 1876 they were settled near Anaheim, below Los Angeles, in a small cottage with the blue Pacific before them and the Santa Ana mountains at their back.

If climate and the picturesque were all that life requires, the colonists should have prospered. But food from the soil is necessary, and they knew not how to produce it. The settlement was a failure. Ruin stared the settlers in the face. The woman had to save them from starvation; and early in the following year Helena Modjeska went to San Francisco to try to resume her art. It was the close of the Golden Age. The shades were thickening but had not passed altogether into night. The Argonauts, though no longer of "That strength which in old days Moved earth and heaven," were still to be seen in the streets; there was still something of the old generosity; and we, who in the summer of 1877 saw the artiste who came, sudden and unheralded, apparently from nowhere, our hard speech faltering on her tongue, to triumph in the old California Theatre of McCullough, Barrett and Booth, while the Polish colony acclaimed her madly, loved to think that to the old California chivalry this bright star owed its rising above the horizon of the English speaking world. But, alas! Madame Modjeska tells another tale. She had to batter at closed doors, to compel a hearing. Barton Hill, the manager, yielded to her prayer to be heard as the unjust judge yielded to the poor widow. And when, seeing he had a prize indeed, he opened the way to the stage, the company put every obstacle it could in her path. But this ill-will wore itself out gradually. The night of August 13 was a night of victory. From it to the end of her life no playhouse in America or Europe could close its doors against Modjeska. The poor farm at Anaheim became a memory: the little cottage could grow to be the home of restful leisure.

For more than thirty years Madame Modjeska was a Californian, and every Californian who knew her was proud to esteem her. Outside the Church and inside the Church there was but one mind on the subject; and when she passed away last year in the spring, from clergy and laity went up to God, many a fervent prayer for her soul. Still there were defects of character we cannot pass over. Madame Modjeska was a Pole, a patriot, an actress and a Catholic; and we who are not so complex must remember this in meeting things that scandalize somewhat. Three times in her "Memories" she speaks unpleasantly of suicide as a possible ending of her troubles in the troubled times. We do not believe for a moment that she could have ever committed this awful sin, but we should have been better pleased had she never admitted it to her thoughts. We should have been happier too if, sticking to earlier and sounder principles which excluded "Camille" from her plays, she had not allowed herself to take part in this and in "Sapho," "The Doll's House" and "Magda." No one can doubt that she was thoroughly conscientious; though how she formed her conscience in this matter is one of the secrets of her complex character we cannot fathom. Certainly the reasons she alleges seem to us quite insufficient.

Her "Memories and Impressions" are fascinating for what they tell of herself, of her early Polish life, of her trials and triumphs. They are doubly so because in them we meet nearly everybody famous in her day in letters and art. All the Poles are there, Sienkiewicz, Paderewski, the De Reszkes, Sembrich and many another to make this book most pleasing to its readers. Its many illustrations add to its charm.

W. H.

Uruguay's League of Catholic Women

In the year 1885, a tidal wave of hostility to religion swept over Uruguay. The lot of the Church had not been the happiest up to that time, for political bickerings and insurrectionary movements had kept the country in a turmoil; but still religion and its beneficent effects were recognized and Catholic children learned their catechism in the schools of the country. Then came the day when such a concession to the religious sentiment of the citizens was considered too great for the republic to grant. The republic, mark you, seems, by a pleasant little fiction not peculiar to Uruguay, to consist of a handful of law-makers who have succeeded by brain and brawn in establishing themselves at the capital, where they represent the majesty of power if not the will of the sovereign people. One of the woes of South America is that so many of her young men go abroad for their studies before they have reached that maturity of judgment and self-control which every youth needs when far from home and kindred, the consequence being that their receptive minds drink in lessons which are not precisely of asceticism and excessive devotion. Some rally from the experience while more remain in the slough into which they have been led or thrust. With false principles of life and a profound ignorance of much which it greatly concerns them to know, they return as leaders in Israel but not of the chosen people, against whom they so often wage relentless war. "The enemies of a man are those of his own household."

Such was the state of affairs at Montevideo in 1885, when a few women started an association with a paid up capital of five dollars and a great deal of determination to succeed. The League of Catholic Women has been celebrating its silver jubilee in this year of multiplied and miscellaneous celebrations of anniversaries. The humble beginning is remembered with gratitude to those who made it and for the way in which it has been favored by Providence. The League now conducts five academies of its own, besides financially assisting twenty-two others in different parts of Uruguay. In addition, it maintains sixteen sewing rooms, thirty-five catechetical associations, and five festive oratories. Particular attention is paid to catechetical instruction, especially where otherwise the children would be reared in ignorance of the law of God. The number of children prepared for first Holy Communion already reaches well up into the thousands. As the conferences of St. Vincent de Paul are very generally established in the republic, the League leaves to them their special field and devotes itself to other social works.

One of these works, which raised a howl of opposition at its inception, is the censorship of theatrical performances; yet it has been successful in banishing indecency from the theatres of Montevideo. "Theatrical enterprises which wish to make money in Montevideo must bring a decent repertoire," says the report for the current year, "but we do not presume to interfere with the liberty of others. If they wish to have improper plays, let them pay for them; we will not. For some people morality does not exist, either in the theatre or out of it; they do not recognize its name for they have never known it. If they would have a theatrical performance down to their own level, let them pay for it out of their own money and not with ours, for we live in quite another world and are contented to live there."

The ladies have not been finicky and squeamish in approving or condemning plays, for they have a list of upwards of two thousand that have successfully passed inspection. Requests for copies of this list are frequently received from similar associations elsewhere in South America, so the good work centered in Uruguay extends beyond its limits. At the outset, the censors were pooh-poohed and ridiculed, but when the sales of tickets fell off, the angered impressarios thought of having recourse to the courts with the intention of forcing the ladies to make good the loss; but as neither intimidation nor duress could be proven against the committee, the plaintiffs had no grounds for action.

Mindful of the words of Cardinal Sarto, Patriarch of Venice, now Pope Pius X, on the importance of the Catholic press, the League established committees in the various cities and towns of Uruguay, with the object of distributing good reading matter where it would not otherwise be found, and moreover (and this deserves special mention) of inducing Catholic families to subscribe for a weekly or a daily Catholic paper. Presumably, the way of the book agent or solicitor is about as flower-strewn in Uruguay as elsewhere, yet the fruits of the undertaking were a proof that it was timely, for every committee brought in subscribers varying in number from two to a hundred and fifty. It has been well said that the best means of continuing and strengthening in the home the work of the catechism class and of the Catholic school is the regular visit of the Catholic newspaper, from which the children, as they grow older, can gain that wider and fuller knowledge of Catholic faith and practice suited to their mental development.

Other sociological works have come in for a share of the attention of the Catholic Women's League of Uruguay; but those already mentioned may serve to inspire or to encourage some American woman who is able and willing to give some testimony to the faith that is in her. The children of some of our immigrants have so scanty a knowledge of their mother tongue that they cannot grasp religious instruction, even if their parents were qualified and disposed to give it, a condition which is by no means always verified, and those children will develop into adult foes of the Church or strangers to her unless means be taken to bring them to a knowledge of the truth which makes us free. David numbered Israel, but mere numbers without a corresponding knowledge count for little. Here is a field for a vast deal of active, organized missionary effort in behalf of those who have but baptism to distinguish them from the heathen of Asia and Africa.

H. J. SWIFT, S.J.

The Chinese National Assembly met for the first time October 3 at Peking. Its functions are purely advisory, but the edict establishing it, states that it is the foundation for a parliament. Its members are divided into eight classes, viz.: Fourteen members of the Imperial family, twelve hereditary nobles, Manchus and Chinese, fourteen hereditary nobles, Tibetan and Mohammedan, Six members selected from collateral relations of the Imperial house, thirty-two Peking officials of high rank, ten distinguished men of letters, ten selected from large land owners, one hundred members of provincial assemblies. The subjects of its discussions were to be revenue and expenditure and any other that the throne might authorize. Nevertheless, it had hardly met when it demanded the hastening of the real parliament. This has been granted. It is difficult to forecast the part China may be playing in the world twenty years hence.

Episcopalian Practice and Principle

Some three or four years ago an Episcopalian minister in Boston started a movement known as the "Emmanuel," from the name of the church of which he was rector. It was concerned with a certain method of healing, neither altogether new nor altogether satisfactory. It was called a movement because its promoters thought that if they could persuade the Episcopal Church to take the method up officially a revival of the apostolic gifts of healing might be seen amongst them, to the edification of their own people and the chagrin, no doubt, of the Roman. At the late Convention some proposed the institution of an office for anointing the sick, in connection with the method in question, and free from the Roman superstition that makes such anointing efficacious, not only for the cure of bodily ailments, but also for that extinction of sin which sickness calls for in an especial manner. The Convention refused very prudently to entertain the proposition; and it is noteworthy that both the clerical and the lay delegates of Massachusetts, the diocese in which the movement originated, voted against it. In California the method had been given a year's trial and had proved unsuccessful. In the voting its clerical delegates were divided; the lay delegates voted unanimously not to commit their Church to a scheme, the failure of which would be a foregone conclusion.

In practical matters Episcopalians do not lack perspicacity. When they come to things doctrinal their mental vision is too often dull. A certain Dr. Morrison objected to the official styling of the Bible, "The Word of God," on the ground that it would bring the Episcopal Church into conflict with "the best biblical scholarship." This caused a commotion, and it looked as if the Convention was going to vindicate the name at least, and perhaps to discipline the unorthodox clergyman. He, however, was able to restore it to its wonted inactivity. He said he had been misunderstood. He was quite willing to call the Holy Scriptures the Word of God, "taking this to be a sacred and reverent name for them, inasmuch as they contain all things necessary for salvation." With this the Convention was content. What Dr. Morrison deems to be "the best biblical scholarship" would probably be content with it too; for, after all, the things this considers necessary for salvation are very few, and so it would not be impeded in its pleasant occupation of tearing the Bible to pieces. But did Dr. Morrison's definition really satisfy the conscience of those who were up in arms against him? Does it express the tradition of the Episcopal Church? Is it a Christian definition? Once more we see the fatal readiness of the Episcopalian to compromise on words though these involve logically the sacrifice of a dogma he professes to hold dear.

One day we see some claiming the right to the name of Catholic: the next, we see others rejecting Catholic doctrine unrebuked. When will these good people see the falseness of their position? HENRY WOODS, S.J.

CORRESPONDENCE

From One of the Portuguese Jesuits

LISBON, PRISON OF LIMOEIRO, OCT. 17th, 1910.

DEAR BROTHER IN CHRIST, P. C.

I had never thought that it would fall to my lot to answer your birthday letter from the prison in which I now am, but God has wished it thus. Here I am, a captive for the love of God, and, thanks to His Holy Name, like all my brother captives I am filled with joy.

I cannot recount for you all that we have suffered; it would fill a good sized volume. Just a few words in order that you, and the others, to whose prayers we recommend ourselves, may have some little idea of what has befallen us.

On the morning of the 6th, we were suddenly surrounded at Barro, by soldiers of the cavalry! Imagine, if you can, the feelings of all when we saw the troops riding down on our house. We were immediately ordered to leave the house and start at once for Lisbon. Only a few minutes were allowed in order that each one might make up a little bundle of the things necessary for his private use.

Rev. Father Rector asked and obtained permission for one of the Fathers to remain in order to consume the sacred species. I myself remained with two others, who were sick, and some lay-brothers.

You cannot imagine the sorrow I felt when I saw my brothers, each with his little bundle in his hand, surrounded by soldiers, begin the march to Lisbon. On the following day I found out that they were in prison in the fortress of Caxias, where they are still prisoners. I have not seen them since, nor have I had any direct news from them.

The afternoon of the 6th, the doors of the house were sealed in my presence, and the windows were locked. What shame and sorrow we felt to remain in this fashion in our own house.

On the 7th, they came to take away those of us who remained. Father Gouveia was carried to the hospital, but the rest—there were eight of us—were conducted, well guarded by soldiers, to Lisbon. We were set down at Rocio, where amidst the insults and threats of the rabble we were incarcerated in the government prison.

What consolation we had on our entrance to find that we were in the same prison with Ours of the residence of Quelhas! There were, all told, twenty-three of us in a space that could hardly give decent accommodation to three. There were only three beds, and not a single sheet or blanket. The air which came in (and escaped) through two small openings, reeked with foulness, and the uncovered closets that were in the same room with us, made the stench almost unbearable.

During the night of the 12th, they brought us here to Limoeiro, where we are much better off. We number six from Barro, ten from Quelhas, five from the Campolide, four from Setubal. Fourteen Franciscans and Lazarists are our companions in captivity. We occupy a large hall, and each one has a straw pallet and a blanket. Our rations consist of a bowl of soup, which burns our mouths and tongues on account of the pepper in it, and a quarter of a loaf. We are allowed to buy something extra for the sick. At every moment we expect the "interrogatory visit" of the Minister of Justice, Affonso Costa. Being persecuted as Jesuits, we hide nothing, but confess openly that we belong to the Society of Jesus. And in this there have been heroic occurrences which will be written later.

We are sometimes favored by the visits of distinguished friends, who bring with them presents of food and other little things. They break down before us and weep like children, and it is we who have to comfort them. As yet we do not know what will be done with us. By a decree of the government we have been declared exiles, and all our goods are confiscated to the State.

There has just arrived at the prison a person of rank, who said to one of the Fathers: "I have just been interceding for you with the Minister of Justice, Affonso Costa, and he has promised to set you at liberty, provided you leave the Society of Jesus." The Father's answer was, "Exile rather than leave the Society!"

The same proposition was made to my brother and myself two days ago, but we gave the same answer. Thanks be to the Good God, who consoles us in all our tribulations.

Concerning the majority of Ours we have no news. We know that some from Barro and the Campolide are in the fortress, Caxias. Some of Ours from Setubo wandered for three days through the mountains. They had taken the Blessed Sacrament with them, and had Holy Communion each day. Father Ilhao, dressed only in shirt and trousers was for three days a fugitive. During that time he had nothing to eat; but he and the others were finally captured. All the authorities and public functionaries treat us with deference.

Good-bye. Pray God for all of us that no one may become weak in this hour of trial.

Yours in Christo,

FRANCIS RODRIGUES, S.J.

(Captive for Christ).

From the Wilds of Siberia

VLADIVOSTOK, EAST SIBERIA, OCT. 7, 1910.

Having elected to spend two of the summer months in Sidémi, we bade a cheerful au revoir, last July, to the fortress and entered into the wilds of Siberia. Siberia usually suggests either soldiers or wolves, or both, to the average human mind, said mind having been nurtured on a diet of "Michael Strogoff" in its mature infancy, and late writers and impressions being unable to efface the pictures of desperate circumstances which came in shoals from Jules Verne's pen.

As we steamed out of the bay of Valdivostok into that of Peter the Great, we were reminded not a little of the St. Lawrence as one follows it from Montreal to the open, save that for the rosary of little Canadian villages, each with its guardian church spire, are substituted great bunches of barracks and guns, with here and there two Byzantine church steeples, the whole in the keeping of various sentries, who must be made of nothing less than bronze to be able to support the heat and the cold of the coast. Yet in spite of all this embanked grimness, the bay itself, as far as one could see, tossed boats about, and spilled itself on shores just as do waters of sunnier climes when they have a mind to be happy or unruly.

The port is an active, busy one, once the snow melts, with passenger steamers, freight steamers, sand barges, Korean hay boats, Chinese fishing junks, cruisers, tugs. Even yachts are not wanting, for the yacht club being under the immediate patronage of the Czar, who encourages particularly a love for boating, is in a very flourishing condition. All of these we left behind, as the stately Volga steamed towards the hills. Stateliness and speed seem mutually uncongenial, for five hours passed before we dropped anchor in a lovely scythe-shaped bay. The mountains which are very steep, rise almost from the water's edge, though part of the beach was wide enough to accommodate two Korean huts and a bath-house lacking two sides, which was destined for our particular use. When we availed ourselves of this ruin, we found the water to be, first, so very salt, that it is almost impossible not to float, and second, the summer resort of sharks of a most peaceful and abstemious variety—perhaps it was that they did not know what they were missing—for with the foreigner's first splash they turned tail and headed for the open.

I should almost prefer a nip, a very small nip, of course, from one of them, than the slippery sensation of stepping barefooted on the huge jelly fish that float about these parts, most beautiful to look upon. Splendid aquamarines and pinks they are. The Chinese and Koreans consider them great delicacies, drying them, and, I suppose, calling them tapioca pudding when they are cooked. The trees that shadow the valleys and low lands are all young. Twenty-five years ago all the vegetation was sacrificed by the Chinese during the war, so every existing tree has grown up since that time.

There are just two Russian families on this particular peninsula in two summer homes. The other people one meets, driving oxen with loads of grass or leaves, or down on the shore setting nets, or "just sitting," like the old Kentucky farmer, are Koreans. They are Russian subjects, belonging to the Russian Church, their children go to a sort of primary school quite a distance across the bay; otherwise their customs, habits, dress, etc., are as in their native country. Theirs is the spirit of economy in its entirety—never does a dead horse, or dog or chicken go to waste. Is it blissful ignorance or simple trust which allows them to enjoy stews of the same, served in brass bowls on little carved stands, without the fear that it may work to their discomfort or death? "Ya Naznayon," which meaning, "I do not know," is a most useful phrase for a stranger in a strange land.

The Korean cowherds pass the house several times a day; there is one with a name which might have belonged to a man at arms of Joan of Arc, "Nérandois" and "Kudéry" is his little brother. Nérandois wears a bright orange kerchief tied round his head, his hair, inside of it, is gathered into a married man's top knot. Kudéry's is still braided and there is nothing to distinguish his head-dress from that of his little sister's. Kudéry is joyful, and sings queer little songs all day, as he drives his double team of oxen. Not so Nérandois, who is married and regrets the step. He is seventeen, and the little brown girl who carries his noon-day meal of fish in a jar on her head, is his wife, of the ripe age of thirteen. Neither of them wanted to get married, but her father needed money, she therefore being a bargain, his father bought her and tears availed not. One of the Russian ox-drivers pursues the even tenor of his way with an ear-ring in one ear. On inquiring the reason of this solitary use, I was told that a peasant on taking a bride, pierces her ears with a jab of an earring, and then presents her with a pair. Should the fair one be already thus decorated, she finds it her duty to pierce one of her lover's ears in the same original manner, which accounts for the loneliness of one side of the head.

There are plenty of islands about; some thickly wooded and mysterious to look upon; but if one paddles out to them at dusk, one will be greeted by the dull bark of sea-lions. It is nice to be able to look on sea-lions without giving a ticket to a man at a gate. In winter, if one really cares to, one may see tigers in the same free way. They are as large as the Bengal beasts, and when the winter is a hard one, are very bad and very bold. Then they come about huts. One will pick up a loose horse or cow, fling it carelessly over his shoulder and walk away with the "smile on the face of the tiger."

But the king of the woods in this part of Siberia is the deer. For him do the oxen pass up and down all day long carrying sweet, fresh grass and green leaves to the huge paddocks, where he is kept prisoner. In this particular park there are more than seventy-five. Others are allowed to roam unmolested till June, when a few are killed each year. All that is required of the captive ones is the annual sacrifice of their horns. The most perfect specimens are found on the island of Askold, not far from Vladivostok, the resort of a kind of hunting club. The Chinese hold that the blood found in these horns possesses an extraordinary something, capable of curing almost any disease and of rejuvenating persons suffering from old age. Therefore they are glad to pay two, three and four hundred roubles for one pair of horns. These are most valuable when they are young and tender, having one or two branches only. They are cut quite close to the roots, and are then plunged into boiling water, so as to harden without bursting them. The pretty creatures are a joy and a delight to the eye. Their color is a rather bright red, with white spots, and they have the melting eyes that belong to their race. One can hardly be reconciled to their imprisonment and disfigurement, no matter how worthy be the object of allowing decrepit Chinamen a few more pulls at their opium pipes. When they cry, as they are often moved to in the dead of night when everything should be at rest, as many songs and poems tell us, they have the voices of spoiled children—very spoiled ones—so that with the best of intentions, one cannot pity them for long at a time.

Otherwise this is a peaceful community. We were for a time threatened with a danger that might have been very unpleasant to say the least. The Hunhoosas, or Chinese pirates, have been very restless this year. They, like the tigers, are particularly fierce when severe winters make food scarce and business dull. Their chief frolic is to swoop down upon persons they think it would pay to take captive and hold for ransom, usually attacking a house at daybreak or at dusk. All our windows are barred with iron, and our doors bolted likewise. The government sent troops to the favorite points of attack and captured several of the ruffians, after they themselves had made eighteen prisoners, mostly Koreans. We were much edified one day at the sight of a detachment of cavalry galloping past with much éclat; but the search on our peninsula resulted only in the before-mentioned edification, and the capture of three Chinese opium smugglers. These were handed over to the Chinese authorities, who beheaded them. The Russian girls in our house were visibly disappointed in the result. One in particular had planned sacrificing herself as hostage, and lately had been examining the edibility of various berries and insects with a view to the possibility of being forced to live upon them. This really was unjust to the brigands, who return their victims in the pink of condition, provided the ransom is promptly paid, otherwise the prisoner is gradually damaged, a finger or an ear being removed from time to time. The possible visit of the pirates provided us with much food for speculation and plans of future greatness, but with nothing else.

Meanwhile the samovar sings; sweeter music a Russian knows not, and hot buns with chopped carrots and turnips and cabbages in their little insides await the serving of the steaming tea.

AN AMERICAN ABROAD.

Duez to Be Brought to Trial

PARIS, OCTOBER 27, 1910.

The notorious scandals brought to light in the investigation of the liquidation of the property of the religious orders by Duez are once more matter of public talk. It appeared for a time, despite the popular indignation aroused by their first revelation, that they would be dealt with as so many other lapses from grace have been dealt with by the ruling powers of France—that they would be quietly forgotten for the good of the cause. Just of late, however, word is spread that Duez is to be brought to trial for his misdeeds. The first report made no mention of the tribunal before which the prosecution would come,—whether the civil or the criminal courts were to take cognizance of the matter. Duez, it is said, has used every endeavor to avoid a criminal process, going so far as to retract the confession made in the beginning that he had stolen a million and a half whilst acting as agent of the official originally charged with the liquidation. M. Imbert, the public prosecutor has not heeded this action and Duez will be criminally tried on this and other indictments.

The present report has it that he will be called to answer for false valuations in his work, for thefts committed in administering the property of the Congregations, for betrayal of confidence in the liquidation processes, and finally for presenting false expense vouchers and for unjustly magnifying real expenses incurred whilst doing the work with which he was entrusted. There is, too, mention made of a false affidavit presented in connection with his accounting for the estate of the Oratorians. Duez's agent and accomplice, Martin Gantier, is held on practically like counts, and in addition is to answer for the seizure of documents of value which disappeared from his possession. As is well known, the Liberal press has all along affirmed that Duez had acted in full understanding with the heads of religious houses in the criminal deeds charged against him, and that these heads, having enabled him to deceive the Government, were guilty accomplices in his wrong-doing. No word of this appears in the process now prepared against him by the judges, and the liberal calumniators of the fearfully-wronged religious are thus put to shame by those of their own household. The calumny had been rejected from the start by fair-minded Frenchmen as too obviously coined to protect the carelessness of men responsible for the scandals. Those accountable for the silly story are of a like honorable stripe as the lovers of liberty, who spread the report that religious had used their convents and monasteries as vantage points from which to shoot down the people in the streets of Lisbon. Anti-clericalism is everywhere ready to use the weapon of lies and calumny.

K. V. Z.

A M E R I C A

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1910.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1910, and published weekly by The America Press, New York, President, THOMAS J. CAMPBELL; Secretary, MICHAEL J. O'CONNOR; Treasurer, J. J. WILLIAMS.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Sq., W., New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

The Dungeons of Campolide

Mr. Lionel James, special correspondent of the London Times, writes from Lisbon to his journal contradicting the Archbishop of Westminster whose statement in the matter we quoted last week. He asserts the existence of subterranean crypts the Archbishop did not see. He thinks to strengthen his position with the testimony of no less a person than the notorious minister, Senhor Affonso Costa, who authorizes him to proclaim to the world that there are subterranean works in the College of Campolide.

The London Tablet tells us that outside the foundations of the college there are subterranean structures sufficient to vindicate the literal veracity of the minister, who affirms only the existence of such, though he implies the accuracy of Mr. James' statements. Subterranean structures are not necessarily "passages, crypts and caches that would have done credit to the Bastille;" and the Tablet explains their harmless nature at Campolide as follows: "At the lower end of the college was a hollow, whence stone had been quarried for the building. This was filled, partly by a cistern to supply the baths of the establishment, partly by wells furnishing drinking water, by stairs for the descent of workmen to execute necessary repairs and by arches forming receptacles for fuel, carts, old timber and other lumber. Over the whole was a flower garden with a trap door giving access to the stairways above mentioned." "En vérité il y a des souterrains," says Senhor Affonso Costa.

Should Mr. James ever have the opportunity of going through the Jesuit Novitiate at Florissant, Missouri, as he went through the College of Campolide—we hope he never will, but the thing is not absolutely impossible—he will find what will fill his mind with unholy thoughts such as now possess it. There also, "en vérité il y a des souterrains." There is the underground structure, the garden over it, the trap door. The fact is that the water at Florissant is bad and in the space between the buildings there is a large underground cistern in which the rainfall is collected.

Canalejas and the Religious

The proposed measure of Premier Canalejas, which, "by the advice of the cabinet and with the consent of the King," he has laid before the Cortes for legislative action, is not sufficiently drastic to suit the radical element among his supporters. How long will it take him to learn that he is engaged in feeding a fire which will never say "Enough?" He drafted the proposed law as a peace-offering to the more rabid of his followers, and, lo! they rave the more. As the law has stood since 1887, religious associations had but to present to the provincial governor their articles of incorporation and all was done. The law did not make incorporation obligatory; in fact, no word was said about including religious Orders in its provisions, and no attempt was made to enforce it against them.

Señor Canalejas now wishes to oblige all "associations" to observe the law and, at the same time he wishes so to modify it that religious may not be able to secure governmental recognition. His proposal is that, until such a time as the Cortes shall have passed a new law relative to the right of association, the provincial governors shall refuse to accept for recording any documents relating to religious foundations, unless the parties concerned shall have first obtained the authorization of the Minister of Grace and Justice, which authorization he is not to grant if more than one-third of the persons who are to form the new association are foreigners. Under the law of 1887, the governors had no discretionary powers. Their duty was to receive and register the articles of incorporation; if they thought the association dangerous to the kingdom, it was their duty to denounce it to the judicial power, but there their responsibility ended.

The projected measure has quite a different scope. In the first place, as will be remarked, all is in the hands of the Minister of Grace and Justice. If he withhold his consent, no incorporation is possible; if he were disposed to grant the application, he may not do so in favor of foreigners. Such is the famous "padlock law" of the President of the Council; it has been considered by the cabinet and has been introduced with the King's permission. The measure has passed the Senate, where trouble was anticipated, and is sure of success in the House.

In their treatment of King Amadeo, the Spaniards showed that they knew how to make things unpleasant without any recourse to violence, for they simply remained away from the palace when royal functions were to be graced by the presence of the great men of the kingdom. The mob in Huesca hurrahing for the republic as soon as word of the uprising in Portugal reached them, must have helped to open the eyes of the premier, just as the dignified and orderly protests of the genuine Catholics against his priest-baiting policy ought to have told him that he is treading on dangerous ground. Will he heed the warnings?

The Voice of the People

That public officials are but the servants of the sovereign people is a saying that passes current throughout the Republic. Men are chosen in one way or another to perform certain functions in the interests of the commonwealth and they are answerable to the sovereign people for the manner in which they discharge the trust committed to them. And since there is room for great diversity of opinion in matters purely political and economic, it is supposed that the majority of the qualified voters shall determine at the polls the course of action that their servants, the successful candidates, shall follow. This is a pretty conceit, imparting much comfort and arousing much self-satisfaction in the manly bosom of each unit of the aforesaid sovereign people, but in stern reality it may be as destitute of solid foundation as the froth and foam that perch so jauntily on the crest of a wave.

While the Constitutional Convention of Colorado was sitting, numerous signed petitions appeared with the prayer that a provision for equal suffrage should be introduced into the Organic Law of the Centennial State; but the members of the Convention, not wishing to risk the rejection of the whole Constitution by the introduction of a possibly unpopular provision, soothed their petitioners and satisfied themselves by inserting an order for a special election, to be held after the adoption of the Constitution, for the purpose of settling the question. The election was duly held, but attracted so little attention that, though female suffrage was adopted by a comfortable majority of the votes actually cast, it did not have in its favor a majority of the voting strength of the State.

How is this anomaly to be explained? Most simply, as in similar cases elsewhere. The ease-loving voters and fair weather patriots, who spend so much of their valuable time in denouncing the corruption of politics and the wickedness of politicians, shirk the herculean labor of expressing their will at the polls on election day. There are people of dignified leisure and Buddha-like repose who are too inert and sluggish to cast a vote for a friend and benefactor when his interests are vitally concerned with the outcome of the battle of ballots, much less do they bestir themselves when a trifle such as the fate of an amendment to the Constitution is to be decided. Where a projected change in the Constitution brings out only thirty per cent. of the voting strength of the State, as happens in Colorado, it follows that a few resourceful and designing men can saddle on that State any piece of freakishness in whose favor the votes of sixteen out of every hundred voters can be begged or borrowed or bought. And this, if the election be "fair," that is, without violence or intimidation or false ballots.

This consideration may help us to understand how measures may be carried in countries where the people have been accustomed for generations to have no voice in the government and where the suffrage, such as it is, is a novelty. When President Santa Ana, of Mexico, ordered a general election to decide freely whether he was to continue to exercise dictatorial powers, he provided each voting place with two books, one labeled "No" and the other, "Yes." The voters had but to inscribe their names. Lest any harm should befall the precious books, armed soldiers were appointed to guard them. A handsome majority freely voted that Santa Ana's extraordinary powers should continue. The people had spoken. So, in all probability, will the sovereign people of Portugal speak.

Liberia's Dream

The willingness of the United States to undertake the part of counselor in Liberian fiscal affairs has aroused roseate visions in the African republic, for its citizens see in the action of our Government the first steps towards a great and influential State, which shall be the rallying point of enlightened and progressive negroes from other parts of Africa, and even from all parts of the world. Liberia is harried by grasping neighbors. Great Britain, France and Germany have long viewed its territory as eminently desirable if scientifically carved and judiciously apportioned; that is to say, if Liberia is unable to stand alone, they are ready to hold it up. Now, in spite of its political and economic miseries, Liberia is not anxious to be held up, in any sense, by its European acquaintances. When it undertook to employ some English assistants, France at once requested that some Frenchmen should also be employed, and at the same not meagre salary. Thus the merry game went on.

Feeling that the United States does not covet its territory, Liberia hopes to receive so great an impetus towards intelligent self-government that its success may work a radical change in the colonial policy pursued by European Governments in Africa, where little inclination has thus far been shown to admit the enlightened part of the native population to any political privileges. For ourselves, we are satisfied that to confine the suffrage to men who have seen their twenty-first birthday, is quite as arbitrary as to confer the ballot on grounds of complexion, for many a youth of twenty has a better understanding of public affairs than many an adult of twice or thrice his age. But if there should be a grand exodus of dissatisfied blacks from African colonies to Liberia and the polling booth, we have our misgivings about the happy results that might follow.

At present, Liberia's voting population is small. How could that country admit and properly assimilate an army hankering after political power, which it has never practically grasped? Manifestly, there would spring into existence a kingship or a reign of "bossism," that would make Liberia's confusion worse confounded. We see no mighty State in the future of Liberia, and we hope that, for the sake of its citizens, there will be no prodigious influx of discontented souls in search of a political paradise.

Revolution and Religion

The revolutionists in Portugal are walking in the footsteps of their masters. We read that somebody arranged a funeral service for those who fell in the streets of Lisbon and invited the Government to send representatives to it. This Senhor Braga refused to do, on the ground that the new republic must be neutral with regard to religion. Up to the present moment it has dissembled its neutrality, like the gentleman who dissembled his love in order to enjoy the pleasure of kicking the beloved one downstairs. But letting that pass, one may say that the reasons of that obligation are by no means clear. The Portuguese are Catholics, and for their new rulers to stay away from Mass because they must be neutral regarding religion, which means, of course, regarding all religions, is about as sensible as it would be for an American to refuse to come down to his American breakfast because he must hold a neutral attitude towards English jam and marmalade, French café-au-lait and the chota-hazri of Hindustan.

So, too, it is with the Portuguese revolutionists. They refused to go to the funeral service, not because they have to be neutral with regard to all religions, but because they hate everything that goes by the name of the Christian religion, and most of all the Catholic religion, which is Christianity itself.

This is incontrovertible. Should any one feel inclined to dispute it, he would change his mind on reading the latest news from Portugal. The Government, so delicate in its neutral conscience when there was question of going to Mass, is preparing a Marriage, or rather an Unmarrying Bill, providing for divorce by mutual consent!

Two Kinds of Republics

New York has watched with interest the steady growth in influence and importance of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, from the early efforts of the Taylor Johnson mansion, in West Fourteenth street, to its present magnificent proportions in Central Park. The recent exhibition, which coincided with the appointment of Dr. Edward Robinson, as Director of the Museum, ought to draw the attention of the world to the way art is treated by our own Republic and those abroad. Among the rarest gifts to the Museum is one from Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan. It is a monumental altar piece.

"The Assumption of the Virgin," by Benvenuto di Giovanni. It bears, with the signature of the artist, the date 1498, and was at one time in the Church of the Convent, in Grancia, province of Grosseto, Italy. It has been placed in a small room dedicated to Italian primitives and has almost a whole wall to itself, so important is it considered by the curator of paintings. It depicts the Blessed Virgin seated with hands folded, while about her float a company of angels and cherubs. Above is the figure of Christ and below kneels St. Thomas, receiving the girdle. At the bottom of the figure is a quaintly painted landscape, which serves as a background for St. Thomas, St. Francis and St. Anthony of Padua, who kneel near a sarcophagus filled with growing flowers. The whole breathes a spirit of beauty and reverence, and plainly indicates how true devotion was the inspiration of the artist.

Another important addition to the primitive paintings is an altar piece by Taddeo Gaddi, which was purchased with the income from the Rogers fund. The central panel contains figures of Christ and the Blessed Virgin Mary. In the right hand panels stand St. James with his pilgrim's staff, St. Stephen bearing a palm, John the Baptist with the cross and St. Lawrence clothed as a deacon and bearing the emblem of his martyrdom. It is believed Taddeo Gaddi, who died in 1366, painted this work toward the close of his life.

Almost at the very moment these examples of Catholic art were being placed in positions of honor in the chief city of our republic, something else was occurring in the capital of the newest "republic"—the republic supposed to be the efflorescence of modern progress; the "epoch of austere morality and impartial justice" the production of Theophilo Braga, described in the Independent of October 20 as, "poet scholar, philosopher," and his associates, to whom it says "must be assigned the chief credit for awakening Portugal to a consciousness of her national entity in history and in art." We shall allow Mr. Perceval Phillips, the special correspondent of the London Daily Express, to describe it.

"A gigantic negro, barefooted and wearing a priest's biretta on his head, and armed with a cavalry sabre and a long butcher's knife," he writes, "was prising up the side of the altar slab searching for jewelled relics. Two grimy revolutionaries wrapped in gold-cloth copes danced in the choir singing the 'Marseillaise,' while another mocked the intoning of the priests. Another gang smashed the high gilt reredos and baldacchino behind the high altar with hammers and axes. A naval petty officer, blood-stained and with a bandaged head, called three pillagers to assist him as he savagely wrenched out the pulpit, hoping to find secret treasure. Life-size statues were thrown down and broken. A sailor handed his rifle to a companion and tried to wrench off the silk curtains of the tabernacle on the high altar. Republican mottoes were scrawled on the walls in chalk. The organ was ruined. A grimy artilleryman tried to play an accompaniment to a ribald song, and smashed the keys in disgust when he failed."

The special correspondent of the London Daily News confirms the above as follows:

"I witnessed some almost incredible scenes of looting and senseless destruction of church property at Lisbon yesterday (Saturday), when soldiers and sailors, intoxicated with four days of freedom, suddenly realized their strength, threw off all pretense of discipline and plunged into wild excesses.

"With drunken revolutionists dancing the Marseillaise on the altars of ruined churches, gangs of patriots, armed with rifles, knives, bludgeons, even immense hammers and pickaxes, as weapons of defence, were engaged in sacking convents and hunting the fugitive priests."

Here are two pictures of republicanism, the Braga-Ferrer "scientific, philosopher" brand, and the old-fashioned God-fearing Christian variety. They can be left to speak for themselves to sober, thinking American minds.

LITERATURE

The Catholic Encyclopedia. An International Work of Reference on the Constitution, Doctrine, Discipline and History of the Catholic Church. In Fifteen Volumes. Volumes VIII and IX. New York: Robert Appleton Company.

This great Catholic literary enterprise is progressing with such rapidity that the ninth volume is upon us before we found opportunity to publish our appreciation of its predecessor. There is no evidence, however, of the shortcomings that usually accompany rapidity of production. On the contrary there is a manifest mastery of technical details, the result of experience, acquired by the editorial staff in successfully coping with the initial difficulties incidental to so vast an undertaking. The machinery is running smoothly and it is now assured that the fifteen volumes of this monumental work will be completed before the date originally set.

The first thing that will strike the student of the Encyclopedia is its attractiveness. The illustrations are numerous, artistic and appropriate, and the clear cut divisions and sub-divisions enable the reader to find at once any phase of a subject he is interested in. The maps of Volume VIII, notably the map of Christendom under Innocent III, the colored illustrations and the reproductions of the great masters in Volume IX, and the numerous cuts that adorn almost every page have an artistic and illustrative value which, we believe, no similar work has hitherto attained.

In scanning the pages one is impressed with its broad and genuine Catholicity, in character, contents and contributions. There is no sphere of human activities, mental, manual or moral, that the Catholic Church has not influenced, and it is the highest praise of the Encyclopedia that every phase of that influence is reflected in its pages. Its scope goes back of the Christian era through the long lines of biblical and secular history to the cradle of mankind, and back even of that to the dawn of creation and the physical formation of the universe. Its list of several hundred contributors and the title of their subjects—scientific, biographic, philosophic, biological, theological, geographical, historical, ascetic, artistic, educational, social, juridical—make an instructive and interesting study. From China to Peru, from the Bahamas to the Philippines, from Australia to Alaska, every land and interest is represented, and with an impartiality and an adequacy of scholarship that has astounded non-Catholic critics and surprised even Catholics themselves. Not the least service of the Encyclopedia's editors is to have awakened Catholics to a proper conceit of their capacities and stimulate them to further achievement.

The countries that bulk largest in Volume VIII (titles extending from Infamy to Lapparent) are Ireland, Italy and Japan. There is an excellent summary of the history of Ireland by Father D'Alton; of the Irish in the United States by Peter Condon; in Canada by Father Devine, S.J.; in Australia and South America by T. F. Meehan; in England by D. M. O'Connor, and in South Africa by A. H. Atteridge.

The influx of Irish soldiers on the Continent of Europe appears to have been ignored, but the story of the Irish Colleges that were established in various European centres to educate the Irish priesthood in the days of persecution, and of the numerous martyrs and confessors of the period, is adequately rendered. Dr. Douglas Hyde's treatment of early Irish Literature is admirable, but his sketch of the more modern period is less satisfactory. A Protestant, however sympathetic, can scarcely be deemed capable of doing justice to Catholic Literature. He is naturally better acquainted with writers of his own persuasion, and hence we find some of the greatest Catholic names omitted and some included that have no place in Catholic and little in any literature. Of the thirteen photographic illustrations there are only three of Catholic authors. Many Irishmen are treated elsewhere, under separate titles, but we miss one of the greatest, Geoffrey Keating, historian, poet, orator, confessor and the classic writer of modern Gaelic.

The articles on Italy, Japan and Jerusalem form a good subject of comparison with other encyclopedias. Even excluding the religious view-point, on which a correct appraisal of their history and character is largely dependent, we can safely affirm that in the extent, variety and accuracy of their secular information, these and similar articles are preeminent. The same may be said of Dr. Ganns' Luther and Liszt, of Goyau's Von Ketteler, Archbishop Farley's John McCloskey, Father Thurston's Joan of Arc, Dr. Turner's Kant and Leibnitz, and of the numerous important biographies, Leo X excepted, that come under the names of John, Leo and Louis. Purely theological and religious subjects may be expected to be exceptionally well treated, and of these Father Maas' Jesus and the liturgical articles are fine examples, but under names included in all books of reference, such as Law, Labor, Logic, Marriage, it is interesting to notice the decided superiority of writers whose faith and training give them certainty and definiteness of view.

Louisiana and Maryland, the two States that most abound in Catholic interest, receive adequate treatment in Volume IX, though we think Professor Fortier's view of the heroism of the five Voltairian conspirators of New Orleans and of the cruelty of the Spanish Governor who had them executed is not sustained by history. Of other excellent articles we may mention Know-Nothingism, Manuscripts, The Mass, Masonry, and History of Philosophy. Satisfactory accounts of Dr. Lueger and Père du Lac, who died within the year, show that the editors are up to date. In a work of such vast and varied scope occasional flaws are inevitable, but, taking a general view, these volumes must be pronounced, like their predecessors, a credit to the Encyclopedia staff and a revelation of the range, quality and readiness of Catholic scholarship.

M. K.

Whirligigs. By O. HENRY. New York: Doubleday, Page & Company. Price, $1.20.

This is the first of two volumes of his short stories which remained unpublished at the time of the author's death. The selection of tales for the present volume, we are told by the publishers, was almost the last literary labor of O. Henry. Whilst this circumstance gives a certain pathetic interest to "Whirligigs," calculated to moderate a critic's sensitiveness to defects, it need not operate to such purpose on the present occasion. "Whirligigs" shows a distinct improvement in tone and workmanship over preceding books by the same author. The wit and humor of O. Henry were always undeniable qualities; but they were too often of a curb-stone variety and exercised on unworthy subjects, showing a preference for the aimless and rather banal fun and crude color of Puck over the less obvious and more artistic comedy of Punch at its best. One received the impression that O. Henry was a "self-made" writer starting without traditions or respect for them, and merely yielding to native joyousness and power of narrative for the delectation of himself and of all and sundry. His originality could always command admiration of a sort.

In "Whirligigs" the author endeavors to consult literary values and to raise the style of his performance to levels where it will come within the scope of literature. The ideas which he uses to furnish anatomy for his stories are less frequently bizarre, sentimental and melodramatic, and more often true to life and vigorous in their sanity. This fastidiousness of thought has a beneficial effect upon his manner. He is not at such pains to cover his real purpose under a flaunting and pretended ridicule of his own tears. It behooves a person weeping over cheap melodrama to conceal the fact.

The way an old device of the class-room can be turned into something wonderful by original talent is strikingly illustrated in "The Roads We Take." It is a triumph of skill. Another triumph is the story, "The Theory and the Hound." It was written merely to prove that a man who is overfond of horses and dogs is always cruel to women; but it is not every writer who can convey an obvious moral with so little damage to his art and interest. "Calloway's Code" should long remain as a classic satire on newspapers. Less telling pieces of satire—both of them on types of current fiction—are "A Little Local Color" and "Tommy's Burglar." Occasionally O. Henry descends to such things as: "'Dolce Far Niente'—that's what they called the place; and it was an improvement on dolce Far Rockaway, I can tell you." This is in his early manner, which the present volume encourages us to think he would have discarded if days had been granted him. On the whole, "Whirligigs" makes us regret his early death more than any of the stories from his pen which we have seen hitherto.

J. J. D., S.J.

Jesus is Waiting. BY MATTHEW RUSSELL, S.J. London: Burns & Oates. New York: Benziger Bros. Price 75 cents.

The art of Father Russell excites our admiration. So far as we are aware it has no counterpart among English writers on religious devotion. It is restful, with the conscious security of Faith, and at the same time fully alive to all the shades of current error and disbelief. It has the mellow tone of contented maturity, yet does not want the impulses and yearnings of youth. With adoration at its heart and prayer on its lips, it is still reminiscent of a world that misdirects its adoration and never prays. But the consciousness of Divine frustration permitted to wandering free wills does not make Father Russell's art sour, bitter or cynical. Meditation on human sin and folly may turn an apostle into a Savonarola or a Francis of Sales. If one can shame sin by confronting it with the sweetness and beauty of virtue, one is apt to be more effective than by flaying it with the scorpions of wrath. Father Russell's art is alive to the difference and the advantage; and, whether from conscious purpose or, as we are feign to believe, from a natural and spontaneous inclination, it has always proceeded on the principle that every religious writer, especially on devotional subjects, need not and should not stop to argue and discuss. It uses its familiarity with the world, obtained from wide reading and ripe experience, to give point and illustration to its statements of the truth or to its gentle admonitions. Otherwise it preserves a monastic aloofness from the clash and cross-purposes of doubt and unbelief, and in the serenity of divine Faith concentrates all its resources upon showing the attractiveness as well as the need of Catholic truth to minds and hearts.

We are moved to make these observations by the appearance of Father Russell's latest book. As the title of it indicates, it occupies itself chiefly in calling the attention of Catholics to the rich Treasure they possess in the Divine Presence in the Tabernacle, and the unutterable loss and ingratitude involved in forgetting and neglecting our "Prisoner of Love." This single theme lends itself, under the author's pen, to a fascinating variety of treatment, as one can conjecture at the very start by going over the headings of the chapters. Some of them are: "Jesus is Waiting;" "The Blessed Sacrament in the Bible;" "Benediction;" "The Great Grace of Daily Mass;" "Visits of a Religious to the Domestic Chapel;" "Prayers at a Visit," etc.

It is a characteristic of Father Russell's art that he does not adopt the academic and impersonal style in his books. He is a teacher, but not a pedagogue. He takes us into his confidence, a friend among friends; and, whenever his subject permits him, he draws from his own experiences, or those of persons he has known, rare facts and delightful reminiscences that fix his particular counsel or suggestion in our memories forever. And here we cannot but stop to envy the good fortune of Father Russell in the number and quality of his friendships. Perhaps, after all, as in the case of books, we find in our friends only what we bring to them; and Father Russell's enviable record in this respect may be only a tribute to his own personal qualities. No one can deny that he has made excellent and practical use of what is in itself a genuine pleasure; for the biographical fragments scattered through his text afford so many concrete and forceful illustrations of his teaching. In the present volume, which he dedicates to the late Sister Mary Francis of the Blessed Sacrament—formerly the Hon. Mrs. O'Hagan—he devotes the last pages to a brief sketch of that gifted woman's life.

Before we close our notice of this little book we ought to make a slight reference to its usefulness as an anthology in verse of the Eucharistic devotion. Father Russell is an industrious and judicious gleaner, and many an exquisite flower of verse might continue to blush unseen in the ancient files of an obscure magazine had not Father Russell drawn it from obscurity and given it the sunshine of his charming pages.

Just now when the Eucharistic Congresses are annual expressions on a large scale of the Church's renewed fervor in devotion to the Blessed Sacrament, Father Russell's latest book is especially appropriate. Among the many excellent volumes that are appearing to mark one of the most wonderful revivals of Catholic spirit in the history of the Church, it ought to occupy, if not a place of pretentious prominence, at least a very serviceable and popular position on the shelf of our devotional literature.

J. J. D., S.J.

Hosanna, a Catholic Hymn Book; Organ Accompaniment to the "Hosanna." By LUDWIG BONVIN, S.J. St. Louis, Mo.: B. Herder.

"Hosanna" is almost entirely a new book, though listed as the sixth edition of "Psallite," a hymnal edited in 1901 by Alexander Roesler, S.J. The latter work has undergone such thorough revision that comparatively little remains of the original. Many of its melodies have been retained, though even these have received additions and emendations. "Hosanna" contains in all 188 numbers, twenty more than the "Psallite." In its present form the hymn book is a choice collection of Catholic hymns with appropriate music adapted for use in our churches, schools and religious communities. Upon the text or wording the author has bestowed great care to embody sound Catholic thought and sentiment, excluding all verbiage or meaningless phrases. Many of the selections are genuinely poetical, and few sink to the level of mediocrity.

An important feature, often greatly lacking in existing books of the kind, is this, that the texts are really adapted to the melody and rhythm, with the accents, pauses and caesuras placed naturally and properly in all the stanzas. Without any violence to text or melody, the language throughout is dignified and appropriate.

As to the musical quality of the hymns, it is worthy of note that the hymnal contains some of the most beautiful hymns, used by the Catholic Church since the twelfth century. There is no trace of trashy or unchurchly music in any of the pieces. An appendix of approved prayers and devotions has been added to the musical part of the book.

The organ accompaniment is of that high grade of merit which we might expect from the hand of a composer whose name is so well known in the musical world.

PETER W. LEONARD, S.J.

The Princess of Poverty: St. Clare of Assisi. By Very Rev. Fr. MARIANUS FIEGE, O. M. Cap.

Since there exists such a great and ever-growing interest in Franciscan literature it is not surprising that the publication of a life of St. Clare by such an eminent authority as Fr. Paschal Robinson, O.F.M., should be looked upon as a notable literary event, and tend to bring into fresh prominence the modest and retiring figure of "our holy mother St. Clare." It is a natural consequence that her former biographers should come in for a share of attention, and their merits and defects be discussed and canvassed.

Under those circumstances it is strange that, while others have been mentioned, no one should, apparently, remember Very Rev. F. Marianus Fiege's life of St. Clare, published only ten years ago. A work which presents to the English-speaking public every authentic source of information accessible on the subject. Those sources are enumerated and described by Fr. Robinson in his article, "The Story of St. Clare" (Ecclesiastical Review, February, 1910, Philadelphia).

Father Marianus thus modestly speaks of his work in the preface: "In looking over the material at my disposal and consulting various modern works written on this subject, I was confronted with a difficulty which for a while caused me to be at a loss how to treat the work. My original intention was to present to the reader a complete and connected history of the saint's life and of her Order. But I finally abandoned this idea. For I found that the different lives that I had read were all based upon an ancient biography of St. Clare written shortly after her death by order of Pope Alexander IV, the same Pope who also canonized her. Hence, instead of constantly referring to this authentic record, as other authors have done, I thought it more advisable to give a faithful translation of the same. The original Latin text which I have followed is the one given by the Bollandists, whose well-known painstaking care is a sufficient guarantee for its authenticity."

BROTHER ANTHONY DILLON, Tertiary of St. Francis.

A Brief Grammar of the Portuguese Language, with Exercises and Vocabularies. By JOHN C. BRANNER, Ph.D., LL.D. New York: Henry Holt & Co.

The advantage that European merchants have over American competitors in the Latin-American market is due in no small degree to the fact that the former maintain resident agents or representatives in America, who learn the language and wants of the country in which they are established. Throughout the vast republic of Brazil the language spoken is Portuguese, and the same will be true when the population shall have increased ten hundredfold in that land of untold mineral and vegetable wealth. Professor Branner has lent valuable aid to our exporters by bringing within reasonable compass all that is needed to acquire a fair conversational knowledge of the language of those producers who, for years to come, will have to look beyond the confines of their own country for the manufactured articles that they need in their work of development. The grammatical rules are succinctly given and well illustrated; the exercises on the rules are to the purpose. Some gems are conspicuously absent, as, "Are you brushing the hat of the son-in-law of your uncle? No, I am tying the strings of the bonnet of my grandmother." He seems to have kept in mind the adage which he sets down: To speak without thinking is to shoot without aiming. Whoever will take the trouble to give a short quarter of an hour a day to this meaty little volume will soon find himself in a position to enjoy the treasures of Portuguese literature, too few of which have been reproduced in English. * * *

The Adventures of Two Ants. Told by NANNY HAMMARSTRÖM, from the Swedish by A. E. B. FRIES. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Co.

Endowed with the power of speech for the benefit of two little children, Miss Rufa Ant gives them a thrilling account of her life from infancy to mature age. The charming story is told as only mothers can tell stories, and into it is introduced in a chatty way a great deal about ant life, which has the double advantage of being in keeping with fact and as delightful as a fairy tale. The book is plentifully supplied with illustrations, that on page 20 being notably "human." The author has very happily combined instruction and pleasure for children small and big. * * *

Highways and Byways of the Rocky Mountains. Written and Illustrated by CLIFTON JOHNSON. New York: The Macmillan Company. $2.00 net.

Here we have variety enough for all tastes, for though the mountains from Montana to New Mexico take up the greater portion of the book, some of its most pleasing chapters tell of the great plains that skirt the Rockies. The "civilized tribes" of Oklahoma, the Pueblo Indians of New Mexico, miners and Mormons, oil wells and old settlers furnish Mr. Johnson with an abundance of local color which his pen and his camera have combined to spread before us. Some seventy photo-engravings are generously scattered through the book. * * *

Spiritual Counsels of Fénelon. Selected by LADY AMABEL KERR. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net, 45 cents.

The high spirituality and tender piety of the illustrious prelate from whose correspondence these "Counsels" have been culled were recognized and revered in France at a time when courtliness was more common than religious fervor. This selection from his writings consists of a number of short chapters on the service of God, any one of which, though only of fifty or sixty lines, will furnish abundant matter for profitable reflection. "How to Pray," "God's Hidden Ways," "Spiritual Reading" and "The Secret of True Peace" are some of the suggestive titles. * * *

Los Martires de Uganda. Por un PADRE DE LA COMPAÑIA DE JESUS. St. Louis: B. Herder.

This number of "Desde Lejanas Tierras" takes us to Africa and describes the customs of the savages on the shores of the Victoria-Nyanza, where the first converts were put to death by the superstitious king. An interesting story is woven into the historical part, which in itself is sufficiently stirring. Six full-page engravings picture the most striking scenes of the text. This little volume is the twenty-fifth of the series, whose object is to make the missions of the Church better known and appreciated among the Spanish-speaking faithful. * * *

BOOKS RECEIVED

- Memories and Impressions of Helena Modjeska. An Autobiography. Illustrated. New York: The Macmillan Co. Net $4.00.
- A Brief Grammar of the Portuguese Language. With Exercises and Vocabularies. By John C. Banner, Ph.D., LL.D. New York: Henry Holt & Co.
- Voices From Erin and other Poems. By Denis A. McCarthy. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. Net $1.00.
- The Cost of a Crown. By Robert Hugh Benson. New York: Longmans, Green & Co.
- French Publications:*
- L'Heure Du Matin. Ou Meditations Sacerdotales. Revue et Considerablement Augmentée. Par l'Abbé J. B. Gros. l'Abbé E. Dunhac. Chanoine Honoraire de Pamiers. Paris: P. Téqui, 82 Rue Bonaparte. Net 6 francs. Two volumes.
- Dieu. Son existence et sa nature. Par l'Abbé Broussolle. Paris: P. Téqui.
- Jeunesse et Pureté. Par l'Abbé Henri Morice. Paris: P. Téqui.
- La Loi D'Age. Pour La Première Communion. Par l'Abbé F. Sibeud. Paris: P. Téqui.

EDUCATION

The Educational Review for the current month gives place of honor to an article which deserves attentive reading from all who are interested in the question of state control of education in this country. The writer, Mr. C. P. Cary, is State Superintendent of Schools in Wisconsin, and having, from his position, excellent opportunity to know the good and evil existing in one of the best institutions of the kind of the country, his paper describing some unfortunate tendencies among state universities should possess a distinct value. Mr. Cary finds three characteristic features of development in our state universities, which he deprecates as unfortunate. These are: a tendency to unwise expansion, to exaggerate graduate and research work, and the growing disposition of state universities to take themselves too seriously as leaders. The unwise expansion leading to a readiness "to offer instruction in anything under the sun that anybody wants to study" is a sort of automatic acting arrangement, says Mr. Cary, largely imitative of older and better developed institutions, which grow out of no actual need of these schools in the university.

It is rather an unseemly spirit of rivalry which urges those in authority to attempt to keep pace with what is done in the institution "over the state line," or the endowed institution that is equipped financially and otherwise for prudent and useful growth in the courses it offers. Mr. Cary makes the claim, too, that a good deal of evil comes from the evident inclination to exaggerate the importance of graduate and research work in state universities. He is not in accord with the cry that "it is impossible to have good teaching in a college if there is not a large and growing amount of original research in a school above the college." Naturally one agrees with his contention, realizing as one must that the purposes of a graduate school and of a college are very different, the methods are different, the ideals and spirit are different.

The trend to research work marking the development of state universities in America appears to date from the growth of German influence among our university lights. Germany appears to have been peculiarly fortunate in the development of her higher schools, since the claim is made for them that every university professor is a research man and a teacher. Whatever be said, however, of the ideals prevalent in Germany, with us in America abundant zeal and large ability as an original investigator do not appear to go with the all-important faculty to instruct students in a careful, systematic and thorough manner. Nor does there appear to be, as Mr. Cary argues, much prospect of a growing need in the direction of investigation in our universities, since it would seem that the real work of investigation in the future is to be carried on here in America largely in institutes of various sorts founded by men of wealth and devoted to specific purposes. The third tendency discussed by the author of the paper now being considered is the growing one on the part of state universities of taking themselves too seriously as leaders, a tendency, as Mr. Cary explains, to domineer under the name of leadership, and, as he well remarks, "a state university is a splendid servant of society, but when it undertakes to be master it is passing beyond its function, and, in fact, has crossed the danger line." The reason of the complaint thus made is drawn from the officiousness of those charged with the direction of these higher schools appear to show in regard to the state at large. Needing large funds to carry on their plans, and realizing that this fund must be drawn from the taxes gathered by the state executive, a "systematic and ceaseless booming of the superior qualities and superior work and worth of the university is carried on." The service of the press is enlisted, politicians are approached, state officials are badgered, the alumni of the institutions are pressed into service, and threats of political ostracism are not infrequently resorted to.

The dangers referred to are real dangers, and their scope would be widened immensely were the thought now in the mind of many favoring dominant control by the state of the entire educational work done within its borders, to become a reality. The paper should be attentively studied by all who desire to see our educational institutions live only in the desire to strive to render the highest conceivable service to the students who are gathered within their walls.

An Iowa sociological congress in session at Des Moines and representing the mothers of that state went on record November 1 in a vote demanding the enactment of a law favoring state censorship of moving picture films. The law in question prohibits the exhibition of films that portray acts of violence, physical torture, evil suggestion or love and hate. In their place the pictures must represent heroes and heroines of history and literature or portray the lives and habits of people of other nations.

The New York Times lately invited the children of Bergen County, N. J., to write historical compositions, suggested by the celebration of the county's 250th anniversary, and numerous medals and other prizes were offered for the best contributions. On October 28 the Times said: "To the surprise of the examiners of the Bergen essay contest they found yesterday a degree of almost uniform merit in the compositions from the parochial schools of Jersey City. In contests of this order private schools unfortunately often make a very poor showing indeed as compared with the general average of public school work. But here, almost every outside institution competing—notably St. Patrick's school, St. Paul's school, St. Michael's school, Catholic Institute, St. Joseph's school, St. Bridget's school, and Hasbrouck Institute—have sent in sets of essays all so well written that the judges have found difficulty in selecting prize-winners."

It is gratifying to find so fair a notice of Parochial school work in one of our dailies, but whilst we accept the compliments of the Times with pleasure, we question the statement made that "private schools often make a very poor showing as compared with the general average of public school work." Is it not rather the case that the outcome in this competition is in line with results ordinarily noted in such contests?

ECONOMICS

The imports for ten months ended September 30 amount in value to 1,172 million dollars. For the corresponding period of last year they were valued at 1,068 million dollars. Sugar increased in value from 80 to 103 millions, and works of art from 5½ to nearly 10 millions. Perhaps certain investigations have had something to do with these increases. Crude rubber increased from 50 to nearly 79 millions. The high prices prevailing in the rubber market during the first half of this year may account for some of this. The value of coffee imported dropped from 57 to 45 millions, while tea was almost unchanged. Cocoa dropped more than 1½ million from nearly 10 millions. Iron ore just doubled in value, being 6 millions this year while last year it was only 3. Champagne dropped from nearly 6 to 2½ millions, a very striking example of the effect of the present tariff. Whether it is to be bewailed depends upon one's point of view. On the whole right-minded persons will not be greatly distressed. The value of cigars and cigarettes increased from $2\frac{3}{4}$ to nearly $4\frac{1}{2}$ millions, which some may take to be a sign of returning prosperity. Hats and their materials increased from 4 to 6 millions, in sympathy, no doubt, with the growth in diameter of ladies' hats.

At a meeting of the Chemists' Club lately, the President, Dr. C. F. McKenna, hinted at a cause of high price which has not been noticed hitherto, namely, the employment for other purposes made possible by the progress of chemistry of what once were articles of food only. As examples of this he instanced corn, in which there is a trace of oil used for soap, paint and perhaps rubber; eggs taken, whether good or bad, by manufacturers of albumen; gelatine, employed for many purposes. Following the same line of thought, one may say that the Pure Food Law has something to do with high prices. Chemists, for instance, can make glucose, starch, vinegar, out of sawdust, but under the present law these products may not be used to adulterate food as they were used previous to it. All this is true. Still we hold that the fundamental cause of high prices is the increase of consumption out of all due proportion to the increase of production.

SOCIOLOGY

Up to October 27 no less than twenty-two aviators were killed during 1910. In the month elapsing from September 27, the date of Chavez's fatal accident, seven perished. One must ask again and again, whether such benefits are to be looked for from the aeroplane as to justify this sacrifice of life.

The International Congress for the Legal Protection of Workingmen, at its second plenary session in Lugano, Switzerland, instructed the executive committee to send the report of its proceedings to the associations of Spain and Denmark, in accordance with the petition of the Berne meeting. The committee was likewise instructed to communicate with the workingmen's organizations in Norway, Russia, Finland, Turkey, the Indies, Australia and Canada, to obtain their adhesion to the resolutions of the Congress. Conformably to the motion of M. Shrelht of Paris, a report was ordered to be drawn up by the three committees appointed to examine night work at which children are employed, the work of women, and the length of the day for child labor. An appeal was made to the English government for an annual subsidy. The official representative of Great Britain promised to agitate the question of work in the homes. The Congress passed resolutions demanding the establishment of bureaus to look after salaries and contracts, the application of the penal code to the Truck system of wages, and the support of professional associations among workingmen. A vote of thanks was given to the American government for increasing its subsidy. The next Congress is to be held at Zurich in 1912.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

A letter from the Rev. Mother General of the Good Shepherd Nuns at Angers, France, addressed to the Mother Superior of the Convent in Boston, gives the following details of the expulsion of the Sisters from their monastery in Lisbon during the recent revolution:

"As there was no priestly hand to remove the Blessed Sacrament from the Tabernacle, the Mother Superior distributed the Sacred Hosts among the Sisters, giving eight to each. Scarcely had she finished when the chapel door was burst open and in rushed the soldiers. All the Sisters were led to prison at once, where they remained five days, expecting to meet death at any moment. Then the German Consul demanded the release of the nine German Sisters, and on this being granted sent them back to Germany. The remaining Portuguese and French Sisters, numbering fifteen, through the exertions of charitable souls, obtained passage on an English steamer, and in due time reached the Mother House at Angers, looking more like gypsies than Sisters of the Good Shepherd. The children whose friends claimed them were allowed to go with them, and the rest were cast into the common prison."

The golden jubilee of the establishment of the Dominican Sisters in Louisiana was celebrated in New Orleans from October 31 to November 6. Eight Irish Dominicans came from their celebrated convent at Cabra, Dublin, in 1860, and under difficult circumstances established a school and convent at New Orleans during the Civil War. They have multiplied their foundations in the interval, devoting themselves chiefly to educational work, and have been a large factor in the development of the Parochial School system of New Orleans. Most Rev. Archbishop Blenk presided at the jubilee functions and sermons were delivered by Rev. J. O'Shanahan, S.J., and Very Rev. J. F. O'Connor, S.J. Three of the founders were present at the jubilee.

The Confraternity of Christian Doctrine resumed its regular winter course of lectures on Friday, November 11, in St. Regis Convent, 140th street and Riverside Drive. This Association of Catholic Ladies, under the direction of Monsignor Wall of St. Charles Borromeo's Church, West 141st street, is formed for the purpose of gaining a further knowledge of the practical relations of our Faith. It meets on the second and fourth Fridays of the month, at 3 o'clock, and the lectures are given by well-known members of the clergy.

Two Irish nuns, Sister Mary Dominic Murphy, a native of Dundalk, and Sister Mary Catherine Clayton, a native of Navan, have reached the Siena Convent, Dundalk, Ireland, from Lisbon, where the first named had spent forty years of her religious life. The nuns state that they were removed from their convent by armed soldiers and placed with two hundred Franciscan nuns in a suffocating shed which was used as a temporary jail.

Rev. William H. I. Reaney, the senior Catholic Chaplain in the U. S. Navy, has been transferred from the battleship Mississippi to the League Island Navy Yard, Philadelphia. He has now served nineteen years in the navy.

PULPIT, PRESS, AND PLATFORM

In discussing the Gaylord case, and in answer to the question, What is a preacher without a creed? an editorial in the Chicago Inter Ocean of November 4 says:—

"The question is not whether Christ was human or divine; the question is whether we can accept His life and follow Him.

"This statement of his beliefs—or lack of beliefs—by the Rev. Edward D. Gaylord to the council of Congregational ministers assembled to sanction his installation as pastor of a Congregational church in Oak Park raised a debate which was closed by a majority vote that the ceremony might proceed.

"Mr Gaylord's statement immediately brought the question, 'Do you believe in the miracles?' To a layman's mind that seems an irrelevant question because manifestly subsidiary to the real one, which is whether Mr. Gaylord believes in the divinity of Christ, as usually understood by Christians. And the understanding of the overwhelming majority of Christians, we take it, is expressed in what is termed the Nicene creed:

'I believe * * * in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God; begotten of His Father before all worlds; God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God; begotten, not made; being of one substance with the Father.'

"To a layman's mind it is incomprehensible how any man who believes that statement, which we take to express the belief of the very great majority of those calling themselves Christians, can stumble over the miracles. For the greater includes the less, and belief in the divinity of the doer includes belief in the deed, no matter how transcending what we call 'natural law.'

"So much by the way, and merely to illustrate an astonishment, in which we know great numbers of Christian laymen share, at this incessant pother of preachers over the subsidiary question of miracles, when the real question is of the divinity of Jesus—is 'What think ye of Jesus? Is he man or God?'"

"It will be observed that Mr. Gaylord did not answer that question. He put it aside as not the question. He insisted that the question is merely 'Whether we can accept His life and follow Him.' So we may imagine the friends of Socrates, if they had attempted to form a church or continuing organization to preserve his teaching and gather adherents to them, saying:

'The question is not whether Socrates' teaching was merely human or was inspired of God; the question is whether we believe Socrates was so good a man that upon his life we resolve to model our own.'

"The friends of Socrates didn't form a church—a spiritual unity in belief setting them apart from unbelievers in his teachings and opening before the eyes of their souls new heavens and a new earth into which the unbelievers entered not.

"Probably they had too much sense to try, having nothing to go upon—having no platform or creed—except their admiration for Socrates as a good man.

"We have no wish to censure Mr. Gaylord nor to engage in theological controversy, which is outside a secular newspaper's province. We merely remark that no continuing human organization ever has been built upon a mere human personality, no matter how admired or how admirable. There must be some principle some foundation stone of faith, that abides when the personality passes beyond human touch or knowledge.

"How far does any man get in any field of human endeavor who disavows belief in any fixed principles of action, no matter how admirable may be his personal conduct? He may be admired, but to him great tasks are not committed. He may win affection, but he does not command confidence.

"And that seems to us the position of a preacher without a creed—who dismisses as of no importance—as 'not the question'—the foundation stone of Christian faith.

"He may win affection as a good man.

He may be accepted or tolerated as a good man willing to fill a preacher's post and do his best to earn a preacher's pay. But that is all—that is all!"

SCIENCE

Prof. T. J. See, director of the United States Naval Observatory at Mare Island, California, has proposed a new and ingenious theory to explain variable stars. Clusters of variables he supposes are suns attended by planets which revolve within close proximity in short periods and, after passing through perihelion plunge into a resisting medium of nebula. This causes a sudden blazing up of the light which afterwards dies away gradually. This theory, Prof. See claims, accounts for the abundance of variables in certain clusters and the great variety of them in others. The sudden appearances of new stars are the results of collisions of the stars of the variables with planets revolving about them.

The recent loss of the submarine Pluviose has moved the French Government to provide for the safety of such vessels and crews. Bells for signalling under water are being devised. Moreover all submarines are to be equipped with three telephonic buoys, one in the bow, another amidships and the third in the stern, so that sending them to the surface, those below will be able to communicate with ships in the neighborhood. Special compartments are to be provided as a refuge in case of accident in which the crew may await either a rescue or an opportunity to escape.

Dr. H. Norris Russell finds, from comparisons instituted between spectral types and parallax, that the percentage of orange and red stars increases steadily as the distance from our system decreases. On the basis that all the stars considered are of similar apparent brightness, it follows that redness is accompanied by an intrinsic faintness, the stars of deepest hue averaging but one-fiftieth of the brightness of the sun. On the other hand, some of the bright-red stars situated at great distances eclipse the sun's luminosity a hundredfold. The hypothesis then seems confirmed that two classes of red stars need be distinguished, one class getting hotter, the other cooling.

F. TONDORF, S.J.

OBITUARY

The scholarly Prince-Bishop, Dr. Simon Aichner, for many years the well-beloved chief pastor of Brixen in the Tyrol, died November 1 in the Neustift monastery, where he has been residing since he resigned his episcopal charge in 1904. Dr.

Aichner had reached the rare age of 95 years, and during his long years of service in the Church had won excellent repute as a staunch leader of the Catholics of the Tyrol. Last August he celebrated the seventieth anniversary of his ordination to the priesthood and it was but a few months before that broken health and the growing infirmities of old age had obliged him to abandon the strenuous activity which characterized his years of priestly labor. Besides his prominence, as a zealous churchman, Dr. Aichner enjoyed a distinguished reputation as a scholar and writer. He will be best remembered for his Compendium of Canon Law, which is a standard text in most German universities.

Hugh J. Grant, the second Catholic to be elected Mayor of New York, who served two terms in that office, died suddenly, on November 3, at his residence in this city. He was born in 1853 and attended St. Francis Xavier's and Manhattan colleges, but did not finish his course in either institution. His record in public office during a period of great political corruption, was without blemish. After his defeat as a candidate for a third term as mayor he retired from politics, and devoted all his time to the care of his large real estate interests.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

FRANKLIN ON OFFICIAL CHAPLAINS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Recently there appeared in AMERICA some notes on the topic of United States Chaplains. It is curious to recall in this connection an incident in the career of that remarkable man, the Rev. John Thayer, one of the first prominent New England converts. He had been ordained a minister, and during the Revolution acted as secretary and chaplain to Governor John Hancock.

He was a restless and eccentric character, and, the war ended, he wandered across the Atlantic in 1781. At Paris he called on Benjamin Franklin, then our Minister to the Court of France, and asked to be appointed chaplain to the legation. "Poor Richard" gave him a curt refusal, telling him that he "would say his own prayers, and save the Government the expense of the chaplaincy."

Denied this office of chaplain, Thayer went on to Rome, where investigation of the miraculous cures wrought through the intercession of the recently deceased Saint Benedict Joseph Labre brought about his conversion, his ordination in 1784, and his subsequent life as a pioneer missionary in Boston, New York and Kentucky.

A. D. C.
Boston, Mass.

The Westminster Library

Edited by the Right Rev. Mgr. BERNARD WARD, President of St. Edmund's College, and the Rev. HERBERT THURSTON, S.J.

Non-Catholic Denominations

By the Rev. ROBERT HUGH BENSON.
Crown 8vo. $1.20 net. Immediately.

The object of this volume is to expound, simply and clearly, the tenets and the grounds of belief of the chief non-Catholic denominations in England and Scotland, and to indicate the kind of methods that will probably be found useful in dealing with their members.

NEW BOOKS BY FATHER BENSON

The Cost of a Crown

A Story of Douay and Durham

A Sacred Drama in Three Acts. With 9 Illustrations. Crown 8vo. $1.00 net.

This play was written for the Centenary of St. Cuthbert's College, Ushaw, and was performed in the presence of the Archbishop of Westminster and many of the Bishops of England by the students of Ushaw under Fr. Bonney.

A Mystery Play

In Honor of the Nativity of Our Lord With Illustrations, Appendices, and Stage Directions. Crown 8vo. $0.90. Text only, with a few Notes, paper covers, $0.20.

First produced at Cambridge, England, upon a temporary stage in the school-room of St. Mary's Convent, by the girl pupils from 6 to 18 years old. This play may be presented at small cost for scenery and costumes, and the "acting" edition for performers may be had at a low price.

Back to Holy Church

Experiences and Knowledge Acquired by a Convert

By Dr. ALBERT VON RUVILLE. Translated by G. SCHOETENSACK. With a Preface by the Rev. ROBERT HUGH BENSON. With Portrait. Crown 8vo. $1.20 net.

One of the books by Prof. Harnack gave the impetus which brought Prof. von Ruville to an orthodox belief and then gradually to a full and formal acceptance of the Catholic faith. Prof. von Ruville gives here an account of this personal development.

At Home With God

Friedieu Papers on Spiritual Subjects

By the Rev. MATTHEW RUSSELL, S.J.
Crown 8vo. $1.25 net.

Longmans, Green, & Co.

Fourth Avenue and 30th Street, New York

Real Food Clean and Fresh

DON'T think of Uneeda Biscuit as a mere lunch necessity, or as a bite between meals.

Uneeda Biscuit are the most nutritious food made from flour, and are full of energizing, strength-giving power.

Uneeda Biscuit are always crisp and fresh and delicious when you buy them. Their sensible, dust tight, moisture proof packages prevent the unclean, tough condition so common to ordinary crackers.

NATIONAL BISCUIT COMPANY

(Never sold in bulk)

5¢

for a package

McCray Refrigerators

We make a specialty of Built-to-Order Refrigerators for SCHOOLS, HOSPITALS, INSTITUTIONS, etc.

Style No. 171

Write for our free Catalogs,

Number 48 for Institutions

" 87 " Residences

" 59 " Meat Markets

" 72 " Florists

" 67 " Grocers

Branch offices in all principal cities

McCray Refrigerator Co.

38 Lake Street

KENDALLVILLE, INDIANA

New York Office, 231 West 42d Street

Sacred Heart Sanitarium

FOR REST, QUIET, RECUPERATION AND HEALTH

Unsurpassed results obtained in Nervousness, Rheumatism, Heart and Stomach troubles. No surgical, hospital nor insanity cases taken. A delightful, homelike, restful place—ideal for all run down conditions. Hydrotherapy, Electricity, Massage, Zander Gymnasium, Sun parlor; Swimming pools, billiards, bowling, etc. Gated saddle horses, large indoor riding pavilion; suspended running track connected by tunnel with bath department. 17-acre park.

A staff of five physicians give their exclusive services to the patients.

WRITE SISTER SUPERIOR FOR BOOKLET X. MILWAUKEE, WIS.

HIGGINS'

DRAWING INKS
ETERNAL WRITING INK
ENGROSSING INK
TAURINE MUCILAGE
PHOTO MOUNTER PASTE
DRAWING BOARD PASTE
LIQUID PASTE
OFFICE PASTE
VEGETABLE GLUE, ETC.

Are the Finest and Best
Inks and Adhesives

For School, Home and Business Use

Emancipate yourselves from the use of corrosive and ill-smelling inks and adhesives and adopt the HIGGINS' INKS AND ADHESIVES. They will be a revelation to you, they are so sweet, clean, well put up and withal so efficient.

At Dealers Generally

271 Ninth St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

Branches: Chicago, London

CHAS. M. HIGGINS & CO., Mfrs.

Simplicity

is a prominent feature
of the

VICTOR

It is not necessary to make a lot of adjustments before doing special kinds of work.

The Victor is always ready without special adjustment, because its special devices are built in the machine—not extra attachments.

Send for the No. 2 Catalogue to-day

VICTOR TYPEWRITER COMPANY

812 Greenwich Street
NEW YORK

THERE ARE TWO REASONS

Why we send our DAUS' IMPROVED TIP TOP DUPLICATOR, on ten days' trial. FIRST—It proves our confidence in the machine. SECOND—By personal use, you can positively tell, before buying, whether it meets your requirements. Each machine contains 16 feet of duplicating surface which can be used over and over again. 100 copies from pen-written and 50 copies from type-written original. Complete duplicator, cap size, prints 8-4 x 13 in. Price $7.50, less special discount 33 1-3 per cent, net $5. The Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co., Daus Bldg. 111 John St., N. Y.

THE CATHOLIC MIND

A periodical published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month.

Each number contains an article of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style.

These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is: one at a time and the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

$1.00 a Year (24 numbers)

5 cents a number

SPECIAL OFFER

SCIENCE AND HER COUNTERFEIT. By Rev. J. Gerard, S.J.
LORD KELVIN AND THE EXISTENCE OF GOD. By H. V. Gill, S.J.
SOCIALISM AND CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. J. F. Hogan, D.D. (2 Nos.)
MEANINGS OF THE WORD SOCIALISM. By C. S. Devas, M.A.
IMPRACTICABILITY OF SOCIALISM. By C. S. Devas, M.A.
CATHOLICS AND THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT. By Rt. Rev. Mgr. Parkinson, D.D.
THE CHURCH—THE STRONG SAFEGUARD OF THE REPUBLIC. By Most Rev. Wm. H. O'Connell, D.D.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE. By Robert Hugh Benson.
THE DELUSION OF CHRISTIAN SCIENCE. By Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J.
THE DOCUMENTARY EXPOSE OF THE RUPTURE OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS BETWEEN THE HOLY SEE AND THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT. (2 Nos.)
THE CONCORDAT OF 1801. By D. MacCafferty O'Connor.
THE FRENCH SEPARATION BILL. (Text.)
PRIMARY EDUCATION IN FRANCE.
THE GENIUS OF CARDINAL WISEMAN. By Wilfrid Ward.
THE MASS AND THE REFORMATION. By Rt. Rev. J. Canon Moyes, D.D.
THE ATTITUDE OF MODERN PROTESTANTS TOWARDS THE VIRGINITY OF OUR BLESSED LADY. By Rev. A. J. Maas, S.J.
EXHORTATION OF PIUS X TO THE CATHOLIC CLERGY.

SINGLE COPIES, 5 cents

100 COPIES—SPECIAL PRICE—$2.00

THE AMERICA PRESS

32 Washington Sq., West New York City

NOW READY

AMONG THE HURONS

VOLUME II OF

Pioneer Priests
of North America

Tells the heroic story of
de Brébeuf and His Associates

"This book is a striking illustration of the truth of Shakespeare's well-known words 'Men's good is oft interred with their bones.' . . . We cannot then but feel grateful to Father Campbell for what he has done to assure the fame of those glorious confessors and martyrs from a threatened obscurity. . . .

"Missionaries such as these have a special work in this day of weak faith and widespread disbelief; for the story of their lives, while it stimulates the one, is a living protest against the other. Father Campbell's theme is a great one, and he has dealt with it well. The clear and simple language in which he recounts the wonderful heroism of these truly wonderful men, is more impressive and convincing than any elaboration of style, and surely more in harmony with the quiet, simple characters of the men of whom he treats."—The Tablet, London.

By Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J.

480 Pages. With Index. 24 Illustrations.

PRICE, $2.00

VOLUME I

This extremely interesting book consists of a series of 18 monographs of the missionaries who labored among the Iroquois Indians. Beginning with the life of Jogues in 1642, they continue up to 1710, when the Indians, just before their annihilation, passed over from French to English control.

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS:

"For lovers of history and biography, of the adventurous, the heroic, and the saintly, there is much to attract the attention in this volume of over 300 large, clearly printed pages."—The Sacred Heart Review.

"The adventures of most of the missionaries read like romances."—The New York Herald.

"One of the most interesting Catholic books we have ever read."—The Monitor (San Francisco).

Price, $1.60, postage prepaid

THE AMERICA PRESS 32 Washington Sq. W.
NEW YORK

THE KNOX HAT

Is universally recognized as the Standard by which all others are judged.

452 FIFTH AVE.
(Cor. 40th St.)

FIFTH AVENUE BUILDING
(5th Ave. & 23d St.)

161 BROADWAY
(Singer Building)

Cable Address: "Sibbel"

Telephone 4963 Madison

JOSEPH SIBBEL STUDIO

ARMIN SIBBEL, Successor

Ecclesiastical Sculpture

214 East 26th Street, New York

Statues, Stations of the Cross and Frames, Groups, Alto-Relievos, Altars, Shrines, Baptismal Fonts Memorial Tablets, Etc.

Plaster Models of Special Designs Executed for Architects

Mullins & Sons

78, 80, 82, 84 Myrtle Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

121-125 Newark Avenue, Jersey City, N. J.

218-220 Market Street, Newark, N. J.

Housefurnishings of Quality

Furniture, Pianos, Carpets, Rugs, Sewing-machines, China, Art Work,
Gunn Sectional Book Cases, Arts and Crafts Furniture. Absolutely
the finest displays in the East. Unequaled in quality and lowest prices.

$1.00 A WEEK FURNISHES THE HOME

The Coward Shoe

In this Child's Shoe

- room for five toes
- snug heel seat
- support for ankle and arch

Broad toe allows natural, springy tread; heel-seat hugs up close about the heel, holding ankle in position; extension heel furnishes extra support to the entire foot structure, centering under the arch.

If the child's ankles turn; the arch weak; the walk lacking in confidence or control; THIS IS THE SHOE NEEDED.

SOLD NOWHERE ELSE

JAMES S. COWARD

264-274 Greenwich St., N. Y.
(NEAR WARREN STREET)

Mail Orders Filled | Send for Catalogue

LIBRARY SUPPLIES

Adjustable Book Covers—Library Numbers Gummed and perforated always in stock—also alphabets of various sizes.

For sale by stationers or by

THE VANEVEREN CO.
60 Ann Street - New York

The Book Covers are made of tough, strong paper and are inexpensive, efficient and easily put on

F. JAMES REILLY
President

WM. F. REILLY
Manager

JAMES REILLY'S SONS' CO.

General Electrical Repairs

122-130 CENTRE STREET
Corner White Street

Telephone 881 Franklin NEW YORK

DR. A. J. WALSH
DENTIST

Specialist in Plates and Bridges

265 West 42d St., N. E. Cor. 8th Ave.

BOUND VOLUMES OF
AMERICA A CATHOLIC REVIEW
OF THE WEEK
SIX MONTHS TO A VOLUME
$3.50

The AMERICA Press, 32 Washington Sq. W., New York

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF HENRY VAN RENSSELAER

Priest of the Society of Jesus

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF A WELL-KNOWN AND MUCH-BELOVED PRIEST

By Edward P. Spillane, S.J.

The volume is enriched with a fine photogravure portrait of Father Van Rensselaer, and with many other interesting illustrations.

Price, $1.00. By mail, 10 cents extra

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Square, W., New York

PRINTING OF EVERY DESCRIPTION FOR Churches and Schools

Periodical Publications
Catalogues Programs
Stationery Etc., etc.

THE MEANY PRINTING CO.
6th Avenue, Cor. 11th St., NEW YORK

FREE SCHOLARSHIPS AT THE Leading Catholic Colleges Board and Tuition

Creighton University, Omaha, Neb.

Fordham University, New York, N. Y.

Georgetown University, Washington, D. C.

Niagara University, Niagara Falls, N. Y.

Notre Dame University, Notre Dame, Ind.

St. John's University, Collegeville, Minn.

University of Ottawa, Ottawa, Can.

University of St. Francis Xavier's College, Antigonish, Nova Scotia.

* * *

All Hallows College, Salt Lake City, Utah.

Columbus College, Chamberlain, S. Dak.

Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass.

Holy Trinity College, Dallas, Tex.

Sacred Heart College, Denver, Colo.

Sacred Heart College, Sacred Heart, Okla.

Seton Hall College, South Orange, N. J.

St. Ambrose College, Davenport, Iowa.

St. Bonaventure's College, Allegany, N. Y.

St. Joseph's College, Dubuque, Iowa.

St. Michael's College, Burlington, Vt.

St. Viateur's College, Bourbonnais, Ill.

St. Vincent's College, Beatty, Pa.

St. Charles College, Ellicott City, Md.

Tuition Only

Catholic University of America, Washington, D. C.

Benedictine College, Savannah, Ga.

Boston College, Boston, Mass.

Brooklyn College, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Canisius College, Buffalo, N. Y.

Christian Brothers' College, Memphis, Tenn.

Loyola College, Baltimore, Md.

Marist College, Atlanta, Ga.

Sacred Heart College, Prairie du Chien, Wis.

Sacred Heart College, Augusta, Ga.

St. Francis Xavier's College, New York, N. Y.

St. Mary's University, Galveston, Texas.

St. Ignatius College, Cleveland, Ohio.

St. John's College, Brooklyn, N. Y.

St. John Berchman's College, Toledo, Ohio.

Fordham University Law School, New York, N. Y.

Fordham University Medical School.

Georgetown University Law School, Washington, D. C.

Georgetown University Medical School.

St. Louis University Law School, St. Louis, Mo.

PREPARATORY SCHOOLS (Board and Tuition)

St. Ann's Academy, New York, N. Y.

St. John's Preparatory College, Danvers, Mass.

COLLEGES FOR YOUNG LADIES (Board and Tuition)

COLLEGE OF NEW ROCHELLE, New Rochelle, N. Y. MOUNT ST. JOSEPH'S COLLEGE, Dubuque, Iowa.
ST. MARY'S COLLEGE, Notre Dame, Ind.

N. B.—Other Colleges and Schools will be announced later.

These Scholarships may be obtained by securing subscriptions for AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week.

For further particulars address

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Square, West,
New York, N. Y.

"Perfect" Warm Air Heaters
"Perfect" Cooking Ranges
and Richardson's Steam and
Water Boilers
Give splendid satisfaction

THOUSANDS IN USE

Send for Catalogue

RICHARDSON & BOYNTON CO.
31 West 31st Street
Chicago NEW YORK Boston

WITH GLACIER WINDOW DECORATION

YOU CAN GET
Stained Glass Effects
on Ordinary Windows
Suitable for Residences
Churches and Schools
Special Ecclesiastical Designs
Write To-day for Booklet 6
Address WM. B. QUAILE, 752 Broadway, New York.

$1.00 WILL BRING POSTPAID one of our
Fine Gold Filled
5 year guaranteed
ROSARIES
In any color. Order through your jeweler or direct.
Catalogue free.
Wm. Purnell Co.
Mfg. Jeweler
37 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER"
AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week
32 Washington Square, West, New York City

FINN BROTHERS
Manufacturers of
Roll Top Desks
STORE and OFFICE FIXTURES
Counters, Shelvings,
Partitions, Etc.
Estimates and Designs Furnished
Office 358 BROADWAY Salesrooms
89-65 FRANKLIN ST., NEW YORK
Telephones, 4855-4856 Franklin
Factory: 112-114 LEROY STREET
Telephone Connection

Ecclesiastical Furniture
PEWS · PULPITS · FONTS · VESTMENT CASES ETC.
Built to secure harmony with the general architectural and decorative scheme, from the finest, exquisitely hand-carved to the simpler, more inexpensive styles. Styles and Prices to meet any requirements.

Illustrations or special designs to harmonize with the architecture and arrangement of your Church gladly submitted to those interested.

American Seating Company Address Dept. B.X.

215 Wabash Ave. CHICAGO
NEW YORK BOSTON
19 West 18th St. 70 Franklin St.
PHILADELPHIA PITTSBURGH
1225 Arch St. 824 Lewis Bldg.

The Famous Rayo

Does Not Strain the Eyes

Don't use a small, concentrated light over one shoulder. It puts an unequal strain on your eyes. Use a diffused, soft, mellow light that cannot flicker, that equalizes the work of the eyes, such as the Rayo Lamp gives, and avoid eye strain.

The Rayo is designed to give the best light, and it does.

It has a strong, durable shade-holder that is held firm and true. A new burner gives added strength. Made of solid brass and finished in nickel. Easy to keep polished. The Rayo is low priced, but no other lamp gives a better light at any price.

Once a Rayo User, Always One.

Dealers Everywhere. If not at yours, write for descriptive circular to the nearest agency of the

Standard Oil Company
(Incorporated)

HEADQUARTERS FOR THE CLERGY
PHOTOGRAPHY! High-Class Work at Reasonable Prices
Cardinal Vannutelli—Exclusive and only sitting in U. S.
Copies for sale; also Cardinal Logue
E. F. FOLEY 164 FIFTH AVENUE
Bet. 21st and 22d Sts.
Appointments 'Phone, 5995 Gramercy

Telephone Call, 5922 Barclay
THE S. T. SMITH CO.
Manufacturers of
Ink, Inked Ribbons, Carbon, Mani- fold and Typewriter Linen Papers
Diamond Brand Typewriter Supplies
11 BARCLAY STREET NEW YORK

MENEELY BELL CO.
TROY, N.Y. AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.
BELLS

ST. JOSEPH'S SANATORIUM

Silver City, New Mexico
Conducted by the Sisters of Mercy
A THOROUGHLY equipped institution for the treatment of all suitable cases of tuberculo- sis. Each room has two wide connecting porches, electric lights and all modern conveniences. In- firmary for febrile cases, also cot- tages for those desiring them. Trained nurses and resident physi- cian in constant attendance. Cli- matic conditions ideal: cool sum- mers and moderate winters. Annual precipitation 12 inches, with only 32 cloudy days. Altitude, 6,000 feet. All ethical lines of treatment, in- cluding tuberculin in suitable cases.
For Catalogue and particulars address either Sister Superior or Oliver T. Hyde, M.D., Medical Director.

Catholic Mind Pamphlet on "THE EUCHARISTIC CONGRESS AT MONTREAL"
5c Each, $4.00 per Hundred
The America Press, 32 Washington Square, West, New York

DIRECTORY OF COLLEGES AND ACADEMIES

Georgetown University WASHINGTON, D. C.

Directory for Catalogues or Information

The College (Graduates and Undergraduate Schools)
The Registrar, 37th & O Sts., N. W.

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E. St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University
Rev. Joseph Himmel, S.J., President

LADYCLIFF

On the Hudson (Adjoining West Point)
Young Ladies' Academy

A department for small boys. Education thorough and practical. Location beautiful and convenient. Terms moderate. Send for prospectus. Address Sister Superior, Ladycliff, Highland Falls, N. Y.

New York State Regents' Examinations.

Academy of St. Joseph

In-the-Pines

BRENTWOOD, N. Y.

A Boarding School for Young Ladies,
Affiliated with the State University

PROSPECTUS EXPLAINS THE TERMS, ETC.

St. Mary's College

St. Marys, Kansas

BOARDING COLLEGE
Under the Jesuit Fathers

Two Courses of Study:
Classical and Commercial

For Catalogue, send to
REV. ALOYSIUS A. BREEN, S.J., President.

ACADEMY OF THE HOLY FAMILY

BALTIC, CONNECTICUT

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity

PREPARATORY, COMMERCIAL and ACADEMIC COURSES

Prospectus explains terms, etc.

Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

Convent of the Holy Child

SHARON HILL, DELAWARE COUNTY, PA.

15 Minutes from Philadelphia

ACADEMY FOR YOUNG LADIES

Highest English Course. French, Drawing, Music by Certified Teachers. Preparation for foreign travel. As the numbers are limited, special care can be given to the formation of character and training of each child.
Address Mother Superior

COLLEGE OF ST. ELIZABETH

CONVENT STATION
Near Morristown, N. J.

One hour from New York City.

A Catholic Institution for the Higher Education of Women

COLLEGE Four years' course leading to the degrees of B. A. and B. S.

SCHOOL OF PEDAGOGY Required for entrance two years of College work

SCHOOL OF MUSIC. COURSE LEADING TO THE DEGREE OF B. M.

ACADEMY A High School Course of Four Years. Full College Preparatory Work. GRAMMAR AND PRIMARY DEPARTMENTS SEPARATE

REGISTERED By the New Jersey State Board of Education and the University of the State of New York Apply for Year Book to The Secretary

For illustrated catalogue address MOTHER

CATHOLIC COLLEGE FOR WOMEN situated in the romantic Valley of the Wissahickon. Degrees conferred. Also Academic, Commercial, Intermediate and Elementary Departments. Very special advantages in Music and Art. The piano student possesses superior opportunities in the use of the Virgil Clavier Method pursued throughout the course. The Art Studio is admirably equipped, and every attention is given to the study of Art, both in theory and practice. Gymnasium perfectly equipped. Outdoor exercise, tennis, basket ball, fencing, etc.

SUPERIOR, Chestnut Hill, Philadelphia, Pa.

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE

WORCESTER
MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Collegiate and Preparatory Departments

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $260 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra. Send for catalogue to

REV. THOMAS E. MURPHY, S.J., President

Seton Hall College

FOUNDED 1856

South Orange, New Jersey

COLLEGE AND HIGH SCHOOL

Bayley Hall for Students
of Grammar Course

FOR CATALOGUE ADDRESS
Very Rev. James F. Mooney, D.D., Pres.

"OUR LADY OF PEACE" RESIDENCE FOR LADIES

225-227 WEST 14th STREET, NEW YORK CITY

THE important residential institution under the management of the religious order of Jesus-Mary is now open to receive guests. This institution responds to a great need in our metropolis. 170 rooms at $8 to $12 per week are ready to accommodate ladies in the literary profession, retired teachers, stenographers, students and others desirous of a peaceful abode. All the rooms are cheerful, well heated, and furnished to give comfort to each one. Library, music room, large roof garden, sun parlor add to the enjoyment of the boarders.

The atmosphere of the house is homelike and attractive. Special price for suites.

School of music will open September 1st, 1910. Private courses in French for ladies and children also begin at same date. For further information, apply to MOTHER SUPERIOR.

ST. JOHN'S PREPARATORY COLLEGE

DANVERS, MASS.

SELECT HIGH SCHOOL conducted by the XAVIERIAN BROTHERS

Classical, Scientific and Commercial Courses

Ideal Location All New Buildings

New Equipment Competent Instructors

Develops the Whole Boy

Send for Catalogue

Brother Benjamin, Director

IMMACULATA SEMINARY

MOUNT MARIAN, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Situated in the suburbs. Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of St. Mary-of-the-Woods. Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Conservatory methods in Music. Oil and Ceramic and Water-color Studios. Abundant out-door exercise. Sightseeing with experienced chaperons.

For Year Book address, Sister Secretary

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

ADJOINING BRONX PARK, NEW YORK CITY

College and High School

ST. JOHN'S HALL, FOR SMALLER BOYS

The location affords the healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city

MEDICAL SCHOOL
in connection with Fordham Hospital

WRITE FOR CATALOGUE

LAW SCHOOL
at 20 Vesey St.
in the midst of the courts

SPRING HILL COLLEGE

FOUNDED 1830 Spring Hill, Mobile Co., Ala. CHARTERED 1836

BOARDING COLLEGE CONDUCTED BY THE JESUIT FATHERS

Just the School for boys who wish to escape the rigors of the Northern climate. Mean temperature of the winter months, 52 degrees Fahrenheit.

HEALTHY LOCATION—EVERY CONVENIENCE OF A MODERN COLLEGE

CURRICULUM INCLUDES THE PREPARATORY, HIGH SCHOOL AND COLLEGE COURSES. DEGREES CONFERRED

Write for Catalogue to Rev. F. X. Twellmeyer, S. J., President

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Vol. IV, No. 6

(Price 10 Cents)

NOVEMBER 19, 1910

($3.00 a year)

Whole No. 84

CHRONICLE

Crops and Prices—Americans Lose Potash Fight—Socialists in Milwaukee—Election Echoes—Canada—Great Britain—Ireland—British Possessions—India—France—Recognition of Portugal—Sharp Criticism of William of Germany—Germany—The German Budget—Hungary—Greece121-124

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Thanksgiving Day—"The Quest of the Ultimate"—Socialist Press Propaganda in the United States—Religious Training in Schools.125-130

IN MISSION FIELDS

Native Chinese Priests130-131

CORRESPONDENCE

How the Portuguese Jesuits were Driven Out—The Catholics of Ecuador131-133

EDITORIAL

Our Jails—Socialism—Well Paid Apostles—Miss Petre and the "Times"—What French Catholics Demand—Thanksgiving Proclamation.134-137

SOME FRIENDS OF MINE137-138

LITERATURE

The Green Patch—Max—Voices from Erin and Other Poems—Mr. Ingleside—Pietro of Siena—Flamsted Quarries—Gardens Near the Sea—Books Received138-141

EDUCATION

Growth of Classes at Holy Cross College—Marquette University's School of Journalism...141

SOCIOLOGY

The True Social Work—Health Promoted by Public Parks—Imprisonment for Parents Who Neglect their Children141-142

ECONOMICS

Reciprocity with Canada—The Welland Canal Not up to Date142

ECCELESIASTICAL ITEMS

A New Apostolic Delegate for Canada—Progress of "The Catholic Encyclopedia"—Decennial Exposition of the Body of St. Francis

Xavier—Help for St. Mary's Hospital—Jesuit Exiles Arrive in New York—National Convention Federation of Catholic Societies—Defects in the Irish National Schools142-143

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

The Real Republic of Portugal143

SCIENCE

Professor See's Capture Theory and Life in Other Worlds—Uranium Ores in Western Australia—Consumption of Oxygen in High Altitudes143-144

PERSONAL

Prof. J. C. Monahan—Cardinal Logue—Gen. James Shields' Memorial—Florence Nightingale's Bequests to Catholic Charities—The Brownson Memorial144

OBITUARY

Rev. Hermann J. Goller, S.J.144

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

New York and Portugal—Franklin's Benevolence144

CHRONICLE

Crops and Prices.—According to the general review of crop conditions made by the Bureau of Agriculture, corn heads the bumper harvest of this year. "The harvests of 1910 have been practically completed, with results exceeding the expectations during the growing period," the report says. "Preliminary estimates have been made of the production of most of the important crops, from which it appears that the aggregate production of crops in 1910 is approximately 7.6 per cent. greater than the crops of 1909, and about 9.1 per cent. greater than the average annual production of the preceding five years. Prices for important crops averaged on November 1, about 5.4 per cent. lower than a year ago."—Meat packers in Kansas city and other packing centres declared that food prices are now on the down grade.—The Treasury Department reports that deposits in the 1759 savings banks during the year ended June 3 increased to more than $4,000,000,000. The average depositor's account was $445.22, just $24.77 above the average of the year before. Banking capital employed in the United States increased $80,000,000 during the year. Individual deposits in all the banks increased more than $1,240,000,000 and the aggregate assets increased $1,355,000,000. The banks, however, are holding about $31,000,000 less in cash than they did in 1909.

Americans Lose Potash Fight.—Germany has rejected the American proposal in connection with the export of potash from that country contracted for by American interests. This proposal sought to halve the difference under dispute caused by the enactment by Germany of the potash bill, mention of which was made in the Chronicle last May. American contractors would thus have accepted a loss of $14,000,000—that is, $2,000,000 annually for seven years, which constituted the life of their contracts. The new law limits the production of a certain amount at each of the mines and levies a tax of 4 cents per hundred-weight on all production in excess of the stated amount. Germany's refusal to accept the American proposal is on the ground that it does not accord with the principle of the new potash law, and the Government uncompromisingly declares its intention to stand fast by the law.

The rejection marks the end of a long struggle. Some of the contracts referred to were made as far back as 1907, others between June and October, 1909. When rumors began to be heard of the new law to be enacted, five months before its passage last May, representations were made by the United States to Germany protesting that such a law would destroy the value of these contracts previously made with American buyers of potash salts and that it might embarrass negotiations then in progress for the granting of minimum tariff rates between the two countries. As was then understood, Germany explained that there would be no export duty on potash, and there appeared no further reason for fearing action that would impair the American potash contracts. The agreements providing minimum customs rates between Germany and the United States were accordingly signed. Soon after the signing, the potash bill again came before the Reichstag, changed in form, but levying a tax on production in such a manner that the mines having contracts with Americans or owned largely by Americans, would be unable to operate without having to pay a tax on their output in excess of the value of the potash. It is against this law that the protests, which have failed to be heeded, were made.

Socialists in Milwaukee.—Victor Berger of Milwaukee, sponsor of the Socialist Mayor Seidel of that city, will be the first Socialist member of Congress. His election coincides with a greatly increased vote for his party in other States, especially in New York, where Mr. Russell's friends claim that 65,000 votes were cast for him for Governor. The Socialists' plan of campaign was unique. In the absence of a daily newspaper organ, they had printed each week for the last six weeks many thousands of copies of a four-page paper in English and German, in which their doctrines were expounded. These periodicals were received by 1,200 men each Sunday morning, and it is said every household in Milwaukee County was supplied with a copy. Noonday meetings at the factories and night meetings at various halls seven days of the week were also held for the last six weeks.

Election Echoes.—A woman was chosen Treasurer of Ashland County, Wis., in the recent election. She was the widow of a former treasurer and had acted as his deputy. She is the first woman to hold the office in Wisconsin. She defeated her opponents, two men, at the polls, nearly two to one. Another widow was elected County Clerk of Angelina County, Texas. Her husband was the party nominee for the office but died before the election. She was appointed to the office, but refused the nomination. She then ran as an independent and won—the first time a Democratic nominee was ever defeated in that section.—The candidate for Secretary of State on the Socialist ticket in New York was a woman.

Canada.—The conferences on reciprocity have been suspended until January and the United States Commissioners have returned to Washington. The feeling against any treaty or even accommodation is very strong throughout the country.—An investigation shows that considerable frauds have been practised in the government printing office in Ottawa.—The government speakers in the Drummond-Arthabaska contest were as openly Nationalistic as Mr. Bourassa and his partisans. The latter and Mr. Monk are carrying on a vigorous campaign throughout the Province of Quebec, and received a warm welcome in Montreal. The end of the controversy will most probably be the revival of racial divisions as bitter as ever existed.—The board of aldermen have received a letter from Nathan, syndic of Rome, rebuking them for their resolution condemning his speech against the Church. One of his three or four friends on the board is about to apply for an order of court directing the erasure of the resolution from the minutes of the council.—The Archbishop of Lemberg, of the Ruthenian rite, has been spending the time since the close of the Eucharistic Congress in the west, looking into the condition of his people. No doubt these will be much benefited by his visit, and will understand better their duty with regard to their bishops.—The Rainbow has arrived in Esquimalt. Both the Canadian cruisers, therefore, are at their stations.

Great Britain.—The conference on the House of Lords has failed, and it seems that a general election can not be far away. The prospects of the Unionists are very dark, their only hope lies in a splitting of the Liberal party by the surrender of the Prime Minister to Mr. Redmond. If he can manage to dissolve parliament on the House of Lords question, before the Home Rule question comes up, he will most probably return to power, to effect a revolution unheard of in England hitherto, but not unforeseen.—There has been serious rioting by the striking miners in the Welsh collieries. Cavalry and the London police had to be brought into the country to restore order.—The plague situation is sufficiently serious. The area in which plague rats and rabbits are found is growing daily. Moreover, during the past two years these carriers have been found in the London docks, three having been found lately. The people in Suffolk are showing apathy in the matter and even resent the assertion that the plague is among them, much as the people of San Francisco did when it first appeared in that city. San Francisco was saved by the energy of the Federal authorities, and the general government will probably have to take hold of things in England.—The London press seems agreed in looking upon the late elections as a rebuke of Mr. Roosevelt's readiness to meddle with the affairs of others. Even Unionist papers refer to the Guildhall speech, saying that it has now been chastised. This is not altogether generous, seeing that Unionists were glad of the assistance they received from that speech.—The reports of the British invasion of Persia seem false. A party of bluejackets and marines were landed at Lingah at the request of the British Consul, to defend the town against bandits, and are to be withdrawn when the danger ceases. The affair at Bris, 360 miles away from Lingah, was a matter of gun-running. A party was landed, as has been done many times lately, to capture a convoy of guns and ammunition going to the tribes of the Afghan frontier.

Ireland.—Queenstown has been afforded a fresh opportunity of showing the advantages it possesses as the port of call for American mail steamers by the establishment of the accelerated Sunday service which commenced a week ago. Under new arrangements made between the Post Office authorities and the Cunard Company, a special mail train will leave London on Saturdays just an hour before the Cunard liner which takes on the mails at Queenstown leaves its landing stage at Liverpool. By accelerating the mail train as well as the steamship service to North Wall, two hours will be saved in the journey from London to Queenstown. The liner will thus be enabled to sail early Sunday morning for New York and will be ordinarily expected to reach that port on Thursday. Thus there will be delivered in New York on Thursday letters posted in London the previous Saturday.—The congested districts most in need of relief do not appear to have yet derived any great benefit from the Land Act of 1909. It has been demonstrated that Connemara and other parts of Galway are in a deplorably neglected condition, and that if immediate steps are not taken to mitigate, at least to some extent, the hard lot of the peasants trouble may be apprehended.—The project to make Galway a transatlantic port, and to establish in connection therewith an Anglo-Canadian steamship service was discussed at a meeting of the proprietors of the Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland, and a resolution was adopted approving of the plan, and guaranteeing a sum not to exceed $25,000 towards the promotion expenses.—Irish Nationalists have not delayed to prepare to oppose the limited measure of Home Rule affirmed to be in store for Ireland in case the constitutional convention mentioned in last week's chronicle should have its way. An All-for-Ireland league is being organized throughout Ireland to fight against the Imperial Confederation scheme said to have been outlined as a possible solution of the question by Mr. T. P. O'Connor, M. P., in recent speeches in Canada. Mr. T. P. Healy, M. P., was the principal speaker at a meeting to form a Dublin branch of this league. In the course of his remarks Mr. Healy advised statesmen not to go to Canada or to South Africa for a model, but to look at the Isle of Man, and he asked why English statesmen could not give Irishmen as much freedom as Manxmen. "Whatever sort of Irish Government was established," he said, "should have such financial arrangements as would enable the country to support itself and prosper." He had no difficulty in approaching any system of compromise, he explained, so long as the financial powers of the nation were left intact.—John Redmond and his associates on their arrival home from New York were received with great demonstrations of welcome. In a speech at Dublin he declared he was going to London to wrest Home Rule for Ireland from the necessities of British politicians.—Cardinal Logue has returned to Armagh in good health after his journey to America. Replying to an address of welcome, His Eminence spoke in praise of the faith and devotion of the Canadian people, and of kindness and good-will displayed during the Eucharistic Congress by the Protestants. There was nothing, however, he said, in Montreal as brilliant or impressive as the wonderful ceremonies and solemnities he witnessed in New York in connection with the consecration of St. Patrick's. He was delighted, too, with the work being done for the Church in the United States in the matter of the education of the young and declared the parochial schools to be the crown of the Church in America.

British Possessions.—It is stated that the reports of the discussion of Imperial Federation in the constitutional conference in England, are very displeasing to Australia.—The West Indian colonies are very indignant over the abandonment of the direct mail line, and the suggestion of one in its place via Canada. They wish the line maintained at England's expense as an imperial service.—Father Machado, known throughout Portugal as the apostle, is dead at Gibraltar. His death is said to have been hastened by the ill-treatment received from the revolutionary government.—The Federal parliament of South Africa was opened solemnly by the Duke of Connaught. All the Dutch elements of the Cape vied with one another in expressions of loyalty. Those of the northern colonies were not so enthusiastic but they may make up for this later when the Duke goes north.

India.—The Maharajah of Mysore has subscribed 2,000 rupees and the Maharajah of Bikanir, 1,000 rupees to the Indian Transvaal Fund. The Indians who are claiming the right to re-enter South Africa are still detained on board ship at Natal.—Ráhim who calls himself manager of the Canadian-Indian Supply Co. was arrested in Vancouver last week under instructions from Ottawa. He was found to be in possession of comprehensive notes on the manufacture and handling of nitroglycerine and the names and addresses of anti-British agitators in the United States, France, Egypt, South Africa and India. He is to be deported to Honolulu, whence he came.—The tribes on the Afghan frontier are very restless. They demand compensation for the rifles and ammunition the British cruisers have been seizing in the Persian Gulf.

France.—The prevailing impression about the new ministry is that it is a "one-man Cabinet," namely, Briand's. The Minister of Foreign Affairs is Pichon. His selection is favorably viewed by the Powers. The Government's program proposes to deal with electoral, judicial and administrative reform, the legal status of trades-unions and the right of government employees to strike.—The River Seine is again in flood, the rapidity of its current forcing steamboats to suspend operations. All parts of France are suffering from the floods. The quays in the southeastern part of Paris are inundated. The authorities estimate the flood at a maximum of 7.20 metres, only about two metres short of the disastrous floods of last January. The River Muerthe and its branches are over their banks, inundating many villages. Great damage has been done at Nancy, where 1,500 persons have been driven from their homes. The valley of the Moselle is flooded and many factories have been compelled to shut down.

Recognition of Portugal.—On November 11, Germany followed the example of Great Britain, France, Spain, and Italy, and resumed relations with the Portuguese government. The United States instructed its representatives in Portugal several weeks ago to transact business with the defacto government there. This does not constitute formal recognition of the new government, however, and such action will not be taken until the State Department is convinced of its stability. It is the view of State Department officials that Great Britain, France, Germany, Spain, and Italy have just done what the United States did weeks ago. Each country must determine for itself when to recognize formally the new republic, and the United States would not be influenced by steps taken by any other government.

Sharp Criticism of William of Germany.—In a meeting of the Austrian delegation in Vienna the young Czech representative, Francis Udrzal, aroused much excitement by an impassioned speech in which he savagely criticized Emperor William and the Dreibund. Beginning with caustic denunciation of Austria's alliance with Germany, Udrzal went on to denounce the "German" tone of the speech delivered at the banquet in William's honor during that monarch's recent visit to Francis Joseph. It will be recalled that the German Emperor was then enthusiastically applauded by the distinguished gathering in Vienna's City Hall, because of his cordial reference to the union of German hearts in the two empires. Udrzal, in his denunciation emphasized the fact that two-thirds of the population of the Austrian Empire are non-Germans. On the day following Udrzal's speech an equally heated attack on Emperor William and the Dreibund was made by the Social-Democrat leader, Rennner, who, moreover, included the Hapsburg reigning house in his criticism. Graf Aehrenthal, the Austro-Hungarian Minister of Foreign Affairs, who was present at the session of the delegation, made a vigorous and effective reply to both speeches and was warmly applauded by the delegation.

Germany.—In the large assembly hall of the Berlin University, Prof. Hugo Münsterberg, of Harvard, the new "Exchange Professor," and Prof. Charles A. Smith, of the University of Virginia, the new "Roosevelt Professor," delivered the opening lectures of their courses. The Emperor and Empress were present and a distinguished representation of official and literary circles in Germany.—Arrangements have been perfected to float the new Turkish loan of seven million pounds by the German-Austrian bank syndicate of which mention was made some weeks ago.—Gratification continues to be expressed in the newspapers of the empire over the remarkably cordial welcome extended to Emperor William and the Empress during their recent visit in Brussels. Contrary to the expectations of some who gladly would have seen another outcome both king and people united in warm-hearted demonstrations in honor of the German imperial pair. The plans of the Socialists to organize workmen in opposition to the visit proved a total failure. Unquestionably closer relations of political friendship between the two neighboring peoples will result from the Emperor's trip to Belgium.

The German Budget.—Details of the imperial budget of Germany for 1912, as given out by the Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, show proposed expenditures of $731,236,284, an increase of approximately $12,975,545. The estimates include for the army $203,941,844, an increase of $2,214,155, of which amount $1,976,124 is for additions to the peace footing. The navy estimate is $112,639,849, an increase of $4,128,582. Press comments call attention to the fact that nearly one-half of the budget is made up of appropriations for the army and navy, and add the significant words: "Germany is thus paying one-seventh of the cost of the insane rivalry in national armament which Lloyd-George has computed at the enormous annual total of $2,250,000,000."

Hungary.—During the session of the Hungarian delegation in Vienna Premier Graf Khuen Hedevary assured the representatives present that it was his intention to lay before Hungary's parliament promptly at the beginning of next year his bills regarding reform in the elective franchise and in the matter of military criminal procedure.

Greece.—It is a curious fact the political leader in Athens at the present time is a Cretan. The Bien Public says that unlike Theseus who went from Athens to Crete to slay the Minotaur, Venizelos went from Crete to Athens to put an end to the public corruption that is destroying Greece. Scarcely named Prime Minister, he found himself without a Parliamentary majority. The difficulty arose from an interpellation as to whether Venizelos had received from the Crown the right to dissolve the Parliament. The claim of his opponents was that the Parliament was invested with the power of revising the constitution and that therefore neither the King nor the Minister had a right to dissolve it. Thereupon Venizelos offered his resignation. The king refused to accept it and told the minister to try again. He secured the needed votes, but only 157 could be regarded as given without reserve, and hence on October 25, with the approval of the King he dissolved the Parliament. It was done in a somewhat Cromwellian fashion. Gendarmes occupied the approaches to the Chamber. The consequence is that Venizelos is denounced as a dictator. All this is disquieting for there are questions clamoring for settlement such as the Cretan trouble, the fate of the Greeks who live in Macedonia or elsewhere under the Turk, the boycotting of Greek merchandise, the threats of the Turks. At any day there may be an upheaval in Turkey.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Thanksgiving Day

From the Massachusetts Bay and Plymouth colonies, the observance of Thanksgiving Day soon spread to other parts of New England. Yet it was not an annual occurrence even in the land of its birth. From the time of its introduction into Connecticut, it was almost a yearly celebration, for with the exception of 1675, the good people of the colony received an annual reminder from the authorities to meet and thank God for His manifold mercies.

Hardly had the machinery of the Federal Government been set in motion when a joint committee of both Houses of Congress requested President Washington "to recommend to the people of the United States a day of public thanksgiving and prayer, to be observed by acknowledging with grateful hearts the many and signal favors of Almighty God;" and in answer to this request Washington issued his first, and only, thanksgiving proclamation. He appointed "Thursday, the 26th day of November next" (1789) and exhorted the people not only to thank God for His blessings but also to "beseech Him to pardon our national and other transgressions, to promote the knowledge and practice of true religion and virtue, and to grant unto all mankind such a degree of temporal prosperity as He alone knows to be best."

The remaining eight years of Washington's administration passed by with no Presidential recognition of Thanksgiving, although the day continued to be observed in New England as before the adoption of the Constitution. It was in 1798, under the first Adams, when the unfriendliness of European powers threatened to plunge the country into war, that the President recommended "Wednesday, the 9th of May next, as a day of solemn humiliation, fasting, and prayer," and that they should be accompanied by "fervent thanksgiving to the Bestower of Every Good Gift for having protected, preserved, and prospered the United States." But the political horizon did not clear. A second proclamation, couched in terms similar to the first, appointed "Thursday, the twenty-fifth of April next," (1799) as a day on which the citizens were to abstain as far as possible from secular occupations and devote themselves to acts of public and private devotion.

Jefferson's two terms brought forth from the Executive no invitation to prayer or penance or thanksgiving; but his disciple and immediate successor, James Madison, issued four proclamations, three of which appointed days of public prayer during the second war with Great Britain and the fourth fixed "the second Thursday of April, 1815," as a day of thanksgiving for the return of peace. All these were issued at the request of Congress.

Towards the end of Madison's administration, the New England practice passed the border and received recognition in New York, where Thanksgiving Day was first officially noticed by the State in 1817. Its observance gradually spread southward, although up to the time of the war between the States it had not gained a foothold in all the Southern States.

On the very eve of the great conflict, President James Buchanan, yielding to "the request of many pious and patriotic associations and citizens and his own sense of duty," designated January 4, 1861, as a day of solemn prayer and fast, but he made no mention of thanksgiving. "His omnipotent arm only can save us from the awful effects of our own crimes and follies—our own ingratitude and guilt toward our Heavenly Father." The whole fabric of the republic was tottering and the aged President realized it only too well.

Acting on the recommendation of Congress, President Lincoln appointed the last Thursday of September, 1861, as a day of prayer for the restoration of peace; but like his predecessor, he struck no note of thanksgiving. He issued similar proclamations in 1863 and 1864.

The success of his troops called forth three thanksgiving proclamations in the course of the war; but his first proclamation of our present Thanksgiving Day appeared in 1863, to be followed by a second in 1864. These were the first thanksgiving days that coincided in date with that proclaimed by President Washington in 1789.

After Lincoln's lamented death, President Johnson named the first Thursday of December, 1865, but returned to the last Thursday of November in 1866. The exordium of his proclamation in 1867 deserves notice: "In conformity with a recent custom that may now be regarded as established on national consent and approval, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do hereby recommend to my fellow-citizens that Thursday, the twenty-eighth of November next, be set apart and observed throughout the Republic as a day of national thanksgiving and praise to the Almighty Ruler of Nations, with whom are dominion and fear, who maketh peace in his high places."

In the first year of President Grant's administration, the designated day was Thursday, November 18, 1869; in 1870, however, the last Thursday of November was named. Since that year, there has been no change, for the Presidents have invariably selected the day first chosen by Washington, then by Lincoln. The "recent custom," recognized and respected by Johnson and followed by Grant, after his first year in office, is now solidly established in our national life. It is only of late years that the day has received special religious recognition from Catholics. And it is well that their recognition should be more marked as the years roll by; for, although the day is very generally kept as a holiday throughout the Republic, gratitude to God is not nowadays the keynote of the celebration.

The President's proclamation affects Federal officials, the army and navy, and, in general, those citizens directly subject to the Federal authority, as in the Territories and the District of Columbia. That State officials may close their departments and join in the celebration, the several governors, following the President's action, concur in his proclamation and proclaim the holiday.

II. J. S.

"The Quest of the Ultimate"

An editorial article, under the above heading, in a recent issue of the New York Evening Post, is interesting from the fact that it gives deliberate and careful expression to a point of view concerning religion, which, we fear, is shared in these topsy-turvy times by a numerous class of so-called "intellectuals." It begins by aiming gentle ridicule at those recent publications which undertake to construct the "religion of the future" and to outline the final form of religious belief. In this we agree perfectly with the writer; but we are poles apart from him when he comes to explanation.

According to him religion is a science; and, because it is a science, any attempt to restate its conclusions can only be provisional and, at most, merely another step forward, but never the perfect attainment of all religious truth. The infinite expanse of knowledge always stretches still beyond the wavering and halting advances of the finite mind in whatsoever field of science it may chance to be exploring. It is only in art, says this writer, that man in his restless quest of the unattainable can find repose. While science looks to the future for its victories, art looks to the past. "In his unavoidable quest of the ultimate, man must go for absolute satisfaction, not to the crucible or the study, but to the impassioned music of Wagner, the tragic failure of Hamlet, the columned majesty of the Parthenon, and the swinging hexameters in which the gods live."

It will be observed by the reader that the teachings of Christ are not even dismissed by the writer as a possibly final expression of religious truth: they are not so much as referred to. With sublime insouciance they are completely ignored as if every one agreed at present that their days of usefulness were over, that they had become an obsolete formula, that the progress of man up the spiritual heights has been so rapid in these latter days that Christ had ceased to be a leader and other guides are necessary to chart the dizzy altitudes in which we live and move.

Fortunately the day has not yet arrived when it is necessary to refute seriously the utter falsehood involved in such an intellectual attitude. The bare statement of it carries its own condemnation in the eyes of every thoughtful inquirer. Putting the matter on a purely natural basis, what student of human nature and its spiritual yearnings will place the science of religion, as Christ taught it, below the vague and inconsequent attempts of modern doctrinaires to state man's relations to himself and to society and the duties arising therefrom? The kernel of truth that may lie amid the bushels of chaff in the foolhardy essays of modern religionists is sure to have been stolen from the Christianity they affect to despise. Whatever dignity they manage temporarily to cast about themselves in the eyes of their disciples is due immediately or remotely to the traces of a religion which they have not yet succeeded in entirely flinging off. So true is it that

"Somehow, no one ever plucked

A rag, even, from the Body of the Lord,
To wear and mock with, but, despite himself,
He looked the greater and was the better."

The writer in the Evening Post is quite correct in maintaining that no finite mind can give us finality of attainment in any field of knowledge. The reason why the greatest intellects of all time have found the repose of the ultimate in Christ's presentment of religion is precisely because it is the pronouncement of an Infinite Mind. Such a pronouncement will never have its comprehensibility exhausted by finite intellects; its depths of significance will still remain unfathomable no matter how deep the plunge of man's reason and intuition into its ocean of truth. But it is always an ocean of truth and not of error or of turbid speculative conjecture. It is quite definite and circumscribed in its aloofness and separation from falsehood and surmise. It is a perfectly articulated system of knowledge which in the nature of its Deviser and Teacher, admits of no improvement or readjustment, no, not even if man were to continue to be born and to live and to die on this planet for a hundred million years. The religious spirit of man will always be able to discover new beauties, new facets of truth, new significances and latent grandeurs, springing up before his eyes owing to some shaft of sudden light flung on Christ's message by a divine grace or the sore personal need of the hour, or owing to the impact of that message upon some new form of human error. But the inherent limitations of a mind that is merely human forbid it to presume to add to, or alter, or mutilate what must forever remain the ultimate and complete expression of man's religious knowledge.

These views, we are afraid, would not be entertained for a moment by the writer whose editorial we are discussing. And so, in the concluding portion of his article, we find him taking refuge in art, that melancholy asylum of disillusionment without faith or hope. He speaks confidently enough of the "durable satisfactions of the human spirit" in "the glory that was Greece and Florence and Weimar and Stratford." And he must be very young and inexperienced to be so confident and so sanguine. It was, we venture to fancy, an older man than he who once wrote: "I like books—I was born and bred among them and have the easy feeling, when I get into their presence, that a stable-boy has among horses. I don't think I undervalue them either as companions or instructors;" and after thus giving us his credentials as a judge in the matter, he goes on to state that "there are times in which every active mind feels itself above any and all books. When a man can read, his paroxysm of feeling is passing. Sometimes I hate the very sight of a book."

We respectfully submit this description of a universal experience to the Post's contributor. In the light of it let him take another good look at the hope he is hugging to his breast. Happy man if he never finds out that his swinging hexameters and his Greek temples and his thundering music and his prodigies of Stratford and Weimar do not fail him and turn into boring annoyances just when he needs them most. For religion—and there is only one true form of it—begins to exert its most powerful effects just where all art stops, viz., in moments of calamity and of moral crises.

In conclusion we shall delay only long enough to declare our surprise that the writer, enumerating the great final triumphs of literary art, makes no mention of the Bible. This is astonishing when we reflect that perhaps no great modern master of language ever lived who would not, for literary considerations alone, sacrifice, were it necessary to choose, even the great Shakespeare himself in order to retain his copy of the Bible. We shall be excused, therefore, if we yield to the suspicion that the writer in the evening newspaper has not followed the best traditions in our literature by making himself familiar with the rich treasures of our greatest Book. A study of it would doubtless open to him fields of thought and speculation which he would find extremely interesting. He might, for instance, care to test the theory of Cardinal Newman that the matter and form of the Bible, when it is free from misinterpretation, belong to such superhuman heights that in them the parallels of science and poetry meet at a common point. That would explain very well why the written Word of God is at one and the same time the highest type of poetry and the most adequate written expression of the religious spirit. It is the ultimate of art and, rightly understood, of the science of religion. To seek this latter ultimate elsewhere is to search for sunlight at midday with closed eyes.

JAMES J. DALY, S.J.

Socialist Press Propaganda in the United States

The press, Socialist writers assure us, is the first power in the world. To destroy by every effort and at every cost the capitalistic press and to advance the progress of their own, was the counsel Liebnicht left his followers. Bounds of country and difference of language were to constitute no reason for denying mutual support towards this great purpose. "Already the Belgian Socialist party," wrote the Call in reference to the foundation of a Spanish daily paper, "remembering the financial aid received by it from the German Socialist party in the beginning of its struggle, has opened a subscription to help found a Spanish daily."

In 1906 there was in the United States not one Socialist daily in the English language. To-day there are three, thoroughly organized and solidly established; while for the millions of English speaking Catholics there is not one. All this has been accomplished by men without means, without political influence, but by dint of united effort and most obstinate perseverance. The Call in its struggle for existence opened a wage fund for contributions, and these soon came pouring in from every quarter. Now it was a poor working girl who gave one of the six hard-earned dollars of her weekly wages. Again it was a laborer who sent the first fruits of a new employment, with an almost religious enthusiasm. Realizing that gratitude was due somewhere he bestowed it upon that press which was soon, in all probability, to efface from his heart whatever vestige of faith he might still possess. The notes, too, accompanying these donations, were often well nigh pathetic. "At the last minute I send you a mite. I am so proud of your fight, I wish I could afford to help you in the struggle. The day that you said you were discouraged it tore my heart." Such gifts of money, together with the largely gratuitous services of those engaged, as long as such assistance was required, have already made both the Chicago and New York dailies mighty factors in the great industrial crisis of our day, while the Jewish daily, Forward, is said to sell nearly 100,000 copies a day.

Opposed to our two Catholic German and several Polish and Bohemian dailies, there are now in all six Socialistic daily papers. In the report of the Socialist Party of the United States to the International Socialist Congress at Copenhagen, 1910, we read: "Within the last year the number of strictly Socialist publications (in the United States) has increased to almost seventy. Of these over one-half are periodicals in the English language, three are daily papers, twelve are monthly magazines and the rest are weeklies. Twenty-nine Socialist periodicals are printed in foreign languages, as follows: seven in German (of this number three are daily newspapers); three each in Finnish, Slavonic and Jewish; two each in Polish, Bohemian and Lettish; and one each in the following languages: French, Italian, Danish, Hungarian, Russian, Swedish and Norwegian." Both the Appeal to Reason and Wilshire's Magazine have each a circulation of about 250,000 copies. Do we realize what an influence is represented by the statistics I have quoted? Are we fully aware of what is stirring about us in the dark, and are we prepared to meet it and to guard our own? How many of these papers are read by those who once were Catholics?

How has all this been brought about! By ceaseless watchfulness and labor; by those sacrifices which the world constantly demands of her own and as constantly receives. Calls that become almost distressing are often made upon Socialist subscribers, asking for help, contributions, personal exertions. Socialist unions often enter joint subscriptions for one or other periodical. Socialist pamphleteers and propagandists at times obtain the same results from local trades unions that are not entirely Socialistic. State conventions themselves are canvassed by the restless agents. At the Wisconsin State Federation of Labor a recommendation was proposed that unions and individuals subscribe for the official Socialistic organ published at Milwaukee. Although it was evident that the delegates favorable to Socialism held the convention at their mercy, yet it was thought prudent not to force the matter. "A number of delegates jumped to their feet and declared that while they voted against the recommendation they did not consider it a slap at the official organs." The meeting was content with merely endorsing these!

Another outlet of Socialist activity is the spread of campaign literature. "Long experience has proved beyond doubt," writes the International Socialist Review, "that the campaign work bringing the biggest returns in proportion to the labor and expense required is the scattering of literature. Speeches are effective, especially open air speeches, but these need to be supplemented by the distribution of leaflets or the sale of books and magazines to the people who listen, or more than half the results are lost." Accordingly there follows an incredible output of literature practical for this purpose: the "Pocket Library of Socialism," the "Center-Shot Leaflets," pamphlets and dodgers of every variety. "It is only the lazy lecturer," Arthur M. Lewis instructs the Socialist speakers, "who imagines that his duties to his audience end with the peroration." It is the sale of literature bearing upon the lecturer's theme which must do the deadly work. He himself sold in one week an entire edition of his first book. At Sunday meetings it seems nothing unusual, according to his statements, to have a sale of from two to three hundred copies of some book under discussion.

I might continue here with the popular Socialist novels put upon our literary market by men like Jack London and Upton Sinclair, heedlessly read by all classes alike and calling for ever new editions. Like much of the popular Socialist output they may not directly make Socialists of their admirers, but they aid the cause, they serve to surcharge the air, they prepare for the tempest that is brewing. Besides the literature already mentioned, Socialist books of history abound and Socialist school books are being carefully prepared. Moreover, as Socialism is entering more and more deeply into college life and its Intercollegiate Socialist Society is gaining in membership, we may constantly look for new ventures and developments on the part of these "intellectuals."

To show how intimately the Socialistic press enters into even the least concerns of life, I may instance the Socialist playing cards—cards that work while you play, "each pack," according to the grim Socialistic humor, "a punch at the plutes." Andrew Carnegie is the King of Clubs; John D. Rockefeller, the King of Spades. Across the breast of each there runs "a bugle call verse." The Oil King is pictured with a sword, inscribed "Profit and Interest," in one hand, and a University in the other. The lines read:

"I love to oil the college wheels
And grease the pulpit stairs,
Where workmen learn to scorn the strikes
And trust to Heaven and prayers."

To the remark of the publisher that any workingman who takes up these cards will not lay them down without showing signs of intelligent discontent, a wag in the Nation adds, "particularly if the other man holds all the Socialist aces."

Socialist editors and publishers are above all things enterprising and practical. The large and comprehensive set of Socialist classics—if we may dignify them with this name—translated from all languages, is bound in uniform edition and sold at the lowest prices, while we, with all our years of experience and all the grand literature at our disposal, have not yet been able to issue one single, handy, attractive, inexpensive and carefully exclusive set of our own Catholic classics of the world, or even of those of our own language—invaluable as such an edition would be for class-room and library. We have undoubtedly progressed far beyond the methods of earlier years, and there is much, very much, we may justly point to with the utmost satisfaction; yet it may profit to learn an occasional lesson even from our enemies. The children of the world are ever more wise in their generation than the children of light.

And what then is the nature of all this mass of literature we have described? Apart from the falsity of its fundamental principles, what is its attitude towards the Catholic Church? The best we can say in its favor is that at times it approaches to a profession of toleration. The common shibboleth rung in the ears of the unwary is that Socialism has no relations, friendly or hostile, with religion. It is even admitted that when the Socialistic Commonwealth shall have possession of the earth, there may still be found some Catholics existant upon it—an opinion, however, which would be considered temerarious by the most prominent Socialist authorities. Their toleration, when properly understood, is merely an insult fung into our face. Resolved in its ultimate analysis, it is found to be nothing more or less than a condescending pity for the poor benighted Catholic who, through no fault of his own, but by the mere force of circumstances and environments, has been left so far behind in the process of the Social evolution that his mind is still encumbered with the myths and superstitions of a former period. But for this very reason he becomes a fit subject for Socialistic charity, and much may yet be hoped for him if only he will prove himself docile in the hands of his instructors. That this Socialistic optimism will soon be verified in the case of the would-be Catholic Socialist we may readily concede. God does not promise the superabundance of His graces to those who wilfully expose themselves to certain temptation. The poor laborer who has thus allowed himself to be seduced will soon find that the vast and overwhelming proportion of Socialist literature far from merely promoting religious indifference—a reason sufficient to condemn it—is moreover directly hostile not only to Catholic faith, but to all revealed religion.

Catholics, therefore, have a duty not merely to keep aloof from wells that have thus been poisoned, but likewise to offer to the world the only antidote against the evil. The Catholic press is doing more than was ever done in the past, but Catholics too must do all in their power to increase and spread a deserving Catholic literature, Catholic papers, periodicals and books. We have, it is true, so many demands made upon the generosity of the faithful for the necessary support of Church and school that the interests of the Catholic Press are apt, at times, to receive but scant consideration. Yet it is neither just nor wise to overlook this all-important mission which the Holy Father assures us, can never be over-estimated. To carry on, with something at least of that zeal which our enemies display, this great apostolate of the Press is to safeguard from destruction ourselves and our country, is to spread that fire which Christ came to cast upon the earth, is to answer to that cry which down the centuries comes sounding to us from the Cross: "I thirst!—I thirst for the souls of men!"

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

Religious Training in Schools

But little more than a year ago whilst presiding at the laying of the corner-stone of a new parochial school in a densely populated West Side parish of Manhattan, Archbishop Farley, in a brief address of congratulation to pastor and people, touched a note which strangely thrilled the hearts of those present at the ceremony. Not an old man as yet, the Archbishop has lived through the exciting days of conflict when the mere suggestion of a need of religious instruction in schools stamped the Catholic as an enemy of the Republic, when the building of church schools to safeguard the faith of God's little ones was openly proclaimed to be a dangerous attempt to introduce into the country religious dominancy to the ruin of its free institutions.

No wonder there rang through that warm-hearted talk of the prelate to his people a note of triumph and of victory! Fifty years back Catholic Americans were a destructive leaven in the national life; to-day their persistent efforts to preserve religious instruction as an essential element of the school training of children wins for them the cordial approval of their one time enemies. Old fallacies are forgotten in the better vision that has come to many, enabling them to perceive that the Catholic position implies the presence in the land of a strong conservative force preparing with vigilant care for the combat that threatens, when the one safeguard shall be that respect for authority and obedience to law which a religious training alone can assure.

Fancy the storm that fifty years back would have loomed black over the heads of an assembly in which even an inferential condemnation of the American public school system was heard. Yet, scarcely a month ago, as the public press reports, something very like such a condemnation was launched during the fourth joint session of the House of Bishops and the House of Deputies of the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Cincinnati. The news reports of the discussion on education, to which that session was devoted, tell us that no word was said against the system of training countenanced by the people of the forty-six States, still their significant comment affirmed it to have been made plain by the speakers that they thought education and religious training should go hand in hand.

One is not surprised to learn that many of those in the audience showed themselves not wholly in sympathy with the proposal of a combination of religion and education. It requires years of illuminating experience to destroy the baneful influence of fetiches once held in full honor; and convictions that have been part of one's religious faith almost are not readily shattered. Unfortunately the fancied need of a complete exclusion of religious instruction from the American public school system has been long a ruling fetich in this land. Yet there were strong champions of the right in that all-day discussion in Cincinnati. Rev. Dr. Endicott Peabody, the distinguished head of the Groton School in Massachusetts, pleaded for the establishment of parochial schools in Episcopalian communities, "because they are the best that can be furnished for the children." He argued, even, that, in districts where parochial schools do not or can not exist, parents should have their children excused from their public school rooms for a portion of each day, that religious instruction may be imparted to them in either rooms or buildings apart from the school houses.

Bishop Charles H. Brent, a delegate from Manila, P. I., in discussing the methods which should be used to establish these schools, did not hesitate to utter an expression which in the old days would have pilloried him with the dangerous "un-American Papists." "State education is a menace to the Church of Christ," he affirmed, "unless it be supplemented with religious education." Mayhap the atmosphere of his chosen missionary field has temperamentally favored Bishop Brent, as it has undoubtedly worked salutary influence in the development of his brother-missionary, Bishop Albion W. Knight, who attended the convention as delegate from Havana, Cuba. This latter warmly condemned an educational system which ignores the essential factor of religious training, and said "that until a parochial system is evolved for the Protestant Episcopal Church, and is followed out, the children of the Church will continue to live amid surroundings not at all conducive to their religious well-being."

Nor are the Episcopalians alone in their onward progress towards the Catholic position in regard to the school question. The New-Church Messenger, a Swedenborgian journal published in Chicago, contains in a late issue (Oct. 19), an eminently fair plea for religious training in schools. The article asserts that the question is forcing itself with daily growing strength upon the attention of thoughtful men. "There is not amongst us, thus far," says the writer, "any considerable infidel objection as in Continental Europe, to religious education." An optimistic view, no doubt, and one which, if well founded, would make easy the acceptance of the plan the writer ventures to advocate. "In Great Britain, for many years, schools belonging to several religious bodies have received grants of money based on the results attained by the children under government inspection and examination. . . . That is, the State paid these schools for services rendered when they fully deserved recognition and payment. There is no reason why Jewish or Catholic schools here should not receive similar payment; as it is, the Catholics and others pay twice over, first in the support of their own parish schools, then in the support of the public schools which they do not use. If this measure of fairness is realized, there is likely to be less strain between Catholics and Protestants generally."

The New-Church Messenger article touches the economic side of our subject, a phase of the question that has aroused among Catholics in the United States a readily understood bitterness of feeling though they have loyally borne the double burden which their strong stand for religious instruction in schools imposes upon them. Patience is the word of exhortation their bishops have urged in the years of their long struggle, wiser counsels will surely come to prevail, and with a recognition of the fallacy of the principles underlying the system of education now in honor in this country, a way will be found to repair the injustice under which Catholics are chafing. Unquestionably wiser counsels are beginning to be manifest among us. Perhaps the horrible stories that are coming to America from lands whose first fruitage of freedom was an edict suppressing religious teaching in the schools, will help to produce a salutary change in the mental poise of our countryman regarding the question. Revolution and anarchy never have been and never will be lightly thought of in this country; and a system of education which fits those trained within its influence to throw off respect for authority and obedience to law will not appeal to Americans once they have allowed themselves to measure its full and natural possibilities.

M. J. O'CONNOR, S.J.

From Eisenach, Saxe-Weimar, the so-called "Cradle of the Reformation," comes the report that a new passion play, under Protestant auspices, will be given there next summer. The new play, which is frankly conceded to be a contrast to the Catholic version at Oberammergau, will be performed by well-known actors selected from the best stages in Europe. The present plan is to present it eight times during the summer of 1911, and oftener if it prove attractive. The Grand Duke of Saxe-Weimar and the Duke of Saxe-Meiningen are said to be back of the new enterprise, and sufficient capital has already been subscribed to guarantee its financial stability. The version of the life of Jesus to be used is the work of Herr Weiser, stage manager of the Grand Ducal Court Theatre at Weimar, the famous little playhouse in which Goethe's and Schiller's works were first performed. The German press are asking whether the remarkable success of the Oberammergau play this summer has inspired the new project. The Bavarian play was witnessed this year by 280,000 foreign spectators. Of these 80 per cent. were Americans, 15 per cent. British and Irish, while the other countries supplied the remaining 5 per cent.

IN MISSION FIELDS

NATIVE CHINESE PRIESTS.

It was in 1842 that, by direction of Pope Gregory XVI, the Jesuits returned to the Chinese mission field for the first time after the restoration of the Society of Jesus throughout the world. The mission of Kiang-nan was assigned to them. There they found no mission works, as they are called, namely, schools, colleges, hospitals, etc., but as soon as the Chinese Government permitted the erection of such buildings, the work was begun.

Almost the first care of the missionaries was to start a seminary for the formation of a native priesthood. It was in operation before they had been a year in the country. This seminary, which is situated at Zi-ka-wei, near Shanghai, was the home for many years of Father Peter Hoang, a native of Nanking, whose death in 1909 called forth many eulogistic accounts of his long and remarkable career. He was a secular priest, but he had made his home with the Jesuits for so many years that he was identified with them by the public. Father Hoang was a distinguished scholar, the author of several literary works of great value, and a man of wide influence. His long residence at the seminary qualified him in a special manner for the work of writing its history. From the catalogue which he drew up we learn that the seminary has given one hundred and three priests to the Church. Twenty-six of these became Jesuits, fourteen took up mission work in other parts of the empire, and the remaining sixty-three cast their lot with the mission.

The seminary proper now has twenty-seven students, and the preparatory seminary has twenty-one. There are also forty-three aspirants, who are studying Latin with the intention of qualifying for admission into the preparatory seminary.

As is quite to be expected under the circumstances, the defections from the seminary are numerous. In fact, it is calculated that of thirty who enter the preparatory seminary only one perseveres until he reaches the priesthood. This proves, if proof were needed, that a system of rigorous selection and elimination is in force, and it also explains why the Church so seldom has reason to be ashamed of the life of a Chinese priest. The seminary course extends over a period of ten years, of which four are devoted to Latin, two to philosophy, and four to theology. Latin is the language in use. It is heard in the lectures, in the reading at table and during recreation, the only exception being the great feast days, when the seminarians converse in their native tongue. It is the custom of the Jesuits to have among the seminarians a number of European candidates for the sacred ministry; whose presence and influence are helpful in the formation of the priestly spirit in the natives.

CORRESPONDENCE

How the Portuguese Jesuits Were Driven Out

The following is a copy of a letter sent by a Jesuit scholastic, Mr. Leon Meyer, to another scholastic, Mr. Piental, at Tortosa, Spain:

THEOLOGATE, MURCIA, OCT. 12, 1910.

DEAR BROTHER IN XTO.:—

I am sending you some news which we got from a Theologian who arrived this morning from Oña, having passed through Madrid. There are at present in Madrid Rev. Father Provincial, three other Fathers (Barret, Pinto and Frias), and one scholastic, Comes-Pereira. Some from the Campolide, and all from Barro are prisoners. It is possible at this writing that they have been sent into exile.

It seems that those at S. Fiel had plenty of time to escape. Father Rosario, dressed as a servant, fled to his own home, but being pursued he escaped to La Guardia during the night. I copy from a letter of Mr. Pereira Magalhaes of the Campolide, which came today from Salamanca.

"At one o'clock on the morning of the 4th we were aroused by the discharge of artillery and musketry. When I heard hurried steps in the corridor, and saw men carrying lights, and heard at the same time the noise of the guns, I jumped hurriedly from bed and asked what the matter was. They answered me sorrowfully, 'There is a revolution in Lisbon, and a shell has entered here.' I hurried to the boys' dormitory and awakened Father Cardoso. Some of us went up to the tower; the shots continued, and we heard the shouts and acclamations of the people. We descended to the lower corridor for safety. All were terrified, and some kept calling over the telephone for information. The division commander, Gen. Gorgias, quieted our fears by saying that he hoped to crush the revolt, but he did not succeed. The Revolutionists captured the better positions and killed one in every ten of the Municipal Guard. The street was covered with the corpses of the Municipal Guards, common people and the carcasses of horses. The rattle of musketry was continuous. Father Antunes spoke by telephone with the artillery barracks. One of the mutineers replied that they had taken the barracks, and that they could not send any one to defend us because the regiment had not yet returned; that the Republican banner flew over the barracks. We concluded that the victory rested with the revolutionists.

"Very early in the morning I heard Father Provincial's Mass in the domestic chapel, and went to Holy Communion, and so prepared myself for whatever the Lord should ordain. At the middle of the Mass as the shots sounded close at hand, Father Provincial turned and asked me to see whether there was immediate danger, and tell him in order that he might consume the Sacred Species at once. Fortunately the shots were not directed against the College, but the fighting was among the soldiers themselves. . . . The consternation was general. Some seemed to be half-crazed. I wasn't so much alarmed because I still thought that the uprising would be quelled—but I shall tell you later on what happened to myself.

"Some began to dress themselves in citizen's clothes. At breakfast, Rev. Father Provincial appointed to each one the place that he should fly to in case of necessity. We were to go two by two if possible. As I seemed not to be very much disturbed, my brother told me to hurry and prepare myself for whatever might happen. Then I put on a pair of trousers belonging to Father Director, and a large mackintosh, leaving on my own vest underneath. I met Father Provincial in the corridor (for he was going continually from one part of the house to the other), and I suggested to him that it would be better for each one to go whenever he could and in the best way he could. He replied 'Yes, of course.' I knew that there was a train leaving for Las Caldas at 12.30, so Brother Wenceslaus and myself said farewell to the others,—what a bitter farewell it was,—and each taking a handbag we left the house.

"We met two boys who agreed to carry our bags, for we were going by advice of Father Rector by way of Pulhava. I gave each of the boys 100 reis. The street of the Campolide was filled with people under arms, going to hunt for priests and royalists. We went cautiously through that neighborhood trusting to Holy Obedience. This I remarked several times to Brother Wenceslaus. As we went along the street some exclaimed, 'Those two are surely in disguise.' At a certain spot we met two soldiers who seemed to be royalists. One of them had a large revolver, and the other a cavalry carbine. I feared that if we were recognized we would be killed. The two boys who were carrying the bags disappeared at the first sight of the soldiers, but we found them after a while, and they asked us whether the soldiers had done us any harm. We told them 'No.'

"When we got into the street that leads to the station, we found that it was filled with people who, on seeing us, began to whisper amongst themselves, and here and there I heard the words, 'They are disguised.' We had taken only a few steps when the children began to shout, 'Kill them, kill them!' following up their shouts with a shower of stones, and some older persons hidden amongst the trees were throwing such large ones that it would surely have been the end of us had we been struck in the head. Brother Wenceslaus received such a blow from one of the stones that the swelling still remains. In order to frighten this rabble, I resorted to a device. I suddenly drew a pocket case, and pointing it threatened to kill some of them. As soon as I pointed it they fled like cats behind the walls, yet they kept on mocking us and throwing stones from a safe distance. We finally arrived at the station, and there, too, many persons kept looking at us with suspicion.

"We saluted the station-master who was a friend of mine and he, mistrusting the intentions of the crowd outside, led us into his own office to await the arrival of the train. On leaving we gave him our most cordial thanks. He told us that he himself was in fear of some of the employés, and were it not for the train service he also would flee the place. There was nothing new during the journey by train until we reached the town of Caldas de Reiala, where we had to wait four hours for a change of trains. While we were waiting there the people crowded around us, anxious for news from Lisbon. In order that we might not be discovered for what we were I dissimulated and amongst other things concerning the revolution I said: 'The republic is gaining ground and let us see now whether we shall be better off under the new regime,' and so forth. Our hearers uttered a thousand imprecations against the Jesuits and the priests, but they claimed that there were some good priests, namely those that were Liberals. We then went to the hotel to get something to eat. Many a suspicious glance was directed towards us by the crowd; however, we were not harmed.

"I have just been told that we are to leave to-night for Paris and thence go to Enghien, so I shall shorten my narrative.

"Father Farianha has just joined us and Father Joaquin Dias is with him. We are thirteen. Father Barret will go with us. The first two Fathers had been made prisoners and haled before Affonso Costa, who put them through a very searching examination, but the fathers answered with such naturalness that he was quite satisfied, and as they wished to leave the country he released them. Poor Father Machado being out of his mind contradicted himself, whereupon Costa called him liar, knave and so forth and did not release him. All the rest remain prisoners. In the interview with Costa, he said that it would go much harder with the Jesuits, because they had made vigorous warfare upon the Republicans; some of the officers want the Jesuits to be shot. I think that the government fears foreign intervention and so there will not be so many deaths.

"In the fortress of Caxias all from Barro are prisoners, counting novices and juniors, 80 all told; and those from the novitiate of the Franciscans of Barratojo. Twelve from the residence of Quelhas are in prison No. 8. Those of the Campolide are prisoners in the artillery barracks of that place. From Setubal the news comes that our house and church are totally destroyed by fire. Some of ours from Campolide were followed and shot at even in the station. Nothing further is known of Faria, Bilaygue, etc., but it is believed that they are either captured or still in hiding—for all who are not revolutionists defended us and received us with affection." (Here ends Mr. Magalhae's letter).

N. B.—Father Mattos, director of Portugal, has not been killed. Val de Rosal is totally destroyed.

Enghien, October 26, 1910.—Messrs Magalhaes and Wenceslaus have arrived at this Theologate. The Bishop of Salamanca has offered to pay the expenses incurred by the Portuguese fathers during their stay at the seminary of that city. Two bands of Portuguese are shortly to leave Europe. One band of twenty goes to California, where there is a colony of 90,000 Portuguese. A band of five, directed by Father Socius, will go to Brazil to look over the situation. The whereabouts of three fathers is unknown, and it is feared that they have been killed.

The Catholics of Ecuador

I.

PLAYA RICA, ECUADOR, SEPTEMBER 7, 1910.

Your interesting and instructive AMERICA is slow in arriving at this remote spot on the globe. Various issues usually arrive in bunches, which has its advantages, but tardy as AMERICA is in reaching me, it brings all too soon notice of the calumnious slanders of the Speer brand.

It is now nearly fourteen years since my first arrival in Ecuador and since then I have journeyed up, down and across the country, not once but many times; on foot, in canoe, and on mule and risked my life too on the bit of poorly constructed and wretchedly managed American railway, which has cost Ecuador $15,000,000 U. S. gold and disgraced us. It probably is safe to say that Ecuadorians will grant that no one is more familiar with this country than I. At leisure times I have gone into Colombia to the north of here, journeying likewise over the country, twice have I spent weeks in crossing from the Pacific to the Atlantic in a canoe up one stream and down another the entire distance except for the short and low divide separating the two waters, which one covers on foot in an hour's time, coming out at Carthagena, the centre of the field of labors of St. Peter Claver, whose bones may be seen under the high altar in the Jesuit church in that city. In Bogota, the capital of Colombia, the president, in discussing with me certain regions of Colombia, once remarked that he knew of no other man more familiar with Colombian territory, especially the remote and outlying parts. Now I hope I may be pardoned for this personal reference, which is only to show that I know the two countries to which I refer.

I should like to pay my humble but sincere tribute of respect to the priesthood of Ecuador and Colombia. I have met them everywhere—in the spacious cathedrals, officiating with all the ceremonious pomp the Church uses on certain occasions, and in the lonely wooded wilds on their missions with probably only a barefooted Indian, or negro boy server for companion, and I can truthfully say of them, I do not know one who has discredited himself or his sacred calling. I am proud of them. They are indeed curas in every sense; spiritually and bodily they care for their people. One important thing I observed particularly. I have never seen a Mass completed here under thirty minutes. In Manhattan Island, in a magnificent temple, too, I have been present when the Mass was said in much less time; such unbecoming haste is not edifying, especially to the public. Here the Mass is a sacrifice, not a recitation.

Unfortunately for us both at home and here, many, indeed most, Americans who come to the west coast of South America, are of the pioneer adventurous type. This applies to Protestant missionaries quite as much as to people in other employment, for, after all, the Protestant missionary down here is an employe. This, of course, is why many of them are here—to gain a salary and probably they have to tell some tall stories to hold their posts. Evidently the American people still delight in being humbugged. The loafers about towns in South America seem to know what it is that many Americans desire and with, and oftentimes without, the slightest encouragement will slander the priesthood on the chance of receiving a peseta or less with which to buy a drink. This unfortunate class of people we know are to be found in all countries.

And then there is the other type of maligner, the Radical politician. He is often more pleasing to look upon and to listen to, but his sting is charged with the same venom; it may enter deeper and is meant to be more deadly, for he is most likely against all religion. This is a most important feature which the Protestant missionary appear not to regard. I have asked of more than one of my Radical official friends: "If you are not satisfied with the Catholic religion why not take up some other form or creed, but have a religion?" and in every case have I received the same answer in substance: "No, if the Catholic religion does not satisfy, none other will."

Some have told me they had gone to the Protestant services and listened to the sermons and been disgusted. The Radical government of Ecuador is doing to-day precisely what England initiated in Ireland exactly 150 years ago. They appear to have yet to learn that the way to strengthen a religion is to persecute it. All foreign priests are prohibited by law from entering Ecuadorian territory. Protestant missionaries may come in as many as choose, and they do come, but the Radicals, hoping that they may destroy Catholicism, do not fear them, knowing full well that Protestantism will not grow on Ecuadorian soil. I have no hesitancy in challenging Protestantism to produce one single mature individual native Ecuadorian or Colombian man or woman who can be claimed as theirs. I have met many of these missionaries, men and women, and as a rule they are a rude, ignorant and illiterate lot, drafted mostly from the small towns of the Central West, and I can name some men amongst them of whom worse things might be said without fear of contradiction.

From a religious point of view, having in mind the twelve ignorant fishermen, one might overlook ignorance and illiteracy, but as an American it is not agreeable to be stopped in the street in a foreign land by a fellow countryman, an entire stranger, a very ordinary individual, and asked to go with him to his church services. I have had this happen to me. I doubt not the invitations were kindly and well meant, but it is not just what one would call good manners. It appears to me a great mistake that this class of Americans should invite themselves to come to a most polite, well-mannered Christian people and rudely ask them to give up their old and satisfactory creed. To my personal knowledge there is much more urgent need of their most earnest efforts at home. Now, I have never met with a stranger in these parts who will say even when properly introduced to a priest that the latter began "shop talk."

The charge one often hears of ignorance and illiteracy against the priesthood here will not hold—quite the contrary. I have received much knowledge from coming in contact with them, and so have others. On our works here we have employed hundreds of Indians brought down from the Sierras in the interior and nearly without exception they can all read and write. They are moral and industrious and know their religion too, all the result of the labors of the priests. One of our engineers told me of a native boy in his corps who wore a rather large sized picture of St. Anthony under a piece of window glass bound with strips of American tomato can for framework suspended by a stout cord around his neck. It was rather awkward and bulky, too, for the purpose, but it only was in proportion to the boy's faith, which he ably defended. His chief sought to twit him one day—the same old story—"superstitious worshiping of Saints, etc.," and promptly the boy replied: "No, Mister, we do not worship Saints, we venerate the Saints, you mistake, there is a difference." And my university graduate engineer learned something, and I am pleased to relate he was magnanimous enough to appreciate the peon boy's correction. We agreed to advance Antonio.

Another case of my own experience in favor of the Ecuadorian clergy: A short time back I happened to be the guest for several days of the most prominent preacher in London, and I asked my host to enlighten me on a very important and fundamental dogma of faith. I was not completely satisfied with the explanation. Last Holy Week in Quito I was more than pleased to hear the illustrious Archbishop in one of a course of Lenten sermons explain to my entire satisfaction the particular points which I wished cleared, and it was so simply told that a child might understand. I can truthfully say that I have never heard a word from a pulpit in South America, even in the remotest backwoods, that would not have been creditable, coming from your New York preachers.

I recall with pleasure having listened to a simple little priest, on the headwaters of the San Juan River in Colombia, ten days up in a canoe from the coast, preach sound logic to his yet more simple flock. They were celebrating the feast of the patron of the place, and people had come from afar, according to custom, for devotion, trade and enjoyment. Some had come evidently for trade only from an adjoining province, which in colonial times had been a Spanish penal colony. In the place to which I refer I am quite sure there is not a single pure white resident—all descendants of the black slaves. The act of manumission by the Republic in 1851 left the mine owners without labor, and they retired to the cities leaving the blacks in charge and possession of the field. On the day to which I refer a local merchant had lost about half an ounce of platinum dust, valued at about ten dollars, which he immediately reported to the cura, who, in turn, at the Mass that day, spoke of the matter from the altar.

He first told of the pain it caused him to know that a theft had been committed in his parish and especially on their patron's festival; until that packet of platinum was restored to its owner the parish was in disgrace, etc., and he then made himself more emphatic, explaining in the simplest and most direct manner possible that any having knowledge of who had taken the platinum or where it then was were in duty bound to acquaint him or the owner, else they, as accomplices, were equally guilty with the thief, and could not hope for absolution until the platinum was restored to its owner or restitution made.

He took the pains to explain most carefully to those simple minds why and how they might be accomplices. He preached not only good Christian Doctrine, good philosophy and good theology, but good sound logic and common sense. Therefore they would all kneel and unite in imploring the intercession of the Blessed Virgin to aid in removing the blot from the good name of the parish by asking her Divine Son, Our Lord Jesus Christ, to bring to repentance the guilty ones. Hymns cannot accomplish what all this will.

D. C. STAPLETON.

Students of Gaelic owe a debt of gratitude for the revival of interest in it, to the Germans. The names of Zeuss, Ebel, Zimmer, Windisch and Thurneysen are known to every Gael. Professor Kuno Meyer, of Liverpool University, has just published a collection of hitherto unedited ancient Irish tales and poems, dating from the seventh to the fourteenth century, illustrative of the gradual growth of the old Gaelic Saga centering round Finn and the Finna.

A M E R I C A

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1910.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1910, and published weekly by The America Press, New York, President, THOMAS J. CAMPBELL; Secretary, MICHAEL J. O'CONNOR; Treasurer, J. J. WILLIAMS.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Sq., W., New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

Our Jails

Modern science seems very often like a game of ten-pins. Many of its theories have little to stand on, and are apparently set up only to be upset. Very often they are knocked over, just to sweep the alley. Thus, for instance, biology was busy telling us that man, both body and soul, was merely a mechanism; that he was absolutely the creature of his environment; that he had no soul, no mind, no will; that his thoughts and desires and acts were only the results of an initial impulse imparted long ago in the uncalculable eons of time; that the moral law was a fabrication; that sin was a myth, and that crime would be dealt with by surgery and so on. Now all this nonsense is contemptuously tossed aside, not professionally, but merely as a preliminary to what he had to say, by the distinguished President of the International Prison Commission, Sir Evelyn Ruggles-Brise, K. C. B., who tells us that this materialistic idea of the nature of man, instead of being scientific, "has been the greatest obstacle of our day to true progress." He informed the Congress of Penologists which met at Washington recently, that he and his associates had examined three thousand of the worst specimens of English convicts, men sentenced to penal servitude and guilty of every form of crime. "With regard to each, we have," he says, "tabulated no less than ninety-six statements, that is measurements, family history, mental and bodily characteristics, etc.; and we are able to say that, so far, no evidence whatever has emerged from this investigation of criminal types such as Lombroso and his disciples have declared to exist. As a matter of fact," he continues, "both with regard to measurements and the presence of physical anomalies in criminals, these statistics present a startling conformity with similar statistics of the law-abiding classes. The results of this investigation will be perhaps what most of us would have anticipated, but as scientific data they will serve to break down the vulgar superstition or tradition that criminals are a special type and as such beyond the reach of reform."

"Vulgar superstition"! and "scientific investigation impeding progress," forsooth! We thought that the first was a label reserved for the advocates of the rights of religion, and that superstition and science were necessarily irreconcilable opposites. The truth is that there is really no conflict between science and religion, and never can be. The clash occurs only between the counterfeits of one or the other.

The International Prison Congress before which these important pronouncements were made is no mean body. It was organized in London forty years ago at the suggestion of an American, Dr. E. C. Wines, and meets quinquennially. It is essentially diplomatic, and its delegates make official reports to their governments. At the Budapest Congress of 1905 an invitation was given them by President Roosevelt to meet in this country, and on October 2 of this year, President Taft welcomed them to Washington.

In the opening address, the President of the Commission, after making it clear that the worst criminal was capable of being influenced by the ministrations of religion, insisted that although prisons should have a penal and deterrent purpose in view, sentimentalists to the contrary notwithstanding, their main object should be reformation. In that respect, says the Report of the Congress, published in the Survey of November 5, Americans have little to be proud of in their penal institutions. "In less than half our American States is there any real reformatory work done among prisoners." By our methods of dealing with them we are breeding and confirming them as criminals. In the iron-barred cells—menageries the Europeans called them—there were found the physical antithesis of the reformatory ideals for which Americans stood. The visitors saw abuses which most of the governments of Europe would not tolerate for a day. The Secretary of the Howard Association of London said "the great conviction which thrust itself upon the mind of every foreign delegate with whom I have spoken was the extraordinary qualities of the reformatories and the extraordinary defects of the town and county jails. Every jail I saw ought to be wiped off the face of the earth." The herding together of criminals of all classes, the enforced idleness or useless occupations, the frightfully unhygienic conditions, so fruitful of tuberculosis, the relinquishment of prison management to venal politicians, the extravagant size of the jails in which thousands are incarcerated, and other things beside, not only sink our jail population of 100,000 able-bodied men and women deeper in crime, but result in sending them out after their term of imprisonment to wreak vengeance upon the nation at large, only to have them return again to become worse than before.

Is there not a lesson in all this for those who scoff at religion; and also an exhortation for religious people, priests and laity alike, to take up a work in which so much can be done for the nation and for humanity at large?

Socialism

The new Congress, elected November 8, counts as one of its members-elect Victor Berger of Milwaukee, the first representative to be chosen to our country's lower legislative house as a Socialist and on a Socialist platform. Press reports chronicle certain other details of this same election which seem to lend a measure of assurance to the claim made by Charles Edward Russell, Socialist author and Socialist candidate for Governor of New York on that fateful Tuesday. For years the Socialist vote has been steadily increasing. Unfavorable conditions, it is true, here in the United States have not made the progress of the party as smooth as that enjoyed by it in other lands, and its fight has been a hard, uphill one. But the election returns of November 8 show it to be in every State in the Union, with the possible exception of Vermont, the third strongest political party in the nation, and one has to go back but to 1896 to find its forces thought scarcely worth considering. In that year the Socialists were the sixth national party in order of strength.

Mr. Russell may have yielded to an impulsive enthusiasm when he affirmed: "From now on the Socialistic party is going to wage a winning fight." Still he seems to have a keener appreciation of the situation than his party associates usually show when he confesses that this year's increase in the Socialistic vote was not due entirely to a genuine growth of party strength. The existing economic conditions bringing about an intolerable increase in the cost of living, have been eagerly seized upon by professing Socialists as offering an opportunity to exploit projects of reform which no more belong to Socialism as such than they do to the teachings of Confucius. Shrewdly harping upon these reforms they have been successful in gaining an audience for Socialism. Heretofore the average working man was fairly prosperous and comfortable and his native common sense forbade him to give heed to Socialist theories. Now that he has been allured by the glitter of reform in economic conditions held out to him by Socialist speakers, will the American workingman who cast his last ballot for the party remain loyal to its principles?

Mr. Russell assures us that he will and that his brothers, still true to old idols, will follow his example and seek the remedy for adverse economic conditions in Socialism. Neither of the leading parties, he affirms, will be able to break away from the policy that has prevailed. The Republicans have already evinced their inability to work reform and relief from extortionate taxation. The Democrats, to whom a long-suffering people appear to be turning with a prayer for economy and justice and peace, will prove equally unfitted for the house cleaning which years of corrupt practices make imperative—and then, so argues Mr. Russell, Socialism's day of triumph will dawn.

There might be reason to dread the forecast which Mr. Russell's optimism so confidently utters, were one not aware that a motive entirely distinct from that assigned by him has played a weighty part in the recent elections. There is discontent in the camps of the old parties, and disunion. And in the bitterness of factional strife there has been a breaking of political party ties such as the nation has not witnessed in years. As a result many voted for the Socialist candidates in every district in the country simply because they wished to emphasize their dissatisfaction with both the old parties. But out of the struggle there have come new leaders and brave leaders and clean, strong leaders who will know how to work out the problems facing us to-day and to organize economy, efficiency and progress in administration without reverting to the fallacies of Socialism. Economic and social reform there must be, of course, but not a reform that will spell the ruin of national life and the throttling of national spirit and energy.

Well Paid Apostles

We are indebted to a friend for the Monthly Magazine of the New York City Missions and Tract Society. We find it most improving reading. First, it corrects the idea of some discontented people, that our charities are mismanaged, and that we have a lot to learn in this matter from Protestants. The report of the Society's Treasurer shows the expenditure for September to have been $2,612.53, of which $589.08, more than 22 per cent., went for administration. What an outcry there would be if 22 per cent. of the outlay of St. Vincent de Paul's Society went for administration! For work among the Italians, very dear to the subscribers since it means the robbing them of their faith, only $671.72 was spent, exceeding expenses of administration by only a little more than $80; and as no details of expenditure are given, one may presume that the workers get the lion's share of it. One does not need a very vivid imagination to realize what our Catholic workers among the Italians would be able to show for a monthly revenue of about $700.

Second, it shows how pleasant a thing it is to be connected with the New York City Mission. The first article is an account of eight months' European travel by one who seems to be a pillar. Perhaps he paid his own expenses: perhaps he did not. His fervent gratitude to the directors for his leave of absence, makes one suspect the latter to be the case. He is a doctor of divinity, and tells how it was his "privilege" to be in Rome at the time of the Roosevelt episode. What particular privilege there was about it, is not comprehended easily. Perhaps he is now writing that it is his "privilege" to be in New York during the Roosevelt collapse. He tells his readers how Cardinal Merry del Val is a blunderer and the Pope, a "puppet;" he talks of Cardinal "Rampollo," the "German Encyclical," and shows himself generally to have in a remarkable degree the minister's capacity of getting misinformed. He then had another "privilege," that of seeing in Constantinople how superior is Islamism under the Young Turks to Christianity in Rome.

Third, it shows how such societies are still supported by a deft trading on the horror of popery still to be found in Protestant minds. The second article expatiates on Jesuits, monks, nuns, telling how they have been expelled from Portugal, which is not true, for not a few are in prison; and how in the case of the Jesuits their fate is due to their "malignant and persistent political scheming." It ends with the benevolent hope that the Jesuits in this country will behave themselves and not compel the Republic, which is the peculiar possession of the New York City Mission, to use similar severe measures. And so the money rolls in.

Miss Petre and the "Times"

We all know the old story of the bull in the corn-field. When Mr. A. thought it was his bull in Mr. B.'s field he was quite unconcerned, did not see what could be done, and had no doubt that fences out of repair had let the bull in. When he was made to understand that the case was just the reverse, that the field was his and the bull Mr. B.'s, his view of it was also changed. It became clear to him that Mr. B. must be held responsible for all the damage.

When the anti-Catholic bull is rioting in the Catholic field the public press is undisturbed. Priests may be murdered, nuns may be insulted, religious of both sexes may be imprisoned, and the newspapers' verdict is: "It serves them right. Are they not corrupt? Have they not subterraneous passages and dungeons? Are they not enemies of the new régime?" And it turns to chronicle aviation meets and other topics of interest. Should a Ferrer meet after fair trial the punishment of his crimes against the State and social order, columns of agony appear day after day, for there is one law for the anti-Catholic bull in the field, and another for the Catholic bull in the anti-Catholic field.

The London Times gave currency lately to the statement that the Jesuits in Portugal had practised all illegal "monasterial intrigues and seclusions," whatever these may be. The assertion was challenged and proofs of it demanded by a well-known Jesuit, but he got no satisfaction. Miss Maud Petre is refused the Sacraments until she gives a required assurance that she has given up the Modernism with which she has been dallying so long, and the Times prints an open letter from her on the subject and rushes to her defence in a leader more than a column in length. And yet this is a purely domestic question. Miss Petre does not seem distressed over it, and certainly the leader writer of the Times has no appreciation of sacraments he has lived and will die without. But the Catholic bull is busy and it behooves the Times to belabor it.

"The agents of the Vatican who excommunicated the Abbé Loisy and drove Father Tyrrell into his grave are not yet satisfied. Father Tyrrell's friends must suffer too." It is absolutely safe to say that this bumptious writer knows nothing of Loisy's views regarding our Divine Lord, which put him necessarily outside the Church, nor could he give a decent résumé of Tyrrell's Modernism. Neither the Vatican nor its agents punish friendship. The lady who has forced herself upon public notice is a notorious co-operator in Tyrrell's heresy, his defender now that he is dead. Co-operation in guilt is recognized by all law as deserving punishment, and one cannot escape the consequences of his co-operation by calling it friendship.

The Times writer complains that the merits of Miss Petre's family in the past, have not been allowed to weigh against her offence. Suppose they had been allowed to do so, could not the Times have brought up the stale old charge that the Church has one law for the great, another for the lowly, and said: "Had Miss Petre been a mere Miss Smith, she could not have got off so easily"? But there is little use in expostulating when it has been determined to put us in the wrong. Pius X gets his rebuke, the customary allusion to Galileo is dragged in, the Times writer drops a bitter tear over the blunders of the Curia and closes his thumping of the Catholic bull, resonantly.

What French Catholics Demand

The campaign of falsehood is still being waged against Catholics by the rationalist free-thinkers of France. Speaking in parliament some months ago, M. Doumergue, Minister of Instruction in the Briand Cabinet, made the astonishing assertion that the Catholics of France claimed the right to force Catholic instruction upon every child in the land. "Their ultimate purpose," he added, "is to use the opportunity this training of the children would give them to acquire a dominant power in the country thus to rule the State and foist upon the people Church influence to the detriment of their free Republic."

The malicious untruth was splendidly answered by Senator de Lamarzelle in a gathering of Catholic lawyers, who were present at the thirty-fourth Congress of the Catholic Bar Association, which convened in Valence on October 26. The entire session of the Congress was devoted to the consideration of the School Question. Senator de Lamarzelle, in a striking address, defined clearly the platform on which the Catholics of France stand in their demand for freedom of instruction. "The Church does not ask what M. Doumergue has falsely charged," he said. "What she does demand, and what she will never cease to insist upon enjoying, is the absolute right to train her own children in Catholic ways—a right respected in every genuinely free land. The State not only should not attempt to interfere with her in the exercise of this right, but it should render her the needed assistance and support to enable her to fulfil this duty. What the Church demands is justice for her children, only justice—the justice dealt to her in England, in Holland and in Germany. Grant her justice and peace will reign and the Church will live in that same harmony with the State which rules in England, in Holland and in Germany.”

On All Saints' Day, the chapel of the Castle of Count Holstein-Ledreborg was blessed by Pastor Kirchhoff—superior of the Congregation founded by the Blessed Grignen de Montfort—in Roskilde, Denmark. The last time this chapel was dedicated was in the eighteenth century to Lutheranism, in the presence of King Christian VI. By permission of the present King of Denmark, and on the payment of an indemnity to the parish, Count Holstein is enabled to have this chapel for Catholic service. It was remarked, as showing a change in the times, that at this solemn and interesting service—the return of the first church edifice to the Catholic religion—the American Minister and Mrs. Egan, occupied the place of honor. They were the only guests, outside the family present.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A PROCLAMATION.

This year of 1910 is drawing to a close. The records of population and harvests, which are the index of progress, show vigorous National growth and the health and wellbeing of our communities throughout this land and in our possessions beyond the seas. These blessings have not descended upon us in restricted measure, but overflow and abound. They are the blessings and bounty of God.

We continue to be at peace with the rest of the world. In all essential matters our relations with other peoples are harmonious, with an evergrowing reality of friendliness and depth of recognition of mutual dependence. It is especially to be noted that during the past year great progress has been achieved in the cause of arbitration and the peaceful settlement of international disputes.

Now, therefore, I, William Howard Taft, President of the United States of America, in accordance with the wise custom of the Civil Magistrate since the first settlements in this land and with the rule established from the foundation of this Government, do appoint Thursday, November 24, 1910, as a day of National thanksgiving and prayer, enjoining the people upon that day to meet in their churches for the praise of Almighty God and to return heartfelt thanks to Him for all His goodness and loving kindness.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the City of Washington this 5th day of November, in the year of our Lord, 1910, and of the independence of the United States, the one hundred and thirty-fifth.

WILLIAM H. TAFT.

By the President: Alvey A. Adee, Acting Secretary of State.

SOME FRIENDS OF MINE.

I.

THE PATRIARCH.

Old and gray and bent is he with the snows of many a year. He has voyaged forth on numberless nights in rain and cold, like Peter, intent on his fishing. He is seventy-nine now, and though we are all more or less coated with brine and soaked in sea-lore, no one in the village ever presumes to give him points about a dory, the laying of a lobster pot or the nasty spots of the channel. Forty odd years of rowing up and down the river give a man an expert knowledge of the changeful waters. Even now on a pleasant day you may see the old gentleman rowing out for a few fish or a lobster or two for a friend, for the Patriarch has a large following among our summer residents, who declare that the lobsters lured to his pots are the choicest ever eaten, that no one can bake clams like him, and that the fish he catches are worthy to grace the table of the King of All Ireland.

His principal place of resort is our local Agora or Forum, vulgarly known as "the square." There you may behold the venerables of the place solemnly considering matters of State. The Patriarch is the chairman of all such sessions; his word is final and his fiat establishes a precedent. He has a positive genius for picking out the sunniest spot in winter and the shadiest one in summer, where like "the old man eloquent" he relates his stirring tales of flood and storm.

The Patriarch is a Celt, and he tells a story, as of old the bards of his native land chanted of battles and love, in the court of the chieftain. His narrative has all the rush and color of a sage; in fact, it may be said of him, as Newman said of the great author, that he has in a large sense the faculty of expression. Such a wonderful vocabulary has the old man, such an unerring eye for the weak point of an argument, such an array of proofs and instances, and finally such a rapier-like sarcasm when no other weapon will avail him! Woe betide the man who enters the lists against him, for if the Patriarch feels himself worsted in the fray, he calls to his aid Irish wit and spits his adversary like a skilled fencer. I have known many sons of Erin who have seen little of schools and have been compelled to a life of drudgery, and as I listen to their natural eloquence and appreciate the crude intellectual power behind their rugged brows, I fancy sometimes what an Irish senate might have been had the Emerald Isle been permitted these five centuries past to keep her place among the nations. What a pity it is that these treasures of intelligence and wit have been wasted while their possessors were condemned to the hardest manual labor!

Everybody knows the Patriarch. He is as much a landmark as the steeple of the Congregational meeting-house, which may be seen for miles around. You may discern him from afar, his back bent almost double by age and accident. Always he carries his trusty cane, useful alike for support and emphasis. In wet weather he fares forth in an enormous pair of rubber boots, and in winter his visored cap and red mittens are like the helmet of Navarre. The Doctor, the Notary and the Captain are all village notables, but the Patriarch is an Institution.

He came from Ireland more years ago than one cares to number, when one of his race and creed was as welcome in the village as a Borneo head-hunter at a sewing-circle. He was straight and strong in those days, ever ready to fight for Ireland, or the Pope, or both, with the help of God! And fight he did with tongue and arms, as if he were the sole representative of his people in a hostile land and their honor depended on the quality of his courage. Others might palter or shuffle, but none of such methods for him. Like MacMahon at the battle of Sebastopol, his motto was: "Here I am and here I stay."

In those gloomy days that tried the souls of men, the sight of a priest was like that of a white blackbird and his visits to the village like those of angels, few and far between. But when he did come it was to the Patriarch's house, and there Mass was celebrated and the Father entertained with good hospitality and heartiness. A humble abode, that low, gable-roofed structure overhanging the river, but even in old age it possesses like its owner, a dignity all its own.

The years have been heavy upon him of late. He has been tried like Job. His children have been taken away and sorrow has been piled upon sorrow. His aged arms cannot bend to the oars as of yore and his means are scanty. But withal his keen, blue eye is not dimmed or his strong voice weakened. The spirit of the ancient is stronger than the flesh, and he faces life and death alike fearlessly.

We of the younger generation, irrespective of race or creed, are proud of the Patriarch, as if he were some century-old oak or antique mansion built in Revolutionary times, but I fear we fail to appreciate the stark courage and unalloyed faith of the man in the grim years that are past. We listen to the stories of his battles with stormy sea and bitter hate as we do to the breakers some wild night, while we are safe and warm before the fire, but we do not know what it was to pass through those experiences. We villagers are sad gossips, I fear. The smallest rumor started at the Post Office travels up the street like wild-fire and speedily assumes gigantic proportions. In this way a cloud of tradition has grown up about the Patriarch. While some of these legends would lead one to believe him to have been "a man of his hands," I fail to recall one that show him to have been a weakling.

He even lives in the realms of Art, like Rembrandt's noted models, for a celebrated painter who has sojourned so long among us that we consider him one of our own, has limned the Patriarch in many a canvas. You may light on his weather-beaten visage as you stroll through some great gallery, sketched to the life as the fisherman returning from the deep counting the results of the night's venture.

In the winter time we take life easily, for there is little to do, but in the summer you would never recognize the village, so transfigured is it with the crowds of wealthy folk who have learned to love our rocks and sands, and the song of the sea so well, that they come thousands of miles to enjoy them. These people pay assiduous court to the Patriarch, and hardly a day passes when he is not entertaining a group at his doorstep or riding about in a motor car or trim cart, as perfectly at home as if he were lecturing his cronies in the square, or going down the river in his dory. They take great delight in the old man's wit and racy conversation, and also in his terrible memory that preserves the exact history of all who have lived here, or visited here, these four decades gone. It is an ill-day for the upstart who boasts about his forebears in the presence of the Patriarch; he will have his genealogy relentlessly laid bare for the daws to peck at. Not that the old gentleman is a scandal-monger or takes pleasure in exposing family skeletons, but he has an abiding hatred for sham and pretence and cannot contain himself when they are paraded before him.

Somewhat pathetic is the old-bent figure trudging painfully along the road, carrying on his back the heavy load of years and trouble. As I look at him and think of the hardships he has endured, the buffeting of waves and the strokes of adversity, I realize with a new meaning that expression: "There were giants in those days." What a frame of steel, what a heart of oak he must have had to survive them all and still be among us with faculties so little impaired and a gaiety as constant as the bubbling of a mountain spring.

My other friends I hope will fare well when they cross the Bar and meet the Pilot face to face, but I have no fears for the Patriarch. I feel sure that Peter will take him by the hand and know him for a dauntless old fighter for the Faith and a fellow-fisherman. I cannot help feeling that the great Apostle, who like the Patriarch, was quick of temper and warm of heart, will say to him: "Come old friend to salute the Captain. I bid you a hearty and eternal Welcome Home."

CHAS. W. COLLINS.

LITERATURE

The Green Patch. By BETTINA VON HUTTEN. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Co.

In this story of to-day there are mainly seven characters—two that are merely lay figures—and five that stand out in clear relief. Mrs. Christopher Lambe, the conventional English matron, and Hugh Gunning, the conventional English gentleman, are the lay figures. The other five are all marked by the note of unconventionality—and they are interesting in so far as they fly in the face of accepted conventions. Christopher Lambe tires of his wife, his foggy English home and his three daughters. Here is the way in which he informs his wife of the resolution:

"You wouldn't mind very much if I went away for good, would you?"

"If you went away for good?"

"Yes."

"You mean leave home and children?"

"Again he said 'yes,' watching her with a mild degree of anxiety that would to another look extremely disproportionate to the situation."

So will it seem disproportionate to the reader: which is precisely the effect intended by the author. Throughout the story there is a want of proportion between the conduct of the protagonists and the circumstances in which they act. This is the secret of the Countess Von Hutten's success with "Pam" and "Pam Decides."

The three daughters present a startling variety. Sylvia is as beautiful as she is stupid; beauty and stupidity could no farther go. She is generally discovered falling asleep, unless, indeed, she is just waking up. Susan, the second daughter, only a little less beautiful, is spiteful and Machiavellian. The heroine of the story is the youngest daughter, Daphne. She is homely; the author cannot quite get over that fact and worries about it with persistent iteration. None of these girls seems to have the slightest appreciation of the moral law. They have the refinement of pagans, like their worthy father, and the morality of degraded savages—not savages, mind you, but degraded savages. Their absolute irresponsibility coupled with their state of twentieth century civilization makes them startling figures.

Thus it is that without the least compunction Susan breaks her troth with Gunning on the eve of her wedding day, and at once marries a romantic "Glaour," whom she hardly knows by sight. That a woman should break her engagement and marry another man is neither strange nor startling whether in fiction or in life. But that she should do this with the insouciance of a woman changing her hat is the touch that startles and confounds. Daphne, the heroine,—a liar and a thief in her teens—consoles the rejected Gunning. After all, as she reflects, she has to marry somebody. The happy pair, duly married, go to Ceylon, and there Daphne meets her "affinity," as the newspapers would say. Here is the description of the rascal:

"In another generation I should perforce describe him as being like a Greek God. His head, set on a strong neck, was small and well-shaped, his fair hair curled closely around it, and his pellucid violet gray eyes were twice as large as most people's, although the smooth, long lids were lazily heavy. . . . A magnificent face, noble and strong."

In hinting at his being a Greek God, the baroness must have surely been thinking of the ox-eyed Juno. A man with a small head and with eyes "twice as large as most people's" justifies the opinion that in all exceptional beauty there must be some irregularity.

For the sake of the story, let us accept the wondrous beauty of this creature with the excessive eyes. Daffy concludes that he is the one man for her.

"It's too bad I shall have to be divorced," she told herself, "but that won't matter." Daphne thought it was "quaint" to give up poor Gunning, just as her sister had given him up, for a handsomer man. The fact of his being married was to her only a detail.

It is thus that this "chip of the old block" breaks the news to her husband: "I know that you will not mind, so I can tell you in a few words. I want to marry Mr. Skene, Hughie; so will you please divorce me?"

This casual way of dealing with the most serious situations leads us to think that what we took to be American humor in the following lines may be really the composition of some writer in the Pam school of fiction.

"Little Archibald McBeth
Burned his nice mamma to death.
Archibald is full of tricks;
Ain't he cute! he's only six."

Daphne does not get a divorce. The practical Gunning buys off the the ox-eyed Skene for a round sum. Why should not civilized people buy their wives too?

Also, the Greek God—alas poor Ouida of "another generation"—loses an eye; but wearing a green patch he remains beautiful to the last.

The book presents pictures of life as it never was, as it never will be, and as, under no conceivable circumstance, it ought to be.

FRANCIS J. FINN, S.J.

Max. By KATHERINE CECIL THURSTON. New York and London: Harper Brothers.

This is fifth on the list of the Bookman's six best sellers, regarding which an evening contemporary remarks: "For very shame the fact should no longer be made so prominent that the great American public generally does not know how to distinguish between good books and bad. In this list there is not one good book. Three at least of the novels are utter rubbish." We would not pronounce "Max" utter rubbish, but it is safe to assert that it is not in any sense a good book. The hero or heroine—she is usually "he"—is a Russian princess masquerading as a boy artist in Paris, in order apparently to enable the author to feed the tastes of the prurient with descriptions of the haunts and habits of Bohemia. She is long, if not strong, on description, magnifying things the most trivial with a grandiose solemnity. It takes pages to get Max up or down stairs and chapters to fix him in his room or let him look through the window. There is little plot, the action consisting in roaming through cafés and dancing-halls in search of what is called life, but which is always some phase of more or less sickly eroticism. Blake, an Irishman, who is conveniently blind to Max's obvious disguise, conducts the quest to the last chapter, when Max, now revealed as Maxine, ends the Odyssey by electing to accompany her guide to "the white sky and the opal sea and the sea-weed that smells like violets"—in County Clare. This, she says, is Life; which may be true, but the Maxines would hardly find it so.

The writer has the literary knack, the shell of style, but lacks the soul of it, sincerity. The book is not artistically so good nor morally so bad as it might have been, for much the same reason that debarred Blake from feeling at home in Bohemia: "It is not for nothing I have countless God-fearing generations behind me."

M. K.

Voices from Erin and Other Poems. By DENIS A. MCCARTHY. New edition, revised and enlarged. Boston: Little, Brown & Company. Price, $1.00, net.

As the title indicates the author sings in this volume with special reference to an Irish audience. But the Celtic airs are interspersed freely with lyrics on purely Catholic themes and on subjects that transcend national sentiment. This little book of verses, therefore, ought to be welcomed by all who enjoy the lilt of a good song and are interested in the work and progress of a living singer. Especially, however, should this welcome come from Irishmen and their descendants and from Catholics. For Mr. McCarthy has lit the flame of his inspiration at Catholic altars. He seems to have followed the advice of the early Christian poet, Paulinus Petrocorius:

"Castalias poscant lymphatica pectora lymphas:
Altera pocla decent homines Jordane renatos."

And the remarkable feature in these poems to us is that we prefer the devotional lyrics to the others. This is not usually the case; for devotional verse, while it may be unexceptionable in its sentiment, is very often wanting in the essential conditions of a good poem. It too frequently falls back upon the trite phrase and epithet, or is snarled with ugly inversions, or simpers in a conventional cant that is libellous of the religious spirit in man. The personal note of sincerity in Mr. McCarthy's religious verses, especially in his "Eve of All Souls," "Day and Night," and "O Little Lamp," does not urge him so often as in his Irish songs into commonplace expressions and stock rhythms. The songs themselves are delightful and as specimens of a class are admirable. They have the true lyric quality of literally singing themselves and supplying their own music. But they have been composed for simple ears and have been cast in a mould that is somewhat outworn. If they suffer in comparison with Mr. McCarthy's religious verses it is because we seem to see in the latter a more fastidious and delicate apprehension of the attributes which belong to good poetry.

The author appears to be conscious of the difference in his "The Minor Poet:"

"Oh, not for him the laurel wreath,
And not for him the poet's crown;
But his the fine, free air to breathe,
Untainted of the town!
And his to comfort broken lives
And spirits over-wrought with wrong,
And bring to men and weans and wives
The solace of a song!"

We are reluctant to accept this pièce justificative, and we question whether Mr. McCarthy intends it to be taken seriously. Careless rapture and unpremeditated art connote freedom, indeed; but there is a higher freedom that is won through toilsome effort and vigorous discipline. Apart from all considerations of personal glory, the laurel wreath and the poet's crown, verses, wrought in the freedom achieved by labor, stand a better chance of comforting "broken lives" than the hurried improvisation which aims at a general effect and is indeliberate and easy in details.

JAMES J. DALY, S.J.

Mr. Ingleside. By E. V. LUCAS. New York: The Macmillan Company. Price, $1.35, net.

Mr. Lucas enjoys the reputation of being the literary heir, with modern modifications, of Charles Lamb. The association, of course, cannot but be flattering to Mr. Lucas; but it has disadvantages in suggesting a comparison and tempting critics to judge the contemporary writer relatively to an acknowledged classic of the past instead of to possible classics of the future. A new prophet in literature had better weave his own mantle: that of a great predecessor is always a misfit, being generally by far too large.

If we forget that Mr. Lucas is the shadow of a great name and judge him on his own merits, or with only those exactions that inevitable comparison with living writers demands, we shall find him pleasant enough. He is discursive, well informed in certain lines, and urbane. He has a mild interest in all the social, political, economic and religious movements that are stirring in English society, and writes about them in a spirit of detachment that helps him to preserve unflinching smoothness and a drawing-room neutrality of manner. He is Mr. Shaw, or Mr. Chesterton, or Mr. Belloc without conviction, which is the strongest way of affirming that he is not any of them at all. But, like them, he takes up the intricacies of popular problems and finds a pleasure in trailing their sinuosities; however, whereas the three writers mentioned above endeavor to reach the end of their threads and tie them together, Mr. Lucas allows them to hang loose in the outer darkness. He is not so serious as they; and, although his desultory airs may be reminiscent of a classic essayist, we are inclined to the belief that he is not the gainer from a literary point of view.

"Mr. Ingleside" was not intended to be a novel. It contains just the measure of narrative and description necessary to introduce in a natural way a variety of topics for discussion among a group of men of differing characters and walks of life, drawn together by some subtle bond of sympathy. They are pleasant enough persons, intellectually mediocre, and reflecting in their views the peculiar experiences and environment of their lives. They pose as observers and philosophers, but they are only amateurs at best with the amateur's fatal facility for covering up great voids of ignorance with a bright sally of cleverness. In reading a book like this we ask ourselves why the author takes it for granted that religious conviction of a definite kind is incompatible with intellectual force. With names like those of Gladstone, Hope-Scott, the Marquis of Ripon, and of many others still fresh in our memory, not to mention the living, we are unable to explain why so many English authors write as if England were a kind of Cooper Institute on a Ferrer anniversary. This is a serious reflection on the social and intellectual standing of the authors involved. Miss Edgeworth would have advised them to improve their company by improving their minds. We should like Mr. Lucas, in his next book, to hint at the existence of a class of men of whom Mr. Belloc, Lord Halifax and Mr. Balfour may be chosen at random as fair representatives

J. J. D.

Pietro of Siena. A Drama. By STEPHEN PHILLIPS. New York: The Macmillan Company. Price, $1.00, net.

The latest play by Mr. Phillips does not enhance his reputation as a poet. He deserves credit for his endeavors to perpetuate the literary quality in English drama and to maintain classic standards in a branch of art that has practically surrendered distinction and dignity for the sake of indiscriminate applause. But his early promise seems to be doomed to unfulfilment. He has not become an influence and a force in a revival of letters. His earliest work remains his best, and he has not grown from more to more. He may be industrious, but he is not inspired; and, if this be so, his verse will at its best achieve a certain degree of mechanical perfection, but shall always lack the surprises and intuitions of an art that is not all premeditated.

"Pietro of Siena" is smooth and flawless in its pentameters. The requirements of the stage and the best traditions of the literary theatre are carefully observed in the speeches, exits and entrances, the procession of scenes, and the division into acts. But the whole play is unreal. The story is unreal; the characters are unreal,—so many gaudily dressed puppets; the action is unreal; the speeches unreal. The bow of the Elizabethans cannot be bent by Mr. Phillips. His efforts to perform the feat are laudable; but he succeeds only in catching their mannerisms, their confident strut, their obeisances and flourishes, their lordly and arrogant airs; but, when it comes to shooting the arrow, performance waits vainly upon all these boastful preliminaries. "Pietro of Siena" is a good academic "exercise." Its plot is hackneyed and, as it is unfolded here, does not improve in the hands of the playwright. Some of the verse has the merit of possessing more than ordinary music and beauty of imagery; but such lines as thus attract our attention are just as likely as not to come from the lips of a character, or in the midst of a situation, where their very beauty is an incongruity and a blemish. J. J. D.

Flamsted Quarries. By MARY E. WALLER. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.

The same clean sentiment, the same sympathy for the poor and the afflicted, the same kindly humor are to be found in Mrs. Waller's latest story as characterize her previous books. A Catholic priest is much in evidence throughout the volume, and he is the one heroic person of the story. Mrs. Waller deserves well of us for treating matters Catholic so kindly; though many of our faith will be somewhat disappointed in the melodramatic surroundings of the good priest's death. Somehow it does not ring true. The story, all in all, is wholesome, although at times the sentiment is forced. While the plot grows in interest to the very end, it seems to lack something of the spontaneous charm which one finds in "The Wood Carver of 'Lympos." It is hard indeed for the best writer to "recapture the first fine careless rapture." F. J. F.

Gardens Near the Sea. By ALICE LOUNSBERRY. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Company. Pp. XIII, 274. Illustrated. Price, $4.20, net.

Wind-swept, sandy shores, however inviting from other points of view, are not the chosen retreat for all the members of the floral kingdom; yet, if the home grounds are to have more of the air of stability than a tent city wears, the cunning of the gardener must devise a way of coaxing perennials to brave the winter, contend successfully with the winds, and contribute their indispensable aid to the adornment of the seaside residence. What time, outlay and experience have taught others is here brought together, not in a callous commercial spirit, but with the sympathetic glow of an artist's soul, alive to the beautiful, rejoicing in it, and eager to share that joy with others. We have to admit, in strict confidence, of course, that we anticipated a good deal of "special pleading," as it were, that a garden near the sea is beautiful, whether it can be or not. But now we have learned, thanks to the enlightening letter-press and especially to the "speaking" illustrations, of what actually has been accomplished near the sea. Eight of these illustrations are in color, but the remaining sixty-four are so well executed that they hardly suffer by comparison. Shrubs, vines, bulbs, all come in for honorable mention, for all are willing to contribute, if only invited in due form. We have often marveled why the lily and the iris, to mention only two, receive such scant attention in American gardens, yet here we learn that the seaside garden may enjoy to the full their unrivaled beauties. May the seed fall on good ground. * * *

BOOKS RECEIVED

Persia and Its People. By Ella C. Sykes. New York: The Macmillan Co. Net $2.50.
 The Silent Isle. By Arthur Christopher Benson. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Price $1.50.
 Bible Symbols. Designed and Arranged to Familiarize the Child with the Great Events of Bible History, and to Stimulate Interest in Holy Writ. Arranged by Rev. Thomas C. Gaffney, Ph.D., D.D. Drawings by Max Bihn and others. Boston and Chicago: The John A. Hertel Co. Price $2.00.
 Sermons of St. Bernard. On Advent and Christmas. Compiled and Translated at St. Mary's Convent, York, from the Edition (1508) in Black-letter, of St. Bernard's Sermons and Letters. Introduction by Rt. Rev. J. C. Hedley, O.S.B. New York: Benziger Bros. Net 75 cents.
 The Old Mill on the Withrose. By Rev. Henry S. Spalding, S.J. New York: Benziger Bros. Net 85 cents.
 Ned Rieder. A Parochial School Story. By Rev. John A. Weiss. New York: Benziger Bros. Net 85 cents.
 Freddy Carr and His Friends. A Day-School Story. By Rev. R. P. Garrold, S.J. New York: Benziger Bros. Net 85 cents.
 Eric, or The Black Finger. By Mary T. Waggonman. Philadelphia: H. L. Kilner & Co. Net 75 cents.
 Rosemary, or Life and Death. By J. Vincent Huntington. A Reprint. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons.

Spanish Publications:

El Convite Eucarístico. Manual para la Comunión Frecuente. Entresacado de los Principales Autores que Han Escrito sobre esta Materia. Por el Padre Jesus Cornejo. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net $1.00.
 Los Martires de Uganda. Por un Padre de la Compañia de Jesus. St. Louis: B. Herder.

EDUCATION

The growth of the college classes in Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass., in the past three years, is so remarkable that it would seem to merit special notice. The number in attendance early in October in the four college years was 414. On the corresponding date last year the number was 357, and in 1908 it was 300. The college proper, therefore, shows a growth of more than a hundred students or more than 25 per cent. in two years. It is gratifying to note that the students of Philosophy alone, in the Senior and Junior years, number 140, and the Freshman class, including students who are called "College Specials," already numbered, on October 1, 160. These "College Specials," it should be said, are High School graduates who lack something of the classical requirements for entrance to the Latin or Greek courses of Holy Cross Freshman year, but who have at least the majority of their hours in Freshman courses and can easily make up, before graduation, their deficiency in Latin or Greek. They might be called "conditioned" Freshmen. Of the total attendance at Holy Cross, which, on October was 506, the boarders or resident students number 391, and the day-scholars or non-resident students number 115. These figures surpass all previous records, and it should be remembered that the previous maximum in the school was reached at a time when Holy Cross had two more preparatory classes than it has at present. The growth in the college department and its crowding out of the "Prep" school, which now numbers only 92, has changed the whole life of the institution. This may be better appreciated when it is noted that 180 private rooms for students are all occupied, and all except about a dozen have two tenants each, in other words about 330 of the resident students of Holy Cross are room-boarders.

The class of students graduated from this great Jesuit institution also made a new record for the college, and in fact all Catholic colleges in the country. It numbered 67. All of these had successfully completed the classical course, including Greek. For, as is known, only the classical course is maintained at Holy Cross, and all who receive the degree of Bachelor of Arts must complete the Greek, as well as the Latin course. Judging by obtainable statistics, there is no classical department in American non-Catholic colleges or universities, in which there are as many students following the "old-fashioned" Latin and Greek courses. We doubt if there are as many even in their Latin departments.

The Marquette University News Letter, a manner of chronicle, published semi-monthly by the Marquette University, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, gives the following interesting items in one of its October issues. In the new School of Journalism, which the University College of Economics opened on October 1, two courses are offered—one of four years, and one of two. In the former a degree will be granted, and a diploma or certificate will be awarded in the latter. Much attention will be given to theoretical and practical knowledge of newspaper work in its multiform phases. The elements of newspaper writing, reporting and correspondence, newsgathering and newswriting, newspaper editing, editorial writing, and special and feature work are some of the numerous subjects pertaining to journalism which will be treated in the new school.

A new and useful line of activity has been started in the School of Business Administration, also attached to the College of Economics. It is a Student's Employment Bureau. The bureau is intended to help students in such kind of work as is not incompatible with studies, and thus enable many to work their way through a course. The bureau will have a carefully systematized office equipment for the purpose of securing positions for as many students as require them. Three sets of cards will be distributed to hotels, business men, and private persons, for the purpose of knowing what positions are available. Another set of cards will be filed by students showing what sort of employment they need and what they can do.

SOCIOLOGY

There is a notion abroad among Protestants that the business of Christianity to-day is with social service rather than with dogma. This is of course the logical consequence of Protestantism, by way of the principle, it is no matter what a man believes, provided his life be right. Christianity is to be lowered to the level of a merely natural well doing, which is entirely contrary to the true Christian doctrine that natural well doing is to be lifted up to the supernatural order in Christ. According, therefore, to this truth, the true social work is to make men and women better Christians. Certain methods, apparently unconnected with spiritual agencies may be introduced for certain definite ends. But the non-connection must be only apparent, otherwise either failure or the weakening of faith must result. Hence the absolute social value of sodalities, confraternities, pious works, all of which have for their object the making of our Christian faith more and more practical in our daily lives. Among those one of the most popular and useful is The Holy Name Society, provided its constitution and rules be carefully observed. From time to time we are called upon to notice some splendid demonstration of its members. The latest was held in Washington. Six thousand members marched in procession on Sunday, Nov. 6 through Pennsylvania Avenue before the Papal Delegate. Six thousand men formed to a daily Christian life, are a power. While others are talking and dreaming let us get to work. As AMERICA pointed out a short time ago, we have the machinery, as good as can be desired, and do not need to take up the fads of Rationalism.

The ministers of various religious denominations of St. Louis met recently to consider plans for providing a better system of city parks. Responding to an invitation to address the meeting, the Rev. Francis J. O'Boyle, S.J., of St. Louis University, pointed out the healthy condition of the poorer classes in cities like Vienna and Munich, where ample parks are provided, as compared with the prevalence of disease and deformity among the poor in Liverpool, Dublin and other cities not properly equipped with open-air places of public recreation.

In an address before the Associated Charities of Boston last week, Archbishop O'Connell went on record as favoring imprisonment for parents who neglect their children. "The laws upon the statute books relating to abandoned children are many," said the distinguished Catholic Churchman of Boston, "but there is a singular absence of adequate legislation compelling parents to perform the natural duties which they owe to their offspring. A special house of labor for delinquent and neglectful parents, the profits to go for the support of the family, might prove to be a step in the right direction to bring many parents to a sense of their lawful obligations."

ECONOMICS

The commissioners of the United States are now in Ottawa discussing proposals for reciprocity with Canada. Whether the negotiations will come to anything is doubtful, as there is a strong feeling against it in most parts of Canada on both economic and national grounds. Besides, it touches the imperial question very closely, since reciprocity would mean a drawing towards the United States and a proportional loosening of the ties with the British Empire. This may have something to do with the desire of the United States for the change of trade relations, but such a motive is at most, only remote. The immediate motive on the part of the United States is the need of introducing Canadian food products and raw material into this country in greater abundance, and to open a wider field for American manufacturers. Things have changed greatly in thirty years. Once it was Canada that came to the United States asking for reciprocity, only to be repelled. Now the United States is asking it from Canada. All this confirms the great economic change that is coming over this country. It is no longer a producer for the rest of the world. It cannot produce enough for its own needs. Conservation may remedy this in part; but in future the United States must be reckoned among the manufacturing countries, of which it may become for a time the chief. For how long it is impossible to say, as the awakening of Asia must be reckoned with.

The Welland Canal from Port Dalhousie on Lake Ontario to Port Colborne on Lake Erie, has outlived its usefulness. It was constructed to accommodate vessels 150 feet long and was improved to receive vessels 270 feet in length. Such vessels are disappearing from the carrying trade of the great lakes and a new canal is necessary. One capable of receiving ships 800 feet long is proposed, from Jordan Harbor on Lake Ontario to Morgan Point on Lake Erie. Its line will lie about 20 to 30 miles to the west of the existing canal, and will be 5 miles shorter, being only 27 miles in length. Lake Erie is 326 feet above the level of Lake Ontario; the magnitude of the lock work in the proposed canal is therefore apparent. The cost of it will be some 30 million dollars. Moreover, its construction will make necessary the reconstruction of the canals along the St. Lawrence from Prescott to Montreal.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

Press cables from Rome state that Mgr. Sbaretti, Apostolic Delegate to the Dominion of Canada, has been appointed Secretary of the Congregation of Religious, and that he will be succeeded in Canada by Mgr. Stagni, Archbishop of Aquila. Mgr. Sbaretti left here for Rome early in the summer, and it was understood in Canada that he would not return in his official capacity. Archbishop Pellegrino Francesco Stagni is a Servite, born April 2, 1852, at Badrio, Diocese of Bologna. He was professed June 22, 1875; ordained priest Sept. 24, 1881; elected Prior General of the Servites July 23, 1901. He was consecrated May 28, 1907, and has been a Consultor of the Sacred Office since 1908. Mgr. Sbaretti, who succeeds in the Congregation of Religious the Abbot Janssens, O.S.B., was for several years auditor of the Apostolic Delegation at Washington, then Bishop of Havana for two years, and for the last eight years he has been Apostolic Delegate in Canada.

The ninth volume of the Catholic Encyclopedia, a great Church enterprise undertaken in 1905, as a result of repeated and urgent suggestion of the most thoughtful men in the Church in America, has just been published. Its editors, to keep in touch with the subscribers already receiving the work and to arouse the interest of many others who should recognize that the work will accomplish all that has been hoped for by the most ardent of its projectors and promoters, have issued a capital sketch of the progress of the publication up to date.

One is glad to note that they have wisely determined to make clear reference to a point that hitherto has not been appreciated as it should be. "It is," says one paragraph of the sketch, "in no sense an ordinary publisher's enterprise, as the Company issuing it has been organized for the sole purpose of publishing the Encyclopedia. The tone, policy, and the entire contents and make-up of the work are controlled absolutely by the Editors, who are also members of the Board of Directors of the Company. The other Directors were selected as practical men of affairs, and the entire board administers the business affairs of the Company through its regular meetings and those of the Executive Committee—composed entirely of Directors. As Directors they serve absolutely without remuneration—the editors and business management working together with the central idea of making the Encyclopedia a work that will command the pride of all Catholics and the respect of all non-Catholics. At the same time their aim is to conduct the affairs of the Company in a progressive manner, so that the work will be self-supporting and properly circulated throughout the world—thus realizing the purpose of its projectors."

The miraculously preserved body of St. Francis Xavier, the Apostle of the Indies, is treasured in the cathedral of Goa, Portuguese India, where, once in ten years, it is exposed for the veneration of the faithful. Preparations had been made long since to celebrate a Eucharistic Congress of the Bishops of the Far East in connection with the solemn decennial exposition of the saint's sacred body, which takes place in this month of November; but it remains to be seen what will be the attitude of the new Portuguese government towards Church functions. His Excellency, the Most Reverend Ladislaus M. Zaleski, Delegate Apostolic of the East Indies, and His Excellency, the Most Reverend Matthew d'Oliveira Xavier, Patriarch of the East Indies, were to attend. The imposing ceremonies were to have been concluded on November 25, that day being the four hundredth anniversary of the conquest of Goa from the Mohammedans.

It's an ill-wind that blows nobody some good. When Mayor Gaynor was shot he was taken to St. Mary's Hospital, Hoboken, which is in charge of the Sisters of the Poor of St. Francis. Much of the rapidity of his convalescence was due to the care with which the Sisters looked after his case. When he left the hospital he asked for his bill, and was told there was no charge. A number of prominent New York citizens without distinction of creed have now united to present the Sisters with a Thanksgiving offering in recognition of their services to the Mayor during his critical illness.

Eighteen Jesuits (six priests, two scholastics and ten lay-brothers), exiles from Portugal, arrived in New York, on Nov. 4. They confirm the accounts already printed in AMERICA of the treatment of the religious in Lisbon by the revolutionists. Ten of the group will go to California, two to Missouri, five to Canada, and one remains in New York.

The national convention of the American Federation of Catholic Societies opened on Sunday in New Orleans, with a Pontifical Mass at the Cathedral, celebrated by Archbishop Falconio, the Apostolic delegate. Bishop Morris, of Little Rock, preached the sermon. In the afternoon the cornerstone of the new Marquette University was laid by Archbishop Blenk, and Bishop McFaul, of Trenton, spoke. A mass meeting was held in the evening.

The Standing Committee of the Catholic Clerical managers of the National Schools in Ireland have once more communicated with the Chief Secretary, Mr. Birrell, regarding the unsatisfactory state of many of the school buildings and the reluctance of the Government to assist in remedying the defects. "Promises of help from the Treasury," they say, "are not kept, and Irish education in its financial aspect is being scandalously treated."

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

According to dispatches from Washington the State Department has received a cablegram from Henry T. Gage, United States Minister to Portugal, stating that Great Britain, Italy, France and Spain had notified the provisional government of Portugal that they were ready to transact business with it. Mr. Gage added that these countries had not recognized the republic formally, but merely had accepted the provisional government as being in de facto control. This, it is declared at the State Department, is exactly what the American Government has done.

A clever journalist, however, Francis McCulloch, the special correspondent in Lisbon of the Westminster Gazette, of London, and the New York Evening Post, had recognized the real "Republic of Portugal" for sober-minded thinkers before this. Writing on October 21, of an interview he had with President Braga, he says:

"He has no more influence over the course of events than the weathercock on the Necessidades Palace. A pathetic figurehead, he is not even consulted by the Secret Society, which now rules the country. Interviews with him are, I am told, cut down and mutilated by the censor at the telegraph office. His own subordinates do not pay the slightest respect to him in his own presence."

Among a variety of interesting views of the situation in Lisbon, Mr. McCulloch says of his interview with Braga:

"Finally our turn comes. We are introduced to the President. We speak to him, or, rather, we listen. We listen for hours and hours to a stream of babble covered by a driftwood of technical socialistic and pseudo-philosophic terms. After two solid hours the thing ceases to be a joke. It becomes a positive torture. Imagine having turned on to you an old German Social-Democrat arm-chair professor endowed with the philosophic minuteness and detail of the north, combined with the inexhaustible linguistic facility of the south! Imagine being waylaid by a savant who has committed to memory all the superannuated works of the French philosophes and scores of the other voluminous writers of the same school of thought, not to mention the contents of all the extreme republican newspapers and pamphlets that have appeared in Europe for the last fifty years. Imagine being waylaid by a gentleman who, having accomplished this feat, has (not unnaturally) gone mad and become afflicted by a garrulity that is extreme, overwhelming, superhuman.

"I have a strong personal regard for the President and I know that he would be the first to recognize the truths of the above remarks if he ever had time to see them in print or to hear about them. Of course he never will have time. A man who talks uninterruptedly for twenty hours a day could not possibly have time. Besides, the old professor-President has now reached that stage when a man closes up as it were, becomes introspective, gets absorbed in his own theories, and no longer pays any attention to what goes on in the outer world. He is certainly aware that the revolution has taken place and that he is President of the republic, but I am doubtful if he knows much beyond that. He pours forth his description of an ideal world which exists only in his own imagination, a world in which there are no priests, no religion, no funeral services, no baptisms, no prisons, no poor, no ambassadors, no soldiers, no policemen, no capitalists, no kings. Of the present, the actual, he seems to take little note.

"I am convinced that if his two secretaries were to suddenly stand on their heads on his writing table and all the other patriots in the room were to simultaneously dance the cake-walk, he would pay no attention whatever to their proceedings, but would continue to elaborate whatever wild theory he happened at the moment to be engaged upon.

* * * * *

"As to the drift of this nightmare interview I can only say that the President promises every reform that ever was dreamed of since the world began. He will abolish all the legations and replace the ministers by chargés d'affaires. He will, of course, abolish the legation to the Pope. He will bring to an end in the colonies the reign of the militarist and the official. He will have manhood suffrage, but is not yet quite certain whether or not he will give the vote to women this year. He says that the women of the country are still dazzled by the new light that has broken in in Portugal, probably meaning that the majority of them are clericalist and reactionary. Of course, it does not matter in the least what he says."

SCIENCE

PROFESSOR SEE'S CAPTURE THEORY AND LIFE IN OTHER WORLDS.

An address by T. J. J. See on "Some Recent Discoveries in Cosmical Evolution," is reprinted in Popular Astronomy for November, as well as the Scientific American Supplement of October 29. It aims to be a popular presentation of his Capture Theory, to which we adverted in AMERICA, I, 24 and III, 18. In the course of it he says:

"The discoveries made during the last two years have enabled me to reduce cosmogony to a new basis, by which it now becomes an exact science. The development of a new science is always of profound interest. In this connection I will merely point out how remarkably every part of the new Nebular hypothesis, or Capture Theory, supports every other part; so that the whole work is knit together into a harmonious whole of such irresistible strength that it cannot be overthrown."

The founder seems to be very sure of his new theory. No astronomer of note that we know of has yet committed himself to it, nor have we seen his answer to Brodetsky's objections in the Astronomische Nachrichten No. 4,408.

The concluding paragraph of the address shows how certain the professor is in his utterances:

"I will add just one more concluding announcement, namely, that the planets now shown to revolve about the fixed stars are inhabited by some kind of intelligent beings, so that life is unquestionably a general phenomenon of the universe. It is well known that the late Professor Newcomb expressed similar views in an address delivered at the dedication of the Flower Observatory, Philadelphia, in 1897. The proof is now much more complete than ever before; and men of science will have to admit life to be general on the countless worlds revolving about the fixed stars, or else concede that life upon the earth is an accident and a mistake, existing for hundreds of millions of years in direct violation of the laws of nature, which no philosopher could possibly admit; for this would be a reductio ad absurdum more convincing than those developed in the science of geometry and taught in the best schools and universities of the world. The life flourishing on the earth and believed to exist also on Mars and Venus is but a drop in the Pacific Ocean compared to that flourishing on the thousands of billions of habitable worlds now definitely proved to revolve about the fixed stars."

The whole paragraph evidently tries to make up in declamation and positive assertion what is wanting in argument. We should think that if the proof he speaks of was so convincing, it would be worth presenting, at least in outline. But there is no hint of it anywhere.

WILLIAM F. RIGGE, S.J.

The unearthing of supposedly rich uranium ores at Wodgina, in Western Australia, gives the promise of more moderate-priced salts of radium. Two specimens have been found in a regmatite ore of a tantalite lode within a foot of the surface. The State geologist is of opinion that pitch blend will be discovered below water level, as the conditions prevailing at Wodgina, where crystallized granite dykes are common, are identical with the geological occurrences in other parts of the globe where radium ores are found.

Personal observations of Prof. R. Fuchs and Dr. Deimler, conducted on Monte Rosa, have established that the oxygen consumption of the human body during work is noticeably increased at altitudes above 3-4 kilometers (1.9-2.5 miles); also that the respiratory quotient drops to the exceedingly low figure of 0.53 after work, while the resting value is only 0.6-0.7 at the same elevation. It is suggested either that glycogen is built out of fat and protein in the body, or that substances are not completely combusted in the body, but are thrown off as lactic acid.

F. TONDORF, S.J.

PERSONAL

Professor James C. Monaghan was stricken with apoplexy while lecturing at Portage, Wis., on November 4. His right side was completely paralyzed. Overwork is given as the cause.

When Cardinal Logue got back to Armagh from New York the priests and nuns of his diocese presented him, on Oct. 27, with an address of welcome and a handsome automobile.

The heroic bronze portrait bust of General James Shields, erected by Congress over his grave in St. Mary's cemetery, Carrollton, Mo., was unveiled on November 12. The bust is the work of James Connor and surmounts a polished granite pedestal ten feet high, bearing the insignia of the United States on the face of the die and the following inscriptions:

Gen. James Shields,

Born in County Tyrone, Ireland,
May 10, 1810;

Died in Ottumwa, Iowa, 1879.

On each side of the die are carved the names of the principal battles in which General Shields took part in the Mexican and Civil wars, and on the back appears a bronze tablet containing the seals of the States of Illinois, Minnesota and Missouri, which the General represented in the Senate of the United States.

Florence Nightingale left an estate valued at $178,000. By her will she gave $1,250 and a number of books to Mother Stanislaus, head of the Hospital Sisters in London, and $1,250 to the Mother Superior of the Devonport Sisters of Mercy.

The Brownson Memorial Committee, the Rt. Rev. M. J. Lavelle presiding, have completed arrangements for the unveiling of the Brownson Monument in Riverside Park, at One Hundred and Fourth street, on the morning of Thanksgiving Day, November 24.

OBITUARY

The Reverend Hermann J. Goller, S.J., Provincial of California, died November 5, in Spokane, Wash., at the early age of forty-three. Born in Germany, he came to this country twenty-four years ago to enter the Jesuit Mission of the Rocky Mountains, in which, after completing his studies he held important offices, his last charge being that of Rector of Gonzaga College, Spokane. When the Missions of California and the Rocky Mountains were united a year ago to form the Province of California, Father Goller was appointed the first Provincial. He soon began to show signs of heart disease; but managed to preside over the Provincial Congregation which was held last July. Shortly after this was ended his condition became alarming, but he rallied, and there were good hopes of his recovery until about three weeks ago, when he again became seriously ill. Father Goller was a nephew of Monsignor Goller of St. Louis, whose death we had to record recently.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

NEW YORK AND PORTUGAL.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

On Sunday, November 20, old St. Peter's Church, Barclay Street, New York, it is announced, will celebrate the one hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of its incorporation. The occasion may serve in the light of current events to recall some traditional relations between New York and Portugal. The first pastor of this, the oldest congregation in New York, was the Irish Capuchin, Father Charles Whelan, who came here in the fleet of Admiral De Grasse, and remained to act as the chaplain of the Portuguese merchant, Jose Roiz Silva, who lived at No. 9 Beaver Street, and later at 28 William Street. It was on his advice that Father Whelan bought from the Trinity corporation the lease of the five lots at Barclay and Church Streets on which St. Peter's was built, and he was a member of the first board of its trustees, formally incorporated as such June 10, 1784.

Silva was a merchant and importer of foreign goods, of considerable fortune, and was on the high-way to further prosperity when he died of yellow fever during the epidemic of 1798. His warehouse was at Cruger's Wharf, corner of Old Slip.

It is curious also to recall in this connection the large part as shown by the records that Spain and France had in the beginning of St. Peter's. The money, one thousand pounds, which was needed to buy the lots was advanced by the Spanish Consul, Don Tomas Stoughton and his partner Dominick Lynch; and the corner stone of the church was laid, on October 5, 1785, by the Spanish Minister, Don Diego Gardoqui, who lived at No. 1 Broadway. The most active spirit in organizing the then little band of resident Catholics into a congregation was that strange character, Hector St. John de Crèvecoeur, the French Consul General, who was also one of the first Board of Trustees and incorporators. He had, previous to the proposal to build St. Peter's, asked the city authorities for permission to have Mass said for the people in the old Merchant's Exchange at Broad and Water Streets, a sort of public forum, the arches of which were a favorite resort for itinerant preachers, but consent was refused.

Here, therefore, the record shows us Portugal, Spain, France and Ireland joining forces to found old St. Peter's. Times have changed and men with them in these days of Braga, Canalejas and Briand.

T. F. M.

New York, Nov. 12.

FRANKLIN'S BENEVOLENCE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Though A. D. C. thinks Benjamin Franklin gave Rev. John Thayer "a curt refusal" of his request to be appointed Chaplain, yet it is possible that the curtness of the refusal was modified by Franklin's "benevolence," which Thayer on December 20th, 1781, expressed to Franklin as "not one whit exaggerated" in the accounts he had heard of it. He had experienced that "benevolence" and expressed the most enthusiastic gratitude.

Thayer had gone to France with an introduction to Franklin from Jane Collas, of Cambridge, Mass., dated June 6, 1781. These letters are among Franklin's 13,800 Papers in the possession of the American Philosophical Society, at Philadelphia.

MARTIN I. J. GRIFFIN.

Philadelphia, Nov. 12.

Richard L. Walsh Company
General Building Construction
100 William Street
New York City

GRASP THIS RARE OPPORTUNITY

Special Offer No. 24
$1.75 worth for $1.00

Make your Catholic friends happy!

Send us a $1.00 bill and we will send you postpaid one of our Christmas Combination Sets (for either Men or Women), consisting of a good leather bound Prayer Book, a substantial Rosary and a Silk handsewed Scapular, put up in a nice Holly covered box of rich design and appearance (see illustration).

Illustration shows set for Women, the Men's set contains a Vest Pocket Prayer Book.

Cut out advertisement, pin a dollar bill to it and mail at our risk.

Send the Men's Women's Set to (Cross out one not wanted)

Name Address

FR. PUSTET & CO. 52 Barclay Street, New York
 436 Main St., Cincinnati, Ohio

BIBLE STORIES

TOLD TO "TODDLES"

By Mrs. Hermann Bosch. With Frontispiece. Crown 8vo. $0.80 net; by mail, $0.90.

The narrative is in chronological order, from the nativity to the Feast of All Saints, and represents real conversations of a mother and her child. Suitable for reading to children from 4 to 8 years of age, and for older children to read themselves.

"We recommend them to Priests and teachers and mothers, and to the children themselves."—Catholic World.

"... Such a help is not often put in their hands. Mothers, get this book."—The Sentinel.

THE DAWN OF MODERN ENGLAND: being a History of the Reformation in England, 1509-1525

By Carlos Lumsden. 8vo. $3.00 net.

The book has been written from the Roman Catholic standpoint, the author's view of the Reformation being that it was a struggle between modern individualism and the semi-Socialism of the Middle Ages.

BY CANON SHEEHAN

PARERGA; being a companion volume to "Under the Cedars and the Stars." New impression. Crown 8vo. $1.60 net; by mail, $1.75.

"Imagination and feeling, literary criticism, moralizing on the mystery of things, keen but kindly observation of human nature, flow in an unstinted tide from this charming philosopher."—Catholic World.

THE BLINDNESS OF DR. GRAY, or, The Final Law. A novel of Irish Clerical Life. Crown 8vo. $1.50.

"The most masterful story written in recent months by anybody. It is sure to live alongside the masterpieces of fiction."—Detroit News.

Longmans, Green, & Co.
 PUBLISHERS NEW YORK

Mayer & Co.

OF MUNICH and LONDON

47 BARCLAY STREET NEW YORK

STAINED GLASS Statues Stations of the Cross

IN view of the fact that cheap plaster casts of our Statues and Stations of the Cross are offered for sale by some unscrupulous firms, we call attention to a small stamped metal plate, which is affixed to the base of all genuine Mayer-Munich Statuary.

Correspondence Invited

ALMOST FREE

A Set of Beautiful
 Rogers' Table Spoons

Full size Rogers' extra silver plate, table spoons, bouillon spoons, tea spoons and forks. Handsome rose design in French Gray Finish—free from advertising. To get them you have only to learn the many delightful kitchen uses, the helpfulness, the surprising economy of

LIEBIG

Company's Extract of Beef

Save the metal cap from the jars—Send us one cap and 20 cents and we'll send you a table spoon or a fork, post-paid. Send one cap and 10 cents for a tea spoon or a bouillon spoon. When you've seen one, you'll want full sets.

Always look for this signature in blue

Liebig

A 60-page cook book, by Mrs. Rorer, sent anywhere free on request. Address Dept. S, Cornelle David & Co., 9 North Moore St., N. Y.

Sacred Heart Sanitarium

FOR REST, QUIET, RECUPERATION AND HEALTH

Unsurpassed results obtained in Nervousness, Rheumatism, Heart and Stomach troubles. No surgical, hospital nor insanity cases taken. A delightful, homelike, restful place—ideal for all run down conditions. Hydrotherapy, Electricity, Massage, Zander Gymnasium, Sun parlor; Swimming pools, billiards, bowling, etc. Gaited saddle horses, large indoor riding pavilion; suspended running track connected by tunnel with bath department. 17-acre park.

A staff of five physicians give their exclusive services to the patients.

WRITE SISTER SUPERIOR FOR BOOKLET X. MILWAUKEE, WIS.

LIBRARY SUPPLIES

Adjustable Book Covers—Library Numbers Gummed and perforated always in stock—also alphabets of various sizes.

For sale by stationers or by

THE VAN EVEREN CO.
60 Ann Street - New York

The Book Covers are made of tough, strong paper and are inexpensive, efficient and easily put on

$250. Reward

A reward of Two Hundred and Fifty Dollars will be paid for the arrest and conviction of any junk dealer or other person guilty, under the provisions of Section 550 of the Penal Code of the State of New York, of criminally receiving any property belonging to this Company.

$50. Reward

Fifty Dollars Reward will be paid for the arrest and conviction of any person who maliciously injures or interferes with the lines of this Company.

NEW YORK TELEPHONE CO.
15 Dey St., New York
JOHN H. CAHILL,
May 1, 1908 Vice-Pres't & Gen'l Counsel

GOOD SAMPLE TEA

in lots of 100 pounds or more 16½ cents per pound

Good Old Crop COFFEE

splendid cup qualities—ground or in the bean 15½ cents per pound

New York & Columbia Coffee Co.
126 Front Street, New York City

Telephone Call, 5922 Barclay

THE S. T. SMITH CO.

Manufacturers of

Ink, Inked Ribbons, Carbon, Manifold and Typewriter Linen Papers

Diamond Brand Typewriter Supplies

11 BARCLAY STREET

NEW YORK

ALTAR WINES

From the Jesuit Fathers
Novitiate Vineyards at
LOS GATOS, CAL.

"MALVOISIE" a light dry wine,
perfectly matured.

$1.00 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.

"NOVITIATE" a generous wine,
somewhat sweet—will keep in wood.

$1.50 per Gal. $5.25 per Doz.

Depot and Sole Agency
P. A. MAHONY BARNSTON TEA CO.
Treas. 6 Barclay St., New York

Catholic Mind Pamphlet
Double Number

Piux X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism

The latest Motu Proprio of our Holy Father, Pius X

10c per copy, $7.50 per hundred

THE AMERICA PRESS 32 Washington Square, W
NEW YORK

—Just Published—

Three Historical Events in Maine

BY THE

REV. T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

Single Copies 15 cents

100 Copies $10.00

THE AMERICA PRESS 32 Washington Sq. W.
NEW YORK

NOW READY

AMONG THE HURONS

VOLUME II OF

Pioneer Priests of North America

Tells the heroic story of
de Brébeuf and His Associates

"This book is a striking illustration of the truth of Shakespeare's well-known words 'Men's good is oft interred with their bones.' . . . We cannot then but feel grateful to Father Campbell for what he has done to assure the fame of those glorious confessors and martyrs from a threatened obscurity. . . .

"Missionaries such as these have a special work in this day of weak faith and widespread disbelief; for the story of their lives, while it stimulates the one, is a living protest against the other. Father Campbell's theme is a great one, and he has dealt with it well. The clear and simple language in which he recounts the wonderful heroism of these truly wonderful men, is more impressive and convincing than any elaboration of style, and surely more in harmony with the quiet, simple characters of the men of whom he treats."—The Tablet, London.

By Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J.

480 Pages. With Index. 24 Illustrations.

PRICE, $2.00

VOLUME I

This extremely interesting book consists of a series of 18 monographs of the missionaries who labored among the Iroquois Indians. Beginning with the life of Jogues in 1642, they continue up to 1710, when the Indians, just before their annihilation, passed over from French to English control.

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS:

"For lovers of history and biography, of the adventurous, the heroic, and the saintly, there is much to attract the attention in this volume of over 300 large, clearly printed pages."—The Sacred Heart Review.

"The adventures of most of the missionaries read like romances."—The New York Herald.

"One of the most interesting Catholic books we have ever read."—The Monitor (San Francisco).

Price, $1.60, postage prepaid

THE AMERICA PRESS 32 Washington Sq. W.
NEW YORK

BROKAW BROTHERS

ASTOR PLACE & FOURTH AVE.
NEW YORK

While there's very little scope in color and patterns in clergymen's clothing—there's a broad latitude in the essential details.

Our long experience in catering to the clothing requirements of clergymen has taught us what is right in Fabrics, Cut and Fit.

Samples and self measurement blanks sent upon request

Estab. Over Half a Century

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 32 Washington Square, West, New York City

MENEELY BELL CO.
TROY, N.Y. AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.
BELLS

Simplicity
is a prominent feature
of the
VICTOR

It is not necessary to make a lot of adjustments before doing special kinds of work.

The Victor is always ready without special adjustment, because its special devices are built in the machine—not extra attachments.

Send for the No. 2 Catalogue to-day

VICTOR TYPEWRITER COMPANY

812 Greenwich Street
NEW YORK

The Dayton White-washing and Cold Water Painting Machines

The Progress series of machines are especially adapted for applying white-wash, cold water paints and other wall coatings. They make ideal machines for use about Colleges, Academies and Schools. They can be used as well for general spraying in the Park, Orchard and Conservatory. They are all built on the same principle; varying only in size and construction details.

THE PROGRESS JR.

has a capacity of 12 gallons and is mounted on two wheels and two supporting legs.
Price, with Galv. Tank, $21.00. Weighs 99 lbs.
Brass 25.00.

THE PROGRESS

has a capacity of 20 gallons and is mounted on two wheels and two supporting legs.
Price, with Galv. Tank, $30.00. Weighs 132 lbs.
Brass 35.00.

THE PROGRESS HEAVY DUTY (Illustrated above)

has a capacity of 20 gallons and is mounted on three wheels. It is built very strong and will stand a lot of hard usage. It is recommended where there is a lot of whitewashing as well as a lot of spraying to do.
Price, with Galv. Tank, $35.00. Weighs 200 lbs.
Brass 40.00.

For further particulars and detailed description address
MCCORMICK M'FG CO., Dept. Y, Dayton, Ohio

The Coward Shoe

Sagging ankle and arch without support of the Coward Arch Prop Shoe.

Sagging ankle and arch properly supported by Coward Arch Prop Shoe.

For Boys Whose Ankles Turn In

A habit, on the part of the ankles, of turning inward, indicates structural weakness of the arch and shows the need of rest and support provided by the COWARD ARCH PROP SHOE. The anatomical construction relieves strain on the ankle and arch muscles, helps them to recover strength, and raises the arch structure to its natural position.

Additional support at the waist of the foot is furnished by the Coward Extension Heel.

Don't neglect arch trouble.
Wear the Coward Arch Prop Shoe IN TIME.

SOLD NOWHERE ELSE

JAMES S. COWARD

264-274 Greenwich St., N. Y.
(NEAR WARREN STREET)

Mail Orders Filled | Send for Catalogue

$1.00 WILL BRING POSTPAID one of our

Fine Gold Filled
5 year guaranteed
ROSARIES

In any color. Order through your jeweler or direct. Catalogue free.
Wm. Purnell Co.
Mfg. Jeweler
37 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

Why is 41 and 43 Vesey St.

HOUSEHOLD WORD When Groceries are Spoken of? BECAUSE

You can get the best teas, the best coffees, the best butter, the best cheese, the best flour, the freshest eggs, the best canned fruits and vegetables, the finest olive oil (sold only in full measure, bottles and tins) absolutely pure wines and liquors, a choice assortment of cigars and the largest assortment of the best groceries in the city to select from.

All full weight, sold without misrepresentation of any kind.

Callanan's Magazine and price list mailed on request.

L. J. CALLANAN
41 and 43 Vesey Street

BOUND VOLUMES OF AMERICA A CATHOLIC REVIEW
OF THE WEEK
SIX MONTHS TO A VOLUME
$3.50

The AMERICA Press, 32 Washington Sq. W., New York

Holiday Gift Suggestions

Desk Pads Paper Racks Inkstands Calendars
Writing Tablets Bridge Sets Pen Trays

Novelties in Brass, Bronze and Leather

Over Two Hundred Designs in Personal Greeting Cards for Christmas and New Year's

DEMPSEY & CARROLL

22 West 23d Street The Society Stationers New York

The American Carlsbad Sanitarium

Hydrotherapy according to the celebrated Kneipp system applied in all forms and up-to-date methods. All diseases, acute and chronic, scientifically and successfully treated. Testimonials and references furnished. First class accommodations for patients.

The famous Devonian Mineral water in use, a strong, sulphurated, saline, calcareous and magnesian water, the counterpart of the German Carlsbad.

Rates reasonable. Investigation solicited.

For information apply to

The American Carlsbad Co., Lorain, O.

FREE SCHOLARSHIPS AT THE Leading Catholic Colleges Board and Tuition

Creighton University, Omaha, Neb.
Fordham University, New York, N. Y.
Georgetown University, Washington, D. C.
Niagara University, Niagara Falls, N. Y.

Notre Dame University, Notre Dame, Ind.
St. John's University, Collegeville, Minn.
University of Ottawa, Ottawa, Can.
University of St. Francis Xavier's College, Antigonish, Nova Scotia.

* * *

All Hallows College, Salt Lake City, Utah.
Columbus College, Chamberlain, S. Dak.
Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass.
Holy Trinity College, Dallas, Tex.
Sacred Heart College, Denver, Colo.
Sacred Heart College, Sacred Heart, Okla.
Seton Hall College, South Orange, N. J.

St. Ambrose College, Davenport, Iowa.
St. Bonaventure's College, Allegany, N. Y.
St. Joseph's College, Dubuque, Iowa.
St. Michael's College, Burlington, Vt.
St. Viator's College, Bourbonnais, Ill.
St. Vincent's College, Beatty, Pa.
St. Charles College, Ellicott City, Md.

Tuition Only

Catholic University of America, Washington, D. C.
Benedictine College, Savannah, Ga.
Boston College, Boston, Mass.
Brooklyn College, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Canisius College, Buffalo, N. Y.
Christian Brothers' College, Memphis, Tenn.
Loyola College, Baltimore, Md.
Marist College, Atlanta, Ga.
Sacred Heart College, Prairie du Chien, Wis.
Sacred Heart College, Augusta, Ga.

St. Francis Xavier's College, New York, N. Y.
St. Mary's University, Galveston, Texas.
St. Ignatius College, Cleveland, Ohio.
St. John's College, Brooklyn, N. Y.
St. John Berchman's College, Toledo, Ohio.
Fordham University Law School, New York, N. Y.
Fordham University Medical School.
Georgetown University Law School, Washington, D. C.
Georgetown University Medical School.
St. Louis University Law School, St. Louis, Mo.

PREPARATORY SCHOOLS (Board and Tuition)

St. Ann's Academy, New York, N. Y.

St. John's Preparatory College, Danvers, Mass.

COLLEGES FOR YOUNG LADIES (Board and Tuition)

COLLEGE OF NEW ROCHELLE, New Rochelle, N. Y. MOUNT ST. JOSEPH'S COLLEGE, Dubuque, Iowa.
ST. MARY'S COLLEGE, Notre Dame, Ind.

N. B.—Other Colleges and Schools will be announced later.

These Scholarships may be obtained by securing subscriptions for AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week.

For further particulars address

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Square, West,
New York, N. Y.

"Perfect" Warm Air Heaters
"Perfect" Cooking Ranges
 and Richardson's Steam and
Water Boilers
Give splendid satisfaction

THOUSANDS IN USE

Send for Catalogue

RICHARDSON & BOYNTON CO.

31 West 31st Street

Chicago NEW YORK Boston

ST. JOSEPH'S SANATORIUM

Silver City, New Mexico

Conducted by the Sisters of Mercy

A THOROUGHLY equipped institution for the treatment of all suitable cases of tuberculosis. Each room has two wide connecting porches, electric lights and all modern conveniences. Infirmary for febrile cases, also cottages for those desiring them. Trained nurses and resident physician in constant attendance. Climatic conditions ideal: cool summers and moderate winters. Annual precipitation 12 inches, with only 32 cloudy days. Altitude, 6,000 feet. All ethical lines of treatment, including tuberculin in suitable cases.

For Catalogue and particulars address either Sister Superior or Oliver T. Hyde, M.D., Medical Director.

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 32 Washington Square, West, New York City

FINN BROTHERS

Manufacturers of

Roll Top Desks

STORE and OFFICE FIXTURES
 Counters, Shelvings,
 Partitions, Etc.

Estimates and Designs Furnished

Office 358 BROADWAY Salesrooms

59-65 FRANKLIN ST., NEW YORK

Telephones, 4855-4856 Franklin

Factory: 112-114 LEROY STREET

Telephone Connection

People Who Work Indoors With Their Hands

Seamstresses, watch-makers, artists, draughtsmen, and many others, cannot properly handle their tools with cold, stiff hands. Many a lost hour or two on cold winter mornings results from the delayed heat of furnace or stove.

The Perfection Oil Heater in a few minutes gives the temperature that assures the worker warm hands and pliable muscles. The

PERFECTION
 SMOKELESS
 OIL HEATER

Absolutely smokeless and odorless

quickly gives heat, and with one filling of the font burns steadily for nine hours, without smoke or smell. Has automatic-locking flame spreader which prevents the wick from being turned high enough to smoke, and is easy to remove and drop back so the wick can be quickly cleaned.

It has a damper top and a cool handle. Indicator always shows the amount of oil in the font. The filler-cap does not need to be screwed down; it is put in like a cork in a bottle, and is attached to the font by a chain, and cannot get lost.

The burner body or gallery cannot become wedged, because of a new device in construction, and consequently, it can always be easily unscrewed in an instant for reworking. The Perfection is finished in japan or nickel, is strong, durable, well-made, built for service, and yet light and ornamental.

Dealers Everywhere. If not at yours, write for descriptive circular to the nearest agency of the

Standard Oil Company

(Incorporated)

F. JAMES REILLY
 President

WM. F. REILLY
 Manager

JAMES REILLY'S SONS' CO.

General Electrical Repairs

122-130 CENTRE STREET

Corner White Street

Telephone 881 Franklin

NEW YORK

INSTITUTION LINEN

of all kinds, also Sheets and Pillow Cases, Blankets, Bed Spreads, etc., etc.

WRITE for SAMPLES and PRICES

H. W. BAKER LINEN CO. Dept "K"
 41 WORTH ST.
 Importers and Manufacturers NEW YORK CITY

Mullins & Sons

78, 80, 82, 84 Myrtle Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

121-125 Newark Avenue, Jersey City, N. J.

218-220 Market Street, Newark, N. J.

Housefurnishings of Quality

Furniture, Pianos, Carpets, Rugs, Sewing-machines, China, Art Work, Gunn Sectional Book Cases, Arts and Crafts Furniture. Absolutely the finest displays in the East. Unequaled in quality and lowest prices.

$1.00 A WEEK FURNISHES THE HOME

DIRECTORY OF COLLEGES AND ACADEMIES

Georgetown University WASHINGTON, D. C.

Directory for Catalogues or Information

The College (Graduates and Undergraduate Schools)
The Registrar, 37th & O Sts., N. W.

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E. St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University
Rev. Joseph Himmel, S.J., President

LADYCLIFF

On the Hudson (Adjoining West Point)
Young Ladies' Academy

A department for small boys. Education thorough and practical. Location beautiful and convenient. Terms moderate. Send for prospectus. Address Sister Superior, Ladycliff, Highland Falls, N. Y.

New York State Regents' Examinations.

Academy of St. Joseph

In-the-Pines

BRENTWOOD, N. Y.

A Boarding School for Young Ladies,
Affiliated with the State University

PROSPECTUS EXPLAINS THE TERMS, ETC.

St. Mary's College

St. Marys, Kansas

BOARDING COLLEGE
Under the Jesuit Fathers

Two Courses of Study:
Classical and Commercial

For Catalogue, send to
REV. ALOYSIUS A. BREEN, S.J., President.

ACADEMY OF THE HOLY FAMILY

BALTIC, CONNECTICUT

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity
PREPARATORY, COMMERCIAL and ACADEMIC COURSES

Prospectus explains terms, etc.

Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

Convent of the Holy Child

SHARON HILL, DELAWARE COUNTY, PA.
1: Minutes from Philadelphia

ACADEMY FOR YOUNG LADIES

Highest English Course. French, Drawing, Music by Certified Teachers. Preparation for foreign travel. As the numbers are limited, special care can be given to the formation of character and training of each child.
Address Mother Superior

COLLEGE OF ST. ELIZABETH CONVENT STATION

Near Morristown, N. J.

One hour from New York City.

A Catholic Institution for the Higher Education of Women

COLLEGE Four years' course leading to the degrees of B. A. and B. S. SCHOOL OF PEDAGOGY Required for entrance two years of College work

SCHOOL OF MUSIC. COURSE LEADING TO THE DEGREE OF B. M.

ACADEMY A High School Course of Four Years. Full College Preparatory Work. GRAMMAR AND PRIMARY DEPARTMENTS SEPARATE

REGISTERED By the New Jersey State Board of Education and the University of the State of New York Apply for Year Book to The Secretary

MT. ST. JOSEPH ON THE WISSAHICKON

For illustrated catalogue address MOTHER

CATHOLIC COLLEGE FOR WOMEN situated in the romantic Valley of the Wissahickon. Degrees conferred. Also Academic, Commercial, Intermediate and Elementary Departments. Very special advantages in Music and Art. The piano student possesses superior opportunities in the use of the Virgil Clavier Method pursued throughout the course. The Art Studio is admirably equipped, and every attention is given to the study of Art, both in theory and practice. Gymnasium perfectly equipped. Outdoor exercise, tennis, basket ball, fencing, etc.

SUPERIOR, Chestnut Hill, Philadelphia, Pa.

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Collegiate and Preparatory Departments

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $260 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra. Send for catalogue to

REV. THOMAS E. MURPHY, S.J., President

Seton Hall College

FOUNDED 1856

South Orange, New Jersey

COLLEGE AND HIGH SCHOOL

Bayley Hall for Students of Grammar Course

FOR CATALOGUE ADDRESS
Very Rev. James F. Mooney, D.D., Pres.

COLLEGE OF ST. CATHERINE, ST. PAUL, MINN.

A CATHOLIC COLLEGE FOR GIRLS

Accredited by the Minnesota State Board of Public Instruction and by several prominent Universities.

SEVENTY ACRE CAMPUS.

FIREPROOF BUILDINGS

COMPLETE COURSES

IN THESE DEPARTMENTS

THE COLLEGIATE, leading to the degree of Bachelor of Arts.
THE ACADEMIC OR COLLEGE PREPARATORY. MUSIC and PAINTING in their various branches. DOMESTIC ART, HOUSEHOLD SCIENCE and COOKING.

YEARBOOK FORWARDED ON APPLICATION, Address: THE SECRETARY

ST. JOHN'S PREPARATORY COLLEGE IMMACULATA SEMINARY

DANVERS, MASS.

SELECT HIGH SCHOOL conducted by the XAVIERIAN BROTHERS

Classical, Scientific and Commercial Courses

Ideal Location

All New Buildings

New Equipment

Competent Instructors

Develops the Whole Boy

Send for Catalogue

Brother Benjamin, Director

MOUNT MARIAN, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Situated in the suburbs. Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of St. Mary-of-the-Woods. Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Conservatory methods in Music. Oil and Ceramic and Water-color Studios. Abundant out-door exercise. Sightseeing with experienced chaperons.

For Year Book address, Sister Secretary

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

ADJOINING BRONX PARK, NEW YORK CITY

College and High School

ST. JOHN'S HALL, FOR SMALLER BOYS

The location affords the healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city

MEDICAL SCHOOL
in connection with Fordham Hospital

WRITE FOR CATALOGUE

LAW SCHOOL
at 20 Vesey St.
in the midst of the courts

SPRING HILL COLLEGE

FOUNDED 1830 Spring Hill, Mobile Co., Ala. CHARTERED 1836

BOARDING COLLEGE CONDUCTED BY THE JESUIT FATHERS

Just the School for boys who wish to escape the rigors of the Northern climate. Mean temperature of the winter months, 52 degrees Fahrenheit.

HEALTHY LOCATION—EVERY CONVENIENCE OF A MODERN COLLEGE

CURRICULUM

INCLUDES THE PREPARATORY, HIGH SCHOOL AND COLLEGE COURSES. DEGREES CONFERRED

Write for Catalogue to Rev. F. X. Twellmeyer, S. J., President

DIRECTORY OF COLLEGES AND ACADEMIES

ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS

COLLEGE FOR YOUNG WOMEN (TWO HOURS FROM INDIANAPOLIS)

FOUNDED IN 1840; INCORPORATED IN 1846. EMPOWERED TO CONFER COLLEGIATE DEGREES. Four Years' College Course. Academic and Grammar Departments. Elective Courses for Special Students. Conservatory of Music, with Vocal, Piano, Harp, Violin, Pipe Organ, etc. Oil and Ceramic and Water-color Studios. Modern languages by native teachers. New Gymnasium, with Natatorium, Running Track, Bowling, Basket Ball, etc., directed by a graduate of Dr. Sargent's school of Physical Training. Out-of-Door Sports—Horseback Riding, Boating, Archery, Golf, Tennis. For Catalogue and Illustrated Booklet, Address . . SISTER SECRETARY . . Box 70 . . St. Mary-of-the-Woods, . . Vigo County, Indiana

HELEN AUGUSTA HAYES

VOCAL INSTRUCTOR

342 West 55th Street, New York

BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL

Holy Cross Academy and High School

FOR GIRLS : : : 53d YEAR

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity

343-349 West 42d Street and 340-350 West 43d Street, New York City

Registered by the New York State Educational Department.

Students prepared for College and the New York Training School for Teachers

Preparatory Department for Young Children

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR BOYS UNDER TWELVE YEARS

THE SISTERS OF CHARITY

Mount Saint Vincent-on-Hudson, New York City

ANNOUNCE THE OPENING OF

COLLEGE COURSES FOR WOMEN

Leading to Degrees, B. A. and B. S. Freshman and Sophomore Classes

SEPTEMBER, 1910

Junior and Senior Classes to follow. Professors of distinction.

Equipment of the best.

Location healthful, convenient, one half hour from Grand Central Station.

DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS

Fall term began September 29th, 1910. Write for Prospectus.

The Winona Seminary, Winona, Minnesota

For Young Women. Conducted by the Sisters of St. Francis

LITERARY DEPARTMENT: Collegiate Course leading to degree. ACADEMIC COURSES: Classical, Latin, Scientific, Modern Language. Accredited to the University of Minnesota.

DEPARTMENTS of Dramatic Expression, Art, Household Economics. Home life of the Student is ideal. Indoor and Outdoor Athletics. Literary, Musical, Dramatic Societies.

Conservatory of Music: Piano, Voice, Violin, Organ, Harp

CATALOGUE, BOOKLET OF INFORMATION, DEPARTMENT BULLETINS, MAILED ON APPLICATION

MARY ALOYSIA HARDEY

READY RELIGIOUS OF THE SACRED HEART READY

1809-1886

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY THE REV. THOMAS J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

440 Pages 16 Illustrations With Index

THE LIFE STORY OF A REMARKABLE WOMAN

"Had the Life of Mother Hardey not been published it would have been a positive loss for the history of the Catholic Church in the United States, where for more than fifty years she was such a conspicuous figure. Her biographer completed the work several years ago, but it was only after reiterated entreaties and expostulations that the manuscript was finally put into the hands of the printer."—From the Introduction.

PRICE, TWO DOLLARS

By Mail 20 cents extra

THE AMERICA PRESS 32 WASHINGTON SQ. WEST NEW YORK CITY

Laurel Hall School

184-186 Brooklyn Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Kindergarten, Elementary, High School and Culture Course.

Private Classes formed in French, German and Spanish

Expression and Gymnastic Dancing

Tutoring in all branches by competent teachers.

Catalogues sent on application LAURA L. HOPPER, Principal

PEDAGOGY

There is only one school in New York City that offers correspondence instruction in pedagogy. Have you a friend who needs help in school or in teachers' examinations? We have made 3,181 students pass for licenses to teach in this city. Ask for "The Success of the Three Thousand."

BOOKS

We publish books that give you the essentials of subject-matter. Ten new ones on English. Do you know McEvoy's Methods in Education at $1.50, and McEvoy's Epitome of History and Principles of Education at $1.00?

THE McEVOY SCHOOL

306 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Telephone Main, 5342

ITALIAN, FRENCH, GERMAN, SPANISH

Can be learned quickly, easily and pleasantly in spare moments. You hear the living voice of a native professor pronounce each word and phrase. A few minutes daily practice and in a surprisingly short time you can speak a new language by the

Language-Phone Method

With Rosenthal's Practical Linguistry

This method is highly indorsed and recommended by leading Catholic Church Dignitaries and Educators. Send for Facsimile Letters of these testimonials and interesting booklet

The Language-Phone Method, 825 Metropolis Building, N.Y.

Pilgrim Walks in Rome

A GUIDE TO THE HOLY PLACES

IN ROME AND ITS VICINITY

By P. J. CHANDLERY, S.J.

Third edition enlarged $1.60, Postpaid

THE AMERICA PRESS

32 Washington Sq. W. New York

Made for the
CATHEDRAL OF THE HOLY TRINITY
Jamaica, B. W. I.
Rt. Rev. John J. Collins, S.J., D.D.

Sanctuary Lamp

here illustrated is a typical example of the refined character which distinguishes the Ecclesiastical productions of The Gorham Company. To the designing and making of distinctive Church Furnishings, this Company brings every facility of the best equipped organization of its kind in the country.

Full particulars and estimates sent upon application.

Correspondence is invited

The Gorham Company

Fifth Avenue at 36th Street

NEW YORK

WILL YOU REPRESENT AMERICA

A Catholic Review of the Week

WE want a reliable man or woman in each city and town to act as our agent. No experience or capital required.

THIS opportunity is open to you no matter where you are situated, as AMERICA is a national publication.

Will You Join Our Staff?

NOW IS THE TIME

Write at once, giving reference

AGENCY BUREAU

The America Press 32 Washington Square W.
NEW YORK, N. Y.

Vermont Marble Co.

MAIN OFFICE PROCTOR, VT.

QUARRIES IN VERMONT AND ALASKA
LARGEST MARBLE PRODUCERS IN THE WORLD

Branch Offices
and Yards at

NEW YORK
BOSTON
PHILADELPHIA
CHICAGO
CLEVELAND
ST. LOUIS
SAN FRANCISCO
TACOMA

OUR Rutland White Marble is pronounced by Architects and the Clergy to be specially adapted for Altar Work Altars, Pulpits, Railings, Etc.

EXTERIOR AND INTERIOR WORK FOR CHURCHES AND MAUSOLEUMS

ESTIMATES CHEERFULLY FURNISHED

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Vol. IV, No. 7

(Price 10 Cents)

NOVEMBER 26, 1910

($3.00 a year)

Whole No. 85

CHRONICLE

President Visits Panama—Possible Trade War—The Pension List—Labor Unions Hostile to Militia—Peace Shaft Dedicated—Employees to Pay Fines—Canada—Great Britain—Ireland—Italy—Belgium—Cheaper Meat in Germany—American Vines for Germany—Trust Fever in Germany—Prince Luitpold of Bavaria—Bohemia145-148

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Lafargeville—Democracy's First Great Triumph—Missionary Efforts of the Protestants—How Official Liquidation is Managed in France—Augustus Muller, S.J.....149-156

CORRESPONDENCE

The Catholics of Ecuador, II—Death of An Interesting Character156-157

EDITORIAL

An Economic Contradiction—Germany's Future—Apostles Without Pay—Socialism—Methodism and the American State.....158-161

SOME FRIENDS OF MINE. II—The Doctor161

LITERATURE

La Vie d'Union à Dieu—L'Etat Mystique—Les Faits Extraordinaires de la Vie Spirituelle—Siena and Southern Tuscany—Martyrs of New France—Two Boys in the Tropics—Persia and Its People—Notes Sur la Medecine et la Botanique des Anciens Mexicains—Saint Thomas à Becket—The Story of Our Lord's Life Told for Children—El Convite Eucaristico, Manual para la Comunión Frecuente—Books Received161-164

ART

John La Farge164

PERSONAL

Sister Cecilia Lubinski—The Vatican Observatory—Dr. J. C. Monaghan.....164-165

EDUCATION

Uncle Sam's Books on Education—Large Attendance at Jesuit Schools of the Middle West—A New Educational Review.....165

ECONOMICS

Diminished Imports to Japan and China—Fewer Vineyards in France.....165-166

SOCIOLOGY

Liège Socialist Comes to Grief—Improving New York's Bakeries—Getting Italians on the Land166

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

Resolutions of Convention of Federation of Catholic Societies—Catholic Social Congress of Chile—Blessing a St. Louis Bridge—The Brownson Memorial166-167

ORITARY

Most Rev. Manuel Sánchez—Mother St. Catherine167

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Is Everything the Church's Business....167-168

SCIENCE

The Sun's Influence on the Weather—New Stalactite Cave in Upper Austria—Coal Purchased on its Heating Value—Particles of Comets' Tails168

CHRONICLE

President Visits Panama.—For the fifth time President Taft visited the Isthmus of Panama and went over every part of the work on the canal. It is nearly two years since he was last there, and in that time the progress made has been most satisfactory. The extent to which Gatun Dam and the locks have been completed satisfied the President of the wisdom of the judgment of Congress in having adopted a lock type canal instead of a sea level. The landslides in Culebra cut can easily be removed, which would not be the case if the canal in Culebra had to be sunk to a depth of eighty feet below the present proposed level. This additional excavation, the President believes, would lengthen the time of construction, weary the patience of Americans, and leave it exceedingly doubtful whether, with the difficulty presented by the Chagres River, such a canal would be possible at all. The work is so far advanced, that in the opinion of the President the time has come for the discussion of plans for the management and maintenance of the canal. The government of Panama is enjoying prosperity and a period of political calm. The authorities in charge maintain every disposition to assist the United States in the construction of the canal and to conform to every detail of the obligations imposed by the treaty.

Possible Trade War.—The refusal of the German Government to consider the proposals of interested Americans and the consequent serious loss to these latter through the settlement of the "potash controversy," as chronicled last week, have been made matter of official report to Washington. Pending the return of President Taft statisticians are figuring how much American trade would be damaged if he should determine to apply the 25 per cent. maximum tariff in retaliation to Germany's action. The latest return of the trade of the United States with Germany gives for one year $140,000,000 in imports and $235,000,000 in exports. Should the President decide to apply the maximum rate to German imports, the German Government probably would impose at once its maximum, and a trade of $250,000,000 would be seriously damaged.

The Pension List.—Pension Commissioner Davenport records that forty-five years after Appomattox there are still 602,180 soldiers and sailors drawing pensions, in addition to 318,461 widows and dependents and 442 nurses, who, together receive annually no less than $158,332,-391.82—a sum exceeded but three times in our pension history, though it is four millions less than last year's expenditures.

Although there was a decrease in the number of pensioners of 25,111, the slight net reduction in the expenditures is plainly disappointing, from the taxpayer's point of view. The average annual pension is now $171.90, as against $138.18 in 1906; it increased only $2.08 over that of 1908-1909, but that increase added $1,915,852.64 to the total expenditure. These larger outlays were due to increased rates authorized by Congress, applications for larger pensions, and 3,015 special pensions granted by separate acts of Congress—the worst abuse of all. It is not, however, merely the growing size of the pension which is ominous. The number of widows of soldiers of the civil war increased by 9,045, despite the ravages of death among the 211,781 who drew pay last year for their husbands' services forty-five years ago. It will amaze most people to hear that there are already no less than 27,889 pensioners of our brief war with Spain and the Philippine insurrection. There were not 27,000 soldiers in the regular army early in 1908, and, Gen. Shafter's force at Santiago was not over 18,000 men. Yet within twelve years of that brief struggle there are on the rolls 22,783 invalid soldiers, 1,183 widows, and 330 minor children, 3,072 mothers of soldiers and 512 fathers, 7 brothers and sisters, and 2 helpless children. Already the Spanish war veterans and dependents have received $30,191,725.72.

Labor Unions Hostile to Militia.—The annual report of Col. E. M. Weaver, chief of the division of militia, to the army Chief of Staff in Washington, reflects the pessimistic feelings of the officers of the National Guard created by the generally hostile attitude of the labor unions towards the state militia. These officers claim that it is almost hopeless to expect any relief from the present conditions by the enactment of state laws or through any national law that would restrain the unions from their unfriendly attitude. The preaching of patriotism appears to have no effect, even where it is shown that the sole purpose of the militia is the maintenance of law and order, and Col. Weaver states it to be his opinion that the only solution lies in the creation by states of a state constabulary on the model of Pennsylvania's strong troop.

Peace Shaft Dedicated.—On the summit of Lookout Mountain, in Tennessee, the beautiful monument to "Peace," erected by the State of New York, was dedicated on Nov. 15. Addresses were made by Gen. Daniel E. Sickles, who presented the monument to the United States, and Maj. W. J. Colburn, secretary of the Chickamauga Park Commission, who accepted it.

Employees to Pay Fines.—The Department of Justice issued a statement reviewing the action of the Federal Court at Pittsburg in imposing small fines on the "window glass trust" and its officers and directors.

The statement was based on a despatch from Pittsburg to the effect that the corporations combined in the trust had served notice on their employees that a reduction of 30 per cent. in wages was the only condition under which the factories could continue to work. The reduction of wages was attributed directly to the successful prosecution of the combination and the imposition of fines. "If the rumored action should prove to be substantiated by fact," concludes Attorney-General Wickersham, "it would indicate a very mistaken leniency on the part of the Court in imposing sentence, which it is hoped would not be followed on any other similar occasion."

Canada.—Parliament has reassembled. It is thought that the reciprocity negotiations will be discussed in the debate on the address to the throne, but the chances of them coming to anything seem to grow less daily.—A second-class dry dock is to be constructed at Vancouver. It will cost about one and a quarter million dollars. The government guarantees three and one-half per cent. per annum on the investment for 25 years, and will have prior rights for its ships and for those of the British navy.—A syndicate of London and Paris capitalists has bought a large tract of land in the Peace River country, including 200 square miles of coal lands and 200,000 acres of agricultural land. Individual Americans have made large purchases of unirrigated lands in Alberta, amounting to 35,000 acres.—The steamer Wolverine, with a crew of fourteen and sixty-six passengers, is reported to be lost in Lake Winnipeg.—A despatch from Edmonton announces that a railway from Vancouver to a point on Hudson Bay, 150 miles north of Fort Churchill, has been planned. Its promoters are determined to leave nothing undone to ensure satisfactory climatic conditions. It is to cross the continent between 56 and 61 degrees north latitude, and though the Central Pacific crosses about 20 degrees further south, they have resolved to call it the Southern Central Pacific. The name will be sufficient to drive all ice out of Hudson Bay.—The Emancipation Lodge of Montreal is said to have returned its charter to the Grand Orient of France and disbanded. One may doubt very prudently the statement.—Justice Demers has granted an injunction restraining the Catholic School Commissioners from dismissing teachers because they are Freemasons.—The postmaster-general's report for 1910 shows that 45,705,000 more letters and post cards were carried than in the previous year, the increase being about ten per cent. The department's profit for the year was $943,210.

Great Britain.—Parliament has reassembled and the Prime Minister stated his policy November 18. The House of Lords Bill will be sent at once to the Upper House, which must make up its mind to accept or reject it, as no amendment will be entertained. While the Lords are engaged in this, the Commons will pass some budget and other necessary matters, and should the Lords reject the Bill for their reform, Parliament will be dissolved November 28. Some members were curious to know whether the Prime Minister had got "guarantees," a euphemism for a promise by the King to create as many peers as may be necessary to carry the Bill. They were told very properly that as the King must not be drawn into politics, the Minister can tell neither the advice he has given nor how it was received. But it must not be forgotten that all the talk about guarantees from the King originated with Mr. Asquith himself. The King's obvious course would be to tell Mr. Asquith that he is ready to sign any Bill in the matter coming to him in the constitutional way, i.e., after passing both Houses; but that he will not join with the Commons to abolish the Lords any more than he would join with the Lords to abolish the Commons. Mr. Asquith and his friends declare the House of Lords to be a national evil, since it blocks necessary progressive legislation. This, however, is a begging of the question. The Daily News, Radical organ, hints at revolution.—The disturbances in the Rhondda Valley collieries were planned carefully. At 4 a.m., November 7, a bugle sounded and immediately strikers took possession of the entrances to the yards and allowed no pitman to enter. The town of Clydach Vale was occupied by 3,000 men, who marched continually through the main streets, sending scouts to every house to see whether any pitman had gone to work. The police were attacked. The strikers seized the surface machinery of the Cambrian Colliery and extinguished the fires, but were driven off before actual damage was done. During the night the police guarding the Geamorgan Colliery were attacked, and next day shops were looted and the police stoned. The rioters failed in their attempt to flood the mines by destroying the pumping machinery. In Aberdare Valley there were similar disturbances.—In the shipyard lockout the masters' proposals which had been rejected by a majority of 1100 in 19,000 votes, were re-submitted and were rejected by a majority of nearly 10,000 in 21,000 votes.—The plague in Suffolk is growing more serious. It was hoped that the infected rats were confined to the triangle between the rivers Stour and Orwell. They have now been found at Hollesley, fifteen miles north of the latter river.—The King and Queen propose to go to India in 1912 for a Coronation Durbar. They will probably visit Australia, New Zealand and Canada on their way home.

Ireland.—The near approach of the New Year will bring forward, it is expected, many additional claims for Old Age Pensions in Ireland, in consequence of the removal of the poor-law relief barrier. Since the Pension Act came into force two years ago 8,312 claims for admission to its privilege have been made in Dublin. The recent withdrawal of the pauper disqualification will result, it is thought, in 40,000 claims in all Ireland, and it is interesting to note that nearly 22,000 claims are in arrears in the country because of the insufficiency of the staff of pension officers to investigate the claims. No fewer than 37,876 claims for pensions were granted in Ireland in the year ended March 31 last; 38,495 claims were rejected, and of these 26,675 were rejected on the question of age.—Mr. T. P. O'Connor's "Devolution" speeches during his tour in Canada threaten to bring about a deplorable split in the Nationalist party. The Irish Independent makes this editorial comment: "When Mr. T. P. O'Connor began his strange crusade in Canada we foresaw what its effect would be on the Liberals. Our apprehensions of the damage which his speeches were calculated to do to the Irish Cause already have been more than realized. It is deplorable to see that one of the prominent leaders of the Irish Party should thus have weakened the Irish position without a word of remonstrance from the party or the country. One of the latest declarations by Mr. Redmond in America was that Home Rule on Parnell's lines was inevitable, and that there has been and would be no lowering of the flag by him. That, in our opinion, is the correct line to take at this juncture; but why has Mr. O'Connor been allowed to take an entirely different course, to put England, Scotland and Wales on the same basis as Ireland?"—The sudden death of Sir Clifton Robinson in New York was a matter of regret for the entire community of Dublin. The "Tramway King," as he was called, was the pioneer in Dublin of the very excellent system of electric tramways the city now enjoys.—The total emigration from Ireland during the month of October was 3,322, being an increase of 525 as compared with the October of 1909. The total emigration from Ireland for the first ten months of the year was 30,911, being an increase of 4,045 as compared with the corresponding period in 1909.—The reports of the Judges under the Small Farm Prize Scheme in Cork show that admirable work has been done throughout the country, and that tenants who have purchased have, with zeal and energy, pursued an improved system of husbandry. Gratifying evidence is found in the reports of a proportional improvement in the condition of the small farmers throughout Cork. There was only one drawback in this year's competition—the entries were not as numerous as on former occasions.—Interviewed immediately after Mr. Asquith's announcement of a dissolution of Parliament on November 28, in case the House of Lords rejects the Veto Bill, Mr. John Redmond said: "I consider that everything is now on a satisfactory basis. The fight will now go on as all progressive reformers have thought from the first to be the better, indeed the only way to bring it to a triumphant conclusion. In Ireland we are perfectly prepared for the fight. We shall give a good account of ourselves despite any attempts of factionists to harass and divide the national forces."

Italy.—Italy is threatened with serious financial depression this winter. One of the reasons given is that the cholera kept most of the American tourists away last summer and hence the shopkeepers and hotel men failed to reap their usual harvest. A high official says Italy has lost 400,000,000 francs ($80,000,000) in the last seven months. The fruit crop was almost a total failure and the wine output was exactly half the usual amount.

Belgium.—The King, in his speech from the throne opening parliament, dwelt specially upon the welcome given by the Belgian people to the German Sovereigns.

Mention was made of the agreements recently concluded with Great Britain, France and Germany regarding the African colonial boundaries as showing the excellent relations of the country with the Powers. His Majesty held the brilliant participation of the nations in the Brussels Exhibition to be evidence of the esteem in which Belgium was held abroad. Parliament was urged in the address to push forward with zeal the great public works, especially the completion of the port at Antwerp, and finally assurance was given of the Government's purpose to safeguard the future of the Belgian-Congo by completing without delay its economic equipment.—On entering the chamber the Queen was received with enthusiastic cheers. A few cries of "Long live universal suffrage" were heard, and altercations ensued between Socialists and members of the Right. The King was greeted by the Catholics and Liberals with cries of "Vive le Roi," but the Socialists, who remained seated, flung slips of paper into the hall and raised cheers for universal suffrage and dissolution. Press despatches state that the Socialists threw compressed paper at the King as he was on his way to Parliament, and sang the "Carmagnole" and the "Internationale." The King ignored the demonstrations and continued to acknowledge the cheering of the crowd.

Cheaper Meat in Germany.—As the Socialists are making political capital out of the prevailing famine price for meat, the Government has found it advisable to cheapen the meat supply before the general elections. Unofficial announcements early last week made known the Imperial Government's purpose of soon opening the frontiers for the importation of foreign live-stock for immediate slaughter. Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg has already given Baden and Alsace-Lorraine permission to import a considerable weekly quota of animals from France. The Bavarian Government also intends to admit French live-stock, and will appeal to the Berlin authorities to modify the restrictions now binding on the Danish frontier. Baron Schorlemer, Prussian Minister of Agriculture, is considering a proposal to open all frontiers except the Russian.

American Vines for Germany.—The Home Secretary in Berlin has allowed the importing of 100,000 American vines. This concession is a step in the direction strongly advised by the specialists who have been charged with the task of assisting German owners of vineyards in the straits that threaten them. As is known, these latter have had but poor vintages for some years back. Other dispositions will have to follow if the most picturesque districts of the fatherland are to be saved from poverty. The wine district of the middle Rhine country, and more especially the red-wine region about Andernach and along the lower Ahr seems to be in a desperate plight. For the past six years the average vintage in these neighborhoods has been far below the normal. The introduction of American vines has been long warmly recommended as a saving measure, and individual attempts to better conditions through the planting of American vines have had the happiest results.

Trust Fever in Germany.—The Frankfurter Zeitung says in a recent issue: "One feature of this year has been the great development in concentration, fusions, understandings in one form or another. With us in Germany in the last few years the cartels and syndicates in the chemical, the electrical, the ocean and river shipping companies have been remarkable. The latest trust is that in the book trade, which practically puts an end to competition. The bourse regards such developments sympathetically, believing that the abrupt ups and downs in trade competition will be less pronounced."

Prince Luitpold of Bavaria.—On March 12 next, Prince-Regent Luitpold will have completed his ninety-fourth year. The Bavarian people have been planning a grand national demonstration to honor the occasion, but in a letter to his Ministers for Home Affairs the Prince makes the request that the day be kept only in the simplest manner. His wish will be respected, and, in lieu of the festivities that were being arranged, a great national fund is to be collected and presented to the Regent. The aged Prince has shown marked interest in the charitable and benevolent enterprises flourishing in his kingdom, and the purpose of his people will be to enable him, through a birthday fund, to aid notably certain institutions for the care of young people and veteran soldiers, which have been special objects of his solicitude.

Bohemia.—The attempts to remove the obstacles to necessary legislation in the forthcoming meeting of the Reichsrath in Vienna, due to conflict between the German and Czech parties, appears to be hopeless. The chronicle has already referred to the Compromise Commission, in session for some time back in Prague. The mutual understanding hoped for from its deliberations has not come about. Many now propose the appointment of a Permanent Commission, to which all matters in dispute between the two peoples in Bohemia shall be referred for final settlement. This proposal is not acceptable to the Czechs, who refuse to agree to it until the tax measures now before the Bohemian Landtag will have been finally settled. As the Germans claim to find in the taxation question the one obstructive weapon still left to them, they are not inclined to concede this demand. To add to a difficult situation the City Council of Prague has just entered unanimous protest against the requirement of the use of German, as well as Bohemian in all official proceedings. The meeting of the Reichsrath in Vienna, which had been fixed for November 20, is in consequence deferred.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Lafargeville

The death of John La Farge recalls the story of the efforts to establish New York's pioneer ecclesiastical seminary. The first two bishops who ruled the see realized at once that its fundamental need was a corps of priests trained at home and thoroughly alive to local conditions. Bishop Connolly had so much to do organizing the diocese that he could not attempt anything in this direction. Bishop Dubois, however, during a visit to Rome in 1829, dwelt so vigorously on his need of priests that the Propaganda authorities agreed to help him.

On his return to New York he bought, in 1832, with the assistance thus procured, a building site near Nyack, Rockland County, twenty miles from New York. To get to Nyack in those days you had to cross the river to Hoboken and then drive to Nyack. The bishop had collected about $18,000 for a building fund, and with this he began the new seminary, the chapel of which was dedicated August 10, 1834. Father John McCloskey, later archbishop and cardinal, was appointed director of the new seminary, but just as the building was finished and ready to be opened it was destroyed by fire.

Cornelius Heeney, the Brooklyn philanthropist, next offered Bishop Dubois the site of the present St. Paul's Church, on Court street, for the seminary. He was tinged with the prevailing spirit of trusteeism, however, and wanted to tie a string to his gift, so it was refused, although some of the unused building material had been transferred to Brooklyn from Nyack.

No further move in the project was made until early in 1838, when Bishop Dubois bought the property owned by John La Farge's father, at Lafargeville, Jefferson County, New York. The price paid for it was $20,000, and there, on September 20, 1838, the seminary and college of St. Vincent de Paul was opened, with the Rev. Francis Guth as president, and Fathers Moran and Haes with three lay tutors as his assistants. In theory the location was admirable; in fact impossible. It could be reached only after several days of weary travel. There were eight students at the opening, and the next year saw no increase. "Yesterday we opened our class again with a handful of children," wrote Father Guth, in September, 1839. "We might be compared to a big stage coach, drawn by four horses, but with no passengers." So it was evident that the La Farge place would not do; St. Vincent's was closed, and the idea of locating there given up.

Lafargeville is a village, 18 miles from Watertown; 197 from Albany and 339 from New York. What could have induced Bishop Dubois to select such a remote site for his seminary in 1838? The records include a curious and seemingly unknown chapter in the ecclesiastical history of New York.

After the Revolution the State of New York undertook to open up the old Indian tribal lands to settlers, and this brought about speculation and exploiting by adroit manipulators, much the same as we see being done to-day by the development companies who turn suburban farms into city lots at big profit. With the Indian lands in Jefferson and Lewis Counties, which belonged to the Oneidas, much of this exploiting was done abroad. Gouverneur Morris, for instance, was largely instrumental in organizing what was known as the Antwerp Company, which took 680,000 florins of the savings of the simple Dutch people for 450,000 acres of this then wilderness. Of course the investors lost their money. Among the New York speculators were such well-known men of the last century as Francis Depau—who built the famous "Depau Row" in Bleeker street, where the Mills Hotel now stands. He owned the most popular line of packet ships to Havre and was married to Sylvie de Grasse, daughter of Admiral de Grasse, of our French allies. Others were Herman Le Roy, William Bayard and James McEvers. In January, 1796, they acquired the section of the Oneida lands known as Penet's Square—a ten-mile tract along Oneida Lake.

French capital was also interested in this Black River country as early as 1760. In 1793 Louis Chassnais purchased 800,000 acres there with the intention of selling it in small farms to the refugees who were forced to leave France through the excesses of the Revolution. Along the St. Lawrence, and in this section these émigrés were expected to find congenial homes. Here came, in 1805, from France, James Le Ray de Chaumont, and invested some of the money he brought with him, settling down to live in almost feudal style in the part of the county called the township of Orleans, and in his honor soon subtitled Leraysville, about ten miles east of Watertown. In 1808 he commenced to build the finest mansion west of the Hudson, a stone building 60 by 60, so lavish in its appointments that it was not completed until 1827. He used to drive about the country in a four-horse coach with postillions and out-riders.

Other French investors attracted there by him were Joseph Bonaparte, the ex-king of Spain, then living here as the Count de Sourville, the Duc de Vincennes, Marshal Grouchy of Waterloo fame, Murat's son Joachim, Count Real, who was Napoleon's Chief of Paris Police, and John La Farge, who had been a merchant in Havre in association with one Joseph Russell. Joseph Bonaparte, in exchange for diamonds, said to belong to the crown-jewels of Spain, and valued at $120,000, got 150,000 acres of the Antwerp Company property in 1818, and built a mansion on it. Joachim Murat started the first grist mill in the section, but as the clearing of the land dried up his water power, the mill failed to work. The others settled in more or less splendor throughout the town of Orleans and at Cape Vincent until the restoration of Napoleon and political changes in France enabled them to return. The opening of the Erie Canal so altered New York conditions that James Le Ray failed in 1825 and lost most of his property. He returned to France in 1836 where he died in his 80th year, on December 31, 1840.

John La Farge invested largely in the Joseph Bonaparte property which the ex-king was soon glad to sell him, and settled down to live there. In 1823 the name of this precise spot, which had up to then been known as "Log Mills," was changed to Lafargeville, in his honor. Owing to the strict way in which he exacted the terms of the deeds he gave with the lands he sold he became unpopular and had much trouble adjusting the disputes that arose. The big house he occupied was on his hands, and when his fellow countryman, the good Bishop Dubois, came along looking for a seminary site, it was transferred to him. The Bishop, with his experiences at Emmitsburg, thought that a remote country site was the best for a seminary. The extant picture of the La Farge mansion shows it as an attractive three-story colonial building, with two substantial wings, one of which La Farge had used as a land office.

"The most noted historical landmark in the town of Orleans," says Haddock, in his "History of Jefferson County, New York, from 1793-1894," p. 645, "is the old La Farge mansion, about a mile south of the village. In its day this was a most elaborate structure, in its general appearance, much like the chateaux erected by all the wealthy French settlers in Jefferson and Lewis Counties. The dwelling was richly furnished throughout, and the great land-holding merchant of Havre occupied it in princely style, entertaining royally whenever he could get anyone to entertain. It is notorious, however, that the distinguished Frenchmen who settled at Cape Vincent were not on terms of intimacy with La Farge, nor was he numbered among the distinguished guests who, from time to time assembled at the Le Ray mansion or the chateau of Joseph Bonaparte. Whether it was a difference of politics or society, the writer does not happen to know.

The grounds around the mansion were tastefully laid out and walled with cut stone; the whole demesne being arranged regardless of expense. . . . To-day the mansion is fast crumbling to ruin. The ruins were long ago stripped of their elegant adornments and some of the elaborate walls have fallen down, and an air of general decay pervades the whole surroundings."

The solitary Hibernian name of James J. Murphy appears in the list of the early pioneers, and it draws attention to a notable fact. Here was a colony of educated, prosperous French Catholics, but the Church and religion made no progress in this region under their direct or indirect influence. How different from the story of the other part of the State where the Irish Devereuxs, McCarthys, Kernans and their associates went into similar big land schemes. There churches and congregations were founded at once and multiplied with the steady material growth of the enterprise. At Lafargeville, when the seminary project failed, a little wooden church, called St. John's, seating about 100 people, was put up in 1846 to supply the needs of the Catholics. In 1850 Lafargeville had, all told, about 300 inhabitants—61 families in 50 houses; to-day the population of the village is given at about the same figures. John La Farge, Senior, left there in 1840 and came to live in New York.

THOMAS F. MEEHAN.

Democracy's First Great Triumph

At the time of the ratification of the Constitution of the United States, the suffrage was very much restricted. No bill of rights hinted at voting as one of the prerogatives of a citizen, nor in any State had a citizen, as such, the power of expressing his will or preference at the polls. In five States, namely, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey and North Carolina (strange to say) all free native-born inhabitants, even though descended from African slaves, were citizens and, if they had the qualifications determined by those States, were voters. But in general, so few citizens, either white or colored, fulfilled the many requirements of the various States that a presidential election aroused no widespread interest, although then, as now, hand-bills, pamphlets, and letters to editors assured the people that the permanence of free institutions and the safety of the Republic absolutely depended on the support of this or that ticket, or the defeat of this or that candidate for office.

The Republicans were early in the field, well captained and well organized for the presidential campaign of 1800. The days of party platforms and party nominations had not yet dawned, but Jefferson's letter in 1799 to Elbridge Gerry, of Massachusetts, was in itself a platform, for in it the recognized party chief clearly stated his position: States' rights, economical administration, a navy for coast defence only, no standing army, and freedom of the press. This last was a pass at the Sedition Act, but the Alien and Naturalization Acts received no notice. Jefferson considered them experiments upon the public mind and conscience, to see whether an open violation of the Constitution would be tolerated. If they proved successful, the next move would be to make Adams President for life, fix the succession in his family, and give a life tenure to the senatorial office.

When the electoral votes came to be counted, sixty-three were for Adams and seventy-three for Jefferson, the southern States with their daughters Kentucky and Tennessee having cast a solid vote for the Republican candidates. In ten of the sixteen States that participated in the election the legislatures had chosen the electors.

Adams was defeated, but no President had been elected, for Jefferson and Aaron Burr had each received seventy-three votes. The choice of a President, therefore, devolved upon the House of Representatives. Thereupon, the Federalists, who controlled the House, began to study how they could profit most by their peculiar position. Hamilton, the most influential man in the party, though personally unfriendly to Jefferson, was outspoken in his favor. "I cannot remain with a party," he said, "which so degrades itself as to elect Burr," whom he denounced as ambitious, selfish, and decidedly profligate. Burr was the son of a preacher and a grandson of the famous New England divine, Jonathan Edwards. During the campaign of 1800 which resulted in Jefferson's election, the ministers of New England took an important part. They proclaimed from the house tops that Jefferson's success would be the signal for breaking down pulpits and burning Bibles, and when the contest had reached the House of Representatives, they stigmatized his religious views as so atheistical that he ought not to be the favored candidate.

As each State had but one vote in the choice of a President by the House, Virginia, with her nineteen representatives had no more influence on the result than Delaware with only one. There being sixteen States, the successful candidate must have at least nine votes. In their first caucus, the Federalists decided to elect Burr, but when the House had assembled and the formal balloting took place, they lacked one vote to bring him in. Just one more vote was needed, but as ballot after ballot was taken that vote was not forthcoming. Finally, on the thirty-sixth ballot, taken only two weeks before the day set for the inauguration, Jefferson received ten of the sixteen possible votes. On that occasion Matthew Lyon of Vermont cast the vote of his State for the successful candidate.

The Federalist party as an important factor in politics was dead. Social standing, talent, wealth, and learning had supported it, but it was the party of caste. It had ruled energetically, even despotically; it had been the party of paternalism; better, perhaps, it had been the party in which a select few had played the part of a padrone by embracing the theory that the common people were to be herded, not heard. By birth and breeding Jefferson was an aristocrat; years and study had made him a believer in the people.

Washington's second inauguration, which took place in Philadelphia, was almost painfully quiet and unobtrusive. When John Adams took the oath of office in the same city, the imposing spectacle, as he wrote to his wife, was, in the opinion of all, "the sublimest thing ever exhibited in America." During the last year of his administration, the Government offices were removed to the permanent capital, amid the heavily wooded swamps on the banks of the Potomac. Early in the morning of the day of Jefferson's inauguration, John Adams' carriage drove rapidly out of Washington, and in it rode a disappointed and embittered man.

With an escort of Virginia artillery, Jefferson went to the capitol, where he was received by Vice-President Burr. There he delivered his inaugural address which was conciliatory and full of hope and confidence. "If there be any among us," he said, "who would wish to dissolve this Union or change its republican form, let them stand undisturbed as monuments of the safety with which error of opinion may be tolerated when reason is left free to combat it." Chief Justice Marshall then administered the oath of office.

That simplicity which has become proverbially Jeffersonian speedily displaced the ceremonious etiquette that had prevailed in the president's "palace," as it was then styled. Washington and Adams, following the English precedent, had been accustomed to go in state to the capitol and there deliver orally their annual addresses on the condition of the country. Jefferson introduced the practice, invariably followed since his time, of sending a written message containing his views on public questions.

One of the new President's first official acts was to pardon all who were then in prison under the provisions of the Sedition Law. He made few removals from office, and these were chiefly for "active and bitter opposition to the order of things which the public will had established." It is now called "offensive partisanship."

The Federalists contemptuously dubbed the Jeffersonians "Democrats," a word which the President would not recognize. The appellation "Democratic Republicans" gradually became fixed upon them, while the scattered and battered remnants of their opponents were known as "Republican Federalists."

As during Adams' administration the Republican legislatures of Kentucky and Tennessee had passed resolutions attacking the Alien and Sedition Acts and hinting broadly at nullification, so in Jefferson's first term, some New England Federalists, thinking that with their loss of power the country was lost, began to hatch a plot to separate New England, New York and New Jersey from the Republic and form, with Nova Scotia and other British provinces, a new union in which Federalist principles should be securely entrenched. Although apprised of the plot, Jefferson lost none of his serenity. The truth was that he had very loose notions about maintaining the territorial integrity of the Republic, for he wrote to Doctor Joseph Priestly, under date of January 29, 1804, "Whether we remain in one confederacy, or form into Atlantic and Mississippi confederacies, I believe not very important to either part."

Jefferson's first nomination to the Supreme Court was made in 1804, when William Johnson of South Carolina, the first Republican justice, broke in upon the Federalist exclusiveness of that branch of the Government. The same year saw the adoption of the twelfth amendment to the Constitution, which directs the electors to vote separately for President and Vice-President, thus preventing the recurrence of the circumstances which almost placed Aaron Burr at the head of the Government.

The practice of selecting presidential candidates at a congressional caucus of the party had already been followed privately, but as the election of 1804 approached, the Republicans in Congress gave public notice of a caucus to name a candidate for the Vice-Presidency; for although Burr had not yet fully revealed his true nature, it was understood that he was to be dropped. Nominations by publicly announced congressional caucus continued to be made until 1824, when William H. Crawford, the "regular" nominee of the caucus was defeated for the Presidency.

Jefferson's first term had been peaceful, popular and prosperous. The Louisiana Purchase, for which there was less warrant in the Constitution than for anything that the Federalists had done, was so generally approved that any defect in the transaction was made good by common acquiescence and consent. The Federalists had no issue for the campaign, but they nominated Rufus King, of New York, and went down to defeat with fourteen electoral votes in their favor against 162 for Jefferson. The people were with him.

Not the least notable event of the presidential election of 1800 was the first entrance into the field of politics of a benevolent organization founded in New York in 1789, and known as the Tammany Society.

D. P. SULLIVAN.

Missionary Efforts of the Protestants

The Stimmen Aus Maria-Laach, edited by H. A. Krose, who is himself an authority on Catholic missionary statistics, give under the above title a condensed report of The World Missionary Conference, held June 14 to 23 in Edinburgh. As will be recalled, this Conference assembled in pursuance of a resolution passed ten years ago by a similar though much smaller meeting in New York. By the latter, eight international commissions of from twenty to twenty-three members each were appointed to prepare the material for this year's meeting. The result of their labors based on first hand information from missionaries and other experts, was laid before the congress in Edinburgh in eight volumes, which will, it is said, be shortly published for the general public. They will form, as far as they go, a work of permanent value. A "Statistical Atlas of Christian Missions" has already appeared. By "Christian" missions Protestant missions, are, of course, meant. Only one map gives some information about the extent of Roman Catholic and Russian missionary efforts.

The congress was well attended. There were 1,200 delegates of churches and missionary societies, and besides about 3,000 other visitors, both men and women, and mostly of high social standing. Prominent among these visitors were the Archbishops of Canterbury and York and several other English bishops, hundreds of active missionaries, white and colored, and a goodly number of university professors. Naturally the Anglo-Saxon element was the best represented. However, a certain universality, as far as Protestantism can be universal, was one of the great features of the congress. In fact the speakers did not hesitate to declare that this was an assembly without an equal in the history of all countries, "a truly ecumenical council," and the phrase regularly evoked a storm of applause. The assembly appeared entirely heedless of the fact that this universality excluded two-thirds of all Christians, the Catholics, and that the seeming unity had been brought about by rigorously excluding all questions relating to doctrine.

The congress was strictly Protestant. Missions, meant Protestant missions throughout the whole meeting, Christianity was Protestantism. Catholic missions were very rarely mentioned. Missionary activity in China, it was said, had begun only a hundred years ago and there were now 260,000 "Christians" in that country. Yet China has scarcely ever been without Catholic missionaries since the middle of the sixteenth century, and, with its dependencies, it counts now about two million Catholics among its inhabitants (see Krose, Missionsstatistik).

According to the Conference program, which was strictly adhered to, a very large number of short addresses were made. Again and again it was repeated, that now is the best time to act for the great cause to gain all the world for Christ. During the next ten years or never! The whole East is awakening to new life, all the nations of India are in a ferment. The old is going, there is everywhere a craving for new ideas. As long as the nations are susceptible, the missionary must work under high pressure. All the achievements of modern times must be pressed into service. Too much stress cannot be laid on the education of the missionaries, who must above all be able men, not necessarily of first-rate talents, but pious and self-sacrificing souls, who know how to gain the confidence of the heathen. A Catholic marks with surprise, however, that more was said about the necessity of excellent missionary physicians than about the missionaries themselves. It is a fact that the influence of the former is very great in the Protestant missions.

The millions required for all this will be found. Western Christianity must finally shake off its lethargy and begin to understand its duty. Missionary societies must include all ages and ranks in an active propaganda. Pulpit and press must rouse the interest of high and low; an elementary knowledge of the missions must form part of the catechetical instruction of the young.

In a truly Protestant way the congress determined what kind of Christianity was to be taught, namely, a "pure simple Religion," the same, no doubt, which the members professed from June 14 to June 23. The differences of creed are not to be transplanted into the East. The aim of the missionaries must be to found "national Churches." As soon as a nation shall have been tolerably well supplied with native ministers it may be left to itself, to develop that system, which will be best adapted to its peculiarities. In regard to morality, the second commission had reported that according to the verdict of experts a "milder view" was justified in certain matters; for example, it was believed polygamists should be admitted to baptism, if they could not be otherwise won over to Christianity; they should, however, be told that this was no Christian condition. Missionaries from South Africa protested against this decision, but the matter was not followed up any further.

The most difficult question was, how unity was to be preserved among the missionaries. It was stated with confusion and shame, that the disunion among Christians was the sole reason why only one-third of mankind belongs to the religion of Christ; regretful allusions to the unfortunate splitting up of Protestantism were heard in the speeches of the delegates from the beginning of the Congress to its termination. In any case, it was insisted, the non-Christians must not be allowed to perceive the differences which separate denominations. Let only those truths be named and preached which are common to all. Let the territory also be divided up between the emissaries of the various sects and societies. Every kind of competition would be treason to the Lord. The presence of delegates from the Philippines and other Catholic countries showed, be it remarked, that competition with Catholics was not to be deemed an evidence of such treason!

The following figures taken from the "Statistical Atlas" will give some idea of the extent of the Protestant missions and of the pecuniary means at their disposal: Missionary societies, 788; revenues of one year, £5,071,225 ($25,356,125); "ordained" missionaries, Westerners, 5,522; natives, 5,045; mission helpers (teachers, physicians, women), Westerners, 13,785; natives, 92,918; stations, main and secondary, 35,487; Sunday schools, 24,982; children and teachers in them, 1,198,602. The Atlas declares that there are 81 university colleges with 7,991 students; 489 seminaries and normal schools with 12,543 students; 1,594 high schools with 155,522 students; 28,901 elementary schools with 1,165,212 children; 550 hospitals with 164,245 patients in one year, in which, too, medicine was given gratis 4,231,635 times. The increase of communicants during 1907 is set down as 127,875; the whole number of communicants, as 1,925,205; the whole number of baptized as 3,006,373.

These figures offer powerful testimony to the activity of Protestants in foreign mission fields. Happily, as Father Krose shows in a booklet recently published on missionary statistics, even the published records of Catholic mission work compare very favorably with the tale of Protestant labors. As is well known one reason or another prevents the story of Catholic missions from being fully recounted to the general public. Father Krose instances an admirable example. The record of pecuniary sacrifices made by non-Catholics seems to far overbalance that of Catholic missionary offerings. Yet who is not aware that most of the Catholic missionaries and mission helpers belong to religious orders and freely donate their service to the sacred cause for which they labor. An enormous contribution, surely, when one recalls the large salaries paid by Protestant mission societies to those sent out by them to toil in the mission fields. And it is a contribution due to the generosity of the poor of Christ, whose record is not kept in published reports but in the memory of the Master for whose sake the missionaries have given up all things that they may follow Him.

F. S. BETTEN, S.J.

How Official Liquidation is Managed in France

The laws in regard to the liquidation of the properties of the Congregations suppressed in France require the Minister of Justice to make an elaborate annual report containing all the transactions of the liquidators, or as we should call them, receivers, during the preceding year. This annual report (Memoire) is transmitted also to each senator and deputy, not because any parliamentary sanction is required for it, but so that they may be furnished with information enabling any of them to request an interpellation as to irregularities or obscurities, and to require more precise data upon given points if deemed necessary.

M. Barthou is said to have devoted a good part of his vacation time to the preparation of his report, and on the eve of the reassembling of parliament he has managed to complete his work.

This is the fourth report of the kind which has been prepared, and it is not less interesting than its predecessors, proving that in spite of the prosecution of Duez and of Martin Gauthier, as well as the sword of Damocles which hangs over the heads of Menage and Lecouturier, the liquidators have not mended their ways, but go on with their operations in same good old grafting way.

M. Barthou begins by giving the general statement of liquidations in charge. These reached the number of 507 at the beginning of the year 1908, and in the course of that year some 101 were disposed of. There remained consequently on January 1, 1909, 406 pending liquidations, and of these 88 were concluded by December 31, 1909, thus leaving 318 unfinished on the first of January, 1910.

The total gross amount produced by these 88 liquidations reached 20,880,672.03 francs (notice the exactness of the .03 centimes), which was a striking shrinkage from the total gross amount produced in the preceding year, when it reached the total of 27,266,483.84 francs, thus making a difference of 6,385,811.81 francs. But from this gross sum there must be subtracted the total expense of the liquidations, amounting to the sum of 15,633,541.27 francs. In other words it cost 75 cents to collect each dollar of the amount realized from the sale of the properties in the hands of the liquidators. The French treasury department received only the sum of 5,247,130.76 francs, or one-quarter of the total amount realized. Imagine what would be said about an American receivership run on those lines!

The expenses of the legal proceedings absorbed about 1,973,848 francs, the special allowances of the liquidators (apart from their percentage commissions) used up 202,261 francs, lawyers' fees in the courts of the first instance, 211,386 francs, in the appellate courts and before the Conseil d'Etat, 487,615 francs, leaving out the centimes in each case.

On the other hand, the assistance doled out the decrepit and infirm members of the Congregations, that is the ones who were robbed, the real owners of the properties which were sold, came to but little more than half a million francs (out of the more than twenty millions realized by the sale of their property) and it was doled out so parsimoniously that there were Congregations which in one case received all told for its invalid aged membership the magnificent sum of 50 francs ($10), and another the sum of 31 francs ($6.20), and still another 25 francs ($5). Besides this, in a very large number of dissolved Congregations the liabilities exceeded the assets realized, and the French government therefore had to put its hand into the pockets of the other Congregations and indemnify by such addition of other people's money the poor overworked liquidators for their deficiency, and to pay their lawyers' fees and charges, especially those who practiced in the higher courts at Paris and elsewhere. As an example of the Parisian lawyers, we may cite the case of M. Sarrante, who got for one case 20,000 francs, and M. Faure, who received 40,000 francs for another one.

M. Barthou observes in his report that he has corrected two of the shortcomings pointed out by his predecessors in their reports, namely, the extreme length of time it took the liquidators before they would deposit in the official depositories the cash realized on their sales, all the while retaining it under their own control for several months at a time, even at times when the government had to advance payments to cover cases where there was a deficiency. The deposits, he says, have been made in 1909 almost normally, and with greater regularity than in preceding years, and also adds that as to the advances which the government has had to make in the cases where deficiencies occurred, amounting to the sum of 1,650,225 francs, the liquidators received the greater part of such advances, or to be exact, the sum of 995,827.82 francs. Why they did not make it a round million of francs we do not know.

It is well to bear in mind that in reality this sum has been exceeded, for in the preceding year the government advanced to the liquidators, on account of deficiencies, the sum of 359,067 francs, so that in reality the deficiency funds advanced to the liquidators approximate nearly a million and a half of francs.

Towards the end of his report M. Barthou calls attention to the fact that the accounts of the government and the accounts of the liquidators do not agree by some 62,827 francs, that sum according to the government accounts having been advanced to the liquidators in various deficiency matters, while the liquidators energetically deny ever having received that sum. M. Barthou, however, avoids making trouble for anyone by a most diplomatic proposal, and that is that the sum in question be charged off the government books to profit and loss.

The four reports so far published and the annual ones yet to follow will show a most remarkable chapter in the history of France, because the funds already received will be used to pay deficiencies in future cases, and eventually nothing will be received either for the state, for the aged and infirm members of the Congregations or for the socialistic crew who were to benefit by the confiscation of such property through the means of the promised old age pension system which was to be inaugurated from the proceeds. The whole property of the Congregations was taken from them to be given to official liquidators, their lawyers and their hangers-on.

ANDREW J. SHIPMAN.

Augustus Muller, S.J.

On the Feast of All Saints the Very Rev. Joseph Hanselman, Provincial of the Maryland New York Province of the Society of Jesus, received a letter from India written by the Rev. Augustus Muller, S.J., a missionary in the Far East; the same day, a few hours later, he received a cablegram from India announcing the Father's death. The name of Augustus Muller is known perhaps to few Americans, yet it is familiar to millions of Christians and Pagans in Europe and the Orient. In the annals of the missions for the past thirty years, his work among the lepers and the sick forms a resplendent chapter, while his heroic sacrifices recall to many the saintly Damien of Molokai.

Father Muller was an American, at least by adoption. He was born in Germany in 1841, and at the age of twenty entered the Jesuit novitiate of the New York and Canada Mission near Montreal, Canada. He taught several years at St. John's College, Fordham, New York, and made his higher studies in the Seminary at Woodstock, Md. Little did he dream when he first offered himself for the missions in the East that a great career of usefulness was opening before him. He was of a practical turn of mind and believed that he might minister to the bodily as well as to the spiritual ailments of the people with whom he was to cast his lot. At his arrival in 1879 in Mangalore, India, as a professor of St. Aloysius' College, he was the possessor of a small box of homœopathic medicines, which he had obtained in Paris. With this meagre supply of remedies he treated the sick among the students of the college and the poor who applied to him. The success of his treatment induced friends to help him to add to his stock of medicines and to open the Homœopathic Poor Dispensary in 1880. He next undertook to aid the lepers, and at great sacrifice he built an Asylum for them. Then came the Hospital for general diseases, as well as a Poor House and Plague Hospital.

The list of the institutions he founded and single-handed conducted during thirty years displays the enormous activity and the consuming zeal of the man of God. In the year 1891, Father Muller erected a large dispensary at Kankanady, to which a new wing was added in 1905, and another in the following year. Every day he received applications for advice from patients from all parts of India, Ceylon and Burma, for whom he prescribed gratis. People of every class, rich and poor, came for consultation to the out-patients' Department of the Dispensary in charge of his assistant, Dr. Fernandes, and two of the Hospital attendants. The poor were given advice and supplied with medicine free of charge. The number of out-patients treated daily was nearly 100. According to the report for 1908, forty clerks were kept busy in the dispensary, while ten carpenters were regularly employed in preparing cases or chests for the distribution of medicines.

St. Joseph's Leper Asylum came under Father Muller's management in 1890. His first care was to select a more suitable site of ten acres for a new building, to which the lepers were removed in 1892. The asylum contained 10 rooms, equally divided among men and women. The grounds were neatly laid out, and in 1896 a chapel was erected for the spiritual consolation of the afflicted inmates. Since then the building has been much enlarged to meet the increase of the number of lepers, which in 1908 amounted to 47. The Leper Asylum has been open to all castes and creeds, and its kindly shelter has been a welcome boon to those afflicted with this dread disease. The number cared for would be larger were it not for an ordinance of the District Board barring admittance to patients from outside the District.

Father Muller opened a small hospital for the relief of the poor Catholics of Mangalore and its suburbs in 1895. The hospital, consisting of two large wards and a chapel, was made possible by contributions raised in the town of Mangalore and a donation from Count Cæsar Mattei, of Bologna. The two wards accommodate 36 patients. So many of the sick poor applied for admission that, in 1901, Father Muller resolved to put up a new building, and to that end sought and received contributions from all parts of India. The cost of the new structure was 12,000 rupees, of which 5,425 rupees were given by the general public.

In the year 1902, the bubonic plague made its appearance in Mangalore, and its rapid progress created a panic among the people. The Catholics appealed to Father Muller and aided him substantially by subscribing the sum of nearly 5,000 rupees for another hospital. Within 27 days a building 75 by 45 feet was planned and erected on a site commanding a most charming view of distant hills and interlying rice fields. The Hospital is a durable structure of laterite stone, and has four well-ventilated wards with rooms for 24 patients. The number of plague patients treated in the hospital during the first five years after its establishment was 118.

But this is not all. For several years Mangalore had been free from the ravages of cholera epidemics, though sporadic cases were not unfrequent. In November, 1907, however, the town, and in fact the whole district of South Canara, were startled by a violent epidemic of the dreadful pestilence. As several cases were brought to the Kankanady Hospital, Father Muller opened a cholera camp, using also for want of a special building, the Bubonic Plague Hospital, which had been fortunately without patients for some time. Within a year 150 cases were treated, of which number 115 were restored to permanent health.

This short résumé of the works under the supervision of Father Muller, especially when we consider their arduous character, will make good the claim that he should be recognized as a man of heroic stature. Youthful vigor, energy of soul and pure love of humanity might, under exceptional circumstances, accomplish quite as much; but that a man tottering under the weight of years—for Father Muller had reached the three score and ten when he died—in the midst of hardships and difficulties of every kind, should have done all this, entitles him anew to the veneration of Christians throughout the world.

It is pleasing to note that Father Muller's labors were not without recognition during his lifetime. On Nov. 4, 1907, His Excellency, Sir Arthur Lawley, representing King Edward VII, Emperor of India, presented the K. I. H. Medal to Father Muller, after expressing feelingly his appreciation of the Father's work.

"Rev. Father Muller," said his Excellency in the public address he delivered on the occasion, "I take it that the purpose in view when the bestowal of the Kaisar-i-Hind Medal is determined on is to make known as widely as possible the recognition of services of exceptional merit rendered to India and her peoples. I feel that the phrase which I have used of exceptional merit is a most inadequate description of the work which you have done in this District. The Church to which you belong has, decade after decade, been a practical and living exposition of the teaching of Christ—self-sacrifice, self-obliteration, self-devotion to the welfare of others, and, ladies and gentlemen, no exponent of those doctrines has been more faithful, more consistent, more conspicuous than Father Muller. To restrain and to push back the encroachments of ignorance, poverty and sin, to do battle with the forces of disease, plague, leprosy and the other evils which flesh is heir to—this has been the noble task of his life. His way of life may seem to have fallen into the sere and yellow leaf, but age cannot wither his infinite enthusiasm, his patient devotion to duty, his overflowing love for his fellow-men. I hope that to him and to the gallant band enrolled under his banner the present moment may help in some degree to bring home the fact that his labor is not in vain, that we do realize how splendid has been the effort of his life, how rich the fruit of his work, and earnestly we hope and pray that God may prosper the labor of his hands. Sir, in pinning this Medal on your breast, I offer you my sincere congratulation, and express the hope that for many a year to come you may wear this decoration, and that it may cheer you and others who with you are climbing the steep and rugged path of duty."

Next morning Their Excellencies visited Father Muller's charitable institutions. A few hours after, His Excellency sent Father Muller the following letter:

MANGALORE, NOV. 5, 1907.

DEAR FATHER MULLER:

Together with a report of my speech, I send you a cheque for Rs. 100, which Lady Lawley and I beg you to accept, towards the funds of the Hospital.

It was a great pleasure to us both to see something of your splendid work, in which indeed, I wish you well.

Yours sincerely

ARTHUR LAWLEY.

But the most precious favor in the esteem of this apostle of the poor, the suffering and the outcast, was the following letter which our Holy Father, Pius X, sent with his photograph to the aged missionary in 1905.

To our beloved Son, Father Muller, of the Society of Jesus, and Dr. Laurence Fernandes, who have both well merited by the foundation of the hospital for poor lepers in Mangalore, and to all equally beloved benefactors, who help in this favorite work of charity, and to all the sick, praying for resignation from Heaven in their sufferings, we impart with all our heart the Apostolic Benediction.

From the Vatican, Oct. 14, 1905.

PIUS PP. X.

In the death of Father Muller the Church of Mangalore, and of the remote East in general, has lost the invaluable services of a devoted friend of the poor and the afflicted. The record of his work is the highest tribute to his worth and should be an inspiration to his fellow laborers in the mission field.

EDWARD SPILLANE, S.J.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Catholics of Ecuador

II.

PLAYA RICA, ECUADOR.

If anyone doubts a Living Christ in South America, let him visit on any day a chapel of the Blessed Sacrament. There may be seen men and women in adoration, and with such serious devotion as to convince the coldest heretic of their ardent and comforting faith. It is a common sight to see a father and son enter. They kneel together, bolt upright, on the hard paved floor, the father close up behind the son, who extends his arms full length forward with palms wide open and upward. The father reaches forward and in a manner embracing the son he clasps the latter's arms above the elbows and thus united, with faces radiant with hope turned upward to the Host in the ostensorium their prayers go out to Him living and present before them.

But a really thrilling sight comes to one who follows from the street a disciple of The Poor Man of Assisi on any afternoon, let us say, into the Dominican Church at Benediction. We say the Dominican Church because these two fraternize intimately, although we might behold a similar scene in any other church. After aspersing himself the poor humble friar goes forward to find a place amongst the people; putting down his basket he kneels, as nearly all worshipers do, on the cold pavement. There are no benches; a few fine ladies will have had their servants bring from their homes priedieus for their comfort, but the humble Franciscan is on the cold hard pavement,—and how gracefully all of these people do kneel. There is nothing for them to lean or rest against for support. They do not sit on their heels. Their feet are not screwed about in all sorts of untidy positions, but holding their feet well together and their bodies erect, as good manners exact, they are in becoming and proper devotional attitude. Having most humbly made his reverence, the friar loosens his habit at the throat band and bares his breast; his hands then go out and up. The wide sleeves of his habit fall back beyond the elbows. Oh those skinny arms give proof, if proof were necessary, of vigils and a rigorous ascetic life. The clean shaved head, save alone for the crown of hair two inches wide left circling above the ears, is thrown back with lips parted; from their cavernous depths two imploring brilliant eyes, illuminated by the fire of faith, are fixed on a Living Christ.

"Far off the noises of the world retreat"

We know his thoughts and desires

"Come Creator Spirit blest

And in our souls take up Thy rest

Come with Thy grace and heavenly aid

To fill the hearts which Thou hast made."

This is but a very poor portrayal of his attitude from the time the Host is placed in the ostensorium until it is returned to the tabernacle. Then his arms fall crossed over his breast and his head is bowed low, holding close to his heart, one might think, that which he has received. Arising he takes his basket and goes forth again out into the world. Receiving from those who can give, he simply says, "God will pay you;" and those to whom he speaks say, "Thanks be to God." All from God, all for God, is their teaching.

Visiting one of the convents in Quito a short time ago, I was told by the superior that they had fed at dinner that day 137 poor and infirm. Right then, one assents, was Lacordaire when he said: "The art and the heart of man never went further than in the creation of a convent."

A decade and more ago one could witness a scene in Quito that showed clearly the faith of the people. During the daily high Mass in the cathedral at the moment of Consecration, at about 8.30, the large bell in the campanile struck once. All were expecting it, everyone within hearing and within sight stood still in reverence at the tremendous moment of transubstantiation. The policemen stood uncovered at the street crossing. The coachman reined his horses and uncovered. The cargo mule train entering or leaving Quito was stopped one of the aricos running forward would draw off his poncho and throwing it over the head of the bellmare, blindfold her, and thus keep her and the entire pack still, and all the other aricos along the roadway out of sound of the bell seeing understood and did likewise.

In the market place, which by custom for centuries was in the plaza of San Francisco, the buzz of bartering about this time of the morning was fast and furious, but at the sound of that bell, which all knew and understood, all was hushed. All hats were removed, and if men did not kneel on the bare ground, the head was bared. Mistress and servant making purchases, like the stall keeper, would kneel. Woe to the man who through ignorance or otherwise failed in properly observing the customs. It was not uncommon to see men and women on their knees in the streets all over the city and, of course, in the shops off the streets, proprietors and customers were sure to fittingly reverence the moment. The barber preparing to shave one, by chance may have filled one's nose with soap-suds, and down on his knees he went. But the touching sight was to see the meek and lowly Indians, men and women, coming to market heavily burdened with packs fastened on their backs—a pig or a sheep, or a full sack of wheat, potatoes or maize, or even a coop of chickens or a pack of large adobe brick. The woman's hands busily engaged spinning out wool or cotton into yarn, one hand working out material into thread from a bundle fastened in her belt, the other swiftly twirling the spindle; the men with a wild cane flute or pipes of reed, trying to make a plaintive sad music, which kept alive in memory the sad history of their race and the hope they all cherish, that some day they will come into their own again—all their music is mournful and distinctly different from the lively music of the negro—as they trot along the highway thus occupied they hear the bell, they remove their hats, fall on their knees and bow their heads. One sincerely hopes that their faith will bring them to a much happier lot in the next world. All Quito stood still at this great moment and revered a Living Christ until the third stroke of the bell, when all went into action again. Anyone who will witness these sights—and all may witness them—and still say there is no Living Christ in South America, is not only devoid of religious feeling, but also of human sympathy.

But the American locomotive has climbed the cordillera and arrived in Quito, and all is changing. The public observance of this beautiful custom is going, as the Angelus has gone from us at home. What a pity! And our Protestant friends are making every effort without gain to themselves to destroy the faith of these simple and contented people.

The late Thomas Nast, while American Consul General in Guayaquil, on more than one Sunday evening accompanied me to the church while the people were at their evening devotions. Sometimes the rosary only, other times rosary, sermon and Benediction, and he never failed to remark when we came out how evidently comforting the religion and faith of those people were to them. It had been the faith of his own fathers which he himself had lost; let us hope that before his life was cut short by malignant yellow fever it came to him again.

The custom of the people of these countries of keeping the crucifix, or even a bare cross before them and in their minds, is oftentimes objected to and indeed sometimes ridiculed by those who do not understand them, or are not in sympathy with them. They do venerate the Cross. Upon awakening in the morning patron and peon alike bending the forefinger of the right hand under the thumb forms a cross, which he first kisses and then marks a cross on the forehead, across the lips and over the heart, saying, "By the sign of Thy holy Cross from our enemies, O Lord, deliver us," and this he asks while making the sign of the larger cross in the name of The Father and of The Son and of The Holy Ghost. During the day, if he passes a church, if he does not enter and kneel, he will at least raise his hat when in front of the door, and say, "We adore You O Lord Jesus Christ here and in all Your churches all over the earth, and bless You for having redeemed the world by Your Holy Cross." Should he be called to make oath on any occasion he does so by kissing the cross formed by the forefinger and thumb of the right hand. This is the most solemn form of oath here, and punishable in the severest manner if one should swear falsely.

Idle boys mark the cross on dead walls, lamp posts, telegraph line posts and houses. If an engineering outfit is at work cutting a line through the forest, when at mid-day they halt for luncheon, some one of the party is sure to fell a sapling and to strip it of branches. Then splitting the stick down from the top an opening is made into which they drop a cross-piece and thus a cross is made, which is stuck in the ground. Others may blaze a tree or two and with crayons mark a cross on the face. Canoe up any stream you please, and in turning every bend the first thing viewed will be a cross planted on the bank. Crowning the gables to the humble dwellings along the stream is sure to be a wood cross, oftentimes three. At night the canoeman whose turn it is to remain with the canoe, as you tie up for the night, to guard against floating debris and the perils of sudden freshets coming down from up-country, will be certain to have gotten out from his little bundle of change of clothing, pillow and sheet for bedding, which they all carry, a crucifix or cross, which he hangs above him in the rancho of the canoe. Journeying on any trail or roadway on foot, by mule, or in coach, one is sure to find a cross by the wayside at the top of every hill—if it should be the crest of a cordillera or the divide of important water-shed there will be three crosses. In the homes of the people the cross is still more in evidence from the time one passes the gateway. All day long the cross is before them and in their minds. One oftentimes thinks if he could but see their hearts he would find them branded with the cross. D. C. STAPLETON.

Death of an Interesting Character

To the Editor of AMERICA:

"The Patriarch," Mr. Thomas Casey, notice of whom appeared in your last issue, had been a resident of this little seaside village fifty-six years. He had fought for the Church like a Berserker. He gave no quarter to the enemy, routed him in argument and then punched his head. But he was so square and steadfast, so witty and infectious in good humor, that everybody loved him. His little home was literally filled with flowers from all over the country, and the day of the funeral there were people in the church by the score, who had never thought of entering a Mass-house. One man, a famous Boston artist, who has painted Casey a dozen times and made him a celebrity, cried like a girl when he saw his old friend dead. He would not order a wreath from a florist. "I would not get hot-house flowers for Tom, they are not good enough for him," said he. So he went to his own garden and took the leaves and berries that the old man especially liked and made of them an anchor and brought it down himself. The old man's life was really a rugged epic. It is a singular coincidence that the very day you wrote me and took the sketch, was the day he died.

C. W. C.

A M E R I C A

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1910.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1910, and published weekly by The America Press, New York, President, THOMAS J. CAMPBELL; Secretary, MICHAEL J. O'CONNOR; Treasurer, J. J. WILLIAMS.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Sq., W., New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

An Economic Contradiction

The political agitators of the world never vary through the ages in their monotonous sing-song about the propensity of the Church to increase its possessions for ecclesiastical purposes; but they never utter a sound about the incurable habit of kings and princes and business men in adding house to house, and acre to acre, for luxury or display, or the advancement of commerce and industry. It is true that the new and menacing power of Socialism proposes to reform both these conditions, but to all appearances it will not only be unsuccessful, but will adopt the same methods that are now so offensive to them. We have a striking example of it in bustling little Belgium, which is often spoken of as the Socialists' Paradise.

In the city of Ghent there is a popular Socialist paper called the Vooruit, which, like its namesakes in other countries, the Avanti, the Forward, the Vorwärts, etc., exercises an immense influence by its assaults on capital, its advocacy of the rights of workingmen, its schemes of social reform and the like. Its practice, however, does not keep pace with its protestations. It accumulates property; it avails itself of the unearned increment; it speculates in real estate, it absorbs minor industries; it crowds out small shopkeepers and has always a large amount of money available for its schemes. Thus it has recently purchased a piece of property on the banks of the Scheldt which consists of a splendid mansion surrounded by a garden and with outlying grounds stretching down to the river, where the keen eye of the Vooruit's business managers foresees an excellent opportunity for commercial and industrial plants. This fine estate was purchased at public auction for 115,000 francs. Nor had the money to be borrowed. It was paid on the spot plus the costs of the sale.

This, however, is only one of the many holdings of the enterprising journal. For besides the well-known establishment of the Ons Huis and its annexes, it owns a number of other valuable properties. For instance, it has purchased the historic buildings which formerly belonged to the Choral Society on Baguette street. It has a cooperative bakery, a printing house on Haut Port street, the factories and shipyard at the Industrie dock; coal pockets, a carpet mill, a brewery, a country house at Meirelbecke, and to end this incomplete enumeration, it has several branch offices, depots, pharmacies, liquor stores or estaminets, which are so many schools of Socialism scattered here and there in the suburbs and the thickly-settled quarters of the city proper.

We borrow this list from the Bien Public of Ghent, a sturdy Catholic daily, which is worried about its rival's prosperity and puzzled to account for the inconsistency between its professions and its practice. Here is a Socialistic paper working along precisely the same lines and in precisely the same manner as any capitalistic enterprise. One naturally asks why all this wealth remains in the hands of a privileged few who enjoy most of its advantages? Why are not the profits of these multiplied industries divided up among the poverty-stricken proletariat whose subscriptions and contributions, which are given to the journal with almost a religious zeal, have made these vast operations possible? The answer is obvious. If the money were divided the Vooruit would go out of business; its propaganda could not be carried on for another moment. It is unavoidable, for such is the way in which all human society must be constituted. The mass of mankind will always be workers and a few "intellectuals" will direct the concern, occupy its mansions, enjoy its country-houses, own its autos, make trips on its yachts, etc. There is nothing to be done in the premises but to check and correct the abuses.

Why then should Socialists, above all men, display such rage against religious communities which more than any other human institutions are so purely socialistic in their character? Indeed they are the highest and only possible realizations of socialistic ideals, while at the same time they are absolutely free from the abuses which irreligious or unreligious socialism must always labor under. A number of holy and devoted women live together in the same house, wear the same dress, eat the same food and enjoy no distinctive personal privilege, the highest and the humblest member of the household conforming absolutely to the same rule. Moreover, their object is not to make money but to care for the sick, the poor, the old and the abandoned. Both they and their charges make use of the common purse. Nor are these dependents pauperized, for by methods which are only supernaturally explainable these refined and cultured women succeed in making the people whom they care for almost imagine they are doing the Sisters a favor in accepting the bounty so lavishly bestowed. Nor can any dreamer ever conceive that the Socialist dream will ever be realized of having in the new conditions of society no dependent classes. There will always be sick people and old people and orphans, and heart-broken wretches who will need a Sister's care and affection.

Yet, strange to say, it is these communities that are first to suffer in the convulsions that are now agitating the world. The nuns are driven out on the street, their houses are confiscated; and the poor are left to shift for themselves. It is an economic contradiction indeed, but is there not back of it religious antagonism?

Germany's Future

The United States is not the only nation which is permitting itself a measure of self-gratulation just now, because of the evidence its latest census affords of the national vigor and wide-spread growth of its people. Official figures just published in Berlin lead enthusiasts of the Vaterland to indulge in roseate pictures of what the future has in store for the empire. They affirm that the national wealth of Germany is increasing at so rapid a rate that by 1950 it will be more than double the estimated present wealth of the whole British Empire, and that the population of their country will have grown to 96,000,000 within the same period. That they do not deem their forecast at all visionary appears certain, since they assure us that the army and navy are being expanded with these figures in view.

Do the official figures bear them out in their claims? It is true that the German Empire is now growing in population at the rate of little less than a million a year, and that the excess of births over deaths in Germany in the last twelve months was almost 880,000. Meantime, however, the birth rate has declined in all the States of the Empire and in all parts of the country in the last ten years. It now stands at 33 per 1,000 of the population, while the death rate has risen from 18.98 to 19.01 per 1,000 of the inhabitants. The decreased birth rate has been especially rapid in Saxony, which is a great manufacturing State. A markedly low rate is reported from Hamburg, Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Brunswick, Alsace-Lorraine, Mecklenburg-Strelitz and Reuss. The highest birth rates are in Posen, Westphalia, West Prussia, Silesia, the Palatinate, the Rhine provinces and Bavaria.

This year's reports show, too, that while the decline in the nation's death rate has been checked for the first time in many years, yet there has been an increase in infant mortality—375,022, as compared with 351,046 in the previous year. Immigration into Germany was 30,713 less than in 1906, which was a high year, and emigration from Germany was 25,000, which is 6,000 more than in the year before.

Other features of the nation's reports are calculated to shake an American's faith in the optimism of German forecasts of the Empire's future glory. The German army now costs $5 a year for every inhabitant of the Empire—a total of from $200,000,000 to $250,000,000—a fearful burden to be carried in the arduous march to national wealth and greatness. Its peace strength exceeds 620,000 men and 120,000 horses. There are more than 1,000,000 men under arms at one time or another under the reservist plan. More than 435,000 men, the very flower of the 1,200,000 recruits, examined every year under the compulsory military service laws of the country, are incorporated into one or other branch of the military establishment. About one-half of these are twenty years of age, and the rest twenty-one or twenty-two. It is no very difficult problem one sets himself when he begins to calculate the tremendous sapping of national energy contained in a system which thus disposes of the youth of the land.

One may not deny the progressiveness of the German Empire, or the sturdy character of the people who have made its onward strides so notably evident in recent history, but there are features of its policy that make one hesitate to admit the glowing forecasts which enthusiastic statisticians sketch of its approaching splendor.

Apostles without Pay

We had occasion last week to ask what Catholics would say if, like some non-Catholic charitable organization, the Society of St. Vincent de Paul were to spend more than 22 per cent. of its revenues in administration. We have since received the fifty-fifth annual report of the Particular Council of Brooklyn, from which we learn that the total disbursements were $49,962.32, and the expenses of administration were less than $3,000, that is, less than 6 per cent. of the money paid out. This society cannot show a list of wealthy patrons. Its chief source of revenue is the poor-box in each church where a conference is established, that is to say the small contribution, averaging about ten cents, of the poor. Of its total receipts, $30,354.48 was obtained in this way from 53 churches. Special donations came to $5,037.48; unclassified income, to about the same, the personal contributions of 937 members at their meetings came to $3,087.50, and St. Anthony's Bread realized $5,885.65.

It must be observed that the administration of the Society is in the hands of the members of the conferences. These, therefore, by their personal contributions, given in addition to their services as visitors, etc., practically defray all the administrative expenses, so that whatever comes from other sources goes exclusively to charity. This is an admirable showing, worthy of being noted most carefully by those who have the means and the wish to help the poor.

The Brooklyn Council of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul has the distinction of being one of the very first organizations to take up outings for children during the hot weather, twenty years ago. It also conducts a summer home at Freeport, L. I., where some 1,100 children enjoy a fortnight's country life under the care of the Sisters. This is supported in great measure by the collection and sale of old newspapers and magazines, a work which, moreover, gives employment to some forty men. The Society also supports a probation officer in the Children's Court. It has a Woman's Auxiliary, which gives it much help.

Socialism

The convention of the American Federation of Labor which, on November 14, began its sessions in St. Louis is announced to have been the largest meeting in the history of that body. One is very glad to learn this, since the fact emphasizes the success which came to President Samuel Gompers in his determination to head off the plan of the Socialists led by Victor Berger, Congressman-elect from Milwaukee, to obtain an endorsement of Socialism by the full convention. True, Mr. Berger, apparently angered at being singled out as a "boss" Socialist in press despatches, has issued a statement denying that he went to St. Louis to lead any such movement. Nevertheless, as their action in previous meetings makes clear, the Socialists have cherished the plan to win the Federation's indorsement at every convention of the body in recent years. Probably Mr. Gompers recognized their purpose better than most of his followers, and thought that the recent election of their first congressman made necessary a definite attack upon their ambitious plan. The labor chief has the courage of his convictions, and without awaiting the expected motion seeking the convention's endorsement, in his report, which he presented to the meeting immediately upon its organization, he boldly referred to Socialism as one of the "played out crazes and social panaceas."

Mr. Berger's denials of a plan to capture the convention made little impression on the delegates present in St. Louis. The labor leaders in attendance and naturally all of the adherents of Mr. Gompers interpreted this statement as evidence of a victory over the Socialists, and as meaning that the attack made by President Gompers in his annual report had had the desired effect of checking the ambitions of Berger and his followers. So sure were the delegates that theirs was the real explanation of the Socialist Congressman's denial that the common talk in the hotel lobbies on the night following the reading of Mr. Gompers's report was: "Gompers by his fearless attack nipped in the bud the plot of the Socialists to capture the convention."

The paragraph of the President's report referring to Socialism ought to make interesting reading for Charles Edward Russell, Socialist author and recently Socialist candidate for the office of Governor of New York, to whose enthusiastic assurance that "from now on the Socialist party will wage a winning fight" editorial reference was made in last week's AMERICA. Mr. Gompers, in his report, assails Socialism with the following only slightly veiled attack: "In going the whole round of the isms, sociological, ethical, legal, political, reformatory, played out crazes, and social panaceas, one will hear expressed by the leaders a sentiment that the trade unionists are hidebound conservatives because they declined to rush in a body to take the magic medicine for social ills offered by the particular ism advocated by the critic in each case. It is a fact that trade unionism in America moves on its own set, deliberate way. In so doing it has outlived wave upon wave of hastily conceived broad movements that were to reconstruct society in a single season, and it has sufficiently good cause for continuing on its own reasoned out course."

Methodism and the American State

No sect declaims more fiercely against the union of church and state than Methodism. It is full of suspicions regarding the designs of Catholics in the matter, and is generally on the watch to discover them. Yet Methodists speak and act as if their religion were that of the United States and as if they were the religious guides of the government.

Several Methodist Episcopal bishops visited the November meeting of the Methodist ministers of New York a few days ago, and, if the newspaper account of the proceedings be trustworthy, the language of bishops and ministers was most offensive. As our object is to point out their arrogance rather than their blasphemy, we will not comment upon a bishop's assertion that Our Lord, not Thomas Jefferson, "wrote the Declaration of Independence, because He wanted to make the experiment of creating the biggest, the best, and the grandest nation the world has ever seen." We go on therefore to the following: "We must make good Americans of the foreign born citizens, and making good Methodists is an economical way of accomplishing this." Here are two implications. First, that the Catholic religion is an impediment to good citizenship, something no Methodist bishop has ever proved, nor could prove if he labored till doomsday; and second, that there is such an intimate connection between Methodism and citizenship, that its adoption is a short and easy way by which the foreign born may fit themselves to be worthy Americans.

Another said amid great applause: "After 400 years of Romanism Porto Rico was turned over to the United States with one public school. Under the recent rule and with the advent of Methodism, there are 2,000 public schools, with a membership of 121,000 children." Here there are the following implications. First, that the modern public school is an essential part of the American political system; and, second, that its diffusion throughout Porto Rico is due, not to the public authority of the island, but to the vigilance of Methodism. These evidently contain an insinuation the civil rulers of Porto Rico should attend to, namely, that they would have neglected their duty had the Methodists not kept them up to it. That the modern public school is an essential part of the American political system is at least disputable. The school, public or private, that could teach the view of the authorship of the Declaration of Independence proclaimed by the bishop and welcomed by the ministers, though it might satisfy Methodist ideals, would so outrage Christian feelings as to find no possible place in a national system which respects every reasonable conscience.

SOME FRIENDS OF MINE.

II.

THE DOCTOR.

He is really sixty-two, but as he swings along the road, his long frame as lithe as that of a boy and his eye keen with interest in all that goes on, you would never take him for more than forty-five at the most. Winter and summer he ranges over the country-side dispensing comfort and medicine. His medicine is good, but with all due deference to the pharmacopœia, his comfort is better.

One of the best gifts of a physician is a sympathetic voice, that soothes the fears of the patient and encourages confidence. It is a great factor in obtaining the true history of a case. The doctor in the sick room is an artist. I am sure he would have made a great cross-examiner, so winning is his smile, so kind his intonation. I have known M.D.s who enter the sick room as if they were generals of a conquering army in the camp of the defeated foe. They appear to have as much sympathy for a patient as a lynching party displays for him who is soon to don the hempen neck-tie. How such physicians expect to produce good results is a mystery to me. The Doctor enters the house as if he were the bearer of a pleasant and honorable message from a High Personage. He radiates good humor, he carries optimism in his satchel. When you see him coming in, you know instinctively that the worst is over.

Nor is he any narrow practitioner, contented with his rut. He misses few of the decisive ball games in Boston, and his idea of an autumn vacation is a few weeks at the Harvard Medical School to get in touch with the latest methods of his profession. You may quiz him on the newest moot question and his answer is quick and satisfactory. He takes a broad and human view of the use of spirits and malt liquors. A most abstemious man himself, he makes no hard and fast lines for other men. His fine feeling in this regard recalls to my memory a stalwart old friend of mine who never drinks any intoxicants, but whose great delight is to compound execrable cocktails for his many guests. I think a select committee of such men would be able to solve the eternal liquor question. In fine the Doctor is just such a man as you would like to have as a companion on a long journey or be able to call on in a dangerous crisis.

I have heard in the village that the Doctor is grasping, but I notice that those who make the talk are considered poor pay in the shops. The Doctor has his own grocery account like the rest of us, and while charity is an excellent thing, it is somewhat disgraced by those who have no qualms about routing a man up in the dead of night and then let a doctor's bill run on for two or three years without a word about payment. Twenty years practice in a district like this makes a physician wise in more things than human ills. He accumulates a large and solid experience of human nature, and may be trusted to reach a just decision about deserving cases nine times out of ten. The Doctor tells me he has no objection to treating poor people gratis, but he does hate to be cheated by folks who never pay a bill voluntarily.

I used to think the Doctor had no other voice than the soft and soothing one he uses in the sick room and in conversation, but one day last summer, he happened to be on the road and his horse, a foolish, young animal, started to cut up capers. He took out the whip and administered a good trouncing, whereat a summer resident who belongs to various humane societies commanded him to desist. Then the Doctor rose in his wrath, and in a voice that might have been heard a mile up and down the river, told her to go to those regions where heat is a drug on the market. The lady retired in high dudgeon and has several times referred to the Doctor as "a profane brute," but he still has plenty to do.

A neighbor of mine who continues to present her husband with annual olive branches and has now almost enough boys to form a domestic ball team, recently informed me that it is never necessary to have the Doctor come to the house. He knows the children so well that all you have to do is to tell him the symptoms and he takes some pills from the cupboard, and when they are given to the child according to directions he is soon well again.

There is no love lost between the Doctor and the Patriarch, and thereby hangs a tale. Some years ago the latter had pneumonia, and the Doctor, not desiring to pile up a bill against the old man, called only when it was necessary. But the Patriarch considered daily visits as only befitting his state and age. When the crisis was over and the old man began to feel himself again he took the Doctor to task and they had a falling out. It ended in a younger doctor being called. He had an easy case and received all the credit. Then there was a battle over the bill with threats of law suits and writs. It ended in the complete dissatisfaction of both parties, and the Patriarch uniformly refers to the Doctor as a "miserly quack."

I once asked the doctor about a popular book and he confessed that he had not read a novel in many years. The medical journals, his many cases and the routine of his work eat up all his time. He delegates literature to his wife, who administers dilute portions at dinner. A very good way it seems to me, to absorb the "best sellers."

I have never talked religion with the Doctor, but I suspect he is no strong churchman. It is strange how many men there are in the village, honest, charitable and true, who have so slight an affiliation with any form of religion. They seem to have evolved a sort of humanitarianism with a vague notion of the Deity, and to have settled down to live according to their lights. I hope however that when the Doctor has finished his last round and another physician is called and his eyes are closed upon this suffering world, the Great Physician will put into the scales against my friend's failings and offences the long, hard days and nights that have been given so gladly to ailing young and old.

CHAS. W. COLLINS.

LITERATURE

La Vie D'Union A Dieu, Par Auguste Saudreau. Paris: Amat, 11, rue Cassette.

L'Etat Mystique, Sa Nature, Ses Phases, Par Auguste Saudreau. Same publisher

Les Faits Extraordinaires de la Vie Spirituelle, Par Auguste Saudreau. Same publisher.

As we close these fascinating volumes, we exclaim: "How wonderful are the ways of God! How marvelous His operations in hearts entirely His!" Canon Saudreau lifts us into the serene atmosphere of another world, where we hear an insistent call to higher things.

Some perhaps will not accept all the learned writer's conclusions. He maintains that as it is not contrary to humility to pray for perfect knowledge and love of God, it cannot be but praiseworthy to pray for that state of holy contemplation and those mystic graces, which, according to him, are the normal complement and term of the spiritual life. Not a few might answer, that the mystic state, its graces, its acts are extraordinary, like the gift of prophecy or miracles; and as it would be presumption to look for extraordinary favors, so it is more conformable to humanity not to aspire to the Mystic Way.

Everyone, however, will admit the force, the erudition, the extensive acquaintance with the great theologians and mystics which the author brings to bear upon his theme, in addition to his piety and zeal. The matters treated are of the most difficult and delicate nature. It would be easy to go astray, and a false step would be dangerous. But M. l'abbé Saudreau manifests throughout remarkable sanity of thought and sobriety of judgment.

It may not be amiss to remark—the fact is sometimes forgotten—that those who attain to the mystical state and habitually persevere and advance in it, are not erratic, ill-balanced enthusiasts. Sound spiritual sense, stable equilibrium of the faculties are their characteristics. Humility, patience, obedience, abnegation of self, love of the Cross, follow in their train. No wonder; for in that mystical state God works more powerfully, and the action of God can produce only Light, Order and Perfection. On this point the author insists, and rightly. At the end of the "Vie d'Union," he writes, "Let God do with us as He will. We have but one duty—to increase daily more and more in His Love."

In this volume of the "Vie d'Union," even more perhaps than in the others, the erudite canon shows his intimate knowledge of Mystical Theology. Not only has he mastered the doctrine of its great classical writers, such as St. John of the Cross, St. Teresa, St. Thomas, St. Bonaventure, St. Bernard, St. Francis de Sales, Gerson, Hugh and Richard de Saint Victor and Suarez—but he is familiar with Thalassius and Ruysbroeck, Alvarez de Paz, Bona, Brancati de Laurea and Vallgornera. We have in fact in this work a well connected history of Mysticism from the time of Clement of Alexandria to our own day. We do not find, however, any reference to the "Mystic" of Görres.

To the priests and religious, to those whose motto is Sursum Corda, lift up your hearts, these volumes will make an eloquent appeal. They will teach unworldliness and the spirit of union with God. Their ideals and purpose cannot be too heartily approved.

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

Siena and Southern Tuscany. By EDWARD HUTTON. With sixteen illustrations in color by O. F. M. Ward and twelve other illustrations. New York: The Macmillan Company. Price, $2.00.

Why was this beautiful book disfigured by a ribald story about Boccaccio? It is spoiled completely by one page as far as it is intended to be a book for general circulation. If an author suffers from temporary hallucinations concerning the non-existence of such a thing as decency from an artistic point of view, more practical considerations should determine his publishers to persuade him gently, but firmly, that the coarse stories, written when only scholars could read, are not, on the strength of such a precedent, to be inflicted upon a reading public, which includes, perhaps, more young than old, and certainly fewer scholars than persons merely seeking pleasant distraction and recreation.

This flaw in an otherwise admirable and beautiful book is a fatal defect in the eyes of a reviewer who suspects that his unqualified recommendation may be an occasion for shocking and hurting a pure mind and sensitive conscience. If the author of the book scorns such possessions, he cannot find fault with us for warning a class of persons, whom he must despise, away from his book.

The volume is occupied exclusively with one little square cut out of Italy. A map, arranged most conveniently, aids the text in helping us to follow the author step by step in his rambles through historic and romantic scenes. The history, topography, legend and romance are medieval and Catholic, and are treated by the author in a sympathetic spirit of reverence and sheer delight with the beauty of it all. His sketches of St. Catherine of Siena, St. Margaret of Cortona and the other numerous saints, whose lives brightened the district he has chosen to describe, are just and serious and beautiful to a degree, surprising in the case of a writer who probably is not a Catholic. We feel like shaking him for deliberately putting a big, ugly, malodorous fly into his translucent amber.

J. J. D.

Martyrs of New France. By W. S. HERRINGTON. Toronto: William Briggs.

This book from the pen of a distinguished Protestant lawyer is made up of a dozen sympathetic sketches of some of the heroic missionaries and explorers of early Canada. The author in his preface comments upon the seeming reluctance shown by Canadians of English descent to concede that "our country owes anything to the sturdy sons of France who first planted the fleur de lis upon these shores," and regrets that "it was left for a Protestant bishop of a foreign country to say of the Jesuit Fathers who were the first missionaries to Canada that they 'had shown greater devotion in the cause of Christianity than has ever been seen since the time of the apostles.'" Mr. Herrington, certainly, is not in the number of those who are sparing in praise "of the intrepid Frenchmen who deemed no sacrifice too great for the mighty undertaking they had in hand," for after a thoughtful introductory chapter which places his readers in the atmosphere of the Canadian seventeenth century, he gives a brief, exact but enthusiastic account of the labors and sufferings of De Nouë, Jogues, Daniel, Brebœuf and Marquette, five of those French Jesuits in whom Father Campbell's two excellent volumes, "Pioneer Priests of North America" has awakened our keen interest.

"Martyrs of New France" also embraces sketches of De la Salle, the explorer of the Mississippi, of Daulac, the Saviour of Canada, and finally of a fearless pioneer with whose achievements the general reader is perhaps not so familiar, Gautier de la Verendrye, who, with a Jesuit priest in his party set out in quest of the Pacific. His sons crossed the continent as far as the Rocky Mountains sixty years before Lewis and Clark's expedition.

In touching on the motives animating two great races, the author observes that "England stood for colonization; France for colonization and evangelization." Indeed the pioneers of France are the antithesis of those of England. The latter claims only the solitary John Eliot, who peacefully translated the Scriptures for his praying Indians at Natick, while the French missionaries were thousands of miles away in the wilderness.

Mr. Herrington's little book was intended as a reader for the schools of Ontario. No better theme could have been selected for inspiring young minds with lofty ideals.

WALTER DWIGHT, S.J.

Two Boys in the Tropics. By ELISA HALDEMÁN FIGYEL-MESSY. New York: The Macmillan Company. Price, $1.35, net.

The joyous season of snow forts and snow men, chilblains and chapped hands, brings with it periods of enforced inactivity, during which mustard plasters, goose oil and vaseline are much in evidence. We should like to see "Two Boys in the Tropics" among the remedies kept in readiness for the benefit of youthful, but not always excessively patient, heroes and victims of winter sports and mishaps, for it must necessarily prove an effective counter irritant. No boy can read it without being fired with eagerness to see and enjoy for himself the delights of Loys and Halde as they leave the bleak northern winter of Pennsylvania and sail to the land of perpetual summer. There is not a line of "teaching" in the whole book, yet the boy who does not learn from reading it is a hopeless case. It is ostensibly a book for boys and girls, but it will be welcome to older "boys and girls" in whom this workaday world has not dried up the fountains of wholesome enjoyment. The voyage from Baltimore to British Guiana, the natives of the colony, its birds, seafoods and unfamiliar fruits, the games of the children, are some of the chapters that will attract and hold the ever fickle attention. Full-page illustrations are lavishly scattered through the book.

* * *

Persia and Its People. By ELLA C. SYKES. New York: The Macmillan Company. Price $2.50 net.

There is a feeling of melancholy in contemplating the pitiful remnants of a nation's former glories, which rise spectre-like out of the dim past and place themselves in vivid and painful contrast with the present. Once the proud possessor of an advanced civilization which exercised its ennobling influence over commerce, industry, the arts and sciences and domestic life, Persia now looks out upon a mental and moral waste where the blight of Islam has almost stifled effort if not life. Though nations grow old like a garment, their unlovely decrepitude becomes still more unlovely when compared with what they were in the days of their might. As we follow the author through the dominions of the shah, we are again and again reminded of Persia's proud position in those olden days when even Roman emperors tasted the bitterness of defeat through the skill and valor of Persia's warriors. Now that the chains of absolutism are broken, will there be a resurrection? We think there will be a change, a transformation, wrought not by Persians but by Europeans, and at the cost of Persia's independence.

The Persia of to-day is very graphically set before us, not only as far as government and public life are concerned, but especially in all that regards domestic customs, diversions and superstitions. These chapters are full of life and sparkle. "The Persian Man" is subjected to a searching analysis, and "The Persian Woman" is also examined with the scalpel. We should have been more pleased if in the chapter on religion, the author had gone into more detail about the work of the Christian missionaries, who have certainly not been sparing in toil and expense. Twenty full-page illustrations add to the book's attractiveness. Nothing else is needed to give us a fair knowledge of the Persia of to-day and to arouse regrets for the Persia that was and is not.

* * *

Notes sur la Medecine et le Botanique des Anciens Mexicains. Par A. GERSTE, S.J. Rome: Imprimerie Polyglotte Vaticane.

A residence of ten years in Mexico, during which he delved into the antiquities of that country, furnished the author with a mass of curious information on the healing art as practised by the natives before the coming of the Spaniards and during the colonial days. This he has gathered into a brochure of 188 pages and has thus made generally accessible. As is to be expected in a primitive people, magic rites and superstitious observances entered largely into their system of treating bodily ailments, yet their knowledge of the medicinal properties of plants was anything but meagre. At a time when botanical gardens for the detailed and methodical study of the therapeutic value of members of the vegetable kingdom were unknown in Europe, the Aztec priests were busy with their investigations of the properties of plants which they gathered and cultivated for that special purpose. The Mexican government is now prosecuting a diligent study of the remedies and simples that have remained among the people from the days of Aztec glory. Father Gerste's work has been crowned by the Institute of France.

* * *

Saint Thomas à Becket. By MONSIGNOR DEMIMUID. Translated by C. W. W. "The Saints" Series. New York: Benziger Bros. $1.00 net.

The struggle between the spirit of the world and the spirit of Christ is never-ending; for the solemn adjuration, "Render therefore to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's," has often fallen and will continue to fall on deaf ears. Eight hundred years ago that struggle resulted in the tragedy of Canterbury and the glorious death of the Primate of All England, Thomas à Becket. The marks of royal favor which were showered upon him by Henry II, his rise in power and dignity until he became Lord Chancellor and keeper of the king's conscience, his steadfastness in resisting Henry's attempt to enslave the Church, his sacrifice of worldly prospects for the sake of a sacred principle, all make instructive reading in these our days which pine for Catholics who really place God above Cæsar, Catholics whose principles of morality exercise a wholesome influence over them in their business, professional and political relations with their fellow man. St. Thomas gave his life for the right. So great a sacrifice may not be demanded of us, but there remains the duty to put conscience above any temporal advantage and to work for God's approval rather than for the praise that His enemies may be pleased to bestow. The weak-kneed timeserver will not relish the life of St. Thomas; the Catholic whose faith is a strong and living reality will find in it much to encourage him in the present phase of the never-ending struggle.

* * *

The Story of Our Lord's Life Told for Children. By a CARMELITE NUN. New York: The Cathedral Library Association. $1.00 net.

No book that has been brought to our notice can compare with this Life of Our Lord for children. The story, old yet ever new, related in words accommodated to the understanding of the young hearer or reader, is simply and touchingly told by one who, in the sacred retirement of the cloister, has lived close to Him and has enjoyed that holy intimacy with the Divine Presence which is accorded to those who love Him with an undivided heart. The illustrations are in keeping with the treatment of the theme, for the masterpieces of world-famous artists have been gathered together to adorn the text, which is in itself so delicately beautiful. Happy children who have been so highly favored! Grateful indeed ought they to be to the gentle nun who has made them sharers of the knowledge and love that she has for Him who said, "Suffer the little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not."

* * *

El Convite Eucaristico, Manual para la Comunión Fre-cuente, por el Padre JESUS CORNEJO, Redentorista. St. Louis: B. Herder. Price $1.00.

This is a compilation for those devout souls who, hearkening to the voice of the Father of Christendom, would frequently refresh themselves at the Eucharistic Banquet. There are six series of seven exercises each, thus furnishing abundant and varied matter for preparation and thanksgiving. One hundred pages are given to the familiar every day devotions and hymns, thus making the book a complete prayer book. It is a spiritual treasure-house for the Spanish-speaking faithful.

* * *

BOOKS RECEIVED

- The Dawn of Modern England. A History of the Reformation (1509-1525). By Carlos B. Lumsden. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. Net $3.00.
- Cuba. By Irene A. Wright. New York: The Macmillan Co. Net $2.50.
- Territorial Governors of the Old Northwest. By Dwight G. McCarthy. Iowa City: The State Historical Society of Iowa.
- Modernism. By Cardinal Mercier. Translated from the French by Marian Lindsay. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net 50 cents.
- Christ and the Gospel. Or, Jesus the Messiah and Son of God. By the Rev. Marius Lepin, S.S., D.D. Philadelphia: John Jos. McVey. Net $2.00.
- Catholic Religion. A Statement of Christian Teaching and History. By the Rev. Charles A. Martin. Illustrated. Cleveland: The Apostolate Publishing Co. Net cloth, $1.00; paper, 35 cents.
- Back to Holy Church. Experiences and Knowledge Acquired by a Convert. By Dr. Albert Von Ruville. Edited, with a Preface by Rev. Robert Hugh Benson. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. Net $1.20.
- The Christmas Angel. By Abbie Farwell Brown. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. Net 60 cents.
- Melchior of Boston. By Michael Earls, S.J. New York: Benziger Bros. Net $1.00.
- As Gold in the Furnace. A College Story: (Sequel to "Shadows Lifted"). By Rev. John E. Copus, S.J. New York: Benziger Bros. Net 85 cents.
- Phoebe and Ernest. By Inez Haynes Gillmore. New York: Henry Holt & Co. Net $1.50.
- The Mayor of New York. By L. P. Gratacap. New York: G. W. Dillingham Co. Net $1.50.
- The Land of Living Men. By Ralph Waldo Trine. New York: T. Y. Crowell & Co. Price $1.25.
- The Centurion. By A. B. Routhier. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net $1.50.
- Mere Hints: Social and Moral. By Rev. John E. Graham, Baltimore, Md.

Pamphlets:

- The Process of Abstraction. An Experimental Study. By T. V. Moore. Berkeley, Cal.: The University Press.
- Spanish Almanac for 1911. New York: Benziger Bros. Net 20 cents.
- French Almanac for 1911. New York: Benziger Bros. Net 20 cents.
- Italian Almanac for 1911. New York: Benziger Bros. Net 20 cents.
- Einsiedler Kalender for 1911. New York: Benziger Bros. Net 15 cents.
- Marien Kalender for 1911. New York: Benziger Bros. Net 20 cents.

ART

JOHN LA FARGE.

A great artistic individuality disappears in the person of John La Farge, who died at Providence, R. I., on November 14. For many years he had been with Saint Gaudens one of the two best-known figures in the American art world. Both were eminently representative, though infinitely dissimilar. Each held a place that no other can quite fill. Their work will remain. And as La Farge himself expressed it at the close of his famous talk on Hokusai: "The art of the painter is his final abode."

John La Farge was born in New York March 31, 1835, of French parentage. He received his first instruction in drawing from his grandfather, a miniature painter of some note. From Columbia College he went to Europe, 1857, and worked for a while under Couture; after that alone, observing and copying in the galleries. In 1859 he returned home and entered a lawyer's office without wholly giving up his painting. The man to whom he owed most as an artist was William Hunt, a pupil of Millet; in him he found tastes and aims similar to his own. Excellent landscapes, sincere and wide, and flower pieces that one can only call impressionistic, belong to this period. In 1860 La Farge married Miss Margaret Perry. The illustrations for Enoch Arden and Browning's "Men and Women," are of about the same date. In 1863 came the picture for St. Peter's Church. The "Wolf Charmer," a drawing on wood, was not developed until much later. "New England Pasture" (1866), "The Last Valley" (1867), and "Bishop Berkeley's Rock" (1868), led up to the artist's election to the National Academy. La Farge's subtle understanding and strong love for Japanese art seem to date back to his early days in Paris, where he probably first saw the original Hokusai drawings; his color-sense, always strong, developed continually. The future of American art lay, he said, in mural painting. His friend, H. H. Richardson, commissioned to build Trinity Church in Boston, invited La Farge to decorate the interior, (1876). The following year, in the chancel of St. Thomas' Church, Fifth avenue, he painted "The Three Marys at the Tomb" and "Christ and the Magdalene," unfortunately destroyed by fire; the vast "Ascension" in the church of that name, in New York, is probably La Farge's best religious subject. Large and harmonious in composition, subdued and yet unusually prismatic in color effect, and far more atmospheric than much of his later work.

In the seventies, during a period of convalescence, La Farge amused himself with the experiments of colors and light seen through an opaque glass. The idea grew upon him of what might be done with iridised opalescent material. The invention was purely his own. He got a man to make what is now called "American" glass and devoted himself chiefly henceforth to the production of stained windows, following the process from beginning to end. Exceeding depth of tone, richness, solid quality and vivid beauty of color characterized these windows. The first were leaded; the latter ones show only filaments of metal fused to the glass. A famous example is the "The Peacock Window" in the Worcester Art Museum; the great "Battle Window" at Harvard, in Memorial Hall, (1881) flashes like a gem. The Memorial windows executed by La Farge are too numerous to name: Watson, Parkhurst, Cable (a lovely one) Black, Ames, etc. Much work, glass and wall or ceiling painting, was done in private residences: W. H. Vanderbilt, Cornelius Vanderbilt, and the two lunettes "Music" and "Drama" for Whitelaw Reid. Important mural decorations in civic buildings are the series in the Court House in Baltimore, and the four great subjects in the capitol, St. Paul, Minn.: The Moral and Divine Law; (Moses); the Relation of the Individual to the State (Socrates converses with Polemarchus); The Recording of Precedents (Confucius); The Adjustment of Conflicting Interests (Count Raymond of Toulouse takes oath before the Bishops).

In 1886 La Farge went to Japan, "happy to return to painting after much work in decorative glass." He was most delicately sensitive to effects of colors and light in color, and some of the loveliest things he ever painted came in words from his pen. His "Letter from Japan" record this trip. In 1890 he was in Hawaii; in 1901 in Stevenson's Samoa. The record of his travels was exhibited at Durand-Ruels in 1895; pictures, sketches, drawings, all infinitely prized by the knowing. This same year La Farge "gave" (so he spoke of his painted work) the "Considerations on Painting." In 1903 came his "Greek Masters," and the lectures delivered that season before the Art Institute of Chicago appeared subsequently as "The Higher Life in Art."

A great worker, original and of enormous fertility, La Farge's output has been large in every direction; an innovation of his has been the treating of a stained glass window freely and pictorially, almost like a fresco. It has not been said enough how, in the latter fashion of his painting, his placing of solid masses of splendid color, uncompromisingly, for its own intrinsic worth, recalls the Venetians of the noblest age. The last interest of his life appears to have been the autobiographic manuscript over which he broke down.

"The art of the painter is his final abode. If it be really his,—he is safe within it—safe from praise as he is safe from blame."

His funeral took place from St. Francis Xavier's Church, New York, on November 17. The Rev. John La Farge, S.J., was the officiating priest.

PERSONAL

Sister Cecilia Lubienski, an Ursuline of Lemberg, head-mistress of the girls' high school at Kolomea, according to the Franciscan Annals, recently passed the university examinations and received the degree of doctor of philosophy.

The completion of the Vatican Observatory, under the direction of Father Hagen, the Jesuit astronomer, was marked by a celebration held in the papal apartment on November 17. It had been planned to have the exercises at the observatory; but the weather was unfavorable and though the Holy Father is well, he feared to venture out. An address was made by Cardinal Maffi, Cardinal Protector and Administrator of the Observatory, to which the Pope replied, highly commending the work of Father Hagen.

Dr. James C. Monaghan, the statistician and lecturer, is slowly recovering from the stroke of apoplexy he received on November 4, while lecturing at Portage, Wis. The news of his illness was received with universal regret.

EDUCATION

UNCLE SAM'S BOOKS ON EDUCATION.

In the hot days of July, just at a time when teachers and children were alike enjoying the delights of vacation, Uncle Sam's public document cataloguers were busy preparing a very complete Price List of Government Publications relating to Education. The 74 page booklet which resulted has an interest for many reasons.

You will see at a glance that many phases of the great educational questions have been treated in various government publications which are in the libraries at your disposal, and as a reference list for locating such papers, this Price List serves well. Its primary purpose is to tell you which of these can be purchased at the Public Documents Office, Washington, and so it is one of the few things which, like "Heaven alone, can be had for the asking."

The articles on education in the bleak lands of Alaska are located for you in the Bureau of Education Reports; the Origin of the Canaanite alphabet, you are told, is in the Smithsonian Report for 1907; the numerous papers composing the important American Historical Association Reports are fully listed for the later years.

The inside view thus given of the latter series is a revelation to many. Containing as they do, such articles as Battle of Gettysburg, Commodore John Barry, Napoleon's Concordat with Pope Pius VII in 1801, Dismemberment of Turkish Empire, Know-Nothing Legislature, Legislation against Roman Catholics in Maryland, Poor Priests, or Study of Rise of English Lollardy, Lord Baltimore's Struggle with the Jesuits, American Ecclesiology, they awaken our interest in the past. I doubt not that we will differ from the writers in some cases, but that fact adds spice to our interest, for in history and education, America is truly a land of many men of many minds.

This booklet locates articles on public schools, private schools, parochial schools, city schools, agricultural schools, cooking schools, dairy schools, art schools, engineering schools, Chinese schools, Cuban schools, women's schools, and even vacation schools. Then behold the following detail:—

"Letters of Rabbi Akibah, or Jewish Primer as it was used in public schools 2,000 years ago; discovered and translated by N. H. Imber" (In Education Report, 1896, vol. 1, pages 701-719). Cloth 75 cents.

The price is given for the volume in which the article is found.

Kindergartens, Libraries, Manual Training, Military Training, and the good old training a la Solomon, namely Corporal Punishment, are a few of the other headings which catch the eye, and with all these topics before us, we are tempted to think the same wise man had the Government Printing Office in mind when he said, "Of the making of books there is no end."

M. PELLEN.

Announcements published October 1, make known that in the Jesuit schools of the Middle West, in Chicago, St. Louis, St. Marys, Kansas, Cleveland, Omaha, Milwaukee, Cincinnati, Detroit, Prairie du Chien, Wisconsin, and Toledo, the enrollment of students had reached the gratifying total of 6,230. Of this number 2,411 were following university courses; 554 were registered for full college work in classical courses; 2,768 were in preparatory or high school classes; and 497 were in the commercial schools attached to some of these institutions.

In accordance with the general policy of the Catholic University of Washington to advance in every way the interests of the Catholic schools of this country, and more especially to render its Department of Education in the highest degree serviceable, Monsignor Shahan, its Right Reverend Rector, announces that there is under consideration a proposal to publish an educational review which shall deal with the various problems and aspects of Education from a Catholic point of view. The publication, whose scope is outlined in a circular already sent to Catholic educators throughout the country, will aim at providing teachers with correct views regarding the nature and purpose of educational work. While fully recognizing the endeavors put forward in behalf of secular education, the proposed University review will emphasize the principles and methods of Christian education and will exhibit the results of that education in various lines, and will present the Catholic view on the many questions that arise in the course of private or public discussion. The announcement adds that the list of writers includes our foremost Catholic educators in universities and colleges, as well as contributors who are actually engaged in school work along elementary and secondary lines. The hope is expressed that by an exchange of views the spirit of cooperation will be strengthened among Catholic teachers, and the result will be mutual benefit.

ECONOMICS

The imports into Japan have diminished somewhat in the past two years, the diminution being about 5 per cent. on a total in 1908 of 243 million dollars. The American trade shows the greatest loss, having fallen from 46 million dollars to 25 million. The imports from Europe fell from 96 million dollars to 81 million. On the other hand importations from British India rose from 93 million dollars to 117 millions. The high price of cotton is one of the causes of these changes, Japan going to India for what it formerly got from the United States. But there has also been a large falling off in iron and steel manufactures. It seems, therefore, that Japan is as far as possible supplying its own needs from its own factories, and prefers trade relations with India to those with Europe and America. Its exports to all countries are growing continually. Those to the United States have grown in two years from 54 million dollars to 60 millions, raw silk and tea amounting respectively to 36 million and 6 million dollars.

What is seen in Japan appears in China also. In 1900 American exports to China were valued at 11 million dollars, in 1905 they were 58 million, and in 1910 they have dropped to 16 million dollars. Even mineral oil, which has increased as regards Japan, has fallen in China from a value of nearly 10 million dollars to barely half that value. As in the case of Japan the high price of cotton is a partial cause, but another is the disinclination to trade with those who show themselves antagonistic to the Chinese race, provided trade with others be possible.

The falling off in the cultivation of the vine in France is remarkable. In 1875 there were nearly 6 million acres in vineyards; to-day there are only a little more than 4 million acres. Nearly one-third of the vineyards have ceased to exist in thirty-five years. This, which is due in great measure to the phylloxera, has not affected all parts of the country equally. In the departments of the southwest nearly 50 per cent. of the vineyards have gone out of cultivation. In the south there has been little change, and in the valleys of the Rhone and the Loire the abandonment has been about one-fourth. Notwithstanding the reduction in the area cultivated, the production of wine is said to be unchanged. This is the more remarkable, because experience shows that vineyards renewed with stock that resist the phylloxera, and all French vineyards are such, are not as productive as the old, first, because they are new; and second, because the wild American vine which furnishes resistant stock has a slender stem, and therefore when grafted with the old vines cannot support as many productive shoots as the stouter stems of these did. Moreover there are now very stringent laws in France against the adulteration of wines; a grower and his agent in the champagne country have been condemned on this account, the latter to a fine of 500 francs and three months imprisonment, the former to a fine of 5,000 francs and four months imprisonment, and also to pay the government the excess of which it had been defrauded, over $800,000. The annual production of France is about 1,500 million gallons; it imports to-day about 70 million gallons, and this may explain the problem, at least in part.

SOCIOLOGY

M. Alfred Smeets, Socialist deputy of Liege and mayor-elect of Seraing, Belgium, has come to grief in a somewhat novel way. He was a Freemason and a member of the Society of Freethinkers, yet he authorized the employment of Catholic teachers in the public schools of Seraing, where his peculiar views find little favor with the parents of the school children. His associates disapproved of his action, which, though strictly within the letter and meaning of the law, was not in keeping with the spirit and aim of the two organizations. He was therefore ignominiously expelled from both.

In 1906 the New York Factory Law was so amended as to provide for cleanliness in bakeshops. Walls and ceilings were to be whitewashed every three months, woodwork was to be painted frequently, and furniture and utensils were to be so arranged as to be cleaned easily. Every shop was to be over 8 feet high and sleeping in them was forbidden. The law is a good one, but the cost of enforcing it has impeded its application. Perhaps something will be done to make it more efficient as the matter is important.

The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway and the Government of British Columbia are at a deadlock. The former is bound by its agreement to build its lines in British Columbia with white labor. A few months ago it announced that the difficulty of obtaining such labor is so great as to make the employment of Asiatics absolutely necessary if the road is to be finished at the appointed time, and asked the government to derogate from this point. The government refuses absolutely to entertain the request, since it is in direct opposition to its fundamental policy of keeping such labor out of the Province. One might suggest the possibility of employing Italians. This would, of course, be possible, but we are glad to see a movement, beginning to settle these, who are almost ideal husbandmen, on the land, instead of allowing them to be used as mere labor. The Manager of the Labor Information Office for Italians in New York, Signor C. E. di Palma Castiglione, has been publishing for five months past a weekly bulletin, of which a large part is devoted to particulars of farms in New York for sale at $1,000 and under. He is preparing a list of similar farms in Massachusetts, and the authorities in Missouri, Illinois and Virginia have called the attention of those wishing to sell to this weekly publication. It is sent free of charge to all Italians of influence in the country, and it is satisfactory to learn from Signor Castiglione that the Italian priests of this country are cooperating zealously with him in this good work.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

Principal among the resolutions adopted at the concluding sessions of the annual convention of the American Federation of Catholic societies held in New Orleans, La., was one declaring the opposition of the delegates to all forms of socialism. The resolution was worded as follows:

"We protest against propagandas which embitter the workingman, preach a gospel of class hatred, of confiscation of private property, make marriage a mockery, deny paternal rights and responsibility, and proclaim state control and even ownership of the child."

Another resolution passed was bitter in its denunciation of the administrative officers of the new republic of Portugal, and commended the state department at Washington for delaying recognition of the new government. Horror was expressed at the "barbarous inception" of the new republic, President Braga and his associates were scored for their persecution of Catholics, especially for their harsh and insulting treatment of the nuns and monks, and the government was declared to be founded on injustice and ungodliness.

The national educational association was denounced for "attempting to set up in this country an educational trust, a menace to individual liberty and to the primary rights which every American citizen enjoys of choosing the kind of education which he may wish to give his children."

The federation declared against the substitution of ethical teaching for religious training in schools and colleges, protested against Bible reading in public schools, deprecated the use of public funds or of public buildings for lecture courses in philosophy, literature, or science, urged the establishment of more parish schools and demanded "some equitable compensation" for the secular education given in Catholic schools.

Congress was urged to amend the postal laws so as to include within the scope of prohibited literature "books, papers, writings, and prints which outrage religious convictions and contain scurrilous and slanderous attacks upon the faith."

Following the adoption of the resolutions and the election of officers the federation adjourned to meet next year in Columbus, O.

It has been well said that theory and practice are the two wings by which we rise above the level of the creeping and crawling things of earth and move in a sphere where the knowledge of God and the service of God are combined in influencing our lives. Those that sat in darkness may see a great light and do no more than bask in its genial rays, the while they are heedless of St. James's warning about the emptiness of faith without works. Without theory, one may perhaps stumble upon success; without practice, theory becomes a painted ship upon a painted ocean, pretty indeed, but unprogressive, motionless.

The Catholic Social Congress of Chile was a gathering of eminently practical men. The Chileans are called the Yankees of South America. They are not favored with a soft, tropical climate, a prodigiously fertile soil, and almost spontaneous vegetation; but, like the New Englander, they must toil on rocky hillsides in summer and experience arctic (or rather, antarctic) cold in winter. This has made them vigorous, prudent, resourceful; and these qualities were conspicuous in the deliberations of the Catholic Congress.

Four of the conclusions of the Congress bore upon the well-being of children and youth. It was urged, in the first place, that the Confraternities of the Christian Doctrine which already exist in many parishes should be multiplied, to do away, as much as possible, with religious ignorance among the young, which all recognized as a great and growing evil productive of indifference and disorderly living. Retreats for children, which have been so successful in our own country, were also considered, with the result that they are to be introduced into Chile.

Eager to carry out the wishes of the Holy Father about frequent communion, the delegates united in requesting the Archbishop of Santiago to appoint a commission of priests from both orders of the clergy to encourage and foster the practice in Catholic schools and colleges.

Sensible of the trying circumstances in which young men often find themselves when far from home in the pursuit of higher studies at the Universities of Santiago, the Congress viewed with great favor the establishment of an institution under Catholic control where the students could board and lodge while in attendance on the University courses.

The resolutions adopted by the Congress acquaint us with a society which might well have many counterparts in the United States, though we believe its objects have thus far been left to the zeal of individual priests. The membership of the society in question is confined to priests, who devote a portion of their time to visiting and assisting the unfortunate in their homes, in hospitals, and in prisons. By this union of forces, the objects of the society's care are systematically looked after, and no priest is so overburdened that his regular duties suffer. In praising the organization and wishing it increased membership and continued activity in a field so rich in results, the delegates testified their appreciation of what had been accomplished.

Reports on the prevalence and increase in drunkenness in certain classes of the population, led to the federation of all the local temperance societies, and a resolution to undertake a general campaign against the evils of intemperance.

The crowning glory of the Congress was the incorporation of a Building and Loan Society, its purpose being to erect suitable houses to be rented or sold on instalments to laborers. Chilean laborers are often so herded together in unsanitary dwellings that physical and other evils follow as a necessary sequence in their families, where the death rate is above the average for the country.

On Sunday, September 11, a procession fifty thousand strong wound through the streets of Santiago, a manifest proof of the loyalty of the Chileans to the teachings of holy Church. On the following day the delegates held the final solemn session and thus brought to a triumphant close Chile's first Catholic Social Congress.

In the presence of 100,000 spectators on November 10, at St. Louis, Mo., the McKinley electric bridge, the largest bridge crossing the Mississippi and the greatest ever constructed by an electric railway, was formally opened for traffic. The governors of Illinois and of Missouri were on trains that met in the centre of the bridge, and, as they did so, Archbishop Glennon blessed the bridge according to the Roman ritual, the first time, it is believed, such a public ceremonial took place in the United States. The bridge is built of concrete, stone and steel, is 2,940 feet long and cost $4,500,000.

Under the auspices of the Catholic Club, Mr. Frank S. Gannon presiding, the Brownson memorial bust was dedicated, at Riverside Park, on the morning of Thanksgiving Day. The unveiling was performed by Mrs. T. H. Odiome, of Elizabeth, N. J., granddaughter of Dr. Brownson. Mrs. Odiome is the daughter of the late Judge and Mrs. Tenney, of New Jersey, her mother being Sarah Brownson, Dr. Brownson's only daughter.

His Grace Archbishop Farley and many of the local clergy were present. The principal address was delivered by W. Bourke Cockran. A large number of Catholic school children were present and sang under the direction of the Rev. Dr. John J. Kean, pastor of the Church of the Holy Name; and the Catholic Protectors Band furnished the music. Mr. M. J. Harson, chairman of the National Committee of the Brownson Memorial, made the presentation address, and the address of acceptance for the City was made by Commissioner of Parks, Hon. Charles B. Stover.

The monument is the work of the late Samuel J. Kitson, of Boston. The design is a pedestal of choice Barre granite, 9 feet 3 inches in height, surmounted by a colossal bronze bust of Dr. Brownson five feet in height, making a total height of 14 feet 3 inches. The bust has been pronounced an admirable portrait by all who knew Brownson. The inscription on the pedestal reads:

BROWNSON

1803 — 1876

Philosopher, Publicist, Patriot.

He Loved

God, Country and Truth.

The entire effect of the monument in its simplicity of design is majestic and imposing, and presents a beautiful and artistic effect.

In June, 1886, the remains of Dr. Brownson were removed from Detroit, Mich., where he died on April 17, 1876, and were conveyed to Notre Dame University, where they were reinterred in the College church, a simple tablet marking the place.

OBITUARY

The Most Reverend Manuel Sánchez, Provost General for the last five years of the Piarists, died in Rome on the third inst., in his seventy-first year. He was a native of Aragon, but had received his education in Valencia, and thus combined in his long and useful life the gentleness of the South with the resoluteness and constancy that characterize the hardy Aragonese. His Order is known and esteemed in Austria, Hungary, Italy and South America, but especially in Spain, where it conducts sixty colleges. Father Sánchez was honored with many tokens of regard by His Holiness, Pope Pius X, and was often consulted on matters connected with education, to which his Order is devoted.

The Bombay Examiner records the death of the Rev. Mother St. Catherine, of the Congregation of Jesus Mary, at the convent, Murree, October 9. The Reverend Mother was a Canadian by birth and entered the Congregation in 1861. She was in charge of various convents in Canada till 1882, when she was sent to Ipswich, England, where her memory is still cherished. To Mother St. Catherine belongs the credit of being the first in the city of Bombay to adopt all the modern methods of education. To her efforts are due the institution of the School of Arts Drawing Exams, The Cambridge Locals; The Trinity College Music Exams; The Training of Teachers; and the Physical Drill and Gymnastics. Her panegyrist declares that her life was the exponent of every religious virtue.

PULPIT, PRESS, AND PLATFORM

Answering the question, "Is Everything the Church's Business?" an editorial in the Chicago Inter-Ocean of November 1 says:—

"We have not a doubt that our religion can fit men for heaven, but can it fit men for earth? That is the burning question which the church is summoned to answer."

"Such are the closing words of an article in the Homiletic Review on 'The Church and Reform,' by Josiah Strong, to whose name we omit the prefix 'the Rev.' because of his apparent desire that it should be omitted. More than ten years ago, we believe, Mr. Strong ceased preaching the gospel directly and adopted the profession of 'social reform.'"

"To those who may not happen to know it Mr. Strong's attitude is disclosed by the sentences quoted. He considers that the church has a specific mission for social development which it has been painfully slow to accept. He rejoices that the church—or at least some of its ministers—is awaking to this 'responsibility.' He confesses, however, that—

'The increasing social activities of the church are looked upon with grave misgivings by a very large proportion of our church membership as in danger of diverting the church from her own proper work.'

"As Christian laymen we share these misgivings, and they are not allayed by Mr. Strong's efforts at a nice metaphysical distinction between the 'functions' and the 'sphere' of the church. He admits the exercise of governmental authority by the church in the past—the wielding of 'the secular arm'—was 'a usurpation of power which brought about disaster.' But he insists that 'politics, legislation, industry,' while not 'functions' of the church, are within its 'sphere.'

"Are they? Many preachers seem to think so, for they talk so, and we credit them with sincerity. We get many letters in this office from preachers. Curiously enough they write more about the tariff than about the gospel. They ask us to advocate all sorts of causes except that to which by their profession and ordination vows they are solemnly pledged.

"Here is a recent example: A clergyman in a neighboring state sends us a series of compliments on the conduct of this newspaper, for which we thank him, but closes by solemnly warning us that we cannot do 'Christ's work' unless we join the 'anti-tuberculosis movement,' as a sign of which he asks us to wear a pretty button which he incloses! And there are others as foolish.

"So many of these preachers seem to think more about Congress than the creed, and to be of the notion that to have strong opinions about Roosevelt or Cannon is the same thing as devotion to Jesus Christ. We concede at once that all really moral questions are in the field of the church. But how many of political, legislative and industrial questions are really moral questions? What is there of moral question in the levying of taxes, for instance?

"The question is to get money for the expenses of government. To contribute this money in proportion to their means is a civic obligation of all citizens. Granted a fair intent to maintain equality before the law, is not the whole question just one of expediency, with respect to how the money shall be obtained? We think so.

"Again, where is the moral question in the usual industrial dispute. It is usually just a controversy for money. Each side wants to keep all it has got or get more. That is all, and all the fervid oratory of agitators can make it nothing more. With all the pious professions of Mr. Gompers and his associates, the battles they conduct have the purely material aims of taking money from one set of men and giving it to another.

"We see quite another 'burning question' in the whole situation. It is that if the church is going to take sides in all political and industrial controversies—if the church is going to try to make everything its business—how is it going to have any time or strength left to save souls?

"As Christian laymen it seems to us a very serious question whether this devotion to material things—these efforts to 'fit men for earth'—is not disabling the church in its mission of fitting men for heaven."

There are 155 students in the North American, and 140 in the South American College, Rome, this year.

SCIENCE

THE SUN'S INFLUENCE ON THE WEATHER.

W. J. Humphreys, of the Mount Weather Observatory, Bluemont, Va., sums up his long article in the Astrophysical Journal for September, on "Solar Disturbances and Earth Temperatures," as follows:

"1. An increase in sun-spots appears certainly to be accompanied by a decrease in terrestrial temperatures, at least in many places, fully twenty fold that which can be accounted for by the decrease in radiation from the spot areas alone.

2. It seems nearly certain that sun-spot maxima whatever the value at such times of the solar constant, must lead to a decrease in the ultra-violet radiation that reaches the earth, and a corresponding decrease in the production, by this method, of ozone in the upper atmosphere.

3. The increase in the auroral discharges that accompany spot maxima tend to increase the amount of ozone, especially in the higher latitudes.

4. The change in the temperature of the earth, and all its train of consequences, from spot maximum to spot minimum, is not necessarily dependent upon a change in the solar constant [that is, the sun's heat radiations]. It may depend largely, if not wholly, upon a change in the absorptive property of the atmosphere, caused, we believe, by a variation in the amount of ozone produced by ultra-violet radiation and by auroral discharges."

And then he makes these suggestions:

"In addition to a careful determination of the solar constant and terrestrial temperatures during one or more spot cycles, it would be well to measure, at the same time, the accompanying changes in the ultra-violet portion of the radiation, and also to follow, over the same cycles, the temperature and height of the isothermal layer, and to note, if possible, the amount of ozone in the upper atmosphere.

The information here called for is difficult, though not impossible, to obtain; but much of it—it may be all—is essential, though perhaps not sufficient, to the solution of the complex problem concerning the relation of solar activities to terrestrial temperatures—a problem of great interest, both from the strictly scientific and from the purely utilitarian standpoints."

WILLIAM F. RIGGE, S.J.

Explorers have recently discovered a new stalactite cave in the Dachstein Mountains, Upper Austria, and estimate it to be the largest of its kind in Europe. The principal tunnel measures about one mile and a quarter, with numerous branchings of varying length. The cave has two levels. In the upper, two immense ice halls were found, having precipitous glaciers some 300 feet in length. Spread over the lower level were a series of halls, the largest being 600 feet long and 100 feet high. Among the paleontological specimens found were brachiopods and cave bears.

Preparations are under way by the United States Government to extend the new method of coal purchasing which, partially operated a short while ago, has proved its feasibility. The coal bills are paid on the basis of the actual heating value of the coal, deduced by tests of samples made by the Geological Survey. The analysis show the quality of the fuel in terms of carbon, sulphur, volatile matter, ash and moisture, and its heating capacity in calories. This new basis has found favor with all parties concerned.

J. W. Nicholson, in discussing the probable size of the particles of comets' tails and their light-scattering effect, concludes that the majority of these elements are not of molecular dimension in spite of the possible tenuity of the constituent gases. The radiation-pressure theory, advanced by Arrhenius and developed mathematically by Schwartzchild, postulates, for the explanation of the phenomena that are associated with comets of a more special type, the presence of particles of such size that the pressure of the solar radiation on each individual mote be nineteen times greater than solar gravitation. This postulate Nicholson has re-established by an analysis peculiarly his own. The inference, then, would seem to be that in a radiation-pressure theory of cometary tails, particles must be present whose dimensions are comparable with the wave-length of light, and these must consist of aggregates of a very large number of molecules. The low pressure at any point of the tail necessitates the presence of a large number of particles of far greater size which, by continuous disintegration, yield a sufficient number of such dimensions as to satisfy the demand of the maximum radiation pressure.

F. TONDORF, S.J.

THE GROSS TOURS, Inc.
Pre-eminent the Leaders in Travel
TOURS FOR CATHOLICS

Offer the Following Tours for 1911

ORIENTAL TOUR

April 8, 73 days, $490 on Land (plus steamship fares) Azores, Madeira, Gibraltar, Algiers, Athens, Turkey, Smyrna PALESTINE, Egypt and Italy (returning from Genoa).

GRAND AUTOMOBILE TOUR OF EUROPE

May 10, 103 days, $986.85 on Land (plus steamship fares) Azores, Madeira, Gibraltar, Algiers, all Italy, Tyrol, Italian Lakes, Switzerland, Bavaria, Black Forest, Rhine Country, Holland, Belgium, Paris, CHATEAUX OF TOURAINE, and British Isles.

VACATION TOUR OF EUROPE

July 4, 55 days, $417.15 on Land (plus steamship fares) Holland, Belgium, the Rhine, Paris, CHATEAUX OF TOURAINE (by automobile), London and Ireland.

SHORT VACATION TOUR

July 15, 44 days, $328.65 on Land (plus steamship rates) Paris, Chateaux of Touraine (by automobile), London and Ireland.

AUTOMOBILE TOUR OF ENGLAND

August 13, 7 days, $104.00, London to Windsor, Eton, Stoke Pogis, St. Albans, Ely, Cambridge, Peterborough, Oxford, Warwick Kenilworth, Shrewsbury, Birmingham, Chester, Liverpool.

AROUND THE WORLD

October 1, 1910, $2,800. Five Months. Hawaii, Japan, China, Philippines, India, Arabia, The HOLY LAND, Egypt, Greece, Turkey, Italy, Central Europe and British Isles.

EACH PARTY LIMITED IN NUMBER. $50 DEPOSIT MUST ACCOMPANY EACH APPLICATION. EVERYTHING THE BEST. PERSONALLY CONDUCTED. EVERY DETAIL CARED FOR. APPLY AT ONCE. WRITE FOR ITINERARIES.

THE GROSS TOURS, Inc.

302 Ellicott Square

BUFFALO, N. Y.

Real Food Clean and Fresh

DON'T think of Uneeda Biscuit as a mere lunch necessity, or as a bite between meals.

Uneeda Biscuit are the most nutritious food made from flour, and are full of energizing, strength-giving power.

Uneeda Biscuit are always crisp and fresh and delicious when you buy them. Their sensible, dust tight, moisture proof packages prevent the unclean, tough condition so common to ordinary crackers.

NATIONAL BISCUIT COMPANY

(Never sold in bulk)

5c

for a package

McCRAY REFRIGERATORS

We make a specialty of Built-to-Order Refrigerators for SCHOOLS, HOSPITALS, INSTITUTIONS, etc.

Style No. 171

Write for our free Catalogs,
Number 48 for Institutions
" 87 " Residences
" 59 " Meat Markets
" 72 " Florists
" 67 " Grocers

Branch offices in all principal cities

McCRAY REFRIGERATOR CO.

38 Lake Street

KENDALLVILLE, INDIANA

New York Office, 231 West 42d Street

*"Perfect" Warm Air Heaters
"Perfect" Cooking Ranges
and Richardson's Steam and
Water Boilers
Give splendid satisfaction*

THOUSANDS IN USE

Send for Catalogue

RICHARDSON & BOYNTON CO.

31 West 31st Street

Chicago NEW YORK Boston

The Coward Shoe

Sagging ankle and arch without support of the Coward Arch Prop Shoe.

Sagging ankle and arch properly supported by Coward Arch Prop Shoe.

For Boys Whose Ankles Turn In

A habit, on the part of the ankles, of turning inward, indicates structural weakness of the arch and shows the need of rest and support provided by the COWARD ARCH PROP SHOE. The anatomical construction relieves strain on the ankle and arch muscles, helps them to recover strength, and raises the arch structure to its natural position.

Additional support at the waist of the foot is furnished by the Coward Extension Heel.

Don't neglect arch trouble.
Wear the Coward Arch Prop Shoe IN TIME.

SOLD NOWHERE ELSE
JAMES S. COWARD
264-274 Greenwich St., N. Y.
(NEAR WARREN STREET)
Mail Orders Filled | Send for Catalogue

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week
82 Washington Square, West, New York City

"MEMORY SCHOOLS EXPOSED"
and Booklet Free
"How to Read Music at Sight" 50 Cents
"How to Memorize Music" 10 Cents
MEMORY LIBRARY, 14 Park Pl., NEW YORK

INSTITUTION LINEN

of all kinds, also Sheets and Pillow Cases, Blankets, Bed Spreads, etc., etc.

WRITE for SAMPLES and PRICES

H. W. BAKER LINEN CO. Dept "K"
41 WORTH ST.
Importers and Manufacturers NEW YORK CITY

Has It Ever Occurred to You
THAT THERE ARE
MANY KINDS OF SODA WATER
AND SOFT STUFF
FOISTED ON THE PUBLIC

OUR PRODUCTS
COST NO MORE
OVER BARS THAN THE CHEAP
ONES MADE FROM GLUCOSE,
SACCHARIN AND ANILINE DYES

Get Your Money's Worth

ALTAR WINES

From the Jesuit Fathers
Novitiate Vineyards at
LOS GATOS, CAL.

"MALVOISIE" a light dry wine,
perfectly matured.

$1.00 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.

"NOVITIATE" a generous wine,
somewhat sweet—will keep in wood.
$1.50 per Gal. $5.25 per Doz.

Depot and Sole Agency
P. A. MAHONY BARNSTON TEA CO.
Treas. 6 Barclay St., New York

Only 75 Cts. Each, Postpaid

Keep every number of

AMERICA

A Catholic Review of the Week

IN A HANDSOME

Adjustable Binder

of boards and maroon cloth

THE AMERICA PRESS

32 Washington Square W.

New York City

Munich Publishing House for RELIGIOUS PICTURES
Statues, Stations of the Cross, Cribs, Transparencies, Oil Paintings, Portraits of Pope Pius X
ART-INSTITUTES JOSEF MUELLER
Branch: 1133 Broadway (Room 828) NEW YORK

The American Carlsbad Sanitarium

Hydrotherapy according to the celebrated Kneipp system applied in all forms and up-to-date methods. All diseases, acute and chronic, scientifically and successfully treated. Testimonials and references furnished. First class accommodations for patients.

The famous Devonian Mineral water in use, a strong, sulphurated, saline, calcareous and magnesium water, the counterpart of the German Carlsbad.

Rates reasonable. Investigation solicited.

For information apply to

The American Carlsbad Co., Lorain, O.

PRINTING OF EVERY DESCRIPTION
FOR Churches and Schools

Periodical Publications
Catalogues Programs
Stationery Etc., etc.

THE MEANY PRINTING CO.
6th Avenue, Cor. 11th St., NEW YORK

ATTENTION OF PASTORS!

Catholic Mind Pamphlet

Holy Communion for Children

DECREE OF THE SACRED CONGREGATION OF
SACRAMENTAL DISCIPLINE ON THE AGE
OF THOSE TO BE ADMITTED TO RE-
CEIVE FIRST HOLY COMMUNION

In envelopes ready for distribution
$4.00 per hundred. 5c each

THE AMERICA PRESS 32 Washington Square, W.
NEW YORK

AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE

THE AMERICA PRESS

32 Washington Sq. W., New York

Individual Libraries for Christmas Gifts

Globe-Wernicke Bookcases lend charm to any room, and make an acceptable gift for use in the individual's own room, where favorite books can always be kept.

Globe-Wernicke Elastic Bookcases

enjoy the prestige that comes only from highest quality materials, perfect workmanship, long experience and ample resources—the new 1911 Globe-Wernicke catalogue describes in detail the many styles and finishes in which Globe-Wernicke Bookcases are made—shows the variety of artistic unit combinations—offers practical suggestions for decorative treatments.

List of "The World's Best Books" Free—containing selections of the 5, 10, 25, 50 and 100 best books for children and adults. A reliable guide for Christmas buying.

A copy will be mailed free with the 1911 Catalogue on request.

The Globe-Wernicke Co., Dept. A A, Cincinnati, U.S.

WITH GLACIER WINDOW DECORATION

YOU CAN GET
Stained Glass Effects
on Ordinary Windows:
Suitable for Residences
Churches and Schools

Special Ecclesiastical Designs

Write To-day for Booklet 6

Address WM. B. QUAILE, 752 Broadway, New York.

LIBRARY SUPPLIES

Adjustable Book Covers—Library Numbers Gummed and perforated always in stock—also alphabets of various sizes.

For sale by stationers or by

THE VAN EVEREN CO.
60 Ann Street - New York

The Book Covers are made of tough, strong paper and are inexpensive, efficient and easily put on

For Entrances, Corridors or Floor-Spaces
Exposed to Hard Service, Dirt or Wet

Cary's Everlasting Flexible Steel Mats

The United States Government uses and specifies for this mat in all their Buildings.

None so Clean, Durable and Sanitary for Churches, Hotels, Apartment Houses, Banks, Stores, Restaurants and Public Buildings.

Made of the Best Cold Rolled steel. Rust Proof. Reversible, self-Cleaning.

Made in rolls and eight regular sizes. Special sizes to order.

PATENTED IN THE UNITED STATES AND FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

We have equipped the Church of Our Lady of Mercy, Fordham, N. Y., with 270 square feet of these mats. Also St. Cecilia's Church with nearly 400 square feet. Circular upon request.

CAN YOU AFFORD TO BE WITHOUT THESE?

CARY MANUFACTURING CO. - 19 to 23 Roosevelt St., New York
(Telephone Worth 1445)

Mullins & Sons

78, 80, 82, 84 Myrtle Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

121-125 Newark Avenue, Jersey City, N. J.

218-220 Market Street, Newark, N. J.

Housefurnishings of Quality

Furniture, Pianos, Carpets, Rugs, Sewing-machines, China, Art Work, Gunn Sectional Book Cases, Arts and Crafts Furniture. Absolutely the finest displays in the East. Unequaled in quality and lowest prices.

$1.00 A WEEK FURNISHES THE HOME

F. JAMES REILLY
President

WM. F. REILLY
Manager

JAMES REILLY'S SONS' CO. General Electrical Repairs

122-130 CENTRE STREET
Corner White Street

Telephone 881 Franklin NEW YORK

DENTISTRY

Loose teeth tightened by a new process; teeth without plates. Extracting avoided. High-class and up-to-date dentistry in all branches at reasonable prices.

DRS. BURKE & BURKE
DENTISTS

1947 BROADWAY AND 65TH ST.
66th Street subway, L station and all surface cars.

BOUND VOLUMES OF AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW
OF THE WEEK

SIX MONTHS TO A VOLUME

$3.50

The AMERICA Press, 32 Washington Sq. W., New York

Sacred Heart Sanitarium

FOR REST, QUIET, RECUPERATION AND HEALTH

Unsurpassed results obtained in Nervousness, Rheumatism, Heart and Stomach troubles. No surgical, hospital nor insanity cases taken. A delightful, homelike, restful place—ideal for all run down conditions. Hydrotherapy, Electricity, Massage, Zander Gymnasium, Sun parlor; Swimming pools, billiards, bowling, etc. Gaited saddle horses, large indoor riding pavilion; suspended running track connected by tunnel with bath department. 17-acre park.

A staff of five physicians give their exclusive services to the patients.

WRITE SISTER SUPERIOR FOR BOOKLET X. MILWAUKEE, WIS.

HIGGINS'

DRAWING INKS
ETERNAL WRITING INK
ENGROSSING INK
TAURINE MUCILAGE
PHOTO MOUNTER PASTE
DRAWING BOARD PASTE
LIQUID PASTE
OFFICE PASTE
VEGETABLE GLUE, ETC.

Are the Finest and Best
Inks and Adhesives

For School, Home and Business Use

Emancipate yourselves from the use of corrosive and ill-smelling inks and adhesives and adopt the HIGGINS' INKS AND ADHESIVES. They will be a revelation to you, they are so sweet, clean, well put up and withal so efficient.

At Dealers Generally

271 Ninth St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

Branches: Chicago, London

CHAS. M. HIGGINS & CO., Mfrs.

Simplicity

is a prominent feature
of the

VICTOR

It is not necessary to make a lot of adjustments before doing special kinds of work.

The Victor is always ready without special adjustment, because its special devices are built in the machine—not extra attachments.

Send for the No. 2 Catalogue to-day

VICTOR TYPEWRITER COMPANY

812 Greenwich Street

NEW YORK

GOOD SAMPLE TEA

in lots of 100 pounds or more 16½ cents per pound

Good Old Crop COFFEE

splendid cup qualities—ground or in the bean 16½ cents per pound

New York & Columbia Coffee Co.

126 Front Street, New York City

THE CATHOLIC MIND

A periodical published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month.

Each number contains an article of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style.

These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is: one at a time and the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

$1.00 a Year (24 numbers)

5 cents a number

SPECIAL OFFER

SCIENCE AND HER COUNTERFEIT. By Rev. J. Gerard, S.J.

LORD KELVIN AND THE EXISTENCE OF GOD. By H. V. Gill, S.J.

SOCIALISM AND CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. J. F. Hogan, D.D. (2 Nos.)

MEANINGS OF THE WORD SOCIALISM. By C. S. Devas, M.A.

IMPRACTICABILITY OF SOCIALISM. By C. S. Devas, M.A.

CATHOLICS AND THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT. By Rt. Rev. Mgr. Parkinson, D.D.

THE CHURCH—THE STRONG SAFEGUARD OF THE REPUBLIC. By Most Rev. Wm. H. O'Connell, D.D.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE. By Robert Hugh Benson.

THE DELUSION OF CHRISTIAN SCIENCE. By Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J.

THE DOCUMENTARY EXPOSE OF THE RUPTURE OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS BETWEEN THE HOLY SEE AND THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT. (2 Nos.)

THE CONCORDAT OF 1801. By D. Monier O'Connor.

THE FRENCH SEPARATION BILL. (Text.)

PRIMARY EDUCATION IN FRANCE.

THE GENIUS OF CARDINAL WISEMAN. By Wilfrid Ward.

THE MASS AND THE REFORMATION. By Rt. Rev. J. Canon Moyes, D.D.

THE ATTITUDE OF MODERN PROTESTANTS TOWARDS THE VIRGINITY OF OUR BLESSED LADY. By Rev. A. J. Mass, S.J.

EXHORTATION OF PIUS X TO THE CATHOLIC CLERGY.

SINGLE COPIES, 5 cents

100 COPIES—SPECIAL PRICE—$2.00

THE AMERICA PRESS

32 Washington Sq., West

New York City

NOW READY

AMONG THE HURONS

VOLUME II OF

Pioneer Priests

of North America

Tells the heroic story of
de Brébeuf and His Associates

"This book is a striking illustration of the truth of Shakespeare's well-known words 'Men's good is oft interred with their bones.' . . . We cannot then but feel grateful to Father Campbell for what he has done to assure the fame of those glorious confessors and martyrs from a threatened obscurity. . . .

"Missionaries such as these have a special work in this day of weak faith and widespread disbelief; for the story of their lives, while it stimulates the one, is a living protest against the other. Father Campbell's theme is a great one, and he has dealt with it well. The clear and simple language in which he recounts the wonderful heroism of these truly wonderful men, is more impressive and convincing than any elaboration of style, and surely more in harmony with the quiet, simple characters of the men of whom he treats."—The Tablet, London.

By Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J.

480 Pages. With Index. 24 Illustrations.

PRICE, $2.00

VOLUME I

This extremely interesting book consists of a series of 18 monographs of the missionaries who labored among the Iroquois Indians. Beginning with the life of Jogues in 1642, they continue up to 1710, when the Indians, just before their annihilation, passed over from French to English control.

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS:

"For lovers of history and biography, of the adventurous, the heroic, and the saintly, there is much to attract the attention in this volume of over 300 large, clearly printed pages."—The Sacred Heart Review.

"The adventures of most of the missionaries read like romances."—The New York Herald.

"One of the most interesting Catholic books we have ever read."—The Monitor (San Francisco).

Price, $1.60, postage prepaid

THE AMERICA PRESS 32 Washington Sq. W.
NEW YORK

A SHOPPING GUIDE TO ABRAHAM & STRAUS

This store has a department organized for the purpose of supplying the convent, academy orphan asylum or school, hospital, etc., with serges, merinos, draps d'été, linens, etc., and clothing worn by children. The contract department, as it is called, also advises and estimates on carpets, furniture, shades, etc. A representative familiar with the requirements of religious communities will call, as soon as request is sent to Contract Department.

ABRAHAM & STRAUS

240 Fulton St., Brooklyn, New York

WARD & CO. Fulton Ave. & East River ASTORIA, NEW YORK

Telephone 22 Astoria

Shipbuilders
Shipwrights
Machinists

Saw Mills
Planers
Blacksmith Shop

DRY DOCKS

Established 1876 : : Estimates Cheerfully Furnished

$1.00 WILL BRING POSTPAID one of our

Fine Gold Filled
5 year guaranteed
ROSARIES

In any color. Order through your jeweler or direct. Catalogue free.
Wm. Purnell Co.
Mfg. Jeweler
37 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week
32 Washington Square, West, New York City

FINN BROTHERS

Manufacturers of

Roll Top Desks

STORE and OFFICE FIXTURES
Counters, Shelvings,
Partitions, Etc.

Estimates and Designs Furnished

Office 358 BROADWAY Salesrooms

59-65 FRANKLIN ST., NEW YORK

Telephones, 4855-4856 Franklin

Factory: 112-114 LEROY STREET

Telephone Connection

Ecclesiastical Furniture

PEWS · PULPITS · FONTS · VESTMENT CASES · ETC.

Built to secure harmony with the general architectural and decorative scheme, from the finest, exquisitely hand-carved to the simpler, more inexpensive styles. Styles and Prices to meet any requirements.

Illustrations or special designs to harmonize with the architecture and arrangement of your Church gladly submitted to those interested.

American Seating Company Address Dept. B.X.

215 Wabash Ave.
NEW YORK BOSTON
19 West 18th St. 70 Franklin St.

CHICAGO
PHILADELPHIA PITTSBURGH
1225 Arch St. 824 Lewis Bldg.

The Famous Rayo

Gives the Best Light at Any Price

When you pay more than the Rayo price for a lamp, you are paying for extra decorations that cannot add to the quality of the light. You can't pay for a better light, because there is none. An oil light has the least effect on the human eye, and the Rayo Lamp is the best oil lamp made, though low in price. You can pay $5, $10, or $20 for some other lamp, and although you get a more costly lamp, you can't get a better light than the white, mellow, diffused, unflickering light of the low-priced Rayo.

Has a strong, durable shade-holder. This season's burner adds to the strength and appearance. Made of solid brass, nicked, and easily polished.

Once a Rayo User, Always One

Dealers Everywhere. If not at yours, write for descriptive circular to the nearest agency of the

Standard Oil Company
(Incorporated)

HEADQUARTERS FOR THE CLERGY

PHOTOGRAPHY! High-Class Work at Reasonable Prices

Cardinal Vannutelli—Exclusive and only sitting in U. S.
Copies for sale; also Cardinal Logue

E. F. FOLEY 164 FIFTH AVENUE
Bet. 21st and 22d Sts.
'Phone, 5995 Gramercy

Appointments

Telephone Call, 5922 Barclay

THE S. T. SMITH CO.

Manufacturers of

Ink, Inked Ribbons, Carbon, Manifold and Typewriter Linen Papers

Diamond Brand Typewriter Supplies

11 BARCLAY STREET

NEW YORK

MENEELY BELL CO.
TROY, N.Y. AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.

BELLS

We can supply anything in the line of Kitchen and Bakers' Utensils

French Cooking Ranges
and Broilers

Cooking Equipments
of Every Description

JAMES Y. WATKINS & SON

16, 18, 20, CATHERINE ST.
NEW YORK N. Y.

DIRECTORY OF COLLEGES AND ACADEMIES

Georgetown University WASHINGTON, D. C.

Directory for Catalogues or Information

The College (Graduates and Undergraduate Schools)
The Registrar, 37th & O Sts., N. W.

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Joseph Himmel, S.J., President

LADYCLIFF

On the Hudson (Adjoining West Point)

Young Ladies' Academy

A department for small boys. Education thorough and practical. Location beautiful and convenient. Terms moderate. Send for prospectus. Address Sister Superior, Ladycliff, Highland Falls, N. Y.

New York State Regents' Examinations.

Academy of St. Joseph

In-the-Pines

BRENTWOOD, N. Y.

A Boarding School for Young Ladies,
Affiliated with the State University

PROSPECTUS EXPLAINS THE TERMS, ETC.

St. Mary's College

St. Marys, Kansas

BOARDING COLLEGE
Under the Jesuit Fathers

Two Courses of Study:
Classical and Commercial

For Catalogue, send to
REV. ALOYSIUS A. BREEN, S.J., President.

ACADEMY OF THE HOLY FAMILY

BALTIC, CONNECTICUT

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity

PREPARATORY, COMMERCIAL AND ACADEMIC COURSES

Prospectus explains terms, etc.

Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

Convent of the Holy Child

SHARON HILL, DELAWARE COUNTY, PA.
15 Minutes from Philadelphia

ACADEMY FOR YOUNG LADIES
Highest English Course. French, Drawing, Music by Certified Teachers. Preparation for foreign travel. As the numbers are limited, special care can be given to the formation of character and training of each child.
Address Mother Superior

COLLEGE OF ST. ELIZABETH

CONVENT STATION

Near Morristown, N. J.

One hour from New York City.

A Catholic Institution for the Higher Education of Women

COLLEGE Four years' course leading to the degrees of B. A. and B. S.
SCHOOL OF PEDAGOGY Required for entrance two years of College work

SCHOOL OF MUSIC. COURSE LEADING TO THE DEGREE OF B. M.

ACADEMY A High School Course of Four Years. Full College Preparatory Work.
GRAMMAR AND PRIMARY DEPARTMENTS SEPARATE

REGISTERED By the New Jersey State Board of Education and the University of the State of New York
Apply for Year Book to The Secretary

MT. ST. JOSEPH ON THE WISSAHICKON

For illustrated catalogue address MOTHER SUPERIOR, Chestnut Hill, Philadelphia, Pa.

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE

WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Collegiate and Preparatory Departments

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $260 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra. Send for catalogue to
REV. THOMAS E. MURPHY, S.J., President

Seton Hall College

FOUNDED 1856

South Orange, New Jersey

COLLEGE AND HIGH SCHOOL

Bayley Hall for Students
of Grammar Course

FOR CATALOGUE ADDRESS
Very Rev. James F. Mooney, D.D., Pres.

COLLEGE OF ST. CATHERINE, ST. PAUL, MINN.

A CATHOLIC COLLEGE FOR GIRLS

Accredited by the Minnesota State Board of Public Instruction and by several prominent Universities.

SEVENTY ACRE CAMPUS.

FIREPROOF BUILDINGS

COMPLETE COURSES
IN THESE DEPARTMENTS

THE COLLEGIATE, leading to the degree of Bachelor of Arts,
THE ACADEMIC OR COLLEGE PREPARATORY. MUSIC
AND PAINTING in their various branches. DOMESTIC ART,
HOUSEHOLD SCIENCE AND COOKING.

YEAR BOOK FORWARDED ON APPLICATION, Address: THE SECRETARY

ST. JOHN'S PREPARATORY COLLEGE

DANVERS, MASS.

SELECT HIGH SCHOOL conducted by the XAVIER BROTHERS

Classical, Scientific and Commercial Courses

Ideal Location

All New Buildings

New Equipment

Competent Instructors

Develops the Whole Boy

Send for Catalogue

Brother Benjamin, Director

IMMACULATA SEMINARY

MOUNT MARIAN, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Situated in the suburbs. Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of St. Mary-of-the-Woods. Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Conservatory methods in Music. Oil and Ceramic and Water-color Studios. Abundant out-door exercise. Sightseeing with experienced chaperons.

For Year Book address, Sister Secretary

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

ADJOINING BRONX PARK, NEW YORK CITY

College and High School

ST. JOHN'S HALL, FOR SMALLER BOYS

The location affords the healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city

MEDICAL SCHOOL
in connection with Fordham Hospital

WRITE FOR CATALOGUE

LAW SCHOOL
at 20 Vesey St.
in the midst of the courts

SPRING HILL COLLEGE

FOUNDED 1830

Spring Hill, Mobile Co., Ala.

CHARTERED 1836

BOARDING COLLEGE CONDUCTED BY THE JESUIT FATHERS

Just the School for boys who wish to escape the rigors of the Northern climate. Mean temperature of the winter months, 52 degrees Fahrenheit.

HEALTHY LOCATION—EVERY CONVENIENCE OF A MODERN COLLEGE

CURRICULUM INCLUDES THE PREPARATORY, HIGH SCHOOL AND COLLEGE COURSES. DEGREES CONFERRED

Write for Catalogue to Rev. F. X. Twellmeyer, S. J., President

DIRECTORY OF COLLEGES AND ACADEMIES

ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS

COLLEGE FOR YOUNG WOMEN (TWO HOURS FROM INDIANAPOLIS)

FOUNDED IN 1840; INCORPORATED IN 1846. EMPOWERED TO CONFER COLLEGIATE DEGREES. Four Years' College Course. Academic and Grammar Departments. Elective Courses for Special Students. Conservatory of Music, with Vocal, Piano, Harp, Violin, Pipe Organ, etc. Oil and Ceramic and Water-color Studios. Modern languages by native teachers. New Gymnasium, with Natatorium, Running Track, Bowling, Basket Ball, etc., directed by a graduate of Dr. Sargent's school of Physical Training. Out-of-Door Sports—Horseback Riding, Boating, Archery, Golf, Tennis. For Catalogue and Illustrated Booklet, Address . . SISTER SECRETARY . . Box 70 . . St. Mary-of-the-Woods, . . Vigo County, Indiana

HELEN AUGUSTA HAYES

VOCAL INSTRUCTOR

342 West 55th Street, New York

Laurel Hall School

184-186 Brooklyn Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Kindergarten, Elementary, High School and Culture Course.

Private Classes formed in French, German and Spanish

Expression and Gymnastic Dancing
Tutoring in all branches by competent teachers.

Catalogues sent on application LAURA L. HOPPER, Principal

BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL

Holy Cross Academy and High School

FOR GIRLS . . . 53d YEAR

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity

343-349 West 42d Street and 340-350 West 43d Street, New York City

Registered by the New York State Educational Department.

Students prepared for College and the New York Training School for Teachers

Preparatory Department for Young Children

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR BOYS UNDER TWELVE YEARS

Just Published

Three Historical Events in Maine

BY THE

REV. T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

Single Copies 15 cents

100 Copies $10.00

THE AMERICA PRESS 32 Washington Sq. W. NEW YORK

Catholic Mind Pamphlet Double Number

Piux X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism

The latest Motu Proprio of our Holy Father, Pius X

10c per copy, $7.50 per hundred

THE AMERICA PRESS 32 Washington Square, W. NEW YORK

PEDAGOGY

There is only one school in New York City that offers correspondence instruction in pedagogy. Have you a friend who needs help in school or in teachers' examinations? We have made 3,181 students pass for licenses to teach in this city. Ask for "The Success of the Three Thousand."

BOOKS

We publish books that give you the essentials of subject-matter. Ten new ones on English. Do you know McEvoy's Methods in Education at $1.50, and McEvoy's Epitome of History and Principles of Education at $1.00?

THE McEVY SCHOOL
306 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Telephone Main, 5342

The Winona Seminary, Winona, Minnesota

For Young Women. Conducted by the Sisters of St. Francis

LITERARY DEPARTMENT: Collegiate Course leading to degree. ACADEMIC COURSES: Classical, Latin, Scientific, Modern Language. Accredited to the University of Minnesota.

DEPARTMENTS of Dramatic Expression, Art, Household Economics. Home life of the Student is ideal. Indoor and Outdoor Athletics. Literary, Musical, Dramatic Societies.

Conservatory of Music: Piano, Voice, Violin, Organ, Harp

CATALOGUE, BOOKLET OF INFORMATION, DEPARTMENT BULLETINS, MAILED ON APPLICATION

MARY ALOYSIA HARDEY

READY

RELIGIOUS OF THE SACRED HEART

1809-1886

READY

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY THE REV. THOMAS J. CAMPBELL, S.J.
440 Pages 16 Illustrations With Index

THE LIFE STORY OF A REMARKABLE WOMAN

"Had the Life of Mother Hardey not been published it would have been a positive loss for the history of the Catholic Church in the United States, where for more than fifty years she was such a conspicuous figure. Her biographer completed the work several years ago, but it was only after reiterated entreaties and expostulations that the manuscript was finally put into the hands of the printer."—From the Introduction.

PRICE, TWO DOLLARS

By Mail 20 cents extra

THE AMERICA PRESS 32 WASHINGTON SQ. WEST NEW YORK CITY

ITALIAN, FRENCH, GERMAN, SPANISH

Can be learned quickly, easily and pleasantly in spare moments. You hear the living voice of a native professor pronounce each word and phrase. A few minutes daily practice and in a surprisingly short time you can speak a new language by the

Language-Phone Method

With Rosenthal's Practical Linguistry

This method is highly indorsed and recommended by leading Catholic Church Dignitaries and Educators. Send for Facsimile Letters of these testimonials and interesting booklet

The Language-Phone Method, 825 Metropolis Building, N.Y.

Pilgrim Walks in Rome

A GUIDE TO THE HOLY PLACES

IN ROME AND ITS VICINITY

By P. J. CHANDLERY, S.J.

Third edition enlarged $1.60, Postpaid

THE AMERICA PRESS

32 Washington Sq. W. New York

ROYAL BAKING POWDER

Absolutely Pure
The only baking powder
made from Royal Grape
Cream of Tartar
No Alum, No Lime Phosphate

Get Exhilaration and Energy From Your Bath

BY USING

HAND SAPOLIO

It cleanses and refreshes the skin, lets the pores breathe, removes dead cuticle and stimulates circulation.

All Grocers and Druggists

THE LIFE AND LEGEND OF THE LADY ST. CLARE. Translated from the French version (1563) of Brother Francis du Puis. By Charlotte Balfour, with an Introduction by Father Cuthbert, O.S.F.C. With 24 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, gilt top. $1.25 net.
A quaint sixteenth century version of Thomas of Celano's legend of St. Clare of Assisi—the companion and friend of St. Francis, and the Foundress of the Second Order of Franciscans. Four letters of St. Clare to Blessed Agnes of Bohemia are included in the volume—also those passages in the 'Fioretti' and the 'Speculum Perfectionis' which tell of the relations between St. Francis and St. Clare.

Facsimile of the Original MSS.

THE DREAM OF GERONTIUS. By John Henry
Newman. With a complete facsimile of the Original Fair Copy and a portion of the first Rough Draft. Folio (16 by 11½ in.), bound in white parchment, with gilt top and silk ties. $10.00 net.

An Appropriate Christmas Present.

A LIFE OF CHRIST FOR CHILDREN. With a
Preface by His Eminence, Cardinal Gibbons. With 20 Illustrations, reproduced chiefly from the Old Masters. New Edition. Large Crown 8vo. Decorative cover, pp. xii—77, $1.00 net; by mail $1.10.
"Parents and teachers who are responsible for the religious education of the young, owe a debt of gratitude to the Catholic pen which has given us this beautiful volume. The work has a short preface by Cardinal Gibbons and bears the imprimatur of Archbishop Farley. The paper, the binding, and the illustrations are all of a high order of excellence. Only one who had lived close to the hearts of young children could have written the story. It is the Gospel narrative simplified and interpreted to the child."—THOMAS EDWARD SHIELDS in the Catholic University Bulletin.

THE WORKS OF CARDINAL NEWMAN. In 39 volumes.
Crown 8vo, $50.00. Special prospectus on request.

LONGMANS, GREEN, & CO.

WILL YOU REPRESENT AMERICA

A Catholic Review of the Week

WE want a reliable man or woman in each city and town to act as our agent. No experience or capital required.

THIS opportunity is open to you no matter where you are situated, as
AMERICA is a national publication.

Will You Join Our Staff?

NOW IS THE TIME

Write at once, giving reference

AGENCY BUREAU

The America Press 32 Washington Square W.
NEW YORK, N. Y.

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Vol. IV, No. 8

(Price 10 Cents)

DECEMBER 3, 1910

($3.00 a year)

Whole No. 86

CHRONICLE

Reading for Seminarians—New Pennsylvania Station—Uprising in Mexico—Canada—Great Britain—Ireland—France—Emperor William Visits Beuron—Germans Cannot Have American Beef—Vienna—Bohemia—Portugal 169-172

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Immaculate Conception—Beginnings of Italian Socialism—A Modern Vitalist—Canadian Patois—The Pre-Reformation Churches in England: A Mood—A Dramatic Incident....173-180

CORRESPONDENCE

The Catholics of Ecuador—Consecration to Our Lady of Guadalupe—After the Passion Play—Jews Protest Against Nathan's Attack on the Holy Father—Rhodesia's Diamonds....181-188

EDITORIAL

Tolstoy—Turning from Diaz—Base Proselytism—The Mutiny at Rio de Janeiro—A Protestant Bishop on Unity.....184-187

SOME FRIENDS OF MINE. III—The Notary. 187-188

LITERATURE

My Mark Twain—Melchior of Boston—Our Lady's Lutenist—The Old Mill on the Withrose—History of the Telugu Christians—Sermons of St. Bernard on Advent and Christmas—Books Received188-190

EDUCATION

Sixteenth Annual Report Superintendent Philadelphia Archdiocesan Schools.....190

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Protest Against Recognition by the United States of the New Republic of Portugal....190

SOCIOLOGY

Statistics of the Jews—City Laborers Unfit for Heavy Work—Hindus Kept Out of Canada—Tricks of Usurers—Eleventh Annual Meeting of the National Civic Federation.....191

ECONOMICS

Imports of Milk and Cream from Canada to the United States—Europe's Imports of Wheat—

Prices of Meat Falling—A Huge Cunard Turbine Steamer191

ECCELESIASTICAL ITEMS

No Disunion Among the Bishops of the German Empire—Celebrating the 125th Anniversary of Old St. Peter's, New York—Golden Jubilee of St. Vincent de Paul's Church, Brooklyn—Alumni of Sulpician Seminaries Meet in Baltimore. 191-192

PERSONAL

Alfred J. Talley—Very Rev. John Ward Appointed Bishop of Leavenworth—Tablet in Memory of Rev. Herman Blumensaat, S.J.....192

SCIENCE

Refrigerated Air for Blast Furnaces—The Band Spectrum of Cyanogen—Copper-Clad Steel—How Oil Pools Are Formed—Ruebel Bronze. 192

OBITUARY

Sister Mary Agnes Moran.....192

CHRONICLE

Reading for Seminarians.—The recent Motu Proprio against Modernism prohibited the circulation of any kind of newspapers, periodicals, reviews, etc., among the students of ecclesiastical seminaries, and in the houses of study of religious orders and congregations; even the most orthodox and official seemed to come under the ban. A number of bishops having written to ask a definition on the subject, Cardinal De Lai, Prefect of the Consistorial Congregation, has, by the direction of the Pope, written a letter to Cardinal Vaszary, Primate of Hungary, communicating to him and other bishops the formal decision, in which he says:

"The mind of our Most Holy Father is that the law is to remain established which prohibits journals and periodicals, even the best, which treat of the political affairs of the day, or of the social and scientific questions which crop up daily and have not yet found a definite solution—these, I say, are not to be freely left in the hands of the students. There is, however, nothing to hinder the Superiors or Professors of a seminary, when scientific questions are discussed, from reading to the students, or handing to them to read in their presence, articles from some newspapers or periodicals which they may deem useful or opportune for the instruction of the students. But periodicals which contain nothing contentious, but only religious news, the disposition and decrees of the Holy See, the acts and ordinances of the bishops or others which, although periodicals, are merely readings promoting faith and piety, may, with the approval of the superiors of the seminary, be allowed in the hands of the students out of study hours, or of the time prescribed for the other offices."

New Pennsylvania Station.—On Sunday, Nov. 27, the Pennsylvania Railroad opened its North River tubes, the new tunnels and extensions and the whole of its great station in New York, thus binding together New York, Long Island and New Jersey. Work on the North River tubes was begun on June 10, 1903, and the borings were completed on October 9, 1906. The buildings of the station began on May 1, 1904. Most of the actual work of construction was completed on all parts of the undertaking by August of this year, but the installing of signalling and interlocking devices could not be completed while the heavier work was in progress. Time was also necessary to provide and train a large organization to make ready for use this largest of sub-surface terminals.

The North River division of the tunnel has a length of 13,700 feet. The actual length of the tunnel under water is 6,100 feet. At the Manhattan end of the tunnels the tracks are carried to the station in a closed subway to Ninth Avenue, and then through an open yard into the station. Between Thirty-first and Thirty-third Streets are twenty-one parallel tracks, all so connected by switches that a train can be moved from any one track to any of the others. Ninety-seven feet below mean high-water mark is the lowest depth reached by the tubes. Five hundred buildings were demolished to make room for the new station, and $100,000,000 was spent in its construction and equipment. The tracks in the building are all under ground and upon various levels. The waiting room, whose ceiling is 150 feet high, is 277 feet by 103 feet, and constitutes a great promenade. Unlike most railway stations, there are no chairs or benches in the room, but these are provided in the separate waiting rooms for men and women.

The façade in Seventh Avenue is composed of a Doric colonnade. Each of the columns of granite is four feet six inches in diameter, and thirty-five feet high. The columns are doubled at the main entrance and at the entrance for carriages. Above the central colonnade is a clock, having a dial seven feet in diameter. Electric engines will draw all trains in and out, and there will be no smoke in the new station, nor in any of the long subway passages. Illumined by the reflected light of electrolights, the waiting room appears to justify the boast of the Pennsylvania officials, that it is the most imposing thing of its kind in the world.

Uprising in Mexico.—On November 18, a detachment of police of the city of Puebla undertook to search the house of one Aquiles Cerdan, who was supposed to have secreted a store of rifles for use against the Government. Cerdan was an avowed partisan of Madero, and held suspicious meetings in his house. The police found the house barricaded and defended by something like a hundred men, for the news of the impending search had reached the owner. Revolvers and rifles and, for the first time in Mexican history, dynamite bombs were used against the attacking force. State militia and regular troops were summoned to the support of the police. Major Frago, of the State militia, was seriously wounded, captured and carried to an apartment; Chief of Police Cabrera was killed. While the attacking force was battering down the massive doors of the building, the defenders made their escape, but the wife and the sister of Cerdan were captured. After lying concealed in a hiding-place for fourteen hours, Cerdan was shot by guards while he was trying to make his escape. Fearing a general riot, the stores were closed, the streets were deserted, and the flags of the foreign consuls were displayed. The revolutionary movement appeared in all the northern States; but after a few trifling successes, it was suppressed by the Government forces. Its lack of men and means shows that Mexico is far removed from the time when successful revolutions could be arranged over night.

Canada.—The Liberal Association of Winnipeg, reached with difficulty a resolution in general terms approving a lower tariff in favor of western agricultural interests.—The Wolverine, reported lost on Lake Winnipeg, went ashore, but all on board have been saved. Some of her crew reached Selkirk, whence a relief party has been sent out to fetch the rest.—The friends of Nathan, in Montreal, propose to ask the courts to declare Mayor Guerin disqualified, on account of malfeasance, which is to consist in this, that he had the cost of telegraphing the council's protest to the Holy Father, paid out of the petty cash, instead of asking an appropriation from the council. Such trivial persecution, though annoying, must redound to the Mayor's profit.—The Royal George reached Quebec with a case of cholera. Her passengers and crew were quarantined; the ship was fumigated and released.—Lord Strathcona has added $200,000 to his previous gift for promoting physical and military training in public schools. His gift is now a million.—Sir John French's report on the militia has been laid before parliament, a very severe document, the gist of which is, the material is excellent, the formation, especially that of officers, is worthless.—The children of American settlers in some parts of Alberta object to sing English patriotic songs in school, and the school boards have ordered such songs to be omitted. This has caused considerable indignation in some, who think that the songs should have been continued and the American children excused from taking part in them. A little reflection will show that such a course would have been most unwise. It would have fostered a spirit of antagonism it is most necessary to avoid, since the daily refusal to sing would have been a positive daily assertion by the children of that antagonism, the more so as the number of American children is large. This shows that the American immigration will be a cause of trouble unless it be handled very wisely—300,000 immigrants entered Canada in the present year.—Sir Richard Cartwright spoke in the Senate in favor of reciprocity, saying that it would promote an alliance between England and America which would help to general disarmament. He acknowledged that others may be of a different opinion, and it seems that the commercial and manufacturing interests are almost universally opposed to the idea.

Great Britain.—Lord Lansdowne has submitted proposals for the reform of the House of Lords, which may be presumed to express the mind of the Unionists in the late conference. First, the number of its members is to be reduced and mere peerage is not to give the right to a summons to it. Second, all rights over money bills are renounced provided safeguards against "tacking" are established. Doubts as to whether a bill be purely financial are to be settled in a joint committee. Third, differences regarding other bills in two successive sessions or lasting, at least, a year, are to be settled in a joint sitting. Should the matter be very grave, and not as yet submitted to the people, the electors are to be consulted by means of a referendum.—The younger Unionists began the electoral campaign with gibes and personalities, a dangerous course, as their opponents are Churchill and Lloyd George, masters of that particular style, who have seized at least one of their smart sayings and turned it against them effectively. The older men are pointing out that the question involves a grave constitutional change. Those who do not wish the change to be made along radical lines must put aside every other matter for the moment and vote with the Unionists. The general opinion of critics outside England is, that this is their only chance of success and that above all they must keep the "backwoods" peers off the platform.—Lloyd George spoke to an East London constituency. The National Anthem was shouted down. He made a bitter attack on the Lords, claimed that the returning prosperity is God's blessing on his budget, promised more pensions and insurance against unemployment, and recommended a Socialist named Lansbury to their suffrages. The enthusiasm he excited was most intense.—Hilaire Belloc refuses to support the ministry, declining "to give at the bidding of the party machine a blank cheque to Churchill, Asquith, Haldane and the rest."—Asquith is full of promises of future legislation, payment of members, reversal of Osborne judgment, the admission into Parliament of a female suffrage bill, provided he be returned to power.—The "Suffragettes" have been rioting. They attacked Messrs. Asquith and Birrell, injuring the latter so severely that he has had to cancel his public engagements. They broke the windows of these ministers and of Winston Churchill.—Parliament was dissolved November 28. Insurance at Lloyd's is equivalent to odds of 4 to 1 in favor of the Liberals.—The plague situation in Suffolk grows more serious. Dead rabbits and hares have been found in East Kent. All sorts of precautions are being recommended by the authorities who, strange to say, seem to know nothing of the admirably effective work of the American Government in San Francisco, Honolulu and Manila.—The Birkbeck Bank has sustained a great run caused by the circulation of an anonymous letter connecting it with the Charing Cross Bank. The bank offers a reward of £200 for the discovery of the writer.—The Lower House of Canterbury Convocation has been discussing Prayer-book revision, and recommends the change in the prayer for Parliament, of the words, "Our most religious and gracious king," into, "Our sovereign lord, the king." The abolition of the declaration against transubstantiation, etc., has evidently destroyed the sovereign's official character as a "religious king."—Rioting in the South Wales collieries has been renewed.—Two great estates, that of the late Charles Morrison, eleven million pounds, and that of the late Alfred Beit, eight million pounds, are being settled. The death duties will be three million pounds, about 15¾ per cent.

Ireland.—Mr. Redmond, on his return to Ireland from his successful American mission, was received with extraordinary demonstrations of welcome in Cork and Dublin and the cities en route. He spoke warmly of the reception he had received in the United States from all classes of the people. His meetings were crowded and Governors, Bishops, Senators, Congressmen and Mayors were on the platform. All Americans, from the President down, were in favor of Home Rule for Ireland. Some $150,000 was the material result of the visit, but the moral result was greater. Referring to sneers at the use of American money he quoted the answer of an American statesman: "Ireland ought to be no more ashamed to ask material aid from America to help her to win her liberty than America was ashamed to ask material aid from France when she was winning her liberty." American public opinion on Ireland's side is an impassable barrier to an Anglo-American alliance till Irish liberty shall have been granted. It was false that he had lowered the National Flag in America. An Irish Nationalist by race, tradition, instinct and training, his dominant purpose was to win self-government for Ireland and he was now returning to Parliament to wrest it from the necessities of English parties.—The controversial features of the Budget will be held over till after the election, thus permitting the Irish party to support the government. The part of the Budget which has just passed the Commons contains a provision eliminating certain disqualifications in the Old Age Pension Bill, which will specially benefit Ireland. The announcement that the Liberals if returned will introduce a Payment of Members Bill should be particularly acceptable to the Irish Members.—It is thought that the Nationalists will be returned in their present strength, and may possibly gain one or two seats from the Unionists. A truce was proposed between the two Nationalist sections, but without effect. Mr. O'Brien, whose friends are expected to lose one or two seats from a total of ten, contends that Mr. Redmond has broken up the Conference and thereby destroyed the only immediate hope of Home Rule. Mr. Healy is suspicious of Mr. Asquith's reticence and of the kind of Home Rule he should favor, but would accept any provided the financial provisions are sound. Mr. Balfour in declaring that "the Government is going to attempt to destroy our Constitution in obedience to the will of American subscribers" and "we are governed by factions of men who care nothing for your empire or country," has made anti-Irish domination the Unionist slogan, so that whether the Liberals wish it or not, the Irish question is bound to be in the forefront of the electoral battle.

France.—The statistics of criminality, published annually in France, made their appearance in the Journal Officiel early in November. The official figures make distressful reading. Crime is rapidly on the increase among youths between the ages of seven and twenty years. As the record runs, "the percentage of criminality added by the youth of the country to total criminality of the nation has notably increased." Nor is this the whole story. "As regards children under seven years," says the report, "the figures given do not furnish a complete idea of the prevalence of evil-doing." It appears that minors haled before the courts at this tender age are dismissed with a warning; and no record is made of their appearance to answer charges. A rather naive reason of the situation is advanced in the Journal Officiel. "The increase is due," says the writer, "to a lack of surveillance on the part of parents and to a non-frequentation of the schools." Some one commenting on the report in l'Echo de Paris has this remark to make: "The excuse alleged shows at once the helpless infirmity of the authorities and the culpable illusion of those who pretend to justify them contrary to all evidence." The real reason of the lamentable increase of crime among the young, which the official records cannot conceal, is, he adds, the frequentation of schools in which the very name of God is tabooed. And he comments further on the unsavory outcome of the lay schools established with so great a flourish by the government twenty-five years ago. The parents trained in them fail to safeguard their little ones, the little ones now being formed in them grow in wickedness year after year. —At the closing session of the Catholic Congress recently held in Lille, Cardinal Luçon gave a strong address on the school question. He affirmed that the success of the free-thinkers' efforts to laicize the schools of France would not merely de-christianize their country, they would rather make it atheistic. French normal schools to-day, said His Eminence, are practically atheistic, and they who are trained in them, go forth to teach what they have learned. Catholics must not falter in their struggle for the liberty of the school until they shall have won complete success in their just demands.

Emperor William Visits Beuron.—The German press reports a noteworthy utterance of Germany's ruler during his visit to the Benedictine monastery at Beuron, November 13. Addressing the abbot and a number of Catholic dignitaries gathered to welcome the Emperor and his party, William said: "I look to you to help me keep my people religious. This is very important, as the twentieth century has set loose ideas which can be successfully combated only with the help of religion and the support of heaven. My crown can guarantee me success only when it relies on the word and personality of Our Lord. The governments of Christian princes can be carried on only according to the will of the Lord. The altar and throne are closely united and must not be separated." The Emperor went to Beuron chiefly to see the heroic bronze crucifix presented to the monastery by His Majesty a few weeks ago, but his announced visit of half an hour was drawn out to an hour and a half, so interested did he show himself during his tour through the Monastery buildings to examine the notable art treasures and the splendid library with which the Beuron Benedictines have enriched their ancient abbey.

Germans Cannot Have American Beef.—The stormy scenes looked for at the reopening, on November 22, of the Reichstag's sessions, after a recess of six months, failed to appear. The body met, and with no more formality than might have marked its proceedings had it adjourned but the day before, began at once the consideration of the order of the day. The interpellation announced by the Socialists regarding the high price of meats, which it was thought would provoke sharp discussion, owing to the opposition of the Agrarian party, was made to almost empty benches. Vice-Chancellor Delbrueck, Minister of the Interior, made known the Government's position in unmistakable terms. He explained how at the solicitation of the South German government Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg had sanctioned the import from France of a fixed number of cattle and swine weekly. Importation of cattle from America, he added, originally prohibited, owing to the prevalence of Texas fever, cannot be permitted on veterinary grounds, and American fresh beef was barred for the same reason. But if this prohibition were abrogated such importation would still be impossible, owing to the meat inspection law, which requires fresh beef to be imported in whole or half carcasses with the internal organs intact.

Vienna.—The great open square facing Parliament House was the scene last week of a strong demonstration in favor of cheaper meat. The high prices prevailing for months past have become a source of wide-spread complaint and the promoters of the demonstration used the opportunity to arouse their followers against alleged favoritism in the policy of the Government towards the agrarian party. Ten thousand Social Democrats marched in the parade bearing banners on which were inscribed demands for the reduction of the meat tariff, so that importation of that commodity from Argentina might be facilitated and prices be reasonably lowered.

Bohemia.—The Landtag, following the conditions described in last week's chronicle, adjourned sine die. No good results apparently were to be expected from the further deliberation of the compromise committee, to which the grievances of Czechs and Germans had been referred, after its futile attempts during many weeks to arrive at a satisfactory settlement between the two parties. The outcome may prove a serious matter to the Kingdom. Many questions touching the country's welfare await solution, and nothing can be effected until a peace compact shall have been entered into by the contending factions.

Portugal.—The provisional Government has revoked the decree of exile pronounced against Queen Maria Pia, grandmother of Manoel. She has sent a confidential servant to Lisbon, to collect her personal property and convey it to Italy. Ex-premier Franco was arrested for abuse of power in connection with his services to Dom Carlos. He was released on two hundred thousand dollars cash bail. The hierarchy met in Lisbon under the presidency of the Patriarch to provide for the welfare of the Church under existing conditions.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Immaculate Conception

Many to-day find religion a fascinating study. It gives scope to the imagination; and so books are written about it, people talk about it, indeed one can hardly find a more acceptable subject for the conversation of a well-read company. Yet in such companies religious persons are often few; for too often those finding the Christian religion most interesting objectively, are the very ones to profess the least subjective need of it. It enters into their personal lives no more than Totemism or Fetichism. They read the Gospels and the Upanishads with the same aloofness; and our Lord Jesus Christ is no more to them than Buddha. Of what faith is, the world of culture has not, as a general rule, the vaguest notion.

This does not mean that the men and women belonging to it are not members of sects commonly styled Christian. Some may be even ministers in their sects. A clergyman, speaking in a splendid building named after an Apostle who gave himself to a cruel death for the faith of Christ, told his hearers lately that he did not believe in the reality of Adam and Eve. An influential periodical of the same sect joins the Independent in railing at certain Presbyterian ministers, calling them "Bibliolaters" because they maintain the historical truth of the Pentateuch. A person of that type once asked me whether the Catholic Church held as matter of faith the accounts given in Genesis of the Fall. On my answering in the affirmative, he rejoined: "I am sorry to hear it. I thought better things of the Catholic Church." I pointed out that it is a fundamental doctrine, and he was quite surprised. Yet it is clear that the fall of the human race in Adam's disobedience lies at the foundation of Christianity. Redemption presupposes the Fall and implies the Incarnation, and without the Incarnation there is no Christian religion. Take away the Fall, and St. Paul's epistles are so much waste paper. Until modern faithlessness appeared, not only to Catholics, but also to nearly every Protestant, all this was self-evident.

That it is not so to-day outside the Catholic Church, is due to the great error of these times, the persuasion that there is no dogma, that religion is exclusively a matter of conduct, and not primarily a matter of belief. This necessitates the denial of the Incarnation; since to admit that God "has spoken to us through his Son" would involve logically the obligation of accepting such a revelation. Hence, therefore the rejection of the Fall and of the Redemption. Hence, too, all the indignities done to her whom through long centuries all Christendom acclaimed "the glorious and ever Virgin Mother of God." The error is to be met, therefore, by reaffirming the great facts of the Incarnation, the Word made Flesh, and the consequent dignity of Mary His Mother.

These stand or fall together. They might, therefore, be reaffirmed simultaneously; or one might be reaffirmed formally; the other, implicitly in that formal reaffirmation. The first Protestants denied Mary's prerogatives and her place in the scheme of Redemption, as things injurious to her Son; and, as the result, we see Protestantism generally apostatizing with regard to Our Lord's Person, Mission and Incarnation. This may be a reason why in His wisdom and providence, God decreed to summon the world to return to faith, by the reassertion of Mary's dignity.

Because God is infinite He can draw good for men out of every evil. That He does so for all who will accept the good, every Christian must believe; and in His government of the Church we find the confirmation of our faith. Heresy after heresy arose to be condemned; but no condemnation left the faith in the same condition as it was in before. To the Church at its foundation our Lord committed the fullness of the Catholic faith; but it was not always taught to the faithful with the same explicitness. It was the examination and condemnation of each successive heresy that conduced to the fuller exposition and clearer definition of the deposit of faith. And so the disturbances of Arianism, Monophysitism, Nestorianism, Donatism, Pelagianism left Christians the richer in their explicit knowledge of Our Lord's Divinity and Incarnation, and of the intimate connection with these of Mary's prerogatives, of the nature of the Church and the Sacraments and of the workings of Divine Grace. It is not wonderful then, except to those who, making void Christ's promises, deny the Church to-day to be the living Church of other times, the organ of the Holy Ghost, that out of the Protestant heresy should have come to us, among other things, a defined knowledge of the Immaculate Conception as contained in Divine revelation from the beginning.

For this is no new doctrine. On the contrary, it is part of the oldest revelation, of what the cultured, faithless world we spoke of, calls the Eden myth, but which for us culminates in the proto-evangelion, the first Gospel-message, the promise to our first parents of the Redeemer by whose merits they were forgiven, and who should restore to mankind all it had lost in Adam's sin. The words are few, and in the fullness of their sense obscure, as the weighty words of God must always be to the mere human intellect; but to the Church, enlightened by the indwelling Holy Spirit, nothing is obscure. Under her guidance we read them and penetrate their meaning:

"I will put enmities between thee and the woman and between thy seed and her seed.

She shall crush thy head, and thou shalt lie in wait for her heel."

The seed of the woman is Christ, our Lord, who, St. Paul tells us is the second Adam. Between Him and the devil and all the fallen angels with all their ceaseless warfare against mankind, is to be absolute enmity, of which the climax is to be His triumphant victory and their utter overthrow. With Him is joined, on terms as equal as can subsist between the Creator and a creature in this absolute enmity, "the woman." Who is this woman? Is it Eve, the devil's victim in the first attack of the world-long war? Is she to be raised to such an association, while to Adam is left the temporal consequences of his sin? This cannot be. His partner in grace, falling with him in their sin, she must be the companion of his punishment. The second Adam takes to himself a second Eve, not her to whom was addressed the sentence: "I will multiply thy sorrows," but her to whom the infallible Church applies the divine words: "Thou art all fair and there is no spot in thee," that is, her who never was to be otherwise than at enmity with the devil, and therefore never to be subject to sin. Mary, therefore, was not only by a wonderful privilege to be free from actual sin during her life, but also by a singular privilege to be free from original sin by the reception of sanctifying grace simultaneously with the first moment of her existence.

Understanding this, one goes over the liturgies of the Church, the feasts and offices in honor of the Mother of God, the writings of Fathers, Doctors and Saints, the constant belief of the Christian people, and to his heart's great joy finds how consonant all are with the definition of the Catholic faith uttered not sixty years ago by Pius IX. He is not surprised to hear an occasional voice apparently discordant, for Saints and Doctors and Fathers are not infallible. Moreover, the voice is, generally speaking, discordant only apparently, it is uttered by one who has not grasped the question as it is our privilege to grasp it under the unerring guidance of Holy Church, so that it is not hard to show that had such a one enjoyed our advantages, his voice would have blended with ours in saluting the Immaculate Conception of the glorious and ever Blessed Virgin Mary.

There are well-meaning people outside the Church persuaded that, in defining this dogma of the Catholic faith, the Church has honored Mary unduly at the cost of the honor due to God. They think we hold Mary's perfect sanctity to be hers, as it were, by right, whereas by right only God is holy, and take her out of the category of those redeemed by the Blood of Jesus Christ, which alone cleanses from sin. Certainly such a doctrine would be an outrage on the Christian religion. But the Catholic Church is far from teaching it, how far, the words of the definition will show:

"We declare, pronounce and define the doctrine, which holds that the most Blessed Virgin Mary was, in the first instant of her conception, preserved by a singular grace and privilege of Almighty God in view of the merits of Jesus Christ the Saviour of the human race, free from all stain of original sin, is revealed by God, and therefore to be firmly and constantly believed by all the faithful."

The Immaculate Conception is, therefore, a grace and privilege conferred on Mary alone of all mankind; it was conferred by Him who alone could do so; it is the work of His Omnipotence, and it was merited by the Precious Blood of Jesus Christ, who in His goodness and for His own honor would be the Redeemer of His dear Mother in a way even more excellent and intimate than that in which He is the Redeemer of the rest of the human race.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

Beginnings of Italian Socialism

To the American interested in the Socialist movement, the story of Socialism in Italy will, no doubt, be welcome. It must be merely a sketch, but will help to a better understanding of the social and political movements of that country. Those who wish to have a more thorough knowledge of the subject may consult for instance, the reviews of Socialist Congresses, published in such periodicals as the Civiltà Cattolica and the Revista Internazionale of Rome; the Idea, the Scuola Cattolica and the Unione of Milan, and the Azione Sociale of Bergamo. The chief liberal periodicals discussing it are the Riforma Sociale of Turin, and the Nuova Antologia of Florence. Among the Socialist organs may be mentioned, the Critica Sociale of Milan and the Avanti of Rome. Moreover, several Catholic writers have studied seriously the questions of Socialism in Italy, amongst whom are notable Veggiano, Ballerini, Toniolo, Verresi, and Meda. From all these sources we shall draw freely.

Socialism in Italy began in what may be regarded as the Revolutionary period, extending from 1848 to 1874, which, however, was a time of preparation, rather than of Socialism pure and simple. The precursors of the leaders of to-day were Mazzini, Garibaldi, and above all, the Russian refugee, Prince Michael Bakounine, who betook himself to Florence in 1864, and then proceeded to south Italy, where he established sections of the International Workingmen's Association. The first section was formed in Naples, in 1862; others came later in Campagna, in Sicily and Tuscany. In the north of Italy a few newspapers helped the work, chief of which was the Plebe, of Lodi, under the direction of Enrico Bignani. The International Association became famous in 1870 through its connection with the Paris Commune, and increased in strength, not only in the south of Italy, but also in the north, especially in Emilia and Romagna.

Bakounine soon broke with Mazzini, and then his one hundred and fifty sections, aided by twenty newspapers, and strengthened by the moral forces which came to them from the Congress of Rimini in 1862, and Bologna in 1874, began to prepare for a revolution. The scheme miscarried. The attempts in Naples and Benevento were a failure, and the Government resorted to terrible means of repression. Andrea Costa, who has been the head of the Internationals since 1870, declared himself against Bakounine and his absolute anarchism, and in favor of the doctrine of Marx. Thus the idea of insurrection as a means of social regeneration faded for the moment from the minds of the men, and in a few years the International, as such, ceased to exist, being succeeded by various Socialist organizations.

The Congress held in Bologna on the 14th of March, 1880, afforded the clearest indication of this change. The Congress approved of the liberty of strikes; universal suffrage; the liberty of the press and of the association; municipal autonomy; a progressive single tax, and the abolition of church funds. From this congress sprung the Italian Workingmen's Party, whose purpose was to organize workmen for the struggle of labor against capital. It intended to exclude any idea of conciliation, but, nevertheless, it hesitated between Unionism on one side and Anarchy on the other. The different sections at Milan, Turin, Genoa, Rome, Naples and other great cities were endorsed, and at the next political elections, Bignani, Costa, and the workingman, Antonio Maffi, appeared as candidates. Parallel with the Workingmen's Party was that of the Revolutionary Socialists, which was more political than social, and was especially strong in the old International centres. This division was, naturally, a cause of weakness.

Meanwhile there had arisen on the Socialist horizon a star of the first magnitude, Filippo Turati, perhaps the finest mind among the Italian Socialists. His eloquence and his periodical Riforma Sociale, gave him unlimited influence. At his suggestion, and that of the Milanese Socialists, whom he controlled, a congress of Italian Socialists was convoked at Milan, in August, 1891. It there defined the purpose of the Italian Workingmen's Party, and drew up the constitution of the Labor Party, counting as workingmen, not only laborers and artisans, but also professional men. The program of Marx was adopted, but as the intellectuals multiplied and became leaders, a sharp rivalry began between them and the old pioneers of the Workingmen's Party, who were workingmen pure and simple. This strife reached its climax in the Congress of Genoa, August 15th, 1892, when the Italian Labor Party expelled a considerable number of workingmen as Anarchists. At that Congress one hundred and ninety-two political and workingmen's associations were represented. It was the absolute triumph of Marxism.

In the Congress held at Reggio di Emilia, from September 8th to 10th, 1893, the Italian Labor Party was transformed into the Italian Socialist Labor Party. There were two hundred and seventeen representatives present, chief among whom was Enrico Ferri, the man who was to play such an important part in the affairs of Italian Socialism. The aim of the party was defined as being the Maximum Program, that is, the socialization of the land and the instruments of labor. The revolutionary character of the party was affirmed, and its tactics were declared to be no compromise; its methods, war of the classes. A procession of five thousand peasants passed through the streets of Reggio and listened to the fiery speeches of the Socialist leaders. That parade of the peasants and the revolutionary program of the Congress filled the Government and the middle class with consternation. A reaction was inevitable. When Crispi came into power, Sicily was in revolt. The vigorous Minister proclaimed a state of siege, and with an iron hand crushed the Anarchical Socialists, arrested Barbato, Bosco Garibaldi, Verro and several hundred of the open secret agitators. The Government occupied itself for a time almost exclusively against the revolutionary propaganda, and in 1894 passed laws against Anarchists, and applied on a large scale the rule of compulsory residence. Indirectly the Government's action extended to Socialism, and on October 22d, 1894, a decree was issued dissolving all Socialist associations.

Such stringent measures had the effect of exciting sympathy for the Socialists, and renewed their courage. At the height of the reaction, sixty-four leading Socialists met secretly in Parma, January 13th, 1895, and declared the party reconstituted, calling it simply the Italian Socialist Party. This meeting at Parma is important. In contradiction to the Reggio assembly, it explicitly adopted the Minimum Program, as the aim of Socialistic activity. It also substituted individual adhesion instead of an association by groups or unions. Individuals without any reference to their occupation, constituted sections in each locality, and thus there was a separation of the economical from political action. The Organization of Trades found its natural place in the Labor Exchanges, which were begun in 1889, and extended in a few years to all Italian cities. Thus also began the great agricultural and industrial associations, such as the Union of Railway Employees, Printers, Masons, etc. By degrees all these groups of workingmen were imbued with the Socialist spirit and followed the guidance of Socialist leaders.

In the elections of 1892, twenty-seven thousand votes were cast for their candidates, and in 1895, the figure grew to eighty-one thousand. Their representatives in Parliament rose from five to twelve, and in the Congress of Florence in July, 1896, three hundred and twenty-nine sections were represented. They then entered upon a very aggressive propaganda, and their success was made easy by the disaster of Adowa and the fall of Crispi.

I. QUIRICO, S.J.

A Modern Vitalist

At the convention of the Keplerbund in Kassel, Hans Driesch, one of Germany's foremost biologists, delivered a lecture on "Logical Vindication of the Doctrine of the Autonomy of Life." This lecture, together with another delivered at Heidelberg on "The Purpose and Nature of Natural Philosophy," was published only recently, (Engelmann, Leipzig), in the form of a pamphlet, bearing the title, "Zwei Vorträge zur Naturphilosophie." While we are scarcely in sympathy with Driesch's Kantian Philosophy, nor with his efforts to interpret nature, and especially living nature in terms of that Philosophy, still there is much in the few pages of this lecture that will command the attention of the two opposing camps of modern theoretical biology.

Hans Driesch is a vitalist and has given repeated expression to his convictions in unmistakable terms. To quote his own words, "Biology, I hear someone say, is simply and solely an empirical science; in some sense it is nothing but applied physics and chemistry, perhaps applied mechanics. . . . It will be my essential endeavor to convince you in the course of these lectures that such an aspect of the science of biology is wrong; that biology is an elemental natural science in the true sense of the word" (The Science and Philosophy of the Organism, vol. I, pp. 8, 9). And Driesch has arrived at his conclusions in a strictly scientific way, analytically, by the aid of experiment. As he himself says in the lectures now under consideration, "The profound insight which experimental research has given us into the nature of living matter, has produced in many contemporaries, as well as in myself, the conviction that any materialistic, yes, even any mechanistic explanation of life processes is false,—that life must be autonomous; in other words, is not applied Physics and Chemistry, but something entirely different, a thing by itself. Such a doctrine has ever been designated as Vitalism." (op. cit. p. 3).

In the very beginning of his lecture, Driesch gives utterance to doctrines that will make both the materialist and the vitalist pause: the former, because they are uttered by a "real" scientist, a "free" scientist, a firm believer in the scalpel, the microscope and the test-tube. one to whom no bias, religious or otherwise can be imputed; the latter, because he is astonished to hear of someone bold enough to throw back into the face of materialism the very weapon which it had been using with such telling force against vitalism these many years. Evidently taking his suggestion from the well-known purpose of the Keplerbund, to foster "unprejudiced and unbiased science" he asserts that "the majority of biologists of to-day are fettered by dogma: dogmatic materialism,—or as it is now more commonly called, by the misuse of an old and venerable name,—dogmatic Monism, fetters them. . . . Yes, even when the crudities of thought (Denkroheiten) of real Materialism are avoided, . . . the majority of contemporary research workers are inclined to consider this phenomenon of the Real (Erscheinung des Wirklichen) as a perfect mechanical system and nothing else, hence as 'Mechanism.'" (p. 3).

Time was, and it is not ancient history, when materialists had the copyright on this accusation of bias and prejudice. The fact that it has now been used on so public an occasion and by so prominent an authority against its former owners is certainly not without significance.

But Driesch had other surprises in store for scientists on this occasion. How novel to the ear accustomed to the accents of "modern" biologists, are the following words: "We know nothing of the laws of descent; but we do know that the commonly accepted doctrines, known as Lamarckism and Darwinism, which make 'law' out of mere chance, are false. The field of the theory of descent is an ungrateful one. In it there is opportunity for destructive criticism, only; not for constructive development." (p. 2).

The lecturer then explains his method: "In many ways I have tried to prove the vitalistic doctrine of life. This, of course, could be done, only, by showing that certain processes in the life of the individual cannot be resolved into merely physico-chemical factors. In other words, the proofs for vitalism are indirect proofs, proofs 'per exclusionem.'" (p. 3).

Driesch now shows how these experimental proofs can be given. They are described in great detail in the author's "The Science and Philosophy of the Organism." (London, 1908), but even in their abbreviated form as they appear in this pamphlet, they are so clear and striking that they cannot but appeal to the unbiased mind. From the reviewer of the pamphlet in Nature they elicited the statement, "His, (Driesch's) arguments in support of his opinions are most weighty, and—the present reviewer ventures to say—convincing." (pp. 84, 294).

The first proof Driesch finds in the fact that fragmentary parts of embryos when properly treated can produce, even without previous regeneration, entire, although diminutive, individuals. Such diminutive individuals were actually produced by the author, and he quotes the embryos of the sea-urchin, the star-fish, of fish and of amphibia, as well as adult forms of Tubularia, Hydra, Planaria and Clavellina as instances in point. The explanation of these phenomena is certainly not forthcoming by supposing that external agencies or Chemism or a machine is the directing force; for, argues the author, "a machine does not remain the same if its parts are arbitrarily removed, and just as arbitrarily rearranged." (p. 6).

Regeneration and the facts of cell cleavage during embryonic development form the basis of the second argument for vitalism. A machine certainly does not repair its own damaged parts, nor can it duplicate or multiply itself and still remain the same machine. Finally, an analysis of vital activity is regarded as a third proof, since it shows that the so-called "psycho-physical parallelism" is untenable.

As is evident from the above, the proofs which Driesch adduces in this pamphlet should rather be termed "classes of proofs," for in their fuller treatment in "The Science and Philosophy of the Organism" a number of striking facts observed in the laboratory chiefly by the author himself is adduced under each of these three heads.

Driesch then passes on to the logical vindication of his theories. Since he makes use of Kantian terminology in this part we chose rather not to follow him. He puts to himself the question "How can the essentially non-mechanical in nature be compatible with the mechanical as a part of nature, as well as with our thought, as the 'understander' of nature?" His conclusion briefly, is that vitalism is a doctrine that satisfies the demands of correct thought, and that it does not postulate the existence of anything that contains contradictory characteristics.

With this conclusion, of course, we agree thoroughly, and we feel confident that Driesch's little pamphlet will do much to strengthen the vitalistic position which demands first and foremost a thorough groundwork of scientific experimental fact; not for those, it is true, who accept it on the traditional metaphysical grounds, but for the modern laboratory-trained scientist.

A. M. S. S.J.

Canadian Patois

"Unfortunately," said an American to an acquaintance of his on the other side of the border, "your Canadian French is only patois." "I am aware," was the reply, "that such is the impression among those who know nothing about French. Indeed, they never grow tired of volunteering that precious piece of information; and as a certain old professor used to say, 'the more a man repeats an accusation the more he gets to think that it is true.'"

However, French-Canadians are not particularly worried about the charge, for they know that they are not alone in that respect. It is not very long since Englishmen spoke disdainfully of the language used in the United States and Upper Canada. Thanks to the literature produced in both places that prejudice has been largely removed; though traces of it still linger here and there. But no such impression had to be removed from the minds of Frenchmen in France with regard to the language employed by their kindred on this side of the world. That delusion exists only in the imagination of those who have no knowledge of French.

As a matter of fact there is no Canadian patois. Our French is genuine French; it is a blood-relation, in the first degree, of the language used in France. The people of Old and New France are perfectly at home with each other and converse as brothers of the same family. I have studied and lived in France; I have traveled through many of its provinces; I have passed the greater part of my time among professors of colleges and universities; I have conversed with the ordinary people both of France and Canada, and though I have met individuals in both countries more or less careful of their grammar and pronunciation, I have not yet discovered two distinct categories, one speaking bad and the other good French. This was especially the case in religious communities. Among them it would be extremely difficult for a visitor to discover whether the person speaking came from New or Old France. At most, a particular accent might betray one at times, but it would be no more than one might observe between the accent of a man from the Southern States or from Back Bay. And yet their language is nothing else than that of the various classes of society from which they come, plus the grammatical correctness which they may have subsequently acquired.

Candidly, I believe that there is no country in the world where there is less patois than in Canada. The French spoken there is the same from Halifax to Vancouver. It is the French brought over from Normandy and Brittany, and it has been preserved perfectly, especially in the country places where the people do not come in contact with English settlers, and do not read the daily papers. It is, of course, not the French of the Academy, but neither is the French used in the different provinces of France that of the Forty Immortals. Naturally, there are mistakes of pronunciation and the syntax is sometimes at odds with the rules of grammar. But what archaisms exist either in the words or phrases have a charm of their own. When Mgr. Touchet, the Bishop of Orleans was speaking the other day, at Notre Dame in Montreal, of one of the judges of Joan of Arc, he said, "he was from Limoges and used a sort of a jargon." He would never have said that of a French-Canadian judge.

Without exaggeration or chauvinism, I might add that the differences which one remarks between our language of the people and that of the peasants of France are rather in our favor. Among our people there are fewer of those curious, sharp and nasal accents which quite upset Frenchmen themselves when they pass from one province of France to another; there are fewer sing-song intonations, fewer barbarisms, and there is no slang. M. J. J. Ampère, M. Rameau, and M. Ch. Bos, have all spoken of the purity of the language of Canada; and M. Bellay in describing a dramatic representation given at a certain Canadian college, expressed himself as particularly pleased with the correct accent and pronunciation of the students. M. du Roure, a Parisian, who is at present a professor at Laval, has put himself on record as saying that a very notable thing at the recent Eucharistic Congress at Montreal was the surprise of many visiting Frenchmen at the purity of the language as it is now spoken in Canada. L'Hermine, a French paper, in a criticism of Ernest Gagnon's latest book, "Feuilles Volantes," says: "this fine French-Canadian, in his delightful Canadian chronicles writes better French than we do."

I might quote many another French writer, if that would convince those who do not know, or perhaps do not want to know, that in the Province of Quebec real French is spoken.

It would be prudent before a foreigner accuses a Canadian of using patois to be sure that the suspected individual is really a Canadian. I remember, as if it were yesterday, the loud outburst of laughter that one of my friends was guilty of in this connection. He was a bona fide Parisian, a licencié-ès-lettres, a charming talker, and had come from France two years before to be a professor in one of our universities. There were four in the party, and we were going from Quebec to Montreal. It was a delightful July evening, and we were seated on deck, talking. Near us were a lady and gentleman with their grown-up daughter. They were from a great American city which I shall not name. The girl had studied French at a high school in Bordeaux. I learned that from her a little later and she was very proud of it; but she told it to me in English. That evening, as usual, our Parisian was in the best of spirits. He talked and talked and laughed and gesticulated and discussed all sorts of things.

The curiosity of the old gentleman was aroused, and trusting to his daughter's knowledge of French, he asked her what we were talking about. She listened discreetly, and then shrugging her shoulders, said with a disdainful air: "I never could understand that Canadian patois." No doubt her father and her loving mother thought her very clever. They concluded that her French must be very pure because she could not understand the man from Quebec.

I must make it clear, however, that the praise that I have accorded to the language of the people is not applicable to the middle classes. In Canada conditions obtain which are just the reverse of what happens in France. Not a few Canadians who constitute what is called the upper class differ very little in their speech from country people. This is not due to the fact that our rustics do not speak badly, but rather that many of our city folk do not speak well. I do not mean that our merchants and professional men are unaware of the mistakes they make in their manner of speech, but they are careless about avoiding them. Their vocabulary is more copious than that of the people, and you do not remark in their conversations the expressions, or truncated pronunciations, or phrases, or forms of speech which are peculiar to country people. On the other hand your ears are assailed by Anglicisms; not merely English words—and in that respect we are not worse off than the Parisians—but English grammatical constructions and literal translations from English, which play havoc with the syntax and genius of the language. French words are employed, but the form which the sentence assumes is decidedly English.

Fortunately a reaction has set in against this negligence and unconcern. In good families, in houses of education, both primary and secondary, as well as in the universities, in society gatherings, in the student class of towns and villages, there is now a certain pride in pronouncing, learning and speaking excellent French. Canada has its orators, its writers, its conversationalists, its professors, its teachers. In them there is not the slightest trace of patois. There are not a few Canadians who teach French in France.

L. LALANDE, S.J.

The Pre-Reformation Churches in England: A Mood

During the summer and autumn a good many American children of the Church are across the sea, at leisure, and open to all impressions in "that dark, rich Old World." It is indeed an anomaly if they, above all others, do not look far and see deeply and widely. Every Catholic is, in the truest sense, a long-descended person, with a spiritual ancestry and spiritual traditions old as Europe itself; his memories, if he care to draw upon them, are of no common kind. Certain thoughts and emotions are his alone, not shared with his most aesthetic kinsman or neighbor, nor running neck and neck with those of the merely historical student, though the latter may look upon the evidences of ancient religion with interest, and even with respectful awe. Put a party of Cook's Tourists in an English Cathedral. There are one hundred and fifty-seven of them, perhaps; and a separate Cathedral for each. "We make from within us," says Thackeray, "the world we see." To that almost unearthly beauty of English architecture, so full of a certain divine dissatisfaction and mystic aspiration never equalled on the Continent,—who can be so sensitive as an instructed Catholic? For what is this he looks upon? Something inexpressibly noble and beloved which is gagged, drugged, wronged. The spirit has been driven out of it; it goes through alien functions with a spurious or galvanized energy. It is not dead; it is only heart-broken. "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid Him."

A terrible, a pathetic emptiness spreads from end to end, and from side to side. Lamps do not fill it for us, nor the exquisite voices of boys, lapping like crystal waves over the spaces of the ritual choir. Sharply and inevitably the Past, with harsh tones, bridges all that lulling music, and says its incredible say. Long ago, it cries, was the Rood smashed down from its sentinel post on the ramparts of the sanctuary; and the alabaster saints struck from their delicate carven niches yonder; and the useless piscinas singularly chosen to hold pamphlets or fragments of masonry; and the little aisle-chapels, each with its individual charm and unction, cleared away to make room for a larger organ or a bigger vestry; and the blessed dead cast out; and the glorious painted windows blinded, and the frescoes white-washed, and the chantry endowments misapplied; and the pyx in the Form of a Silver Dove hovering over the High Altar put rudely forth on the flooded waters, and given over to homelessness, and the ingratitude of man. Such is the record written for those who will heed, the rough outline of the national calamity brought to pass by the strong rulers, full of meat, of the Tudor line.

It is an operative calamity to this day. Severance and spoliation and seduction are written on those splendid walls. They stand hushed with no breath of fire in them: stand decent and unexpressive. No place at all is this for passion or for tears, or for unleashed human repentance and ecstatic human joy any more. One is grateful to have them kept as carefully as they now are at last, their shells of souls being most fair and dear. But less torturing, in a way, is some roofless monastic ruin hard by, where the grass surges in its pure natural gold, and wood-doves make their nest high in the cran- nies of the precarious chancel arch, against a sweet pale sky. For there, at least, is real death, aping no other fate; murdered innocence, with all the arrows crumbling from her wounds, lying quite safe in the hands of time and decay. There wanders no strange presence, as in that other interior, clothed in legalized rebellion, and singing for nearly three hundred years: I am Far Better than the Old! and then varying the refrain, within the memory of living men, until it sounds forth confidently, and with a smile of light: I AM the Old!

Yes, there is much in dispossessed England, "robbed" England (to use a famous word of Cardinal Manning's), which arrests the gaze of those loyal to the Holy See, the Family Hearthstone of the nations. Ladies from New York have been known to sit in the vaulted porches and weep, not irrationally! But why such romantic indulgence when there is no question of despair at all? On the contrary, such an amazing basis for thanksgiving and a strengthened belief in the mercies of God. Surely, most of the popular portents to the instructed eye are hopeful, though not immediately hopeful. And a long line of saints and visionaries in every country have foreseen the broken-off "Branch" restored to her sap and origin: "for He is able to graft it in again." It is treason- able, too, to be too sad where martyrs have died that Faith might live: for the martyrs do not all fail in their invest- ments. Then there are things to do, it seems to some of us, in the way of actual cheer and comfort. "Durham is gone, and Winchester is gone," cries Newman in his wonderful Oscott sermon. But they have not gone so far but that they and we continue yet in secret touch. Ours is one speech with that of the medieval founders whose hearts were built into these consecrated fabrics, and whose bones, according to their last wills and testa- ments, were intended to sleep therein, and to be remem- bered before the vanished Altar "forever." No lay- Catholic need ever pass an Orate in an epitaph without sprinkling on that dry grave the dew of brotherly but long-denied prayer. English priests must often be near their own melancholy minsters when bearing the Blessed Sacrament to the sick. Some among them, not unkind to the homesick courts of the Lord, may even ere now have made it a point to enter and cross them, and so have felt the thrill of the long-cold stones, raised up as children unto Abraham.

Oh, that our American Catholic tourists would think of these things, and deepen, even if it be but for an hour, the sense of their relationship to what they may be tempted to take lightly as "Protestant" Churches! Nothing can Protestantize them. What do they know of "hateful Henry" and the Reformation, and Cranmer, and the Homilies? Built and hallowed as Catholic, loved and used as Catholic, they were still Catholic when lost, and through all external changes, and the buffets, with- out and within, of the wild winds of doctrine, Catholic they are still, and nothing else whatever. They were sealed with chrism by men who knew the pallium. Alienation and sorrow have not dimmed their baptismal beauty one whit. It glows bright, if one only looks for it, on gray towering fanes all over the not very happy land of Gregory and Augustine, the land proud once to name itself Our Lady's Dowry. E. N. Y.

A Dramatic Incident

Examples of what has been called "the revenges of history," are numerous, but none more striking than that given some one hundred and fifty years ago, in the King- dom of Portugal. For a considerable time a powerful and unscrupulous political combination, much the same as that of the present day, had dominated continental Europe and militated against the Church.

"The first step," says Abbé Maynard in "The Jesuits," "in this widespread conspiracy of the eigh- teenth century against Catholicity and the Papal power was the destruction of Jesuit influence and the annihila- tion of the Order." Nefarious persons such as Choiseul and Madame de Pompadour, in France, Aranda, in Spain and the rest, were leagued together in schemes equally nefarious to accomplish this result. Benedict XIV, on his death-bed, and Clement XIII on coming to the throne, were assailed by requests to abolish the So- ciety, upon the foul and absurd charges of suborned wit- nesses.

The latter Pontiff remained steadfast to the last in his protection of the Jesuits, declaring that "the body, the Institute, the spirit of the Society of Jesus, were in- nocent," that it was "pious, useful, and holy in its object." His successor, Clement XIV, likewise warmly defended an Order, which, as he explained, had "been commended by nineteen of his predecessors, and by the Council of Trent itself." The storm against religion, however, had been gaining in strength and fury, and Clement at length yielded, crying out, "that as in a tempest, a mariner sacrifices his most precious goods," so too, he was ob- liged to sacrifice the Jesuits, not that he was deceived as to the objects of those who had forced the issue upon him. "Their ultimate aim," he said, "was the destruc- tion of the Catholic religion, schism and perhaps heresy." He signed for the suppression of the Jesuits, a Brief which could be easily revoked by any of his successors, which was not canonically published nor executed in any country.

All the details of that sad episode in Church history are, of course, familiar, as well as the providential tolera- tion of the Society by Catherine of Russia, and Frederick the Great of Prussia. Both of these admired the Society as the defender of social order and the most successful of educators. Frederick declared to D'Alembert, that he had found no better priests than the Jesuits and would not sacrifice a single one of them; also that he was determined to retain them in his kingdom. He further declared that the conspiracy against them was "the result of pride, revenge, cabal, in short private interests."

Now amongst all who conspired to annihilate the Jesuits, none was more inveterate, more malignant or more powerful than Sebastian, Marquis de Pombal, Prime Minister of Portugal during the reign of the weak and dissolute Joseph I.

Pombal, through his sojourn in England and Germany, had not only lost his faith, but had become so saturated with the principles of eighteenth century infidelity, that he desired to produce in the Kingdom which he governed a condition of affairs similar to that in England, where the Church was subservient to the State. Previous to the open rupture with the Pope, which came later, he strove by the circulation of infidel works and by every other means in his power to undermine the Church, and to rid himself of the Religious Orders, beginning, of course, with the Jesuits.

The procedure is always the same, at that time, as it is to-day, and the same arguments are invariably employed, that the welfare of the State requires the subordination of the Church; that the Religious Orders and finally the clergy in general are in the way of progress and reform. Pombal having helped to procure the suppression of the Jesuits, and having banished or imprisoned, on evidence fabricated by himself, every Portuguese Jesuit, was left for a time free to pursue his multifarious schemes, to the detriment, as was speedily shown, of true progress and civilization, no less than religion. Being implicated in many conspiracies and held guilty of some of the crimes which he had attributed to the Jesuits, he fell from power shortly after the dissolution of the Society. In the reign of Joseph's successor, Maria, he was imprisoned for treasonable practices, and narrowly escaped with his life. Nor did he long survive his disgrace. He died neglected and forlorn, and by a curious train of circumstances his remains lay unburied in a chapel upon the Pombal estates, as if awaiting the return of his former adversaries.

Meanwhile the Society of Jesus had submitted to the decrees against it in Portugal as elsewhere, though it was said that the populace were so much in their favor that a single word from them would have provoked a revolution. They had beheld the ruin by Pombal of their settlements in Paraguay, the glory of Portugal, and which approached as nearly to Utopian perfection as is possible here below. The years in their course had brought them complete rehabilitation, and they were welcomed back to Portugal, amid the plaudits of the nation, and made their reentrance into the Diocese of Coimbra and the city of Pombal. A letter dated March 6th, 1832, from Father de Vaux, S.J., gives a touching account of an incident almost weirdly dramatic, which occurred while the joy-bells were ringing and the city celebrating the return of the Society of Jesus. "We were received," he writes, "with the ringing of bells, complimented and led in triumph by the archpriest, accompanied by his clergy. The church where two of our Fathers went to say Mass was magnificently illuminated, as on the grandest solemnities. As for myself, moved by a religious sentiment which it is impossible to express, I slipped away with a Father and Brother before meeting the good Curé, and ran off to the Church of the Franciscans to pray at the tomb of the Marquis. But the unfortunate man had no tomb. At a little distance from the high altar we found a bier covered with a miserable pall, which the Father Guardian of the Convent told us was his. It had waited in vain for the honors of sepulture from the 5th of May, 1782. . . . I can say then with truth, that after more than half a century of proscription, the first step on the return of the Society to Coimbra was to celebrate an anniversary Mass in presence of the body, for the soul of him who had proscribed it and in the place where he had passed the last years of his life, disgraced, exiled and condemned to death. What a series of events was necessary to lead to this! I left Pombal scarcely sure if it were a dream or a reality. The presence of the coffin, the name of Sebastian pronounced in the prayer, the sound of all the bells of the parish, celebrating the return of the Society, and all this at the same time. I fully believe that the impression will never be effaced from my heart." (Alfred Weld, "Suppression of the Society in the Portuguese Dominions").

Nothing need be added, except that the descendant of that same Marquis de Pombal, during the recent repetition of the insensate acts of one hundred and fifty years ago, has done his best to atone for the wrongs done by his ancestor, and has incurred the ill will of the new persecutors by his defence of the Society.

A. T. SADLIER.

According to the Census the population of New York State is 9,113,279. This is a gain in the last decade of 1,844,385, or 25.4 per cent. In the preceding decade the increase was 1,271,041, or 21.2 per cent. New York easily retains its place as the first state in the Union in population. Under the apportionment of ten years ago New York increased its membership in the House of Representatives from thirty-four to thirty-seven. The same ratio would now entitle the Empire State to be represented in Congress by forty-seven members. In the last decade the growth in New York City was greater than in the rest of the State. The gain in the city was 1,139,681; the gain outside of the city was 515,704. For the first time New York City has a greater population than the rest of the state. The Empire State has more people than either Norway and Sweden, Denmark and Portugal, or Scotland and Ireland combined.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Catholics of Ecuador

III.

PLAYA RICA, ECUADOR.

Some time ago when leaving for abroad, the Sindico of our place, an old black man, asked me to bring him a crucifix which he might hang around his neck, so that, if in God's Providence anything should happen to him while in the forest, he would have no fear. It is really astonishing how these simple people contemplate death. I did not find just what I thought suitable for his purpose either in New York or in London. I had but little time to search. However, I did bring home a crucifix that the old black man might know I had not forgotten him. The cross I brought was appropriate to hang up in his home.

Upon my return he came to welcome me and, having finished his greetings, very brief, very respectful and very serious, as is the custom of these old black descendants of the slaves of the Spaniards—he said, "And now Patron, my Christo." Giving him the crucifix I explained how I was unable to bring him just what I had wished, adding that the cross I gave him would do, for the present, to hang in his house, and on my next journey abroad I would search again for one suitable to hang from his neck. Seeing a hat cord on my table, the old black asked if he might have it. I gave it to him, and, passing the cord through a ring at the top of the cross, he proceeded to fasten it about his neck. I remarked to him: "But it is too large and too heavy,"—it was sixteen inches long with a heavy brass cuerpo—"take it home and hang it up there, and on my next visit I will bring you one to wear." Knotting the cord behind his head, he looked at me and said, quietly and fervently: "Do you not know, Patron, Our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ carried a much larger and heavier cross than this for me? Surely, I can do this little for him."

Proudly he walked away with the crucifix over his bare breast; this bare-footed, white-haired, scantily-clad, old black patriarch.

As I sat on a bench on the Plaza Mayor, in Quito, last Good Friday, taking the sun, a fellow countryman, who was up there at the roof of the world to breathe the pure air into his wasted lungs, came and sat beside me. It was after 3 p. m., and the "Three Hours" had just been finished in the church. We watched the crowds for some time as they moved from one church to another on their visits to Los Monumentos, and remarked their religious fervor. Then this well-bred man, whose family name has honored our congressional halls of representatives and senators, and given weight to Cabinet councils and opinions which make the Supreme Court the most respected court of justice in the world, turned to me, and in an inquiring regretful manner remarked in his beautiful southern speech: "I say, of course, I know that Good Friday has some biblical connection, but I quite forget what it is." He was, I might add, a correspondent for a well-known and influential newspaper at home. But, who needs real instruction and enlightenment, my old Ecuadorian Negro, or the other?

I doubt if it is generally known that it is to South America we are indebted for the practice of the "Three Hours," which is in use in the Church to-day. Father Alfonso Mesia, a Peruvian, born in Lima, January 1st, 1665, and at one time superior of the Jesuits in Quito, it was, who first introduced the present day form of devotion. An Italian Franciscan in Italy in the Thirteenth Century had introduced the practice of calling the faithful together on Good Friday, to preach to them on our Saviour's agony, but the custom thus introduced was not in the form of the present "Three Hours."

Quito was the centre of a highly civilized race before the discovery of America. It was created an Episcopal See in 1540. This year is a memorable one in her history, for it was in 1540 that Pope Paul III founded by Bull, La Compañia, as the Society of Jesus is called down here. So willingly did the so-called Pope's Cavalry respond to the call of those days to foreign missions, that in 1740, as we are told by Vergara, they had civilized the fourth part of all New Granada. The New Granada of that time now comprises the three independent States of Venezuela, Colombia and Ecuador. When, in 1767, Carlos III, of Spain, expelled the Jesuits from all Spanish Territory, Quito supplied one hundred and sixty-three:—eighty-five priests and seventy-eight lay brothers—of the four hundred and seventy-five from the west coast of South America, who gathered in Carthagena to embark in the ship Fortuna for Europe.

In the Sala of the Cathedral in Quito may be seen most excellent portraits in oil of the long line of its Episcopal administrators; and among the early ones and well down into the mid-eighteenth century, in an upper corner of many of these paintings is seen a coat of arms representing one of the best families of the aristocratic old Castile. Across the street from the Cathedral, the Jesuits show a no less interesting collection of portraits of the Generals of the Order from their illustrious founder to the present day. The Augustinians, who are the oldest of all Orders, have a church and convent filled with objects of historical interest. The Dominicans possess a beautiful church with marvelous interior decorations in black, red and gold, and tiled right up to the roof with green and yellow tiles from Spain, brought over sea and up the Amazon by ship, and carried across country on the backs of peons to Quito. The poor Franciscans have in their library here some rare old manuscripts. Among these are writings of Duns Scotus who, they will tell you modestly, argued in favor of the Dogma of the Immaculate Conception six hundred years before Rome, in 1854, defined it to be an article of faith. In their church one sees a large-sized painting in oil depicting the first harvesting of wheat in the new world. In the lower right hand corner of the Cuadro appears an exact size image of the earthen urn in which the friars brought the seed wheat planted by them in the plaza in front of their church in 1530. The urn itself stood on the Epistle side of the altar in the sacristy for nearly three hundred years. They show one, to-day, the exact spot. But when the intrepid Prussian explorer, Baron Von Humboldt, arrived in Quito one hundred years ago, they gave the urn to him as a souvenir of his visit.

We know, too, that it was Quito that gave the first rubber to the civilized world, as well as that staple article of daily diet, the potato. Yes, there is much of interest materially, as well as historically, in Quito. But I particularly desire to point out one thing in conclusion: As a nation, we Americans are doing nothing to win the good will and friendship of the people of Ecuador. Do not think me strong if I say that we are thoroughly despised, if not hated by them, and who can blame them? One lot of our American people come here and without reason attempt to pull out by the roots most cherished principles of the Ecuadorian, and another lot come to ask for advantageous concessions on their own terms. Both classes make no effort to get close to the people of the country; they do not understand them. They show no sympathy for them, and they spread stories about them which a willing press at home listens to, not realizing that the tales are generally pure fabrications. Our American Government is little better. In all this vast territory from Panama to Patagonia, eight million square miles, populated by fifty millions of people, and divided into eleven independent States, our Government has not one minister of the Catholic Faith. Does it not appear that good diplomacy should suggest sending down here to represent us before these people, men in touch with them in religious faith? South Americans are a sensitive, spontaneous people, and they respond generously to kindness and considerateness.

When I began this letter I had not the remotest idea of letting my pen run along as it has, but so many things crowd themselves into my mind when I dwell on the situation here, and see what we Americans are losing through our own carelessness and negligence, that I have let myself out a bit.

D. C. STAPLETON.

Consecration to Our Lady of Guadalupe

CITY OF MEXICO, NOV. 19, 1910.

The most striking feature of the religious celebration of the completion of the first hundred years of Mexican independence was the renewal of the consecration of the republic to Our Lady of Guadalupe as Patroness of Mexico. It was in 1737, during the pontificate of Pope Clement XII, that the Viceroy of New Spain, Archbishop Juan Antonio de Vizarron y Eguiarreta, solemnly dedicated New Spain to Our Lady under the title so dear to the Mexican heart. Though the country has passed through many vicissitudes since then, her shrine, close to the capital, has never suffered from the ravages of riotous mobs or plundering officials. Her sacred picture, which is exposed in a massive frame of pure gold over the high altar, was crowned on October 12, 1895, when a number of American bishops made the journey to honor the occasion with their presence. The same date of this year was chosen by the Mexican hierarchy for a renewal of their formal protestation of filial trust in her intercession, a renewal which was graciously approved and blessed by Pope Pius X.

The sanctuary, which, by papal privilege, ranks with the Lateran basilica at Rome, was the scene of a remarkable demonstration of faith and piety on the eventful day. Three archbishops and seven bishops of the Mexican hierarchy were in the sanctuary, which, though spacious, was unable to accommodate the priests who had gathered from all parts of the republic; as for the faithful, only those who came early were able to crowd into the sacred edifice. After the sermon, which was delivered by the Governor of the Sacred Mitre, Don Antonio Paredes, the prelates knelt and recited the act of consecration, the faithful repeating it phrase by phrase. At its conclusion, all the bells rang out a glad peal and a park of artillery fired a salute. In the church itself, many of the congregation burst into sobs and tears. After the solemn Mass, roses were blessed and distributed to the congregation in memory of the miraculous roses that appeared on the barren hillside in December, 1531.

On October 30, the sodalities of the city held another celebration more particularly for their own members, who, to the number of about six thousand, assisted at a solemn Mass of thanksgiving and renewed their consecration to Our Lady. Doña Carmen Romero Rubio de Diaz, the wife of the President, was among the number. It is understood that on May 12, of the coming year, there will be a large gathering of the prelates of Latin America to renew with even greater solemnity the consecration of their dioceses to Our Lady of Guadalupe.

F. MODESTO.

After the Passion Play

Oberammergau, the world-famous Bavarian village, has resumed its wonted quiet, and the Passion play actors are enjoying a well-earned rest. There were in all fifty-six performances of the great drama, during the rush weeks of July and August there being as many as four performances a week. As each performance lasts eight hours, the physical strain on many of the performers was very great. This strain was increased by the continuous wet weather. On the majority of the play-days the performance was carried on in the rain, which was sometimes very heavy. The last performance was given on September 27, and on the 29th, the feast of St. Michael, the 700 performers made a pilgrimage of thanksgiving to the near by Benedictine monastery of Ettal, reciting the rosary on the way. A Mass of thanksgiving was celebrated in the beautiful abbey church, during which many of the pilgrims approached the Holy Table. The Lord Abbot of the monastery addressed the performers at the close of the service.

During the season the play was witnessed by 260,000 persons. The box-office receipts reached 1,680,000 German marks ($420,000). Of this amount 500,000 marks will be distributed among the players. The surplus, after the expenses of this year's performance are paid—and they are heavy—will be devoted to the charitable and municipal works of the village. Among the latter a prominent place must be given to the regulation of the Ammer, as the little river is called, that flows through the village, whose overflow during last June put a stop, happily only a short one, to the performances, but which threatened for a while to have much more serious consequences. There is a plan on foot also to rebuild the wooden portion of the great theatre in stone.

Apocryphal of the accusation sometimes brought against the Oberammergauers that they are more interested in the play for financial than for religious and artistic reasons, it may be remarked that a favorite Viennese actor, who died about the time of the last of this year's performances in Oberammergau, enjoyed an income of 200,000 ($40,000) Austrian crowns a year. Compare this with 500,000 marks (about 600,000 crowns) to be distributed among 700 Passion play actors! Most of the critics of Oberammergau apparently forget that for nearly a year the play had absorbed the major portion of the time and attention of the villagers, with a consequent financial loss, the recuperation from which no one can begrudge them. Nor can it be forgotten that there are "high prices" in Bavaria as well as in the United States.

Some idea of what it cost the Oberammergauers to serve suitable meals to their guests may be gathered from the fact that they had to pay 25 pfennigs (6 cents) a piece for fresh eggs. It remains true, however, that other enterprises profited financially through the Passion play, notably some in Munich, which city nearly all of the spectators visited. A very widely-distributed poster bore in big letters at its top "Oberammergau—Passion Play —1910." On looking below, one saw that about one-eighth of the space was given to the Passion Play; the rest urged the tourist not to miss various displays and exhibitions in Munich.

Jews Protest Against Nathan's Attack on the Holy Father

In an assembly of Jews, held in Berlin, on Oct. 6, a resolution was passed condemning in the strongest terms the speech of Rome's Jewish mayor against the Holy Father. The resolution professed the loyalty of the assembly to Judaism, but recognized that all positive creeds had an equal right to develop and to practise their beliefs, and esteemed the sincere convictions of their adherents. At the same time it disclaimed any sympathy with the attempts of agitators, whether Jews or not, who, under the pretence of being scientific or progressive, take every opportunity in the press and on the platform to attack and besmirch the sacredness of religion. In the same vein, wrote Dr. Phil. Arthur Sachs, a Jew and a professor at the University of Breslau, to the Schlesische Volkszeitung, paying at the same time a high tribute to the tolerance of the Catholic clergy and laity, and to the magnificence of the works of Catholic charity, and the high grade of learning among Catholic priests and university professors.

M. J. AHERN, S.J.

Rhodesia's Diamonds

In the year 1892, the British South Africa Company, which still governs Rhodesia, being short of working funds, borrowed £112,000 from the De Beers Diamond Company. Later on the De Beers corporation advanced another £100,000, making £212,000. The transaction was arranged by Mr. Rhodes, who was chairman of both companies, on terms most unfavorable to Rhodesia. Besides an interest of 6 per cent. on the money, the De Beers Company acquired certain preferential rights over the Rhodesian Railway, which saved it some £60,000 per annum in the matter of wood-transport for its mines at Kimberly, while an exclusive right was granted it to all diamonds to be found in the chartered company's territories. For many years Rhodesians, who hardly expected to find diamonds in their country, said little about the unfairness of the bargain, but as soon as diamond areas were discovered, and it became known that no one could dig up the stones without permission of the De Beers Company, they began to question the validity of the transaction. The affair was hotly debated in the press, on the public platform, and finally in the Legislative Council.

The British South Africa Company then agreed to test the legality of the monopoly in the English Courts. When the case was opened, the chartered company's counsel argued that the terms of the charter prohibited the creation of a monopoly, except for such public works as railways, telegraphs and the like, and that therefore the grant to De Beers was ultra vires. He argued further that the monopoly was invalid because it constituted a clog on the equity of the redemption of the plaintiff's property. Now the recognition by English Law of a clog on the equity of redemption seems to amount to this:—if the principal and the interest have been paid back, as they have in the present case, no further claim can legally be made. In Romano-Dutch Law, however, which holds in the South African State and in that part of Rhodesia, which lies South of the Zambesi, there is no such thing as a clog upon equity.

Last February, in giving his judgment on the case, Mr. Justice Swinfen-Eady, held that English Law governed the agreement, and that therefore the plaintiffs were entitled to their declaration, but without costs. The counter-claim he dismissed with costs. According to this decision, the agreement was void as a clog on equity, but the judge also held that it was not ultra vires, since, according to his ruling, the chartered company has the power to grant a monopoly over any part of its commercial rights and property if it so wishes. Hence, the people of Rhodesia, who based their hopes on the first contention, viz., that the contract was ultra vires, and thought very little about the second, have gained their point in an unexpected way.

There being so much doubt in the case, it was natural that the De Beers Company should take the case into the Appeal Court. This they accordingly did, but, on July 5, the judges of the higher court upheld the previous decision. A further appeal is now being made to the Privy Council, and the people of Rhodesia, who hope that diamonds will play an important part in the development of their country, are anxiously awaiting the result.

It is natural to suppose that, pending the final decision both holders of diamondiferous land and prospectors will be extremely cautious about communicating their knowledge to the world. They do not yet know the value of their property, since it is not yet decided whether their output will be regulated under the strictest limitations, or whether they will be free to compete with the De Beers Company in an open market. If the appeal is lost, the De Beers Company, which hitherto has held something like a monopoly of the world's diamonds, will probably lose their control over prices and be forced to increase their own output, besides stimulating that of other properties. Should the Rhodesian areas prove to be as productive as those of Kimberley, the result of free competition would probably be a considerable lowering of the price of diamonds throughout the world. The chief gainers by such a revolution would be Rhodesia itself, since its diamond fields would become the means of attracting an increase of population to assist in the general development of the country. The imperial interests at stake in the appeal are somewhat more remote. But Rhodesia expects, sooner or later, to join the South African union, and to join it on her own terms. If, at the date of her entry, she comes with a large increase of population, she may affect considerably the balance of parties in South Africa.

J. KENDAL, S.J.

Bulawayo, Rhodesia.

The cable announces the death in Rome, on November 24, of Alessandro, Cardinal Sanminiatielli-Zabarella, Cardinal-priest of the title of Sts. Marcellinus and Peter. He was born, August 4, 1840, at Radicondoli, Diocese of Volterra, Italy, and ordained priest in 1864. On July 31, 1874, he was elevated to the titular archbishopric of Thyane and made Grand Almoner to Pope Pius IX, in succession to Mgr. de Mérode. He was reserved in petto June 19, 1899, appointed Patriarch of Constantinople June 22, 1899, and proclaimed Cardinal April 15, 1901. There are now nineteen titles vacant in the College of Cardinals. It is stated that in his will the Cardinal has left $25,000 for the Mission for the protection of Italian immigrant girls to the United States and South America.

A M E R I C A

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1910.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 8d, 1879.

Copyright, 1910, and published weekly by The America Press, New York, President, THOMAS J. CAMPBELL; Secretary, MICHAEL J. O'CONNOR; Treasurer, J. J. WILLIAMS.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Sq., W., New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

Tolstoy

Count Leo Tolstoy, whose recent death, under circumstances peculiarly characteristic of the man and his life, has been the occasion of long panegyrics and superlative eulogies in the public press, was a foremost figure among so-called modern reformers. Like the reformers of the sixteenth century, the Russian writer was a "protestant"; but, whereas they protested against Catholic ecclesiasticism and teaching, Tolstoy carried the doctrine of protest and revolt to extremes which, without his literary art, would have made his mission ridiculous and harmless and created grave suspicions of his mental sanity.

That this is no hasty and gratuitous calumny, the offspring of mere prejudice, a reference to some of his principal beliefs will make sufficiently clear. He wrote vigorously for years in favor of what he called "non-resistance." If a man attempted to steal what belonged to you, you should not try to prevent him, for the ownership of any property is immoral and besides one of Christ's first laws is that you must not resent injury. Prisons, legal punishments, trials, judges, juries are all wrong and ought to be abolished. Organized government of every kind is pernicious. There should be no kings, presidents, senators, mayors or policemen. Marriage is a sin. Everyone is under the obligation of preserving virginal chastity. All religious creeds are shams. War for any reason whatsoever is a crime and everyone who takes part in it is a criminal. These are but a few of the tenets advanced seriously and repeatedly and most earnestly during a long life by the late Count Tolstoy. Even his ardent admirers have to admit his excesses in theorizing and to make apologies for his unpractical and absurdly irrational views.

Why, then, is such a man hailed the world over in dignified editorial utterances as a great apostle of humanity?

To simple and unspoiled minds the explanation is not an easy one to grasp. For one thing, Tolstoy was a master in the art of writing. He had the power of seizing upon a sore in modern society, studying it with microscopic vision and picturing it with a clarity and strength of phrase which compelled wide attention. This power goes a long way to explain what else would be a mystery. With this gift of keen observation and vivid portrayal the diary of a surgeon in the ulcer ward of a hospital could be made the most popular book in a dozen nations. Tolstoy had the gift; and he made it subserve the squinting and myopic deductions of an unsound brain from facts which he saw and described with remarkable graphic intensity.

Hence, his claim to our veneration, as put forward by his eulogists, is mainly threefold. First, he was a great artist; secondly, though his remedies for the ills of society were fantastic, still he has attracted attention to those ills and wakened the consciences of the rich, the selfish, and the sensual; and, thirdly, he strove to embody in his private life the principles of conduct which he wished to inculcate on others. As to the first of these claims we are at one with Tolstoy himself in believing that the art of any writer stands or falls according to the judgment that has to be passed on its content; and in our minds the content of Tolstoy's art is unquestionably pernicious. It is a denial of every law except a vague and altogether undefined "Divine Law" which Tolstoy frequently refers to and never formulates fully. Wherever Tolstoy's teachings have been carried out—and when has any quack needed followers?—they have invariably led to misery, unhappiness and tragedy. As for the contention that, in overshooting the mark, he has at least made it clearer for others to see and easier for them to hit, we must confess a lack of conviction. Exaggeration is always discrediting, and a whirling dervish among the conspicuous advocates of any good cause will inevitably injure that cause in the eyes of those who are best qualified to help it along.

The last of the claims put forward by Tolstoy's admirers, that he deserves respectful regard for his personal sincerity, can be urged only in a modified form. In his old age, it is true, he divested himself of his property, as Ruskin had done before him; but, unlike the latter, he tied a string to it by transferring it to his wife and children. Furthermore, he found it easy to practice his non-resistance by shifting upon others the crime of protecting him from its obvious disadvantages. We do not deny, however, a large measure of sincerity to the man; but it seems to us that sincerity, as such, is not necessarily an object of reverence. Sincerity ceases to be a virtue when it has said farewell to reason, prudence and discretion. A mad-house, it is conceivable, may offer more striking instances of sincerity than a university. Tolstoy's sincerity is uttered in accents that continually suggest the fanatic and the madman. It is strange to reflect that the world, which so admires the renunciations practised by Tolstoy, has nothing but contempt and ridicule for those that have been practised so often in a saner spirit in the life of the Catholic Church.

A Father of the Church has pointed out that for personal perfection self-spoilation is not enough; for even Crates, a pagan philosopher, disencumbered himself of all earthly luggage. We must, in addition, follow Christ. Tolstoy, indeed, took the lesson to himself and professed to be a follower of Christ. But the Christ, whom he followed, was one of his own devising. To the Russian novelist Christ was not divine, but only a man like Socrates or Buddha. Tolstoy rejected the Christ of the Gospels wherever Christ did not agree with him. He felt amply capable of understanding Christ for himself and he brooked no instruction on the subject from outside sources. Tolstoy was, for all his mujik's dress and humble self-denials, preeminently a proud man. He labored hard and with skill, but a spirit of insane pride breathes through all his work. That is why it will never lead anywhere. It ended for him in the confusion of his own soul. It survives him to work confusion and despair in the souls of those who in the valley of darkness hail the voice of every new prophet.

Turning from Diaz

It is not sixty days since the elaborate exercises in honor of the first hundred years of the independence of Mexico were brought to a triumphant and almost dramatic close. The whole month of September was a round of celebrations, commemorations and inaugurations, one after another; every foreign country of importance commissioned special representatives to honor Mexico in her year of jubilee. And now, when the last echoes of the centenary have hardly died away, the muttering and rumbling of revolt is heard in widely separated parts of the republic; the secret police are active; bodies of troops are hurried to exposed points; imitating the action of Diaz himself in 1876, Mexican revolutionists are about to hurl themselves across the border from their rallying points in Texas and Arizona. Sudden and violent is the change, yet the suddenness is largely on the surface.

In our opinion, the aged President did not know when to quit. He has made Mexico. What was the neighboring republic when the revolutionist Porfirio Diaz took up arms against President Benito Juárez and his two immediate successors, Lerdo de Tejada and Iglesias? At home, Juárez ruled the country as he might have ruled the few bucks and squaws of his native village; abroad, the government was discredited. What Juárez might have done to restore the prestige of his country, we do not know, for he was taken away almost suddenly by a fatal malady at the time his former pupil at Oajaca and his most efficient military leader was in open war against him. Thus did Porfirio Diaz gallop up to the presidential chair. Utterly sick of warfare, wasted fields, highwaymen and kidnappers, the people welcomed him and changed the Constitution a few times to please him and retain him in office. He responded to their hopes and expectations. Mexico began to thrive. Foreign capital came in, because under Diaz it was safe; valuable concessions were granted to the foreigners who came to develop Mexico's immense buried wealth, to make the country more prosperous, and, incidentally to enrich themselves. The people murmured, for they thought that the best of everything was rapidly passing into the hands of Englishmen, Germans, and especially Yankees; but the strong arm of Diaz was at the helm and the threatened storm subsided.

Diaz was growing old. A man born in 1830 is no longer a youth in 1904. He wanted a vice-president, and the people obligingly made room for one in the Constitution. Long tenure of office made the old man eager to name the vice-president and obstinate in sticking to his choice. Again the people fretted, but he had his way, and Corral of Sonora was duly elected for a term of six years. Corral was not well liked nor favorably known, still he was the old man's fairhaired boy and that had to suffice.

When the presidential election of 1910 approached, General Bernardo Reyes, then Governor of Nuevo Leon, was loudly acclaimed as the next vice-president; but, as is commonly the case, advancing years had made the aged President even less supple in his limbs and in his will, and he clamored for Corral as children cry for some favorite plaything. Reyes, dashing, gallant soldier that he was, seeing that valor's best part was discretion, resigned and slipped off to Europe. He went with a government appointment to spend plenty of time in studying the cinches used in the French army, or words to that effect.

Francisco I. Madero offered himself to a small but admiring group as a candidate for the presidency and began to deliver campaign speeches. He was charged with inciting the people to sedition and was lodged in jail, where he spent election day. After seven weeks as a guest of the Government, he was released on bail, and was finally told to go in peace, if he would leave the country. He went to San Antonio, Texas, it is said, and there found some malcontents who had preceded him. The present activities are inspired by him, if common report be trusted, and their object is not so much to depose poor old General Diaz, who is traveling so speedily towards the setting sun, as it is to oust the unpopular heir apparent, the hated Corral. What lasting glory would have been that of Diaz if he had recognized the signs of the times and had gracefully bowed himself off the stage while the audience was still good-natured, or at least tolerant! For a time he was necessary; for a longer time, he fancied he was necessary; the people waited for him to outgrow the childish hallucination, but they waited to little purpose. And now, in bitterness of heart, he hears the hurrah of yesterday changed into the curse of to-day. His dream of greatness has outlasted the real greatness that once was his. God is necessary; any man's place can easily be supplied. This, the regenerator of his country, the "maker of modern Mexico" may now begin to realize.

Base Proselytism

The Most Rev. Archbishop Szeptychi, Primate of Austrian Galicia, has been visiting his co-religionists, the Galicians in Western Canada. He is incensed, as all right-minded men should be, at the tactics employed by Protestants to destroy the faith of the Ruthenian Catholics, who in large numbers have lately settled in the rapidly-developing Canadian Northwest. The Archbishop, in his response to a statement of the Rev. Mr. E. D. MacLaren, of the Presbyterian Board of Missions, does not, according to press reports, mince matters and appeals to Canadians at large for protection.

"We had been told," says the Archbishop, "that our people were being made the prey of evangelicals, but it really required a personal visit to assure ourselves of the extent of the evil. I find their mission societies paying anybody who can speak their language to celebrate a bogus Mass, hear confessions, administer the Sacraments and, strangest of all, openly and publicly, so that the deception might be more complete, pray fervently for our Holy Father the Pope. It is a great shame. Good, honest Protestants are more consistent than to do it. It may destroy religion in our people where they have not their own priests and rite, but it will make them unbelievers and in the end ruin them as citizens.

"Canada should not permit this. We want our people to be good citizens, good Christians and good Canadians, and therefore they should not be proselytized. Why, I know of a case where a Russian Jew was paid to go through the terrible mockery of a Mass in order to delude the people."

The Mutiny at Rio de Janeiro

"Frankenstein" is an almost forgotten romance. It told how a philosopher formed a monster of super-human size and gave it life by his secret arts. Things went well enough until the monster learned its strength. Then it revolted against its maker and became his master without conscience and cruel beyond conception. The story was a parable of future things: we, to-day, begin to see the reality.

For more than a hundred years the whole process of what men call social progress has involved the degradation of legitimate authority, parental, political and supernatural, so that the chronically rebellious spirit is the pride of Modernism.

Those who imagine themselves the controllers of modern society, would be glad to restrict this spirit to their own circle. But they cannot do so. It permeates every grade of society, and has got into armies and navies. This is bad enough, but the perfecting of destructive mechanical agents and their concentration, so that a single ship or a single battery is a menace to a whole city, increase the danger incalculably.

A few weeks ago the Portuguese fleet, not a formidable one, turned its guns on Lisbon and accomplished a revolution. No doubt the sailors were astonished at the power in their hands and the ease with which they exercised it. Their officers, it is true, were with them, but this was not necessary for their success. Had the case been otherwise, they could have done what they did. A great Brazilian battleship was in the Tagus at the time. Its crew learned the object lesson under their eyes, and have not been slow to practise it. Hardly had they reached home when they and the crew of the sister ship rose in revolt, slew a captain and several officers, turned their tremendous guns on Rio de Janeiro and informed the government that they would open fire unless their demands were granted. These were simple enough: more pay, less work, no corporal punishment. To hasten matters a shot was every now and then fired into the city. The government had no choice. It granted the demands and the senate passed an amnesty bill. One of the chief men in the state carried the news to the mutineers, who replied that they would take their own time to surrender. The last news is that they have hauled down the red flag and received new officers, and that there is a general feeling of uneasiness in Rio de Janeiro. The best way to remove this is to revive the ideas of authority and obedience.

Governmental Service

In view of complaints sometimes urged that an apparent discrimination is being exercised against Catholics of this country in the matter of holding public office, it may be just as well to recall a fact not sufficiently noted. If our co-religionists have failed to secure a due proportion of offices in the various departments of the government, they are largely themselves to blame. The Civil Service system has been extended so far in this country as to include positions paying salaries as high as $4,000 in many branches of our government, and these positions are open to competition. The Consular Service is now on a Civil Service basis, and almost all the positions in the Forestry division and in our Insular possessions as well. The secretaries of our embassies and legations are now appointed after examinations. We think it advisable that our Catholic colleges should have departments for the guidance and instruction of pupils who are ambitious for a career in the government service. In the Catholic schools of the British Empire classes for pupils wishing to compete for the Civil Service are a leading feature. In France, too, and Belgium, the Catholic youth find opportunity in Catholic schools to fit themselves for examinations required before entrance into governmental service.

The National Civil Service Board in Washington will, it is known, gladly furnish information to those interested in this subject.

A Protestant Bishop on Unity

A bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church comforted his hearers lately by telling them that their denomination is the keystone of American Christianity; and he proved his assertion as follows: "The keystone holds up the arch. Our Church stands between the Protestant sects with their numbers and vigor on one hand, and the Greek and Roman communions, with their great organization and overloaded dogma on the other hand, and hopes to bring about a union which God himself can appreciate."

This Protestant bishop knows nothing about arches, but he does not hesitate to speak about what he does not understand. Tell a builder to construct an arch with two huge boulders on one side, and a lot of stones of different sizes and shapes on the other, and he will laugh in your face. The stones in an arch must be of definite size and shape, which must be determined by their mutual relations and the character of the structure. Hand the builder a pudding-stone, small and of no particular form, and say: "Here is the keystone with which you will overcome all difficulties arising from want of adaptability in the other stones," and he will take you for a madman.

That the keystone holds up the arch is a popular notion with just enough truth in it to be allowed to pass uncontradicted. But the combined inward pressures of the stones on both sides are transmitted to the keystone, which must be sufficiently solid to resist the crushing effect. For this something more than the consistency of a pudding-stone, part clay, part pebbles of different kinds, is necessary. Moreover, opposite to the inward pressure is the outward thrust, which tends to spread the arch and cause its collapse. Unless one assumes that in the arch of American Christianity this thrust is overcome by an overpowering attraction of the keystone for each of the elements, that is of the Protestant Episcopal Church for the other denominations, it must be resisted by buttresses. The assumption would be absurd, since the repugnance of every religious body for Episcopalianism, is evident. As for the buttresses, the bishop never thought of them.

Why should the Church in its unity be compared to an arch, unless to flatter Episcopalian vanity? An arch is a difficult thing to understand. Our Lord uses the comparison of a fold, something very easy to understand. But its idea is not a pleasant one, implying as it does, limits, restrictions, subjection to authority, things not agreeable to flesh and blood. Still these are the conditions of unity established by Christ; and therefore the only kind God can approve, notwithstanding the Episcopalian bishop's fancy that He would appreciate the arch, is the unity of the fold.

SOME FRIENDS OF MINE.

III.

THE NOTARY.

He is a many-sided man. In our village he is the wise man par excellence. Whenever any one of us is in a difficulty about law or property, he straightway seeks out the Notary and comes back satisfied. He has never been admitted to the Bar, nor does he accept money for his advice, but in a long business life demanding an accurate knowledge of many obscure topics the Notary has picked up an amount of legal lore that would do credit to a first-class counsellor.

Years ago he attended a famous school and delights to talk about it and the notables with whom he has been on terms of intimacy. He religiously attends his class reunions and the commencements of his college and never fails to come back as pleased as a bridegroom returning from a honeymoon. He belongs to all sorts of fraternal organizations and goes all over the State to their junketings. His experience at various country hotels would make a book.

The Notary has never been robust; all his folks have succumbed to consumption and he lives alone in a great, empty house tenanted, it would seem, by scores of ghosts. He is always well wrapped up and careful of warmth, for the spectre is ever before his eyes. I can look out almost any day and see him plodding purposefully along, a clean cut, ascetic figure, somewhat beyond the middle height, a bit bent now, but withal a handsome man and one you would instinctively trust. He is not an emotional person and speaks in a cool, impersonal way. There is in his manner a hint of those inimitable legal worthies whom the Wizard of the North has sketched for the enjoyment of the world, a little stately, a little distant, but so solidly reliable!

He has a sly and distinctly New England humor. It is a classic to hear him relate a story of some duel of wits with the numerous crusty characters about the village. The finest joke never raises more than a wintry smile, but you can be sure he is laughing internally.

I believe it to be a characteristic of great men to be careless of accidentals. Grizzled generals plan a campaign in a tent as well as in the War Office. Railroad magnates who command skilled armies are equally at home before rosewood desks or plain pine telegraph tables. For them the main thing is the business to be done. So the Notary is no stickler for luxury though he can well afford it. He does all the insurance and conveyancing for miles around, yet he has no office except the rear of an ancient store. In the very heart of the village is a block of venerable buildings that are well on to the century mark. They all have glass bay windows that stick out into the street like the stomachs of corpulent aldermen and the tide rises and falls about the timbers at the rear. In one of these is the Notary's business office. It is an ancient dry goods store which came down to him as a legacy from his father. In the shelves and on the counters are garments and furnishings that would provide for a masquerade ball of the period of the sixties. He never seems to sell anything or to be anxious about selling, but if you find the door open and proclaim an intention of buying he will patiently show you what there is. He is forever talking of closing up the business but never gets around to it. I fancy he would be rather lost if he had not this long, dim store to come to and the familiar boxes and bundles all around him.

Often as I go through the village in the later afternoon or evening I look through the plethoric bay-windows and see in the dim back of the old shop the thin figure of the Notary with his overcoat buttoned to the chin, writing busily at a small table. It always causes me to think I have stepped out of real life back into those queer days that Scott and Dickens tell of; that I am not surveying a commonplace scene in an ordinary town, but have come upon the original of a famous story. Nor does the illusion vanish when I enter and the Notary looks up and bids me welcome, for the pale, intellectual face in the ghostly surroundings seems utterly fantastic and part of a dream. But when I put together all I know about the Notary I come to recognize that he is as interesting and as unexpected as any character drawn by a novelist. He keeps a store and cares little whether he sells goods or not. He gives advice and gets for it nothing but thanks. He lives in a house that belongs in a story book, and goes up and down the village doing good turns for people precisely as if he were a prince incognito playing benevolent tricks for his own amusement.

But while I am entertaining myself with these fancies the Notary cleans his pen carefully, straightens up and rising steps over to the stove as if he were about to disclose some dark secret. He opens the stove door slowly and methodically deposits in its interior a bit of tobacco juice and returning, seats himself and prepares to talk. He is the most unaccountable of men. A few evenings ago I called upon him and he recited poetry, most of the time enjoying himself hugely. His conversation is never hurried; he always waits until his ideas are marshalled and ready for utterance. Strangers accustomed to clapt syllables and the rapid-fire talk of the street might find this a bit annoying, but it is worth while to wait, for the Notary is a man of wide reading and a well-stored mind.

The one great outstanding fact about the Notary is his bed-rock reliability. There is no dearth of intelligent men in the village, but one never knows when they are not playing some game of their own; you feel they are looking out for themselves at all events, but once the Notary assures you of a thing you know you are on solid ground. He is as incorruptible as the Law. On this account he has built up a large business and I find that many of our summer residents are in constant correspondence with him about their interests and investments. Surely an absolutely honest man is a friend to cherish and grapple to. We have all found it out, and as a result the Notary is a very busy man.

I have often wondered that he is not cynical and embittered. He has always been sickly, lived in a small town though familiar with great cities, never known wife or child, yet he is a good companion and even-tempered. I have never enjoyed the pleasure of dining with the Notary or partaking with him a friendly glass, but I am sure he would lift some rare old vintage with all the grace of an old-time connoisseur, that in fact, taking a drink with him would be a function and one who witnessed it would say, after the fashion of the immortal old lady who lifted Sir Willoughby Patterne from the depths of the conventional: "He has a manner."

The Notary is a Democrat, neither fierce nor enthusiastic, but as a matter of heritage and conviction. His father was one of the old-line Democrats of the state, when the party amounted to something here. Time and circumstances have made no difference to him; he attends all the conventions as a matter of duty, seeming to care little how the election goes so long as he has done his part. He speaks of Mr. Cleveland with a reverence that does himself and that illustrious man much credit. They would have been great friends.

The Notary and the Doctor are inseparables. If you mention one to the other you may be prepared for a eulogy. It is rather pleasant to witness such stalwart friendship in these days when men barter so much for a dollar or the expectation of an office. These two veterans go off together to a ball game with the glee of college boys and come back to tell of the heroic performances of some famous pitcher or batsman. They have never learned to grow old.

The Notary is a Methodist and pays his dues religiously, but he is no ranter; his understanding and sympathies are too catholic for such a narrow, hectic creed. I imagine he would say if I asked him: "I am a conservative Methodist."

One of these days the grim Reaper will gather him in and I do not think our townsmen realize what a gap he will leave. We have all learned to depend upon him and accept his decisions as final. I fear he will leave no successor. I fear much there will never be another who will dispense sane advice and good law with such a pleasant smile, who will be so ready to crack a joke and then turn to the serious business at hand. When he goes before the Great Court, I hope the Judge will find the weight of his long years of ceaseless kindness tipping the scale on any undogmatic leanings on the other side, for he has been a power for good all his life.

CHARLES W. COLLINS.

LITERATURE

My Mark Twain. By WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS. New York: Harper & Brothers. Price, $1.40 net.

Mr. Howells divides his book into two parts; the first, containing his reminiscences of the late humorist, covering a period of forty-five years; the second, a reproduction of his criticisms of Mr. Clemens as a writer. It is unnecessary to state that the interest of the book is mainly confined to its first part. In this portion of the volume a skilled and observant craftsman gives us the impressions, that remain in his memory, of a friendship and boon fellowship that endured for more than half a life-time. The sense of loss and of the imminence of death pervades these pages and gives them a poignant sincerity and directness which are not the ordinary characteristics of Mr. Howells's style. Deep and genuine affection, hinted at in the possessive pronoun of the book's title, breaks down the fortifications of debonaire philosophy and aimless speculation which Mr. Howells usually erects between himself and his readers. For this reason, aside from the interest attached to his subject, these few pages of rambling reminiscences by a distinguished veteran in American letters have a value that one may not always attach to the author's more elaborate and finished works.

As for the subject of these memories the picture of the man which these pages unfold is not substantially different from what his writings themselves suggest. Honesty was a conspicuous trait of Mr. Clemens's character; but it was that kind of rather obtrusive honesty which distinguishes self-opinionated and ill-informed men. Mr. Clemens's moral and religious ideals were the crude and elementary ones of a frontier town of the west; with these he was satisfied and he was always honest in acting up to them. But like most men, a little over-conscious of their honesty, he was sometimes too quick to see shams and discovered them often in the heart-deep sincerities of millions of his fellowmen.

This was especially true in his attitude towards religion in general and towards the Catholic Church in particular. His unwarranted confidence in his own conclusions kept him from approaching religious truth in an humble spirit of enquiry. He never quite succeeded in seeing organized religious society from any other point of view than that of a rough mining camp, where a few natural virtues do service as a complete expression of spiritual life. This defect in his outlook was the secret of his literary success. He reduced everything to the low average of an incipient civilization. He translated life into the terms of the prospectors' camp or the pilot-house of an ante-bellum steamboat. Mr. Howells is unconsciously amusing in the horror with which he recalls a certain occasion when Longfellow, Holmes, and Emerson were made, to their very faces and at a public dinner, the unappreciative objects of this peculiar irreverence of the humorist. What strikes the Catholic reader in the account of this incident is the fact that it was considered such atrociously bad taste by men who applauded the same humor when exercised at the expense of persons and institutions far more sacred than the three New England pundits.

J. J. D.

Melchior of Boston. By MICHAEL EARLS, S.J. New York: Benziger Brothers. Price, $1.00.

This is a story about a non-Catholic man of business living in Boston, his Catholic wife and his son Kevin, who went to a Catholic school, not to mention Kevin's younger brother and sisters, and a number of interesting minor characters. The central theme is the difference of faith between the parents, surely a serious problem; but the adjustment of religious sixes and sevens is worked out through Kevin and a Christmas mystery play, so that we are uncertain to whom the novel will be more interesting, the children or the grown-ups.

The narrative of the play, which is woven into the tale very cleverly, is itself a story within a story and is made to unite the present with the distant past in an identity of spiritual experience. The author indicates the somewhat startling synthesis in his title with its commingled suggestion of the ancient and the new. But we can assure the reader that it has all been done without straining or unnatural effort. The college gives a Christmas play; one of the principal characters in it falls sick at the last minute, a tragic situation for any professor who has charge of a college play (but this professor keeps his head in a most remarkable fashion); a "ringer," a rank outsider, comes to the rescue; but in the present instance all the odium falls upon the "ringer" in the eyes of his narrow associates. How the play comes off and what happened to the "ringer" is all told in the book with a light and deft touch. The story gathers momentum rather slowly; but after it strikes its gait it proceeds nimbly and is breathless enough. This is, we believe, the author's first long story, and we congratulate him on his success and hope he will make more sorties into the field of Catholic fiction.

J. J. D.

Our Lady's Lutenist. By the REV. DAVID BEARNE, S.J. New York: Benziger Bros.

"Our Lady's Lutenist" is a collection of stories and pious legends, all of them very edifying, all of them written in good English, all of them having a certain unity, inasmuch as they are all narratives of the brave days of old, although it would seem that Father Bearne is addressing himself to different audiences—sometimes to children, and sometimes to older people. The last story of the set, "The Miller's Son," is as perfect a Catholic short story as one could find. The little volume will make for higher ideals and a more Catholic spirit.

F. J. FINN, S.J.

The Old Mill on the Withrose. By REV. HENRY S. SPALDING, S.J. New York: Benziger Bros. Price, 85 cents.

If a boy wishes to add some very desirable names to his list of friends, let him make the acquaintance of the young Kentuckians whom Father Spalding introduces. Why is it that the boy in a story book is so often of an extreme type? He is either too good to live or too clever to live long or too mean to live at all. But here we have boys, just boys, natural enough to be human. The local color is not confined to Mr. Robert Lindon, who could hardly be found on the right bank of the Ohio, but there are royal sports to which no State less favored than Kentucky can lay any claim. Fishing and gunning and snaring call up pleasant memories in the sober grown-up and fire the youngster's fancy. Even now we recall a young Bostonian who, thanks to the help of a Kentuckian, successfully snared a rabbit. It had died a week or two before. Then we have "moonshiners" and night riders and secret service men, to thrill us while we hope for the best and fear the worst. But where is the Kentucky boy old enough to talk, who would discuss illicit stills with a stranger as young Hunter does at the Mammoth Cave? Let us have some more Kentucky scenes and people sketched by the same sympathetic hand. * * *

History of the Telugu Christians. By a Father of the Mill Hill St. Joseph's Society. Trichinopoly, British India: St. Joseph's Industrial School Press. Price, one rupee.

Published with the approbation of the venerable Metropolitan of Madras, Archbishop Colgan, this little book of some three hundred pages gives an account of the labors of the early Jesuit missionaries in the east-central part of what is now British India. The history covers a period of less than a hundred years, and traces the trials and triumphs of the missionaries in their own words as taken from their reports to their superiors and their letters to friends and benefactors in Europe.

This mission was undertaken at the end of the seventeenth century under the auspices of Louis XIV of France, but before it had rounded out a century the Jesuits were suppressed and the promising field was abandoned. Since Portuguese vessels would not carry French missionaries and French vessels rarely sailed to that distant region, the French Jesuits traced out a route of their own across Persia and often profited by the kindness of English shipmasters to help them on their way.

As might be expected, the book contains many edifying instances of heroic constancy among the converts, who often suffered grievous hardships for the Faith. The missionaries also acquaint us with many details of the social customs of the people among whom they labored.

A very complete index and a map of British India are included in the book. Whoever feels even a faint interest in the work of the foreign missions may profitably read this unpretentious little volume. * * *

Sermons of St. Bernard on Advent and Christmas, Including the Famous Treatise on the Incarnation, called "Missus Est," with Introduction by the Rt. Rev. J. C. Hedley, O.S.B., Bishop of Newport. New York, Cincinnati, Chicago: Benziger Bros. 12mo, net 75 cents.

St. Bernard was an elegant speaker and a prudent counselor, but he was above all a man of God, one whom no worldly occupation or concern could draw away from a holy intimacy with things divine. His book "De Consideratione," composed for the guidance of Pope Eugene III, has been the text book for many a pontiff, and his sermons have been an incentive to many in a less exalted station. Nineteen sermons have been translated from his strong and vigorous Latin speech into an English that seems to preserve, even in its modern dress, more than a suggestion of the saint of the twelfth century. Above all things, the note struck by the holy Benedictine abbot rings true. He leads us by the hand through the pleasant groves and up the lofty heights where contemplation finds spiritual food and refreshment, and we need have no fear that while under his guidance we may possibly wander from the way of the saints into the quaggy forests or over the perilous cliffs of questionable or mistaken spirituality. The price of the book is no indication of its great worth, and, we may add, no indication of the immense labor involved in the accommodating to our English tongue the piety, the fervor and the spiritual enlightenment contained in these outpourings of the heart of the "Mellifluous Doctor" of Clairvaux. * * *

BOOKS RECEIVED

Heroes of California. By George Wharton James. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. Net $2.00.
Twenty Years at Hull-House. By Jane Addams. New York: The Macmillan Co. Net $2.50.

History of the Telugu Christians. By a Father of the Mill Hill St. Joseph's Society. Trichinopoly, Br. India: St. Joseph's Industrial School Press.

The Lectionary. Its Sources and History. By Jules Baudot, Benedictine. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net $1.00.

The History of the Passion. Revised Edition. By James Groenings, S.J. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net $1.25.

A Life's Ambition. (Ven. Philippine Duchesne 1769-1852). By M. T. Kelly. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net 35 cents. (Reviewed in AMERICA, October 8).

The Making of Jim O'Neill. A Story of Seminary Life. By M. J. F. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net 35 cents. (Reviewed in AMERICA, October 8).

German Publication

Die Leidensgeschichte. Unseres Herrn Jesu Christi. Von Jakob Grönings. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net $1.25.

Pamphlets, Etc.

Old Christianity vs. New Paganism. By Rev. Bernard J. Otten, S. J. St. Louis: B. Herder. Net 25 cents.

Calendar of the Blessed Sacrament. New York: The Sentinel Press.. 185 East 76th Street. Net 25 cents; by mail 30 cents.

EDUCATION

In the sixteenth annual report which Monsignor P. R. McDevitt, Superintendent of the archdiocesan schools, recently made to Archbishop Ryan of Philadelphia, certain paragraphs occur which deserve the widest circulation. The Monsignor speaks frankly regarding school conditions. Thus noting the "widespread belief, whether based on truth or not does not here call for comment, that the elementary schools of the country, both public and private are not fulfilling the mission for which they were established," the report is not slow to urge some practical remedies for the ills complained of:

"There must be an adequate preparation of teachers on the part of the teaching religious communities, and this must be met with just and reasonable conditions in the schools. Overcrowded classes and badly constructed and poorly ventilated school buildings exhaust the vitality of teachers, neutralize their efficiency and render fruitless even the most earnest and energetic efforts."

Speaking on the necessity for playgrounds for the children, it says:

"Inseparably associated with those things already named is the consideration of the child's physical well-being, especially in the congested centres of population. The inter-relation of the moral, intellectual and physical life of the child demands the development of each. In the rural districts and smaller towns, where the woods and the fields are within easy reach, the child-pupil has opportunity for the exercises that develop a healthy mind and body; but in the large centres of population the child must turn to the streets to indulge those play instincts which are such a vital part in the formation of his moral character and the preservation of his bodily health.

"Simple and plain instruction on hygiene should be given in the schools, and since medical care given early in life will do much to save children from the disastrous consequences which arise from the neglect to provide treatment before diseases become chronic and incurable, the attention of parents should be called to defects in the child's hearing and sight."

* * *

One is glad, too, to find again in Monsignor McDevitt's report the strong note which won for his report of last year, the unqualified praise of Catholics generally. Touching the question of citizens guarding their rights in the educational field against the inroads of sectarian bodies, the Right Reverend Superintendent of Philadelphia's Catholic schools says:

"There are those who speak and act as if our rights as citizens were privileges, which won for his report of last year the cording to the tolerant or intolerant spirit of the institutions of the land. We should not allow such individuals to remain under any delusion. Firmly and unmistakably we should make them understand that while we ask no favors, we will not submit to injustice nor tolerate encroachment upon our rights as individual members of the Commonwealth; that we exist in virtue of no special immunity, we hold our rights by no man's allowance."

* * *

Nor does the Monsignor fail to make use of the opportunity which the preparation of his annual report affords to accentuate a point to which Catholics are beginning to devote serious attention. The documents presented to the Archbishop by his superintendent show that in the scholastic year of 1909-10 the number of pupils in the archdiocesan schools increased from 62,381 to 62,834. It were easy to compute the immense outlay of money this involves for school buildings, school equipment, teachers' salaries and the many incidental expenses up-to-date school management demands. Monsignor McDevitt makes no idle boast then, when he affirms:

"If at any moment the Catholics of Philadelphia decided to close their elementary schools and send their children to the public schools for that education which our constitutional rights guarantee, and for which they are paying their quota of taxation, and to divert to the establishment and maintenance of a university the millions they are now spending in the support of Catholic education, there would arise at once an institution of learning that would take its place among the foremost of the world."

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

William Michael Byrne, formerly United States District Attorney for Delaware and more recently an Assistant United States Attorney in New York, has sent a telegram to President Taft protesting against a hasty recognition of the new republic of Portugal. Mr. Byrne is a staunch Republican and believes implicitly in the principles of representative government. He is not sure, however, that the people had anything to do with the inauguration of the new régime in Portugal, and until this fact is ascertained to a certainty he desires that any action looking to a recognition of the new Government be deferred. This is Mr. Byrne's telegram to President Taft:

THE PRESIDENT, WASHINGTON, D. C.:

Sir:—New York newspapers report resolutions of Republican Club here asking you to recognize the Republic of Portugal. What's the hurry? Does the present régime obtain its power to govern from the consent of the governed? Why not wait for a referendum of this question to the Portuguese people? Is it a reason for recognition that the cabal of doctrinaires now on top in Portugal stained their power in its birth by the blood of priests and Sisters? Are they safe guardians of liberty who make war on Sisters of Charity—a sisterhood that in our hour of civil anguish floated like angels over every American battlefield? I desire to see self-government supreme the world over; but it must be self-government of the American brand, built on the twin pillars of liberty and justice. Such self-government I hope to see extend to Ireland, to Egypt, to India. What the priests and Sisters of Portugal claim is what your ancestors, the Puritans claimed—the right to worship God in the form of religion which they deemed it agreeable to adopt. The Puritans were persecuted, not because they worshipped God, but because that worship took a peculiar form. Rather than submit to an invasion of their right to follow their own form of worship, your ancestors endured exile and braved the dangers of an unknown land. For insisting on that same right of formal worship in the twentieth century, the Portuguese priests and Sisters are shot to death by the ruling cabal in Portugal. Other nations are pausing before recognition. Millions of American citizens confidently rely in this matter on that equipoise of character which has won for you the admiration of your countrymen.

As a citizen, American born, and since my majority a member of the Republican party, I protest against haste in so grave a matter.

WILLIAM MICHAEL BYRNE.

SOCIOLOGY

According to the Univers Israélite, there are in the entire world 11,817,783 Jews. Of these nearly half, 5,110,548 are in Russia. Nearly one-tenth of the total number of Jews are in New York, which has the largest Jewish population of any city, viz., 1,162,000. Warsaw, with only 254,712, comes next to New York. Outside New York there are only 732,000 Jews in the whole western hemisphere. London has only 144,300 Jews.

The Congestion of Population Commission asked Commissioner Chadwick of the Board of Water Supply, New York, how it is that the laborers on the Catskill Aqueduct are all recent immigrants instead of being drawn from the "army of the unemployed." He answered that it is because the unemployed will not take the work. The commission suggested that they would not take the work at the wages given. Mr. Chadwick acknowledged that this had something to do with it, but added that the wages are $1.50 to $1.75 a day for which he could get all the labor he wished in the city, but the American laborer will not go to the country. We would suggest that a glance at "the army of the unemployed" shows that its members are as a rule incapable of the work the robust immigrant makes nothing of. The physically fit American can, as a rule, get all the work he wants in town, and naturally chooses it. Such as the towns have made unfit cannot work with pick, spade and shovel, even though they were willing to do so. The problem is a more difficult one than it appears at first sight.

The Hindus in the United States are petitioning the Viceroy of India to see that they are protected in their rights as British subjects, which, they hold, give them the right to enter the British dominions when and where they please. They complain that this right is not recognized by Canada, which persists in excluding them.

In an English court lately Mr. Justice Darling made some very interesting remarks. A gentleman had borrowed a considerable sum from a loan office trading under the name of "Fortescue." Though he had repaid an amount equal to the principal, plus 25 per cent. interest, the debt was still undischarged. He refused to pay any more and "Fortescue" sued him. The proprietor of the loan office turned out to be a person of the name Cohen. "Who is 'Fortescue'?" asked the Judge. "There is no 'Fortescue,'" answered Mr. Cohen, "it is my 'trade name.'" "'Fortescue' is not a trade name," said Mr. Justice Darling, "it is a noble name and has been such for centuries. Something ought to be done to prevent persons bearing such names as 'Cohen' from using in their business names of the nobility to deceive the unwary." He then dismissed the case.

The eleventh annual meeting of the National Civic Federation will be held in New York City on January 12, 13, 14, next. The chief topics of discussion will be the regulation of corporations and combinations of railways and municipal utilities, compensation for industrial accidents and arbitration and conciliation. The idea of the Federation is to bring together men from all parties and classes for the consideration of the topics that are agitating the economic world, and for this purpose its executive committee is made up of well-known men drawn from amongst employers, wage earners and the general public. It is to be hoped that its deliberation will be productive of good.

ECONOMICS

In 1908 the value of milk and cream exported from Canada to the United States was just $24. In 1909 it was $549, and in 1910 it was $450,413. This remarkable increase is due to the reduction of duty in the new tariff. Prince Edward Island has begun shipping cream in large quantities to Boston by the Plant line steamers. The price of cream (50 per cent. butter fat) at Charlottetown is 32 cents per quart, f.o.b. the freight is 3 cents per gallon.

We are in the habit of looking on the American continent as the chief source of wheat for Europe. Two years ago Canada and the United States sent to Western Europe over forty-six million bushels, while Russia and the Danubian provinces sent only thirty-three million. This year American shipments are only sixteen million bushels, while those of Eastern Europe have risen to ninety-five millions. Russia is exporting this year no less than 68 per cent. of the world's shipments.

The prices of meat are falling. This is said to be due to the great corn crop which enables farmers to use it for fattening stock. Some will have that it is the result of the elections. It seems that the public are not getting the full benefit of the reductions announced by the packing houses, and the retailers say that they are in the same plight. It remains to be seen whether the fall in price will last for any length of time.

The Cunard Company has asked its builders for tenders for a new ship 885 feet long, 95 feet beam, and 50,000 tons displacement. The engines are to be turbines, the speed 23 knots and the cost about $10,000,000. It is intended to be a rival of the new White Star ships, and will steam two knots an hour faster than these, though it will be more than three knots slower than the Mauritania. Its fittings are to surpass in luxury anything on the ocean.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

Following a splendid demonstration in his honor on the occasion of the dedication of a new parish church in Pankow, His Eminence Cardinal Prince-Bishop Kopp, of Breslau, in an address to the parishioners, used the opportunity to deny the charges of disunion among the bishops of the German Empire, which the Church's enemies have not ceased to inject into the recent Borromeo Encyclical controversy. The Cardinal declared:

"I am glad to testify to the close union and harmony subsisting between the Catholics of this land and their bishops, between the bishops and their head, the Supreme Pontiff, and between the bishops themselves. You are aware, my friends, that this mutual relation of agreement decreed of God, has been lightly spoken of recently by those opposed to us. Your bishops, especially, have been accused of a want of unity among themselves; they are affirmed to mistrust one another, and even meaner sentiments are said to control their mutual dealings. All such talk is false and foundationless. No bishop among us has yielded to the disloyalty such fictions suggest. Your bishops stand together in loving union and their mutual confidence is absolute. Believe me, we shall never fail to go before you, our people, an example of the intimate, close union of hearts that should characterize us all."

The 125th anniversary of "Old" St. Peter's Church, New York, was celebrated recently with fitting ceremony. The Rector of the church, Monsignor James H. McGean, was the celebrant at the solemn high Mass. Many of the old members of St. Peter's, who are now scattered all over the city and its environs, and whose fathers and grandfathers were members of the church when old New York was young, attended the Mass. The Rev. Owen Hill, of the Society of Jesus, preached a sermon recounting the glories of old St. Peter's and the tribulations of its early founders.

The Church of St. Vincent de Paul, Brooklyn, of which the Rev. Thomas E. Carroll is the Pastor, commemorated its fiftieth anniversary on November 21. Prominent among those present at the solemn high Mass in honor of the jubilee were the Rt. Rev. Charles E. McDonnell, Bishop of Brooklyn, the Auxiliary Bishop of the diocese, Right Rev. George W. Mundelein, and Monsignors Barrett, O'Hare, McGolrick, Kaupert, McCarthy, McNamee and McNamara. The occasion was likewise honored by the presence of one hundred priests from the Brooklyn diocese and elsewhere. The officers of the Mass were priests who in their boyhood were altar boys at St. Vincent's.

The alumni of three Catholic institutions were represented at a celebration which was held at St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, on the Feast of the Presentation of the Blessed Virgin. The three institutions were St. Mary's, Baltimore, the Procure of St. Sulpice, Rome, and the Seminary of St. Sulpice, Paris. The guests present included his Eminence, Cardinal Gibbons, and two distinguished visitors from Europe, the Very Rev. F. X. Herzog, of Rome, Procurator-General of the Sulpicians, and Very Rev. Henry Garriguet, Superior-General. It was on account of their presence that the alumni of the various seminaries were invited to attend. At the solemn high Mass Father Garriguet was the celebrant and Cardinal Gibbons presided. The sermon was preached by the Rt. Rev. Louis S. Walsh, of Portland, Me. At the Alumni meeting the treasurer of the chapel fund reported that he had $66,871.39 towards building a new chapel for the seminary, but that $25,000 of this amount was subject to life annuities and not actually available.

PERSONAL

Mr. Alfred J. Talley, at the Church of the Immaculate Conception, on November 23, delivered his lecture on the Passion Play of Oberammergau and repeated the impression which the lecture recently created in the Church of St. Ignatius, where the lecture was given under the auspices of the St. Vincent de Paul Society. Mr. Talley is well known as a lawyer and a prominent Catholic layman, and his treatment of this exalted theme is scholarly, sympathetic and reverent. The pictures shown represent the highest development of the art of photography, the coloring being particularly fine. During December the lecture will be given at the Catholic Club under the auspices of the Art Committee, and at the Church of All Saints, of which Rev. James W. Power is Rector.

A despatch from Rome announces the appointment of a new Bishop for the Diocese of Leavenworth, Kansas, in succession to the Right Reverend Thomas F. Lillis, recently transferred to Kansas City, Mo., as Coadjutor cum jure successionis to Bishop Hogan. Very Rev. John Ward, for many years the efficient Rector of the Cathedral in Leavenworth, has been selected by Pius X to fill the vacant see.

A marble tablet to the memory of the Rev. Herman Blumensaat, S.J., was unveiled, November 27, in the new Catholic chapel in course of construction on Blackwell's Island, New York City. Father Blumensaat, who died May 11, 1901, was for fourteen years chaplain of the city's wards in the institutions under the Department of Charities. The tablet is the gift of the physicians on the island at the time of Father Blumensaat's death, and has been held during the intervening years awaiting the building of the chapel, which was originally his project. Present at the exercises were Commissioner of Charities Michael J. Drummond and Frank J. Goodwin, representing the Department; Thomas M. Mulry, President of the St. Vincent de Paul Society and former Commissioner of Charities; Henry Heide, trustee of the Emigrant Industrial Savings Bank; Frank J. Gannon, President of the Catholic Club; the Rev. David J. Hearn, S.J.; Pastor of St. Ignatius' Church; Justice Edward B. Amend and Professor Charles G. Herbermann, editor-in-chief of "The Catholic Encyclopedia."

Henry Heide and Herman Blumensaat, then a layman, came to this country together as young men, and before the latter entered the priesthood were partners in business. As a priest Father Blumensaat was sent to Blackwell's Island thirty years ago. He remained there continuously for fourteen years, except for the period when a cholera epidemic threatened in 1892. He then went to the temporary hospital on Fire Island and ministered to the quarantined sufferers. There is a Catholic population of 2,300 on the island. The chapel will seat about 1,500, with accommodations for about 200 more in cripple chairs. At present services are conducted in a loft in one of the old buildings. The Jesuits have been in charge of the city institutions on the island since 1853.

SCIENCE

Though seemingly paradoxical, the fact is fully established that the efficiency of the blast furnace is greatly increased with the refrigerating of the air before injection. The refrigeration causes the air to become dried before coming in contact with the flame, thus economizing the heat of the furnace. The process is said to effect a net saving of from 30 to 35 per cent. in fuel.

While studying the spectra of various admixtures of salts, Comte de Gramont and M. Drecy observed that the chief cyanogen band may be produced under conditions where the presence of the compound of cyanogen is quite unlikely, though the constituents, nitrogen and carbon, are manifestly present. Hence they conclude that the band spectrum of cyanogen may not necessarily argue the presence of the deadly compound. This will be a crumb of comfort the next time we think the earth is about to pass through the tail of a comet whose spectrum shows the cyanogen lines.

Copper-clad steel of any desired thickness in which the two metals are so intimately united that the combination may be submitted to any of the usual processes of working metals, has been manufactured recently. The qualities of this new product are worthy of note. The tensile strength is equal to, and sometimes greater than that of steel of the same sectional area. It answers well as a wire for electrical and mechanical purposes, and for the same ohmic resistance, a much smaller size is required than when galvanized iron wire is used. The resistance of the combined metal is about the same as that of copper.

H. A. Danne estimates the total output of natural gas in the West Virginia oil fields at 1,300,000,000 cubic feet per diem, of which 300,000,000 go to waste. The thermal efficiency he rates at 1134 B. T. U. (882,252 foot pounds) per cubic foot with a falling off to 900 B. T. U. (700,200 foot pounds) after compression due to the decomposition of liquefied hydro-carbons. As gas and oil are accompanied by coal and salt water, and the pressure of the gas is invariably affected by seismic disturbances, he infers that these hydro-carbons are generated from carbonaceous deposits by the earth's interior heat, that they are still being generated under tremendous pressure and that the change of temperature due to the release of that pressure brings about the deposition of some of their constituents in the pockets known as oil pools.

A remarkable alloy, Ruebel bronze, has been prepared in Germany. Magnesium, its main constituent, is mixed with zinc, copper, and aluminum. Like the other recent alloys, it joins high tensile strength to low specific gravity. It promises to be most useful in the construction of air-ships, as it will reduce their weight to one-third or one fourth of what it is at present.

F. A. TONDORF, S.J.

OBITUARY

Sister Mary Agnes Moran, who for more than fifty years had been a Sister of Mercy, died at the Mercy Hospital, Baltimore, on November 25. On July 29 she celebrated her fiftieth anniversary as a nun. During the War she was a nurse at the Douglas Hospital, Washington, after which she was connected with several schools as teacher or superior.

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Vol. IV, No. 9

(Price 10 Cents)

DECEMBER 10, 1910

($3.00 a year)

Whole No. 87

CHRONICLE

Conference of Governors—Fighting the Sugar Trust—Death of Mrs. Eddy—New Mexico Drafts Basic Law—Disastrous Shooting Season—Growth of Large Cities—Canada—Great Britain—Ireland—France—Peril to the Nation in Alcohol—Emperor Assailed in Reichstag—Germany—Italy—Standard Oil Company in Austria—Spain 193-196

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Catholic Writers—Holy Communion for Children—Evolution of Italian Socialism II.—Mass in the Presbyterian Church I.....197-203

CORRESPONDENCE

From the Portuguese Exiles—Freemasonry in France, Past and Present—The Evangelical Church in Germany.....203-205

EDITORIAL

The Independent and Pius IX—Mrs. Eddy—

The English Crisis—A Christian Ruler—Episcopalian Comprehensiveness206-209

LITERATURE

History of Ireland from the Earliest Times to the Present Day—The Dawn of Modern England—The People's King—Heroes of California—El Romancero Español—Lives of the Fur Folk—Books Received209-213

EDUCATION

Catholic Papers for School Reading—Success of the Bilingual Schools in Ireland—University Discipline in the Seventeenth Century.....213

SOCIOLOGY

Sanity in the State of Washington—English Immigration to New South Wales—Suicide Clubs 213

ECONOMICS

Postage on Foreign Letters—Long Distance

Marconi Messages—Heavy Pilotage at Cherbourg—Reduction in Sleeping-Car Rates....214

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

Pope Pius X Thanks American Hierarchy for Condemnation of Nathan Insult—New Auxiliary Bishop of Detroit—The Late Father Augustus Muller, S.J.....214

SCIENCE

An Alloy of Cobalt and Chromium—Agricultural Graphics214

OBITUARY

Archbishop Julius Varosy—Pierre Chouteau, 214-215

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Social Week in Barcelona—Cage Masts on Battleships—John La Farge's Art—Pioneers in Jefferson County215-216

CHRONICLE

Conference of Governors.—The third annual conference of State executives, which was held in the Hall of Representatives of the new state capitol building in Frankfort, Ky., was attended by twenty-four governors and governors-elect. When Governor Judson Harmon, of Ohio, entered the hall he was greeted with a demonstration accorded to no other governor. Woodrow Wilson, governor-elect of New Jersey, urged cooperation in the regulation of railroads and corporations by the states. While the proceedings included a discussion of various subjects of general interest, such as the need of uniformity in State legislation, the whole affair was more distinctly social than deliberative. President Taft sent a letter expressing hearty approval of the general purposes of the meeting, and Governor Willson, of Kentucky, in an address opening the proceedings, explained that the assembly was simply a conference and not a "house of governors," as that title had twice been repudiated by the organization itself.

Fighting the Sugar Trust.—In behalf of the Government, suit was entered in the United States Circuit Court, in New York, for the dissolution of the Sugar Trust. The petition is directed against the American Sugar Refining Company with its constituent companies, which it is charged, controls not only the sugar cane industry, but the beet sugar industry also. Among the specifications of the petition are the following: That the late H. O. Havemeyer received a present of $10,000,000 in stock for organizing the combine. That the defendant companies are engaged in an unlawful combination and conspiracy in restraint of interstate and foreign commerce. That money has been obtained by customs frauds, railroad rebates and by working with grocers' associations to keep up the price of sugar. Undoubtedly this is one of the most important cases ever instituted under the Sherman anti-trust law.

Death of Mrs. Eddy.—Mrs. Mary Baker Glover Eddy, the founder and dictator of the Christian Science Church, died at her home at Chestnut Hill, a suburb of Boston, on December 3. The fact was kept secret until its announcement the following day at the Mother Church of Christian Science, Boston. A few hours after her death, in compliance with the State law, a Medical Examiner was called in to issue a death certificate, as no physician had been in attendance. Pneumonia was probably the immediate cause of death. Mrs. Eddy had been ill less than forty-eight hours and was in her ninetieth year.

New Mexico Drafts Basic Law.—The constitution for the State of New Mexico was framed by the state convention, which closed its sessions on Nov. 21. Paramount among the difficulties that faced the convention was the race and language question. Some 135,000 inhabitants of Spanish-American descent demanded protection of their equality before the law and retention of their ancient rights and privileges. They were suspicious of the Federal enabling act, which demands that all the state officers and legislators must speak English. A constitution following the older models was adopted, with these salient new features: An elective corporation commission, without judicial powers, but with the right to regulate rates for transportation and transmission, to grant charters and supervise corporations. The initiative was rejected, but a referendum clause was included. Prohibition and local option were excluded, but the way was left open to the Legislature to deal with these questions. A stringent anti-pass section was adopted.

The constitution provides for an elective judiciary from top to bottom, and for elective state officers. It grants to women the right to vote at school elections, and makes them eligible to be school directors and county school superintendents. The constitution also abolishes the fee system. It prohibits separate schools for Anglo-Saxon and Spanish-Americans, and provides for the payment of the railroad bond indebtedness of $1,000,000 by the sale of 1,000,000 acres of land granted by Congress. No distinction is to be made in the franchise, in jury duty, or in holding office, other than that of State and Legislature, on account of inability to speak English. The constitution is conservative and creditable to its framers.

Disastrous Shooting Season.—According to statistics compiled by the Chicago Tribune from twenty-three states, the shooting season of 1910, which closed on November 30, cost one hundred and thirteen lives. This is more than were killed during any previous season of which there is record. The loss of life in 1909 was eighty-seven, in 1908 it was fifty-seven, in 1907 eighty-two and in 1906 seventy-four. The number of injured this season, however, is only eighty-one, against one hundred and four for the season of 1909. The death list of this year is likely to be considerably increased later by reason of the fatal termination in the cases of many of the injured. "Mistaken for a deer" and "shot by a companion" are the usual causes assigned. Michigan heads the list with twenty-seven killed.

Growth of Large Cities.—Including Portland, Ore., and Seattle, Wash., the cities of the United States of 25,000 and over have an aggregate population of 28,000,000. This announcement is made in a recapitulation bulletin issued by the Census Bureau.

Forty-nine of the cities contain more than 100,000, and of this number eleven have risen into the 100,000 class since the census of 1900. There has been a much larger increase in the cities below 100,000 than in those above, the approximate percentage of the former being 40, and of the latter 32. Portland and Seattle will be added to the class of larger cities.

The recapitulation covers the detailed figures for 18 states, including Arizona and New Mexico. Based on the percentage of gain shown in these states, the prediction is made that the United States has passed the 100,000,000 mark in population. Iowa alone shows a decrease, but in so far as these states are an indication of the final total there seems to have been a considerable growth in the manufacturing regions, and comparatively little increase in the agricultural sections.

Canada.—The naval policy has caused no little disorder during the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and others have been accused of aiming at independence, and a member has called another a liar.—Montreal is to have a second-class dry dock. A first-class one is to be constructed at Quebec.—Montreal is in the fervor of a moral reform. A crime lately discovered, of which the author cannot be found, was the occasion of uncovering a shocking condition of affairs. One of the points under discussion is the checking of the sale of cocaine, which, it appears, is abused very extensively.—Ludger Larose has revived the prosecution of M. Lemieux, which fell through about two months ago on technicalities. The case, it will be remembered, one of highway robbery, grew out of the revelations concerning the Emancipation Lodge.—At the beginning of the year the Canadian Pacific Railway Company will order large and fast steamers for both its Atlantic and its Pacific trade.

Great Britain.—The elections, as we foresaw, are going in favor of the government, though Liberal majorities are reduced. Several secessions from the Liberal party are announced. Among them are those of Lord Joicey, H. B. Money Coutts and Sir John D. Rees, member for Montgomery Burghs. He will contest Flintshire as a Unionist.—Mr. Balfour announced that if he should take office he would submit Tariff Reform to a referendum. In the meantime it is to be abstracted from in the present election. He challenged Mr. Asquith to submit Home Rule similarly. This Mr. Asquith declines to do and Mr. Balfour prophesies that it surely will be so submitted.—There is much ill-feeling over the elections, and some rioting has been reported.—The suffragettes continue to give trouble. They insist on being arrested and seem anxious to go to prison. The magistrates are in a quandary. The government does not wish them to send people to prison whom it cannot treat as prisoners, and as soon as a woman is discharged she says: "I'll be back soon," and goes out to commit another breach of the peace. The situation is almost comic.—Dead hares have been found in Essex, and dead rats along the Thames. The authorities say they were not infected with plague. The question arises, of what did they die? To this no satisfactory answer is given.

Ireland.—Judging from the pronouncements of Cabinet Ministers, Home Rule is not, as predicted by T. P. O'Connor, in the forefront of the Liberal platform. Mr. Asquith only reiterated his Guild Hall declaration: "The solution can be found only in one way—by a policy which, while explicitly safeguarding the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament will set up in Ireland a system of full self-government in regard to purely Irish affairs." Home Rule was placed at the end of his list of reforms. Mr. John Burns is more explicit: "I am in favor of such legislative independence for Ireland in Irish affairs as will enable that country to revive her industries, maintain her population and stimulate her social and agrarian prosperity in accordance with Irish ideas, the imperial supremacy in Imperial affairs to remain inviolate." Mr. Churchill, putting Home Rule also at the end of the list, said: "The hour is coming for the reconciliation of the English and Irish people . . . We shall see Ireland free in all that properly concerns herself. We shall see her take her place like those brave Boers have done, in a true union of the British Empire." "Boer Home Rule" would be considered amply satisfactory in Ireland, but none of the Ministers has promised to introduce a Bill of that or any other kind in the next parliament. Mr. Dillon, speaking in England, said he was suspicious of Mr. Asquith and all British statesmen, and placed his chief reliance on the Irish Party.—The reports of an electioneering encounter between the two Nationalist sections in Cork were greatly exaggerated. No one was seriously injured, and it had the good effect of impelling the rival contestants to enjoin their followers to observe moderation and not adopt the tactics so often employed at English elections. Mr. O'Brien has put up some twenty candidates against the regular Nationalist nominees. His policy of Devolution is a milder kind of Home Rule than even that advocated by Mr. O'Connor in Canada, while his friend, Mr. Healy, demands a stronger measure financially than is claimed by Mr. Redmond. His other chief plank is conciliation of Protestants, but Mr. Healy asserts that no Protestants worth considering are opposed to Home Rule, except on the ground that it would increase taxation. The differences appear to be on persons rather than principles.—The protestations of the Ulster Orangemen and their £10,000 subscription for arms and ammunition are regarded humorously in Ireland. The Nationalists are in a majority in Ulster, and one of the four members for Belfast, who is sure to retain his seat, is a member of the Irish Party. The Nationalist papers claim that the threats of revolution made by the Orange leaders are intended only for electioneering purposes, and will rather injure their prospects as showing the conditional character of their much-vaunted "loyalty."

France.—The floods which were ravaging France last week still continue in all parts of the country. Great fears are felt for next year's cereal and wine crop. The Seine has become somewhat stationary but the Gironde, Garonne and Loire and the rivers of Normandy and Brittany are rising. Hundreds of villages are flooded, and in Nantes the water has risen to the tops of the lamp posts. —Clemenceau has been summoned to appear before a commission of which his bitter enemy, Jaurès, is chairman, and has been compelled to explain what share he had in the financial operations of M. Rochette who made millions in the market through the aid of alleged tips from the Government. Clemenceau, we are told by the daily press, has not come out of the ordeal unscathed.—While the Government is preparing a measure to prevent what is called sabotage or injury of the property of their employers by workmen, the Socialist members of the House are drawing up another bill which proposes to legalize sabotage. This measure also protests against all military interference with strikers even when a riot prevails, and legalizes "picketing" no matter how much intimidation is resorted to against the non-strikers.—The French weakness for statues is still asserting itself. Jules Ferry is the most recent recipient of these post-mortem honors. Briand, of course, was present and the event was enlivened by an excited man knocking off the Prime Minister's hat. The assailant had no purpose of assassination; as he merely attacked his victim with fist. He was promptly laid hold of by the police and the ceremonies continued. The movement for the erection of the statue was political as Ferry was the inaugurator in 1879 of the campaign against Catholic education.

Peril to the Nation in Alcohol.—In opening the new naval academy at Muerwik, Emperor William read an order in council laying stress upon the qualifications necessary to naval officers, and later, speaking extemporaneously, made a plea for temperance on the part of the cadets. "The times," he said, "required iron-hearted men. Character was the first essential, and character was founded upon strong moral and religious convictions." In his temperance talk the Emperor cautioned the cadets against excessive drinking, which undermined the nerves, and the strenuous naval service of to-day required strong nerves. He counselled total abstinence, and added that the nation which in the future used the smallest amount of alcohol would march at the head of the column on the fields of art and war.

Emperor Assailed in Reichstag.—In the course of a bitter debate in the Reichstag on the Emperor's "divine right" speech at Königsburg last summer, Herr Ledebour, a Socialist leader, made a defiant assertion that the German Socialist democracy avowedly aspires to establish a republic and will bend all its efforts to that end. The statement was greeted with prolonged Socialist cheers. In a vigorous defence of the Emperor's speech Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg affirmed his agreement with the ruler's stand not alone as imperial chancellor but of his own honest political conviction. He defended the literal, historical accuracy of the Emperor's claim that the Prussian kings were sovereigns in their own right, and did not owe the throne to the people. "Herr Ledebour's remarks make it clear," he said, "that he and his party are not moved to interpellate by their care for the commonwealth, but a passionate hostility to the constitution. The personal irresponsibility of the king and the independence of the sovereignty of his monarchical rights are fundamental principles of our political life which remain alive in the constitutional development." Republicanism has always been an unwritten plank in the German platform, but this object has never before been so boldly professed. Probably this is the reason why Dr. von Heydebrand, leader of the government conservative party and sometimes called the "uncrowned king of Prussia," declared the bold avowal of the Socialists in favor of a republic which the country had heard in the day's debate, "made it imperative that the chancellor should not wait for the arrival of the revolution, but should take immediately such steps as would nip it in the bud."

Germany.—At the instance of the Ministry of Agriculture, Emperor William has approved the projected sale of the forest lands surrounding the capital to the municipality of Greater Berlin. To serve the double purpose of beautifying the city and of securing breathing spots for the congested districts of the city, the municipal officers proposed the plan of buying these lands and of laying them out in a series of parks. The funds required have already been contributed by the citizens of the city and its suburbs.—A despatch from Hamburg tells of the poisoning of more than one hundred persons following the eating of oleomargarine. Several are so seriously sick that their recovery is despaired of. The municipal officers seized what was left of the suspected product and official investigation will be made to bring the dealers concerned in its sale to punishment.—Graf Adolph von Götzen, the well-known African explorer, once the Governor of the German East Africa district and later the representative there of the Hansa cities, died in Berlin following a surgical operation.—Statistics recently published indicate that the Emperor's temperance crusade is having a substantial effect in the navy, to which his latest temperance speech was addressed. The consumption of alcohol among the officers and men of the fleet decreased respectively in 1906, 1907, 1908 and 1909, 8, 12, 19 and 30 per cent. The decrease in the army is not believed to have been so marked, but the Emperor is doing his best to popularize tea and milk among the troops instead of beer.

Italy.—After an interruption of seven years the Catholics of Italy held in November a successful annual national congress in Modena. The last preceding gathering in Bologna had not met with universal favor because of the sharp antagonism which developed between the older conservative organizations represented and the younger and progressive bodies. As will be recalled these latter dominated the Bologna congress and their acts and platform proved too advanced to merit the approval of the hierarchy. In the years that have since elapsed a change has come to pass which made for harmony.

Some of the young progressists have rebelled against the direction of the bishops and have found their proper places in the radical groups of the country, others have learned moderation in their views and are now strong supporters of the conservative platform. In consequence whilst there was no lack of sharp debate in the Modena meeting, a gratifying unity of purpose prevailed and good results were achieved for the Catholic cause.—A commercial house in Milan will undertake shortly the importation of California wine to Italy and has reported that its first consignment already has been shipped. Italian wine-growers are alarmed at the threatened competition and have appealed to the minister of agriculture for protection. The minister has issued a statement intended to allay the fears of local producers. In it he claims: exportation from California will not be large since the California vintage is limited; the price of California wine exported to Italy will be too high to tempt many buyers; the wine will not meet the taste of consumers as the importers of California wine probably will try to mix Italian wine with it in order to increase its alcoholic strength. The ministers assures home producers that the government will take strict precautions to prevent doctoring.

Standard Oil Company in Austria.—The controversy between the Austrian authorities and the Vacuum Oil Company, a branch of the Standard Oil Company, has reached an acute stage. The Austrian foreign office maintains that the Vacuum Company is registered as a Hungarian company and must, in consequence, be subject to the same regulations as other home companies. The question at issue, it affirms, is purely a matter for Austrian internal administration, and absolutely outside of diplomacy. Richard C. Kerens, the American ambassador, who has been protesting against alleged discrimination of the Austrian government against this company, declines to accept these contentions of the foreign office. Just at present the dispute is at a deadlock. The ministry of finance has begun an official inquiry into the Galician oil situation, hoping to find a solution.

The proposed naval program agreed upon by the Cabinet of Austria-Hungary calls for four "Dreadnoughts," not three, as earlier reports affirmed. Parliament will be asked to vote the first instalments of the cost of these ships in the approaching session. The program, moreover, calls for the building of three fast cruisers and of twenty-two torpedo boats, besides six submarines. The total outlay for the contemplated new constructions involves a sum of 313,000,000 crowns, (a crown is 20.3 cents). In the budget for 1911, 90,000,000 crowns will be asked for.

Spain.—The "padlock law," excluding certain religious bodies from the right of incorporation, passed the senate with a time limit of two years. The promised legislation on associations is not, therefore, left entirely and indefinitely to the caprice of the minister of justice

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Catholic Writers

That world-wide League of Catholic devotion, known as the Apostleship of Prayer, has its attention called every month by the supreme head of the Church to some pressing need which the members of the League are recommended to urge with special fervor in their petitions to the Giver of all blessings. During the current month of December the object of the League's prayers, holy Communion and good works, is, in accordance with the Holy Father's express wish, Catholic writers and artists. We need not lay stress on the encouragement contained in this high sanction for all those Catholics who are laboring with the pen in the cause of truth. And especially is this the case for a class of writers who, it seems to us, have been to a certain extent neglected in the past, so far as direct and hearty encouragement from official sources is concerned. We refer to those who are engaged in literature primarily as an art, to the men and women who are laboriously striving to attain some finished and distinguished art-form in poetry or prose in which to embody Catholic thought and feeling. Nearly all the encouragement in the past has gone to those writers who have been immediately occupied with apologetics and doctrinal exposition, whose main business was with thought and facts and to whom literary form was a minor matter and often something altogether negligible. All honor to them. They have laid foundations, without which we could not have got along. But a stage has been reached when the needs of a Catholic audience go beyond a desire for the mere pabulum, the undressed dishes. It may be a retrograde stage rather than an advanced position. We suspect it is. But, whether it ought to be a fact or not, a fact it certainly is, that the plain treatises which satisfied our fathers are not always inviting to the present generation.

It seems to us that in the significant juxtaposition of "writers and artists," the Supreme Pontiff wished to convey some such notion as we have here attempted to express. From his pinnacle at the centre of Christendom his broad survey of the world has shown him the dreadful and universal havoc that is being wrought by skilled and practised cleverness in the fine arts, in poetry, fiction, essays, popular histories, painting, music and sculpture. He sees that it is not the master of unbelief in the university lecture-room or laboratory who is to be feared, so much as the men and women who exploit in popular forms of art that sinister master's ingenious and novel theories. Very few people are inclined to follow or place their confidence in a pedant who has allowed all the founts of his life to dry up except one, who is obsessed with an idea until it makes him regardless of all facts and relationships not entering into his narrow outlook. He is an enthusiast, a monomaniac, a harmless dreamer, an unpractical theorist, a blind, burrowing mole, in the feverish pursuit of a preconceived theory without any basis in reality distorting all the facts and values of life to suit the exigencies of his vainglorious quest. He lectures, it is likely, to sleepy undergraduates; and we know that he writes very sleepy books. If his influence ended here, he would cut a small figure. But, no; a fellow-professor writes a puff of him for a newspaper or a magazine. The attention of the public is called to him. Able writers and artists, who have no special theory of life and who have no more interest in religious truth than, like Pilate, to ask idly what it is and hurry off without wishing or expecting to be answered, seize on this Dead-Sea fruit of the university professor, dress it up in various appetizing forms, and the garnishings make it acceptable to a public that might have shrunk back in disgust from the crude material in its original rawness.

This is but a rough sketch of the process of unbelief going on all around us. Our writers are not original thinkers, in the modern much-abused meaning of the word; and our original thinkers lay more stress upon originality than upon thinking. But the combination of the two forces has been completed with striking results. Strange and deadly heresies that would have come still-born into the world a generation or two ago, now rise from the restlessness of human pride, creatures of beauty and strength, Aphroditic visions of snow-white foam or god-like shapes panoplied like the shining Athene. What wonder if the populace is awed and deeply impressed! And what wonder if the young and the worldly-minded, the careless and the pleasure-loving, the ambitious and the fame-hungry follow in large numbers the enticements of a meretricious art in lieu of the meagre attractiveness with which the ancient truth woos their inherited allegiance!

These reflections are by no means new. Last week, however, we were present at a memorial celebration which cut them like acid into our mind. The departed author, honored on that occasion, was perhaps America's best-known and most popular writer. During his lifetime he showed scant respect for religious belief and in his circle of friends was wont to deny the existence of a Personal God and of any life beyond the grave. The audience, assembled in his memory, was large; and on the platform were seated many of our most successful and most respected literary men. We enjoyed the speeches and familiar reminiscences and admired the strain of disinterested affection witnessed to by these distinguished fellow-craftsmen and friends of the dead writer. Our sub-conscious regret over the entire absence of any religious feeling and sentiment in these memorial remarks became a paramount and almost exclusive impression when one of the speakers, a conspicuous figure in our public life for nearly half a century and now an old man, closed his address in subdued and solemnly uttered tones with a passage beginning with these words: "We do not know whence we have come and we do not know whither we are going."

The speaker merely voiced the convictions held by the dead man during his life. As we allowed our glance to pass from one well-known face to another in the group of men on the platform and recalled pages that they had written, we felt that the speaker expressed also the deliberate belief of most of the men seated near him. He might have been Epictetus or Marcus Aurelius or Lucretius in evening clothes, resurgent in this year of grace, nineteen hundred and ten, in order to be the mouth-piece of our literary world in its profession of ignorance concerning man's origin and destiny. The object-lesson was vivid and forcible. In the case of this aged statesman and of all these writers, whose charming pens are so busy and so fascinating, Christ and the most fundamental Christian truths are laid aside with cool and cynical certitude in their philosophy of life.

Of course, much of this unreligious tone in literature is only what we can naturally expect. Literature is preëminently human and worldly; it always has been so and will always remain so. Even should we succeed in building up a strong body of distinctively Catholic art the sway of a more human and less religious art will ever prevail by appealing to the stronger passions of the flesh and the pride of man. But, in spite of this, nothing is more desirable at present from a Catholic point of view than the presence of literary craftsmen to serve as a counter-check to the hosts of artists, now either oblivious of the essential truths of human existence or, not seldom, actively hostile to them. You cannot effectively answer a poem or a song by a theological treatise or a sermon. One cannot cope with a well-constructed novel, or a light, gentle-voiced essay, or a witty play, or a shrewd bit of creative criticism, by writing a less well-constructed novel, or by compiling an essay richly stocked with alien inversions and with solecisms and epithets that have been lying in the junk heaps of our language for a century. Slovenliness in form is no certain indication of profundity in matter, and is generally regarded, sometimes rightly and sometimes wrongly, as the sign of muddled thought and undisciplined mental methods. In every contest of ponderosity and awkwardness with lightness, gracefulness and swiftness the latter have always been victorious either for good or evil.

There is, we think, no necessity of adding that we do not advocate the sacrifice of solid attainments for the superficial graces of written expression. Ruskin was once constrained to cry out: "Not being able to decorate the marble block, they declare that decoration is a 'superficial merit.' Yes, very superficial. Eyelashes and eyebrows, lips and nostrils, chin-dimples and curling hair, are all very superficial things wherewith Heaven decorates the human skull, making the maid's face of it or the knight's." The anatomy of solid thought must not be sacrificed; but it is good to remember that, if we are going to parade it before a critical public, we should clothe it in the conventional decencies and in more than conventional graces, should we be able to do so—for it deserves it,—so that our cause may not seem to suffer nor its adherents be put out of countenance. The same Pope, who asks us in his solicitude for the Church to pray for Catholic writers and artists, has adopted the most energetic measures in order to promote thoroughness and profundity in ecclesiastical seminaries. For art and knowledge are not mutually exclusive. The popular writer who has the firmest grasp upon his thought is, in nine cases out of ten, the one who will express it most clearly and artistically.

JAMES J. DALY, S.J.

Holy Communion for Children

The Sacred Congregation of the Discipline of the Sacraments, to which is assigned the entire Church legislation concerning the seven Sacraments with the exception only of what pertains to their ceremonies, on August 8, 1909, published with the approval of our Holy Father, Pius X, a decree to be observed everywhere giving formal instruction for the admission of children to first Holy Communion. The decree has occasioned much discussion in some parts of the Catholic world, because the discipline it imposes is claimed to be radically different from that long prevailing. Writers in religious reviews, pastors and other priests who have to do with the Christian training of children,—all well intentioned, no doubt—profess to be troubled because of the difficulties, which they imagine will face them in their future catechetical instructions of the little ones, owing to the changes the decree "Quam singulari" requires. Nay, there are some who complain that the Congregation's action implies a "burdensome novelty" in Catholic practice that will not prove to be lacking in evil effects.

They who make this plaint are clearly wrong if they speak of "novelty" in a sense touching the common law of the Church. There had, it is true, grown into the practice of the Church in most countries a local discipline regulating the age at which children were to be admitted to First Communion, which appears to be opposed to the norm laid down in the decree Quam singulari; but it is to be remembered that from its first appearance in the Catholic life of those countries, the local discipline respected the first public and ceremonial receiving of Holy Communion, and that, as in other matters of purely local custom, great diversity existed concerning the age at which children were thus solemnly admitted to the privilege of the Holy Table. In some places the age was fixed at twelve years, in others at fourteen, in others again at ten. Moreover, this local practice dates from 1215, the year in which the Fourth Council of Lateran promulgated its well-known decree Omnis utriusque sexus.

There is, as is well known, a divine precept to receive Holy Communion: "Except you eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink His blood you shall not have life in you." But no special time was assigned by Our Lord for the fulfilment of this precept; He left all such matters to be determined by the Church. The piety of the faithful and their eagerness to avail themselves of the Eucharistic banquet made it unnecessary in earlier days to enact specific law determining Christ's own precept, but with the growing indifference and coldness of men there came a day when it was deemed needful that the Church should use its authority. The Lateran Council, therefore, made the universal law that all the faithful, after coming to the years of discretion, should reverently receive the Holy Eucharist at least at Easter, unless it was thought advisable to abstain from Communion for a time for some reasonable cause.

The Lateran Fathers, it will be noted, omitted to determine at what age precisely one may be affirmed to have come to the years of discretion. The obligation imposed by their decree was, then, to be interpreted, as far at least as concerned its application to individuals, by reference to principles of law commonly accepted. A study of our question from this angle will make clear just how the custom regarding the first Communion of children condemned in the decree Quam singulari, came to exist in the practice of many Catholic countries. We come upon its first traces in the enactments of local Church councils and diocesan synods in Germany, France, Italy and Spain following close upon the Lateran Council. These bodies undertook to define the "years of discretion," the term used in the Omnis utriusque, some dating their beginning at the age of ten, others at twelve, others again at fourteen; and coincident with these various interpretations of the term we find the introduction of the practice according to which children were held back from Communion until they had attained the age of 10, 12 or 14 years, as the case might be.

Canonists and moralists, however, alike agree in affirming the purpose of such synodal enactments not to have been to establish the precise age at which the obligation of receiving Holy Communion began to be effective. Rather, they say, they had in view the exact period at which wilful neglect of this Lateran decree would render the delinquent subject to the penalties constituting the external sanction of that law. They who formulated these decrees, had no intention to say when precisely a child was to be deemed subject to the divine precept of communicating and when, therefore, he was to be properly admitted to Holy Communion; but they wished to make clear the exact age at which neglect of this precept, as determined by the Lateran decree, would render him liable to the exclusion from the Church during life and deprivation of Christian burial after death, which that decree imposes. If one keeps this very patent distinction in mind it will not be difficult to recognize how the "years of discretion" came to be fixed for so advanced an age, and how as a very natural consequence children began to be admitted late to Holy Communion.

One need not be told that the Lateran Council was held after a trying period in the Church's history. St. Thomas, assigning the reason of the ordinance regarding yearly Communion, speaks of "the reign of impiety and the growing cold of charity" characteristic of the age preceding the law's enactment. It was an age, too, in which though history records many illustrious and brilliant exceptions, the cultivation of letters, human and divine, had not generally flourished. At a period, then, when councils and synodal statutes exacted only the slenderest training in ecclesiastical science, it surely does not surprise one to learn that the morality and the religious ways of the people had been proportionately affected. With a careless and indifferently-trained clergy one must not expect to see a devout and carefully instructed people. To be sure, already before the convocation in Rome, in 1215, of the Fourth Lateran Council, there had been evident a wide-spread reawakening of Catholic life, which was to be splendidly helped by the wise reformatory legislation of that body; but, considering the conditions of the period, the Lateran fathers were too prudent surely to seek reform through the imposition of excessive burdens calculated to defeat their purpose by rigid severity. Their decrees, then, are usually conceded to be an external expression of a minimum requirement in discipline, through which the prevailing looseness of ways might be checked and men might be led back to the ancient fervor and discipline. In no point, so runs the judgment of critics, did the Lateran fathers intend to condemn or change the discipline which had flourished in earlier days.

Following in their steps the synodal fathers, who defined the term "years of discretion," had no mind to condemn, to disapprove, or to change the practice accepted from the earlier days of allowing young children to be admitted to the Holy Table. They wished rather, in the kindly spirit which the exigencies of the day demanded, to affirm just at what period a child might be deemed juridically subject to the law Omnis utriusque. The characteristic attitude of men towards religious instruction, fervor and piety of life in those distressing days gives us an evident clue to the motive that impelled them to assign the age of ten or twelve, or even fourteen years as the fixed limit when such an obligation began to exist.

One must confess, that certain as is the explanation of these facts, the interpretation of the Omnis utriusque thus established in the thirteenth century by local councils and synods in France, Italy and Germany, had as practical effect a widespread change in the previously prevailing Church discipline respecting the admission of children to Holy Communion. But at no time were there lacking theologians who voiced vigorous protest against the change. Recognizing that the tardy admission of children to the Holy Table arose from a too insistent consideration of the canonical aspect of the law laid down in the Lateran decree, these very properly pleaded for a policy based on the divine precept itself and on the obligation of that precept without reference to its penal sanction as fixed by the Council. In the ensuing controversy this latter view gradually grew in favor and in the fifteenth century we find its advocates boldly defending a proposition which is practically that set down in the recent decree of the Congregation of the Sacraments Quam singulari. Blessed Angelo of the Friars Minor, a distinguished moralist of that epoch, in his Summa de Casibus Conscientie quotes with approval a brother theologian who affirms: "The age limit at which children are bound to satisfy the precept of Paschal Communion ought not to be fixed according to the number of years, or local custom, or any such consideration. The limit exists and the precept obliges as soon as children have attained the use of reason, when they are sufficiently instructed to be capable of feeling proper devotion towards the Eucharist, and when they can discern the Body of Christ in what they receive and distinguish this sacred nourishment from the ordinary food which they eat."

That the growing favor, with which this view of our question was accepted, did not speedily bring into general vogue again the ancient practice of admitting children to the benefit of the Eucharistic Table before the age of ten or twelve or of fourteen years, is a detail into which our present discussion need not draw us. It is sufficient to note that, although the rule now definitely set aside continued to hold sway, for many years back priests and confessors, who have had to do with the training of children, have not scrupled to admit privately to Holy Communion children satisfying the conditions set down by the fifteenth century moralist, no matter what may have been the local rule or custom concerning the first public and ceremonial reception by them of the Sacrament. The decree of August 8 stamps their manner of acting as right and proper, and, approved as it is by our Holy Father, sanctions their practice and makes it the law for the Universal Church.

M. J. O'CONNOR, S.J.

Evolution of Italian Socialism

II.

At the Congress of Bologna, which was in session from the 18th to the 20th of September, 1892, the question was discussed as to the attitude to be held with regard to the ministry and the middle classes or the Bourgeoisie. The debate only increased the dissension which already existed between the various sections and dispelled the hope of any assistance from the Radicals or the Republicans.

In the beginning of May, 1898, an insurrection broke out in Milan, with an after effect in other places of Italy. The Rudini-Zanardelli ministry regarded it as an attempted revolution for the overthrow of the Monarchy. A state of siege was proclaimed in Lombardy and Tuscany, with the result that thousands of Socialists and estimable men of all political shades were thrown into prison; among them, the Director of the Osservatore Cattolico, the intrepid David Albertani. The Socialist Party seemed to be completely disrupted, for its leaders were either in prison or in exile. Their newspaper, however, the Avanti, continued to appear every day, even sometimes with half of its columns deleted. It served thus as a banner for the party, and around it the Socialist army was soon gathered better disciplined than before. When the Pelloux Ministry attempted to pass gag laws in Parliament, the Avanti, under Bissolati, proposed the adoption of obstructive tactics. The suggestion was acted upon with such success that the Government was embarrassed, Parliament was dissolved, and new elections ordered. The results were not such as had been anticipated.

The Socialist representatives who had numbered only fifteen in 1892 were now thirty. Among them were such men as Ferri, Costa, Gatti, Turati and others. The Pelloux Ministry failed, and was succeeded by that of Saracco. About the end of July, King Humbert was assassinated and the democratic reign of Victor Emmanuel III began. The Socialists celebrated their victory by a national congress which was held in Rome that same year, 1900, from the 8th to the 11th of September. Two hundred and nineteen sections were represented in it. In the matter of elections, fusion was advised with other parties, but apart from that, they were to work independently. The Maximum program was adopted, that is to say, the socialization of the instruments of labor, and social administration of products. Class organization and the acquisition of public offices were urged as the means to that end. An accurate and exhaustive minimum program was also elaborated, in which the following claims were made: Equal autonomy for all; the referendum; free defence in civil and penal trials; supervision of the work of women and children, etc.; a weekly rest of at least thirty-six consecutive hours; improvements in rural contracts; legal determination of the length of a day's work; national Savings Bank for the sick and the aged workingmen; the nationalization and transportation from mines and quarries when the cooperation of workingmen was impossible; the abolition of duties and taxes on staple articles of food; a single, progressive and universal income and property tax, and the reduction of interest on public funds.

Immediately after the Roman congress, dissensions broke out anew. For the ten years that have intervened since then, the Socialist writers of Italy have been inveighing against Marxism as being unscientific. Moreover, some Socialists have supported the Zanardelli Ministry. Again, the interpretation given the minimum program started new discussions between the Reformists and the Revolutionists. The Reformists with Turati at their head wished to carry out the program by legal means without too much preoccupation about the maximum. The others were more concerned about the latter, and clamored for revolutionary tactics in order to realize it.

At the congress of 1902, in Imola, from the 6th to the 7th of September, eight hundred and thirty-six sections were represented. Quarrels broke out again, and in spite of every effort to put an end to them they continued as before; nor did the subsequent Congress of Bologna in 1904, succeed in establishing peace. At the close of that year, in consequence of a bloody struggle between some strikers and the military, the Revolutionists declared for a general strike throughout the Peninsula. It was attempted, but was a disastrous failure, and profoundly disgusted the nation on account of the disorders which accompanied it. Giolitti, with rare ability, availed himself of the opportunity and dissolved Parliament, and announced the general elections for the following November and December. They resulted in conservative protests throughout the country, and the parliamentary group of Socialists returned to the House decimated and exhausted. Nevertheless, the Revolutionists and Reformists were not crushed; rather, they were angered by what had just happened, and prepared for another congress to be held in Rome from the 7th to the 10th of October, 1906.

At this congress there were nine hundred and thirty-four sections represented. They were Reformists, Integralists, Revolutionists, Syndicalists, and Non-Syndicalists. The Reformists advocated the use of legal methods, the avoidance of violence and general strikes, and urged the general body to work for the realization of their ideals by the organization of workingmen and the achievement of political influence. Turati, Prampolini, Bissolati are among those who were most conspicuous in that section. Milan is its most important centre. The Revolutionary Syndicalists had a clear and concise program. For them Socialism must be an immense army of workingmen united in syndicates and class organizations, and seeking by revolutionary methods, especially by general strikes, to obtain their object. There are also non-Syndicalists who are revolutionary in their ideas, but they are a negligible minority.

Shortly before the congress convened at Rome, a new organization was formed who called themselves the Integralists. Integralism strives to avoid both extremes; favors legal methods; but does not absolutely reject revolutionary tactics. It deplores the abuse, but not the use of a general strike. It permits the deputies to support legislation for the middle classes, but only exceptionally, and in compliance with the wishes of the party. It is absolutely anti-clerical, anti-military, and anti-monarchical, but works with prudence and tact.

Around the standard of the Integralists a majority of the Socialists arrayed themselves. For, whereas the Syndicalists had only five thousand votes in the Roman congress, and the Reformists five thousand five hundred, the Integralists could claim eighteen thousand. After the congress troubles broke out again. The Parliamentary group was weakened. The leading Socialist newspaper, the Avanti, was in great financial straits, and its director, Enrico Ferri, availed himself of the opportunity offered him of giving conferences in South America. Moreover, the Reformists secured new triumphs in consequence of the failure of the strike which had been ordered in all the provinces of Parma. It had lasted two months and was characterized by great excesses and violence.

The congress of 1908 held in Florence from the 19th to the 23d of September gave the Reformists eighteen thousand, two hundred and fifty votes. The Integralists received five thousand, nine hundred and eighty-four, and the Syndicalists five thousand, nine hundred and twenty-seven. Thus the main body of the Integralists had passed over to the Reformists, whose leader, Bissolati, had again become the director of the Avanti. The Neapolitan Syndicalists had broken with the official organization and erected a new and autonomous party. The President of the Congress of Florence was Andrea Costa, the man who was the personification of all the various stages of Italian Socialism. He was the first leader of the Internationals, first social member at Montecitorio, and finally President of the Congress at which the Reformists triumphed. Italian Socialism had thus passed from Bakouninism to rigid Marxism, then from moderate Marxism to the adoption of the minimum program; afterwards to Syndicalism; and finally from Syndicalism to Integralism. The shape which it now has shows that Italian Socialism in contact with the realities of things, loses its harshness and becomes a new and middle class party.

In the Congress of Florence, we have, as it were, the last stage of the evolution of ideas among Italian Socialists. Congress after congress has seen them continually gaining strength. In the elections of 1909, by means of fusion with other parties, their influence developed; the electors rose to three hundred and thirty thousand, and among the five hundred and eight members of Parliament, they now count forty-four. What is to be the attitude of Italian Socialism with regard to religion, the army, and the various political groups, will be better seen when the next national Socialist congress is convened.

I. QUIRICO, S.J.

Mass in the Presbyterian Church

I.

One of the earliest objections which the Presbyterian Church of Scotland and the Calvinist Churches of the continent made to the Catholic Church, and one upon which they insisted most fiercely, was to the sacrifice of the Mass or anything which resembled it. The repeated allusions to ornaments and vestments, "the rags of Popery" in their struggles and opposition to the Anglican Church and prelacy, as a comparison between their worship and rites and the hated Mass, amply show their attitude. The Presbyterian Church of Scotland commenced with an attack on the Mass, by penalizing celebrant and worshipers. The Act of 1560 provided:

"And presentlie, notwithstanding the reformatioun already maid according to Goddis worde, yet not the less thair is sum that stubbornlie perseveris in thair wickit Idolatrie, sayand Mess and baptizand conforme to the papis kirk, prophanand thairthrow the forsaidis sacramentis in quiet and secret places, regardand thairthrow nather God nor his holie worde,

"Thairfore it is statute and ordainit that . . . na maner of person nor personis say Mess nor yit here Mess nor be present thairat under the pane of confiscatioun of all thair guidis movable and unmovable and puneissing of thair bodies at the discretioun of the magistrat."

And later on when the assembly of divines was called at Westminster, in 1645, and made their celebrated Confession of Faith, which has been literally adopted in nearly all the Presbyterian denominations in the United States of America, they declared:

"The popish sacrifice of the Mass, as they call it, is most abominably injurious to Christ's one only sacrifice, the alone propitiation for all the sins of the elect."

"Private Masses, or receiving the sacrament by a priest or any other, alone, worshipping the elements, lifting them up, or carrying them about for adoration, are all contrary to the nature of this sacrament and to the institution of Christ." (Westminster Confession, chapter xxix, secs. 2 and 4).

Anyone who has ever been acquainted with the bare and austere methods of worship of the Presbyterians, at least here in this country, will understand that they have hitherto endeavored to carry out in practice what they have asserted in their Confession. The Lord's Supper among them has been a mere division of bread and wine spread as near as may be upon an ordinary table covered with a decent white cloth. It so approximated an ordinary meal that a sitting posture was inculcated in their Directory of Worship. It is needless to say that no hint of vestment or liturgical form was ever used; nothing save the recital of the few brief words of institution found in Holy Scripture, helped out with extempore prayer and the singing of hymns. Of late years (1906) a form of service known as the Book of Common Worship, largely borrowed from the Episcopal Church, at least in substance, has been provided, but its use is merely optional and not general nor obligatory. There is, therefore, in the teaching and practice of the Presbyterian Church nothing which permits or approves of the Mass or its attendant ceremonies and embellishments, as found in the Catholic Church, or even in any of the schismatic churches which still retain the Mass and all the practices which go with it.

This makes it the more astonishing to know that the Presbyterian Church of the United States of America, as exemplified in so-called home missionary work in New York and New Jersey, actually provides the service of an imitation Mass for the people whom it seeks to reach, as several dailies and weeklies have already informed us. Whether the central body, which provides the service, the missionaries or Presbyterian clergymen, who perform the Mass, or the persons who furnish the funds to sustain the missions, believe in or approve of such rites so inconsistent with, if not repugnant to, the former teaching and practice of the Presbyterian Church, we have no means of knowing. Certainly the worshipers, if devoutness, gesture and words count for anything, seem to believe they are in attendance upon a real Mass, and there seems to be naught to undeceive them.

In order, therefore, that there may be no mistake about the Presbyterian maintenance of a form of Mass, which is to outward appearance, a close imitation of the real thing, I will give two examples, one in the Borough of Manhattan, City of New York, and one in the City of Newark, New Jersey. There are others in Pittsburg and in Canada, but I have not personally examined them.

It may be said at the outset that the form of Mass which is imitated by the Presbyterian missions, is not the Roman Mass, nor are the people the followers of the Latin rite. The form of Mass which is the basis of their imitation is the Greek Liturgy, which is used both by the Greek Catholics and by the Greek Orthodox, which is, of course, ordinarily unfamiliar to the usual Catholic of the Latin rite, or the imitation would have been detected long ago.

The people among whom the Presbyterian missionaries work in this particular regard are the Ruthenians, who come from Galicia and Hungary, and who are mostly Catholics in their native country, although numbers of them are of the Orthodox Church. At any rate, they firmly believe in the Mass and the Blessed Sacrament, although they do not know the English language, nor, perhaps, are well instructed in all the particulars of their faith. Those among whom the proselyters work may be said to be in the Greek rite what many of the Italians are in the Latin rite, weak and indifferent but still Catholics in their nearest and dearest beliefs.

When I was informed that the Presbyterian missionaries were using a form of Mass to attract the Ruthenians, I wrote to their Board of Home Missions about it and received the following answer:

"There are two Ruthenian centres under our Immigration Department. An organized church, the First Ruthenian Presbyterian Church of Sts. Peter and Paul, in Newark, New Jersey, under the pastorate of Rev. W. Pyndykowsky, with a membership of 117, and a Sunday School of 25. A church building is being erected by the Presbytery of Newark for this congregation. The second centre is in connection with our Hope Chapel work on East Fourth Street [339 East 4th Street] under the pastorate of Rev. Basil Kusiv, who, I should say, has a group of 100 or more adherents. This work is not organized. It is among a poorer class of people. The services at Hope Chapel are well cared for in a large auditorium, and are carried out with much of the picturesqueness of the Greek liturgical service. . . . I understand there are two centres in Pittsburg, or environs, where the Ruthenians are ministered to, but they are not, so far as I know, organized. The Rev. John Bodrug, now engaged in missionary work among the Ruthenians in Canada, where the work is well established, served us in inaugurating the work here in the East. The Protestant work meets with much opposition from the Orthodox Church."

This letter practically admitted what I had been told about the missionary practices among the Ruthenians, and after consultation I made observations at both of the places mentioned in the letter. The Greek rite is perfectly familiar to me, having witnessed it in Greek Catholic and Greek Orthodox churches all over the world, and a pocket edition of the Slavonic Liturgy or Mass of St. John Chrysostom enabled me to accurately compare all portions of the Greek Mass, which I did not already know by heart.

Another chapel in which this imitation Greek Mass is celebrated is known as Hope Chapel, No. 339 East Fourth Street, in the Borough of Manhattan. A sign outside in the Little Russian language announces that the Independent National Ruthenian Church holds services there. Inside the chapel is, in its original condition, very much like the usual type of missionary chapels with pews and a platform, on which there is a prominent pulpit in the middle. Were this the only furniture, it would not differ much from the ordinary Presbyterian Church. But for the use of the Ruthenians it was fitted up exactly like the ordinary Greek Catholic Church, leaving out the iconostasis. On the main floor below the level of the platform and just under the pulpit was an analogion or sacred table, just as in the ordinary Greek Catholic churches. On the table, which, of course, was covered with a white linen cloth, stood a silver crucifix in the centre, flanked by a lighted candle on either side. As the congregation came in each member, particularly the women, went up to the analogion, made the sign of the cross and kissed the crucifix, exactly as is done in Greek Catholic churches.

On the platform behind the pulpit and directly against the wall was a large white altar. On either side of the altar there were three lighted candles, and on the niche towards the top of the altar there were three more lighted candles. In the middle of the altar, above what would be the tabernacle in Catholic churches generally, was a large cross, while under it was the Book of the Gospels, placed upright, as is usual in Greek churches. At the side of the altar a small sluzhebnik, or missal, was placed.

When the celebrant came in to begin the services he was attired in the usual vestments of a Greek Catholic priest. He wore the stichar (or alb), the epitrachie (or stole) the pyass (or belt-like girdle) the narukvitsy (or gauntlets), and the phelonian (or chasuble), so that he could not be distinguished from a priest in the Greek Catholic or Greek Orthodox Church, so far as the vestments went. When he came on the altar he made the sign of the cross, and taking the gospels blessed the people in the ordinary form of the beginning of the Mass, "Blahoslovenno tsarstvo, etc. Throughout the service the celebrant faced the altar with his back to the people, except when blessing and on a few other occasions.

ANDREW J. SHIPMAN.

CORRESPONDENCE

From the Portuguese Exiles

In the issue of the Independent for Dec. 1, is printed this editorial:

"News comes to us from Portugal that all the bishops and higher clergy have given in their adhesion to the republic. That is not wholly surprising. There has been no action of the republic, so far as reported, that would be particularly offensive to the regular clergy. The hostility is to the monks and nuns; and it is well known that the parochial clergy and their bishops are often not well disposed to the favored orders."

At first glance it would seem impossible that a publication of the supposed standing of the Independent could make the succession of grotesque mistakes contained in this paragraph. People who are being continually misled, or annoyed, by the frequent oracular dissertations the Independent prints on Catholic topics, can gauge their real value when it is evident that they are published with the imprimatur of an editor, who shows that he does not know the difference between the parochial and the regular clergy. His strange notions also of what is being "offensive to the regular clergy" can be realized from the following letter sent by Father Bernardino Araujo, S.J., one of the Portuguese exiles to Father Alonzo Gonzaga da Fonseca:

HOTEL PARIS, GIBRALTAR, NOV. 4, 1910.

MY DEAR FATHER FONSECA:

It is now a month since they set fire to the property in our residence of Setubal. We could not persuade ourselves that things would reach such a pass; but when we saw the city hall in flames and no attempt made to check them, we realized what fate might befall us. About nine o'clock in the evening, some of Ours undertook to find out whether any one of the gates was left unguarded, so we might escape one at a time. They did not set fire to our residence, for they were afraid of destroying the adjacent houses.

But they did worse, for they broke in the doors and on entering they destroyed everything, including the statues of the saints. The statue of St. Joseph was hurled into the fire three times and then thrown in front of the door of Senhora D. M. do Carmo, a benefactress who had presented it to the church. The Dead Christ, after having been disfigured, mocked and dragged through the streets, was left at the door of the hospital. The statue of the Sacred Heart, which was venerated on the high altar, was thrown into the body of the church. Pulpit, choir stalls, altars, organ, confessionals, library, and whatever else could be carried thither were burnt up in two fires which were kindled in front of the church, but not until the rioters had seized for themselves what booty they wished.

All that was saved was the Blessed Sacrament, which we conveyed with us to a hill-top overlooking the city, where we had found refuge in the house of a benefactor. From there we witnessed the tumult and destruction of property. On the morning of the following day, the Child Jesus was conducted by us into Egypt, that is, to a farmhouse in the mountains, distant about two hours' journey from the city. There we received the Holy Communion. We slept, or rather passed the night in the hills, for what we heard from chance passers-by made us very uneasy. On the second day, after again receiving the Holy Communion, thus consuming all the particles, we penetrated further into the hills, but being warned that spies were near, we concealed ourselves as well as we could in a forest. I then recalled those words: "In speluncis et cavernis terræ," etc. That night we separated into bands. A lay brother and I wished to get a little rest on a hill near the city of Azeitao; but it rained so heavily that, as we had only one cloak between us as a protection from the cold, we thought it better to keep on. As we went, we stumbled upon an old fellow armed with a big stick. "You are arrested," he bawled. "Why?" "Because the Government has ordered the arrest of all friars." "But, are we friars?" "Pardon me, gentlemen." "Well, this time we pardon your ignorance . . . good-bye." After his departure, we had a good laugh and congratulated ourselves on our escape.

On the following day, we went down to the city of Palmella with the intention of continuing on foot to our native town in the heart of the province of Estremadura al Minho. Some people who passed us on the way and recognized us spoke about us after they reached the city. The lay brother, who was tired and somewhat worn out, entered an open gate and asked for a drink of water. It was given readily, but was accompanied by the request to move on at once, for they did not wish to have their house fired. Here we met a workingman who, for a small sum, brought me a blouse such as is worn by porters; but the disguise availed me little, for I was recognized at once, as the tonsure betrayed me.

When we reached the railway station of Pinhal Novo, we were surrounded by a crowd of men who talked scandalously. They accused us of what they themselves did and thus they pronounced their own condemnation. But I still had my tongue in my head and I made a few pointed remarks. "Here we have over again the judgment-seat of Pilate," I finally said, "for then, Barabbas, a thief and assassin, was released and Jesus was condemned. The criminals in the Setubal jail have been turned loose that they might sack our house, and now you carry us off to prison."

The crowd became silent and the medical officer who was with the troop that escorted us gave a sign of approval; no more foul words were uttered. We made our Way of the Cross from this place to the prison of Aldeia Gallega. Never had death seemed so near to me, never had I so often and so fervently made the offering of my life as during those days. We spent five days in the prison of Aldeia Gallega, one in Lisbon, and thirty at Limoeiro with Ours. With their companionship and the visits and offerings that were made to us, we were all right. Then we were taken before the Minister of Justice, and from him we were conducted with a large escort of cavalry and infantry to Oporto to board a vessel. There, instead of wishes for a happy journey, we heard shouts of, "May you die and never come back!"

The British Government at Gibraltar gave orders that we should be received kindly, and in case there was not room in the hotels, word was to be sent, so a place in the barracks could be prepared for us. We were well received by the great crowd of people at the landing and were taken ashore without charge; and some unknown lady paid for the carriages that conveyed us to the hotels. Along the streets, there were no insults, no fierce looks; respect and good order were everywhere manifest. Many have called to pay their respects.

Good old Father Machado, who was with us, was invited by the Christian Brothers to accept their hospitality; one of the lay brothers went with him. Yesterday (Nov. 3d), I went over to spend some time with him, for he was very ill and his death, or rather the end of his martyrdom, was expected at almost any moment. Up to an hour after midnight he was able to move his arms and bless himself, but that was all. His breathing continued regular until about five o'clock in the morning, when I thought he was resting, but the brother said that the end had come. I pronounced the last absolution, he gave a faint sigh, and peacefully passed away. All the brothers were summoned by the community bell. Entering, they knelt in prayer and recommended the departed religious to the mercy of God.

Father Machado had been very active in giving the spiritual exercises to the diocesan clergy, and he was thus engaged at Santarem when he was arrested. He was very zealous in spreading the devotion to the Sacred Heart, and was rewarded with a happy death on the First Friday. As he had spent most of his life in college work, so his death came to him in a college where some four hundred students offered the Holy Communion for the repose of his soul. He is our first martyr of the Republican persecution. When he was led forth from the prison he was heard to say, "Good-bye till we meet in Heaven."

Pardon me if this letter is somewhat rambling, for I am tired and my head is in a whirl.

BERNARDINO ARAUJO, S.J.

A postal card mailed by the same Father on Nov. 5, gives the following information: All Ours have left Lisbon. Fathers Beirao and Silva and Brother Simao have reached here on their way to India. The others have gone to Holland. Very few remain here, and we are pleasantly placed. A few words about the funeral of Father Machado: The clergy of Gibraltar wished to officiate, and it was an imposing function. There was high Mass, with a female choir, as is the custom here; when the procession passed through the streets the stores were closed and the soldiers presented arms. Several English societies took part; there was an immense throng of people, and not a word was heard. The interment took place in the mortuary chapel of some Irish Sisters belonging to a congregation founded by a Jesuit. The sumptuous casket bore the name of the deceased Father. Even the Protestant bishop and the rabbi of the synagogue were present. It was an eloquent protest against the Portuguese revolutionists.

Freemasonry in France, Past and Present

The history of the French Revolution of 1789 has an up-to-date interest: the destinies of modern France are still controlled by the far-reaching effects of an upheaval, whose real story is only beginning to be accurately known.

Among the French writers whose efforts in this direction are, at the present moment, attracting attention, is M. Gustave Gautherot, a lecturer, as well as a writer, whose Conferences at the Catholic University of Paris draw a large and interested audience every Saturday afternoon. M. Gautherot, a young man, is a fluent speaker and a thorough master of the subject he has taken in hand. His lessons are packed with first rate evidence and undisputed facts; he brings to bear on his subject the testimony of historians of an opposite school to his own, and ably uses these quotations to support certain views that, although they may, at first, appear startling enough are, when examined more closely, backed up by strong evidence. According to M. Gautherot, the upheaval of 1789 was neither the spontaneous outbreak of an oppressed people nor yet the natural consequence of a decayed monarchy.

That certain abuses existed under the old régime is an undoubted fact, but these abuses were neither deep-seated, nor general enough to bring about so tremendous an issue. In the lecture delivered by him on November 19th, one of the most interesting of his course, M. Gautherot clearly laid down his opinion that the Revolution of '89, which was social and religious, as well as political, was the result of a carefully organized conspiracy. The prime movers of the conspiracy being the French Freemasons of the day, whose doctrines are embodied in the irreligious and revolutionary code that, since 1789, is opposed by its advocates to the doctrines of the Church.

M. Gautherot, after expressing his opinion, proceeded to support it by striking evidence. He proved, by contemporary testimonies, that during the second half of the eighteenth century, the Freemason lodges were numerous and powerful throughout the country. Their members might be divided into two classes: the outsiders were the frivolous courtiers, the gay and unsuspecting men and women, to whom Freemasonry was a fashionable amusement. All the great names in France are to be found on the list of Masons; the Princess de Lamballe, the Queen's friend, was affiliated to a lodge, and the quaint ceremonies of her reception greatly amused Marie Antoinette.

These fashionable members of the sect served as a decoy; they knew absolutely nothing of the dark plots that were hatched behind the scenes, and their presence helped to blind their countrymen as to the real meaning of the association.

Upon the work that went on in the recesses of the lodges, M. Gautherot throws a lurid light; in 1789 there existed in Paris, and in the provinces many societies founded for the express purpose of propagating revolutionary doctrine. They received their orders from the lodges, and they carried on their evil work with extraordinary activity and secrecy. All the leaders of the Revolution, Lafayette, Camille Desmoulins, Robespierre, Marat and others, were Freemasons and the Grand Master of the eighty lodges that existed in Paris in 1789, was the regicide Prince Philippe Egalité. It would lead us too far to follow M. Gautherot when he traces through the mazes of history the "invisible hand" of Freemasonry, strong in its power of destruction of all ancient landmarks. This theory is confirmed by other writers on the subject, and is still more strongly supported by the extraordinary power of French Freemasons at the present day.

Their work, which was mysterious and secret in 1789, is now open and unconcealed; even the deliberations of their "Convents" are made public and the origin of the evil laws that are, slowly but surely, un-Christianizing France may be traced back to the "resolutions" and wishes expressed in the lodges. They have long since taken possession of the Government and, at the present moment, M. Lafferre, one of the leading Freemasons of the day, is enthroned as Minister of "Work" in the former Palace of the Archbishops of Paris. The teaching of the sect as regards religion is, in 1910, what it was in 1789; its openly avowed purpose being to extirpate from "French society the influence of religion under whatever shape it presents itself," a statement that was made at the General Assembly of Freemasons in 1885; or, as M. Lanessan, once Minister de la Marine, put it more tersely: "We must crush, not only clericalism, but God himself."

But if the twentieth century Freemasons are one with their eighteenth century brethren in their resolve to stamp out religion in their country, they have adopted different methods to serve their political ends; the guillotine of 1793 is not likely to return, but the steady exclusion of practical Catholics from all branches of public service has gradually made Freemasonry a necessary condition of success in the official world of France.

There exist several associations in Paris, whose object is to enlighten the public mind as to the real aim of the Freemasons; these associations are carefully organized, and their work is thoroughly trustworthy. They pay no heed to second-class evidence, but base their denunciations of French Freemasonry upon the testimony of documents issued by the sect or of speeches made in the lodges. To these workers in a good cause, men like M. Gustave Gautherot bring valuable assistance.

History is being rewritten on many points and, upon the Revolution of 1789, the school of which he is one of the leaders, seems likely to open new and unexpected vistas. The large attendance that every Saturday afternoon flocks to hear him, proves the interest that is excited by the subject: the dry bones of history are restored to life when the past is brought into close connection with the present and, in the present condition of France, Freemasons and their work have a significant and up-to-date meaning.

ANGLO-FRENCH CATHOLIC.

The Evangelical Church in Germany

Apropos of the "Los-von-Rom" movement, which is fanatically carried on in Austria, mainly through the financial contributions of Protestants in Germany, the Bonifatius Korrespondenz, in a recent number presents some striking facts in regard to the Protestant students of theology in German universities, from which it would seem that the efforts of the Protestants of Germany would be better directed towards the awakening of the religious spirit at home, than to the making of proselytes in a Catholic country. The figures are taken from the Protestant Ecclesiastical Year-Book, by J. Schneider-Elberfeld. They show that the total number of such students in the universities of Germany is 2,320, a number which was reached in 1840, whereas, in 1890, it was 4,536. Since 1840, the Protestant population of Germany has doubled. One learns further that in 1907 there took place, in Berlin, 17,442 evangelical marriages before a minister; in 1908 the number was 9,390, a difference of over 8,000, although the total number of marriages in Berlin in 1908 was greater than in the previous year. It is of interest also to note that only seven per cent. of the Evangelical Church members in Berlin receive the "Lord's Supper," on the average only once a year.

M. J. AHERN, S.J.

A M E R I C A

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1910.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1910, and published weekly by The America Press, New York, President, THOMAS J. CAMPBELL; Secretary, MICHAEL J. O'CONNOR; Treasurer, J. J. WILLIAMS.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Sq., W., New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

The "Independent" and Pius IX

There is an article in the New York Independent of November 3, 1910, which has probably disappointed the writer in not eliciting any reply from Catholics. As far as we know, not a single paper has even alluded to it. Possibly the marvelous editorial skill which could condense in 350 words so many misrepresentations, mis-translations, insinuations, errors and historical blunders may have dismayed and silenced them. The article in question is entitled "Del Val as Advocatus Diaboli."

In the first place it might be in order to remark that in dealing with such a subject, discourtesy is very much out of place, and that it would be just as proper to call, for instance, ex-President Roosevelt "Velt" as to designate the distinguished Papal Secretary of State Merry del Val by such a truncated travesty of his name. Certain journalistic methods should not be permitted to invade the sanctum of what professes to be a respectable magazine.

Secondly, a Cardinal Secretary of State while attending to the obligations of his important post, does not and can not be the Advocatus diaboli in this or any other process of beatification. The labors involved in both offices would make such a concentration of functions about as conceivable as if the United States Secretary of State were acting simultaneously as Attorney General.

Thirdly, the process of the beatification of Pius IX has not been "thrown off to the Greek kalends or indefinitely postponed" as the Independent has been informed by "cable."

Unfortunately for the writer of the article, the "cable" is not an infallible source of information. As a matter of fact the process of the beatification of Pius IX is going on regularly and persistently at the present moment. The sessions are held at the Vicariate of Rome under the Presidency of Cardinal Respighi, assisted by the Patriarch of Constantinople, Mgr. Ceparelli, the Rt. Rev. Mgr. Cani, Postulator of the Cause, and the Rev. Sinibaldi, Promoter of the Faith. One of the most recent witnesses summoned to the tribunal was the venerable Cardinal Oreglia, who was so much in evidence at the election of Pius X. Other distinguished men whose names are known in America as well as in Europe have also been notified. These are bits of information which might be valuable for the "cable."

Fourthly, it is absolutely false, in spite of the Independent's assurance to the contrary, that "the Jesuit Ballerini, in his 'Life of Pius IX,' brought out the fact that the future Pope wished to enter Napoleon's service and had thrown off his cassock after being tonsured."

Ballerini says the very opposite. He states expressly that according to the law of that time the name of every young man in Italy was enrolled on the army lists;—Mastai-Ferretti's like the rest—but that after the usual examination he was declared unfit for service. "Iddio così disponente," says Ballerini; e così andò esente non meno dai travagli che dai pericoli del vivere soldatesco," which, for the benefit of the editor of the Independent, means that in the Providence of God he was exempt no less from the labors than from the dangers of military life.

In the fifth place it is sheer calumny to charge young Mastai with "free living." The documents will be forthcoming, if necessary, to show that he led a pure and spotless life. Though the Independent is a quasi-religious magazine, it seems oblivious of the fact that there is a law of God which forbids bearing false witness against one's neighbor.

Not only is the future Pope charged with "free living" but with "Freemasonry." The latter charge has been refuted hundreds of times during the last forty or fifty years, but it is now brought out again, whether from ignorance of all that has been written on the subject, or unwillingness to admit the truth, we cannot say.

We pass over the statement that the petition of the Knights of Columbus for the canonization of Pius "fell flat." Whether or not the Knights ever made the petition which "fell flat" we have not been informed, but we may say that if nothing more was heard of it, they will be in no worse plight than all the Archbishops and Bishops of the United States who asked for the canonization of Father Jogues and Tégakwitha. Nothing has been heard of that petition either. However, canonizations are not made by referendum.

With regard to the secret intelligence possessed by the Jesuits about Magnien's publisher, we venture the suggestion that probably some Jesuit knew how to read, and was thus able to spell out, on the title page of the book which is on the table before us, the imprint, "Burns & Oates, 28 Orchard Street, Portman Square, London." He then stealthily crept around and whispered it to the others. It will thus be properly and vividly melodramatic.

Finally, we suppose that by this time the editor-in-chief has discovered the unfortunate blunder which even the most thoughtless reader might point out as one of the features of this very objectionable article. It is in connection with the veiled and mysterious statements of the Independent about the "Lancelotti documents."

The fatal blow is delivered in this wise. The writer first runs to cover because of his previous pronouncement about the early life of Pope Pius, and admits that "there may be some doubts about the youth Mastai," but he adds, "there seems to be none about Bishop Mastai. Those Lancelotti documents as to his career as bishop in 1852 must be damaging."

In the first place "Mastai" never wore the title of Bishop. In 1827 he was nominated Archbishop of Spoleto, and in 1832 was made Archbishop of Imola. Secondly, as every one knows, he was elected Sovereign Pontiff in 1846. Hence he could not have been bishop or archbishop of either place in 1852.

The paper that can be guilty of such a mistake about one of the great events of contemporaneous history, viz.: the election of Pope Pius IX, whose life it is discussing and besmirching, forfeits all rights to be believed in any of the charges it brings up about the illustrious and saintly Pontiff.

Mrs. Eddy

Referring to the recent death of Mrs. Eddy, the New York World, in an able editorial of December 5, 1910, says of Christian Science, that "what is true in it is not original, and what is original is not true." Nor, it might be added, is it either Christian or scientific. It assails the fundamentals of Christianity both in dogma and morals, while its contempt of all reason, both in its premises and conclusions, shuts it out forever from the possibility of being even remotely classed as science. It is merely a recrudescence of the wild doctrines of the Gnostics who were troubling the world long before the advent of Christ, and who were after that, a constant source of anxiety to the Church for the first three or four centuries of the Christian era.

It will suffice to turn to any account, however succinct, of ancient Gnosticism to see the affinity. There is the same ridiculous and frantic pantheism, the same nonsense about the Father-Mother God; the same assault upon the personality of Christ, the same all-including Divine Mind, the same pronounced Manicheism. Even Mother Eddy's Adam whom she made a dam, an obstruction, has his prototype. Indeed she might almost be sued for an infringement of copyright. Salvation consists not in the individual redemption of each human soul. It is a cosmic process which consists in setting free some part of the divine light from the intrinsically and essentially evil hyle or matter in which it is immersed. And so on to the end. In brief, Christian Science is nothing but a huge plagiarism. It is the reproduction and a restatement of a congeries of errors more than two thousand years old.

The language also in which the religious formulas of both are set forth is of the same unintelligible character. What Taine said of the ancient Gnostics may be repeated without qualification of their modern imitators. "Any one," he moans, "who reads the teachings of the Gnostics breathes in an atmosphere of fever, and fancies himself in a hospital among delirious patients who are lost in gazing at their own teeming thoughts and who fix their lustrous eyes on empty space." In the same way it would be impossible for the most patient man to piece together the incoherences and contradictions that cover every page of Mrs. Eddy's books. One feels his own intellectuals giving way and gives up the perusal in despair. As a matter of fact, however, the modern madness is not quite as acute or extravagant as the one of ancient times. The Orientals have always distinguished themselves by the gymnastics of their hierophants.

There is also a sharp resemblance in the practical part of the creed. Thus when we search the Scriptures we find that Simon Magus was the first Gnostic of Christian times. He had listened, but not with humility, to the Apostles, and absorbed what he fancied was Christian Science, but he determined to make it pay. Mrs. Eddy being a shrewd Yankee did the same, and Christian Science made her wealthy. She or her advisers caught the psychological moment and just when the masters of medicine were pursuing sickness into its innermost lairs, with such persistency and success that the most infinitesimal germ could not escape them, this wonderful dame from New Hampshire appears and dispenses with all laborious research. "Think you are well," she says, "and you are"; and as with other Faith Curers, hundreds of thousands of people flock around her and pour money into her purse. Possibly they may be asking now, why if thought were such a prophylactic against disease it lost its power in the presence of death even when the turn of the prophetess came. It will not do to tell us that the elimination of death is reserved for some future period. The Scriptures to which Christian Science so persistently appeals has written on its pages a sentence that can never be effaced: "Statutum est hominibus semel mori" (Heb. ix, 27). It is decreed that once all men shall die.

In studying the psychology of this movement there is one feature of it that is at first somewhat puzzling. Why is it that so many earnest men and women have adopted its tenets, and that even some of the staid Protestant sects have been thinking of "healing the sick" as a help to fill their depleted churches? Even Extreme Unction has been advocated, not for its spiritual, but temporal advantages. Possibly the reason is that the jarring of the various preachers has driven these good people to desperation, and they are beginning to fancy that this may be a new evangel peculiarly adapted to the times in which Science and Health are so eagerly and superstitiously sought after. And so they give their adherence to this female apostle at least as a trial.

The Church, however, is not disturbed by this religious or anti-religious movement. She passed through it sixteen hundred years ago, when brighter and greater intellects were misled by it than those that are now held in its thrall. The vogue which the delusion achieved in the past as well as at present, only goes to show into what abyssal depths the human mind may descend when not controlled in its search for truth by a divinely guided authority.

The English Crisis

The Duke of Wellington, it is said, called the Reform Bill of 1832 the beginning of the end for the British constitution. One institution after another would be destroyed until nothing would be left of the old order. The Englishman of the middle nineteenth century used to attribute an almost superhuman wisdom to the Duke, whom he revered as the greatest man England had produced, and therefore the greatest the world had ever seen. Consequently the story is not absolutely authentic.

Nevertheless, had the Duke said so, he would have told the truth, for the Bill was the passage from a monarchy to a democracy. The peculiar English character, the many institutions to be attacked, their great power of resistance, have made the process he is supposed to have foreseen a slow one. But looking back over eighty years one sees that it has been sure in its operations. The franchise has been extended, privileges have been abolished, one reform after another has been proposed looking towards democracy, and not one, though suspended for the moment, has failed in the end. The mere mooting of such a reform in parliament has been a guarantee that it would have its place eventually in the statute book.

Towards the end of the last century the House of Commons destroyed its own ancient character, by recognizing that its members no longer had full power to discharge their functions according to their own lights, but were mere mandataries of the people. "The popular mandate" is continually in the mouths of speakers on both sides of the House to-day. The late Lord Salisbury was the last real parliamentarian. His nephew, the leader of the Unionist party (the name "Conservative" seems to have followed into desuetude the older "Tory"), has proclaimed himself a Democrat and proud of the title.

And now the hour of the peers has come. From the day, some twenty-five years ago, when Gladstone warned them "to set their house in order," the passing of this has been, by all experience, certain. All agree that, as a purely hereditary chamber, its long life is over. This is not to be imputed to the rising democracy exclusively; for the changing of its own character has contributed to its ruin. The peers were originally the tenants-in-chief of the Crown. As such they were the King's immediate council, an estate of the realm which, as the limited monarchy developed, had every right to a concurrent voice in legislation. Above everything else they represented the land, which stable in its nature is necessarily conservative; and the fact that they impeded revolutionary legislation is in itself no reason for the abolition of their powers. The real sin of the peers is that they are not what they are supposed to be. They have lost the reason of their existence. They are bankers, brewers, stock-brokers, manufacturers, railway builders, coal miners, shipowners, newspaper proprietors, in a word tradesmen whose proper representation is in the Commons, and there is no reason in the world why such should be called to the functions of hereditary legislators. On the other hand, the great noble families whose perennial connection with the land gave justice to the possession of such functions by their heads, are becoming fewer every day.

Theoretically, then, the Peers should go the way of other old world institutions in England. Practically their abolition will be a severe blow; for no one can be blind to the fact that English democracy shares the bad qualities of the democracy of the European continent. Could Catholics see that a substitute for the House of Lords is to be provided which will protect the rights of religion and education, they would not shed a tear over its fall, for it has been by no means a firm support of such rights. But they do not see this, and so they fear for the future.

A Christian Ruler

Emperor William of Germany, with all his keen zest for the material upbuilding of his empire, has not, like so many others among our modern "great ones," learned to forget the God of his fathers. He retains the old-fashioned Christian idea that the ruler of a nation has responsibilities beyond the prosperity and the peaceful development of his kingdom. The German monarch is not ashamed to confess his dependence on a personal God, whose instrument he affirms himself to be, and whose providential dispositions as the Absolute Ruler of the world he would have his people recognize and reverently respect. What a lesson his stand should suggest to the present day leaders of Continental politics!

Acknowledging an address of welcome from the Arch-Abbot of the Benedictine Abbey of Beuron on the occasion of his recent visit to that venerable monastery, the Emperor said: "It is my earnest purpose to conserve in my people their old loyalty to religion. To realize this purpose I understand how important it is that the temporal and spiritual powers work together and in harmony." His authority, he frankly proclaims, must rest on the word and the personality of Christ; only then shall it have strength to beat back the destructive doctrines our century finds sweeping in upon mankind. Emperor William will have it that the ruler of a people be first and above all a sincere Christian. This character, moreover, he must bear, not in an empty profession of a dead faith, but in an active efficiency for the welfare of his people, aiming always to promote Christian principles and Christian life in his kingdom. This he can do, adds the Emperor, only by safeguarding religion and by fostering the influence of Christian faith among his people. The throne, then, and the altar must be in harmony, mutually aiding each other in the efforts put forth to spread the material prosperity and the peaceful development of the nation.

Old-fashioned notions,—these,—yet they are the notions, which, as history tells us, underlie the onward march of every people that has achieved greatness.

Episcopalian Comprehensiveness

The glory of Anglicanism, in this country Protestant Episcopalianism, is its comprehensiveness. What this is may be seen from the following specimens of the teaching of its ministers.

Bishop Lofthouse of Keewatin said in St. Philip's Church, Norwood, Manitoba, on November 13 last:

"I want to tell you that Confirmation is not a sacrament and not by any means equal to the Lord's Supper or the ordinance of Baptism. It is only a means to an end, and only an outward sign of one's belief. There are only two sacraments, and these have been given by God Himself; these were ordained by Christ. Confirmation was never ordained by Christ; it is only a man-made ordinance."

The difficulties of the Brighton vicars with the Bishop of Chichester, their resignation and subsequent reception into the Church, alarmed English Anglicanism, which determined to take the most effective means to prevent the congregations from following their ministers to Rome. Accordingly a person calling himself "Father" Maxwell was brought in to preach at St. Bartholomew's Church on October 16. He, too, spoke about confirmation:

"Very soon any person who has been received into the Church of Rome will receive . . . something which will claim to be the sacrament of Confirmation. . . . You cannot be confirmed a second time, and therefore you must, if you go through the ceremony, either deny all the sacraments you have received, or you are guilty of taking part in an act of sacrilege. . . . Confirmation confers character; it leaves its indelible mark on the souls, and it cannot be repeated without sacrilege."

The bishop has cloudy notions about ends and means: the "Father" is weak as regard dilemmas. But this is not what we wish to point out. Here are two Anglican ministers, both in good standing, both authorized to teach in the name of their denomination, giving out contradictory doctrines on the important matter of the sacraments. The body that authorized them is responsible for their contradictions. It is not Bishop Lofthouse who says: "It is not," and "Father" Maxwell who says: "It is," but the Church of England, which with two voices, is always ready to affirm and to deny. Yet St. Paul tells us: "The Son of God, Jesus Christ, who was preached among you by us, by me, and Sylvanus, and Timothy, was not, It is and It is not, but, It is, was in him." The matter is more serious for Episcopalians than they are willing to admit.

LITERATURE

History of Ireland from the Earliest Times to the Present Day. By the Rev. E. A. D'ALTON, LL.D., M.R.I.A. London: The Gresham Publishing Company. 6 half volumes. Illustrated.

The demand for a really good history of Ireland is so obvious that it is a matter of surprise no Irish scholar tackled it until a few years back, when a young Tuam curate, under the aegis of his illustrious Archbishop, undertook the task. In his Preface Rev. Dr. D'Alton, whose historical labors earned for him the honorary LL.D. of the Royal University of Ireland, well says: "So many of the parts of Irish history are controverted, so many distorted by prejudice or interest, round so many events such fierce passions have played, that to discover the exact truth and to be courageous enough to tell it is not so easy as it may seem. This work is not written on these lines. It is hoped it will be found accurate. Amid discouragements and difficulties which some of my readers will understand, no pains has been spared to discover the truth, and when discovered it has been told. There is neither interpolation nor suppression; as nothing is added, nothing is concealed."

This is surely the keynote of the true historian, and it amply explains the raison d'être of the present work. Archbishop Healy supplies an appreciative foreword and he rightly points out the need for "a full, accurate, well-written and impartial History of Ireland." He assures the public that Dr. D'Alton is not only a painstaking writer in verifying his authorities, but is a good Gaelic scholar and conversant with the ancient Irish annals—being also familiar with the State Papers and other official documents. Let us at once echo the eulogistic remarks of Archbishop Healy, and iterate the praise which his Grace of Tuam has bestowed on Dr. D'Alton's admirable "History of Ireland." But let us be frank, and give a note of warning: the author's manifest endeavor to be impartial has led him into giving too much credence to the State Papers, and relying too implicitly on the calendared documents, many of which have been proved to be false. One needs great caution in reading into the calendars, and one must be slow in quoting one-sided accounts, especially in the case of writers who mainly wrote what was likely to be pleasing to their masters.

Volume I brings us down to 1210. The frontispiece is an excellent reproduction of examples from the famous "Book of Kells," and there are eight full page illustrations, as also a map of Ireland before the Anglo-Norman Invasion. On the whole this period is satisfactorily treated, but Dr. D'Alton has evidently failed to consult a most important book on the coming of the Norman invaders—"The Song of Dermot and the Earl," published by the Oxford University Press in 1892. This first-hand poetic account completely ousts the blundering and absurd narrative printed by Harris, in 1747, and quoted so faithfully and so frequently by Dr. D'Alton in his chapters dealing with this unhappy period. It also ousts the narrative of Giraldus, which is so fully relied on, in Bohn's uncritical edition. The chapter on "Cultivation and Condition of the Arts" does not do adequate justice to Celtic genius, and reference might have been made to Sir Walter Armstrong's "Art in Ireland." The Irish Celts were famous workers in enamel, "an art unknown to the Romans prior to their contact with them," as Mr. George Coffey writes. In regard to music the translation of Giraldus as to the instruments is incorrect: "timpanum" is not drum, but "timpan," a small stringed instrument in use in Ireland as late as the seventeenth century. Again, as to the question of Adrian's Bull, Father McLoughlin's book should have been quoted; also Mr. O'Clery's "History of Ireland" (1907), the former against, the latter for the authenticity of the grant of Pope Adrian.

Volume II covers the period 1210 to 1547, and there are nine full page illustrations, as well as two maps. The first two chapters would have been improved by a reference to the works of Sweetman, Knox, and Orpen, also to the Pipe Rolls and Justiciary Rolls. In regard to the Statute of Kilkenny, the true date has been pointed out by Rev. Dr. Carrigan in his diocesan history of Ossory. The chapter on the "Reformation in Ireland" is good, but more use should have been made of Theiner, and of the nine published Calendars of Papal Registers relating to Great Britain and Ireland. Primate Fitz Ralph has not been fairly dealt with, and, apparently, no use has been made of the "Annates Hiberniae." It is regrettable to find Dr. D'Alton falling into the trap laid by Dr. Robert Ware, the forger, in regard to Archbishop Browne and the Irish Parliament of May, 1536. He quotes from Mont, a mere copyist, and tells us that Browne "used all his eloquence to have those acts passed which had been already passed in England; the Archbishop's speech on that occasion has survived." Now, as a matter of fact, George Browne did not arrive in Dublin until July 15, 1536, six weeks after the adjournment of Parliament, and, therefore, could not have spoken the forged address given as genuine by Dr. D'Alton. And be it added, Browne's attempt to promote the "Reformation" was a dismal failure. The legend of the two archbishops and eight bishops who "conformed" under the magic of Browne's sermon scarcely needs refutation: it is too obviously absurd.

Volume III ranges from 1547 to 1649. Here the official account of Shane O'Neill is followed, although accessible contemporary documents tell a different tale. We must congratulate Dr. D'Alton on his excellent account of the rebellion of 1641: his quoted sources of information are sufficient to prove that he has examined and utilized the immense literature on this vexed question.

Volume IV treats of the period 1649 to 1782, and is enriched with nine illustrations, and nine plans of battles, as also a map of Ireland under Cromwell. The Confederate epoch is judiciously surveyed, and the same may be said of Cromwell's campaign. Nothing better has yet appeared as regards the Williamite campaign, and similarly the account of the Irish Brigade on the Continent. However, the chapter on "Writers and Schools" is inadequate and not altogether accurate. To write of the "College at Maynooth, established in 1513," as "of little importance as a college" is a slip. Maynooth was merely a collegiate church, like Youghal. Nor is it correct to describe Stanishurst as "not Irish."

Volume V describes the events from 1782 to 1879, and has numerous illustrations, including Grattan, Tone, Emmet, Davis, O'Connell and Parnell. The '98 period and the carrying of the Act of Union are well told. We are also given a very clear estimate of O'Connell, Davis, Lucas, Duffy, Parnell and other leaders.

Volume VI brings the history down to the year 1908. We candidly confess that this portion of the work is not quite so satisfactory, and perhaps it would have been better had Dr. D'Alton ended his survey with the fifth volume at the year 1879. It is too soon to write with the proper perspective of the events of the past quarter of a century, and some of the opinions penned of living politicians may not be generally acceptable. However,

Dr. D'Alton has the courage of his convictions and is not afraid to express them.

In conclusion it may be repeated that Dr. D'Alton's work is the best of its kind before the public, and should find a place in all well-equipped libraries. And, be it added, the work is most tastefully published by the Gresham Publishing Company (London). Letterpress, binding and illustrations are admirable; and all are the product of Irish hands, in Ireland.

W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD.

The Dawn of Modern England. By CARLOS B. LUMSDEN. London, New York, etc.: Longmans, Green, & Co. $3.00, net.

A certain simplicity in modern life is a common matter of boasting. Once a nobleman could not go abroad without a train of attendants: now even a duke will walk the streets with no other companion than his umbrella. His attire used to be silk lace, gold and precious stones: to-day he is no better dressed—sometimes he is worse dressed—than his secretary or his valet. He dwelt in a palace surrounded with state. He had his master of the horse, his controller of the household, his pages of noble blood, his gentlemen and chamberlains and many another official of sonorous name, whom now we grudge even to kings. And all this belonged to what was called, magnificence.

Those who fancy the passing of all this the sign of progress will be surprised to learn that magnificence is a virtue. Aristotle, Cicero, all the wise ancients, had not the faintest doubt about it. St. Thomas shows it in four articles (ii iia^e Quaest. cxxxiv). His proof is simple and irrefragable. "Human virtue is a certain participation of the divine virtue. But magnificence belongs to divine virtue, according to Psalm lxxvii, 35. 'His magnificence and his power is in the clouds;' therefore magnificence is a virtue." He takes Cicero's definition of it: "Magnificence is the proposing and carrying out of great and lofty things with a broad and splendid idea" (De Invent. ii, 54), adding that the matter of this virtue is the expenditure of wealth.

It is most important to observe with Aristotle that the object of this expenditure is not to be the spender himself. St. Thomas gives the reason. The object of magnificence must be great: the purely personal in one of even the highest station is small in comparison with the divine service and the common weal. These, therefore, are the proper objects of magnificence, not one's own personal affairs, unless these derive a greatness from some other source, as do marriage, the building of a suitable dwelling, and the stately household this implies.

Here we have in a nutshell the philosophy which, in the Middle Ages, not only surrounded the great with ceremony, but also gave birth to the glorious churches and monasteries, with their gold and silver vessels, their gorgeous vestments and their works of art, to the palaces, to the statehouses, guildhalls and hospitals, which are all the admiration of the present day. Each man was an individual. He had his own substantial existence, his own intellect and will, his own initiative, his own responsibility, his own soul to save. Indeed his individuality had much more to do with the future life than with the present. So far as this world was concerned, sovereign, noble, merchant, artisan, yeoman and serf were chiefly social beings, bound together by social rights and obligations in their villages, manors or communes, in their guilds, towns, shires or counties, and provinces, in the kingdom, in the empire, and, one and all, in the great, universal society, the Church. Wealth was to be neither unduly hoarded nor lavishly consumed, and the rule of its expenditure was one's social status, not one's personal fancy. Ownership was personal, it is true, but universally absolute ownership as we have it to-day was hardly thought of. "There is no man without a lord" was at the root of social organization. In feudal society, spread over the greater part of Europe, the lord was he from whom one held the land, the source of all wealth; while in the free cities his place was taken by the guilds organized under their chiefs. The lord of the manor was restricted in his ownership by the rights of his over-lord; but much more so by his tenants' rights embodied in the manorial customs, which no lord could annul. As for money, the modern conception of it was undreamed of. No more than the poet Edmund in "The Brook," did the men of the Middle Ages

Understand how money breeds;
Thought it a dead thing, which received the breath of life only when used in the service of God, of His Church and of human society.

All this is unintelligible to the man of to-day. He cannot be troubled with ceremonial, and counts this a virtue, wondering how his forefathers could have enjoyed it, and not understanding that their satisfaction in it was not so much of the senses as of the conscience, not so much because it was pleasant as because it was right. Then, what the people had seen on Samaria's wall, hair-cloth under the royal robes, was not impossible, perhaps sufficiently common: now it is inconceivable. Rarely in our modern world one comes upon a survival of the old spirit, as in a corner of the bustling city one finds a quaint old house out of all harmony with its surroundings. There may be still some French left for whom Noblesse oblige has its meaning, some English, growing fewer day by day, to speak seriously of the duties of their position, but will there ever arise a Prince of Wales recognizing his motto Ich Dien to mean the very antithesis of the typical life of that Prince of Wales whom history knows as the Regent, and George IV?

We do not pretend that all lived up to the old social theory, but we do hold that all acknowledged it. Now we have frankly abandoned it. The modern man brags of being practical. He likes a comfortable house, modest in its exterior (for he has nothing to do with the man in the street), but with steam heat and every convenience inside, with enough servants for luxury, but not so many as to be troublesome. If there be question of building a town hall, he is the enemy of what he calls waste. Stucco is as good as marble, and moulded cement as cut stone. But the elevators must be swift, and electric lights and telephones must be at one's elbow. Convenience is everything. Woe betide the bishop or pastor who, about to build a church, would put St. Thomas' doctrine on magnificence into practice! "Great heavens!" the practical man will say; "Your church will cost a fortune and we shall all be dead before it is finished. I want to see the result of my money." The unpractical ecclesiastic sighs gently under the reproof, remembering how St. Thomas says that magnificence is a part of fortitude, not because it overcomes avaricious inclinations—this for the magnificent has been done already by liberality, a part of justice—but because it spends freely and joyously in hope, doing its work for God and man, ready to forego the sight of the great harvest of its sowing.

Yet the modern man can be lavish. He will spend on steam yachts, horses, jewelry, the opera, extravagant feasts at which others gasp, in a word, on himself. "Why not?" he asks. "May I not do as I please with my own?" Here we see the individualism which to-day reigns in place of the old social virtue, and of which the outward sign is that magnificence has been driven out by luxury. The virtue has been supplanted by the vice.

The subtitle of the book which has given occasion to these reflections is: "A History of the Reformation in England." It is part only of a larger work planned to carry us on to the death of Charles I and the period it covers consists of the first sixteen years of Henry VIII (1509-1525). Historians content with the chronicling of facts are wont to reckon these as the last years of Catholic England under a Catholic king zealous for his faith, and to put the beginning of the Reformation two years later, when Henry first began to moot the question of divorce. Mr. Lumsden will have none of this. For him the Reformation was the necessary religious element in the social revolution that had been developing since the end of the thirteenth century, the passing of the old idea of society and the entrance of the new Individualism, grasping at money, willing to use any means to get it, and recognizing power, social and political, to be the prerogative of the purse. The old order was built up around realities of authority and subjection: the new individualism is essentially lawless. The notion of a divine sanction for human law hardly exists. Men and nations are Ishmaelites, their hand against every other, and every other's hand against them, and order is sustained rather by fear and self-interest than by any idea that the violation of the law is an offense against God, the Source of all authority. Here we may note in passing that the vice of Socialism and Trades Unionism is not the rising against social abuses, for there are many such needing sorely reformation, but the attempting to reform these things while clinging to the very Individualism that produced them, the making of self-interest the criterion of right and wrong. It is clear that the new order could have no place for a spiritual authority calling men to account for their actions, prescribing and forbidding according to a revealed moral system; and so Luther's new gospel, justification by faith only, the rejection of good works and the visible Church, was hailed with joy, as the liberator of consciences and the opener of the gates to all who would enter upon the new way. The discovery of America and of the sea route to the east had begun to pour a torrent of gold into Europe, to heighten men's greed, before Luther had opened his mouth. Rightly, then, does Mr. Lumsden conclude that the evil principle was at work in England long before the rising of

"The Gospel light in Anna Boleyn's eyes."

Mr. Lumsden's application of this theory to the celebrated question of indulgences is very instructive, and his account of the development of individualism to its climax in the mechanical economics of the Manchester school which abstracts absolutely from ethics, is highly enlightening, though given in a few words and only in passing. The extravagance of the court following the example of the sovereign, the beginnings of the enclosure of the common lands by lords of the manor, which was to work such wrong to the poor, and many another point come in to prove a thesis which more famous historians than one defend. It seems to us an exaggeration to make Individualism the fundamental cause of the Reformation and the modern social organization, although the intrinsic connection of all these is beyond dispute. To Catholics it is undeniable that, side by side with the Christian spirit, the spirit of apostasy has been working from the beginning and will continue to work to the end; and it is the real cause of all those cognate evils.

We must say that Mr. Lumsden is evidently not a Catholic. Hence, here and there things appear in his book of which Catholics cannot approve. Nevertheless, these are so obvious, while, on the other hand, the general tone of his book is so good, and so sympathetic with Catholic philosophy, that they can hardly be a danger to students interested in the matters he treats, and therefore we do not hesitate to recommend it to such.

H. W.

—

The People's King; a Short Life of Edward VII. By W. HOLT-WHITE. New York: John Lane Company. Price, $1.25.

As this journalistic life of the late sovereign of England is meant to be a popular one, the reader must not look for a very thoughtful or pretentious biography. Posterity will hardly endorse all the eulogies heaped upon Edward VII in this book by a loyal subject. Though far from being a great king, he was doubtless, as kings go, a good one. The British public that had long known Albert Edward chiefly as a pleasure-loving prince not very particular in choosing his friends, or merely as his mother's representative at all kinds of royal functions, felt some misgivings when he at last ascended the throne. But with the tact and savoir faire he had always shown as heir apparent he now combined a capacity for business and a grasp of state affairs that surprised everybody. These qualities joined with the zeal he displayed throughout his seven-years reign in promoting and preserving the peace of Europe has won him the name of "the people's king," and may make him known in history as the "peace-maker." Much of Mr. Holt-White's book is merely a chronicle of the jaunts and junketings of "the commercial traveller of the Empire" and the "uncle of Europe," but some of the later chapters, containing vivid descriptions of what a journalist saw with his own eyes, are entertaining reading.

There is little in this biography to show us the religious side of the late king's character. It is recorded that while travelling in the Orient he once read the Lenten service for his party, and on another occasion he was ready to observe Sunday by abstaining from hunting, unless he got a shot at a crocodile. Several audiences that King Edward had with the Holy Father are merely mentioned.

In a chapter on the royal family tree the author would imply that he is making only a moderate demand on the credulity of his readers when he gravely assures them that the Emperor of India is undoubtedly descended from King Cræsus and Cyrus the Great: "For there are genealogists who do not scruple to go deeper into the past than I have indicated, who trace the line of Edward VII back to Noah, through the ancient House of Norway, of Elidure, King of Britain, who reigned two hundred years before Cæsar's raid on our barbaric island, and of Antenor, King of the Cimmerians, B. C. 443." But why stop with Noah?

W. D.

Heroes of California. By GEORGE WHARTON JAMES. Boston: Little, Brown & Company.

The mind of the ordinary man is sadly muddled. He reads, but he does not digest. He allows his imagination to play, and fancies his intellect is at work. His phraseology is loose, from which may be gathered the vagueness of his ideas. Tracing the word "hero" from the old poets who gave it, one must see that it implies great deeds, perils and vicissitudes beyond those common to men, and extraordinary qualities of soul. Had the author of the book before us gone to the pains of clarifying thus his ideas, he would have either omitted most of the names appearing in its table of contents, or else devised for it a more modest title.

We have a notion that, if a knowledge of this book has been given to Junipero Serra in heaven, he is not delighted with the company in which he has been put and that One greater than Junipero Serra can hardly be pleased at His Sign of Salvation staring out from the cover of a volume devoted to the praise of men, most of whom, by every intelligible mark, belonged to the kingdom of the world rather than to His. St. Paul, if he be cognizant of the matter, is perhaps somewhat surprised at the perversion of a well-known passage of his Epistle to the Hebrews to the glorification of those pretended heroes, and St. John must resent the taking of a phrase from his mysterious vision concerning the Church and the Mother of God, in order that it may be applied, not altogether reverently, to a certain William E. Smythe.

Men and women of a certain type have gone to California in recent years, and have taken possession of its apostles and its Missions, much as in Europe Sabatier and his fellows have taken possession of St. Francis of Assisi, to exploit them for their own profit. They have invented a mean architecture, which they call "The Mission style," and have built in it banks, railway stations, Carnegie libraries, Protestant churches, godless colleges and other such things, the very antithesis of all the old Missions stood for. This book is constructed in the Mission style. Its outside suggests the old Franciscan friars; its vestibule, so to speak, contains a portrait or two of them. We penetrate into the interior and find ourselves face to face with such as—James Lick.

But the ordinary man will see no incongruity in this. The author knows his public. California and its early people have an abiding interest. This book will, no doubt, have many readers, who, suffering no pain from the bad taste and the irreverences we have noticed, will find in it much to please them. H. W.

El Romancero Espanol. Por RAMÓN MENÉNDEZ PIDAL. New York: The Hispanic Society of America. (IV.—131 pp.) $1.25 net.

If the life of a people is seen in its folk songs, the distinguished Madrid professor's lectures on the ballad poetry of Spain give us a clear insight into the national feeling from the hazy days of the tenth century to our own. Born and cradled in the castles of the Castilian nobles, adopted and adapted by the troubadours, these songs gained a hold on the people of the whole Celtic-Iberian peninsula, even Aragon and Portugal yielding to the charm of their sway. When Spanish lances rattled on Moorish shields, new topics were introduced, but then the inspiration ceased; for the feats of Spaniards in the New World added nothing to the store of the ballad singer. But the old songs remain as the common property of the people wherever the Spanish tongue is spoken. The lecturer gives copious illustrations of the ballad in its primitive form, in the days of its glory, and in its period of decadence, when art tried its hand on the feeling verses of the peasantry. The result was a sort of literary monstrosity—a milkmaid decked in the robes of a lady in waiting. Students of Spanish literature cannot afford to pass over this notable contribution to the subject. * * *

Lives of the Fur Folk. By M. D. HAVILAND, Illustrated by E. Caldwell. New York: Longmans, Green & Co.

The author favors us with four biographies, each related with a wealth of detail and a sympathetic interest in the subject. The fox, the badger, the rabbit, and the house cat which "lapsed" from the hearth to the wildwood receive the fullest treatment, but others, either as hunters or hunted, come in for honorable mention. A vast amount of lore about the fur folk is conveyed to the reader, and it is conveyed in anything but a didactic way. It was Dr. Johnson, if we mistake not, who said that, if some of his ancestors had not been hanged, it was because they had not received their deserts. This occurred to us as we read the author's preface, a portion of which does not increase the value of the book. It is a part of our being that we prefer to trace our descent from respectable ancestors. So graphically written, and so brimful of information is the book that he who searches for a dull line will forget the object of his quest.

Viscount Morley is a man of letters. But even men of letters make sometimes strange mistakes in their matters of literature. He is an old man, and this is an excuse for some lapses of memory. Speaking lately in the House of Lords, on Lord Lansdowne's resolutions of reform, he compared the readiness of the peers to accept them with the frantic eagerness of the nobles of the French National Assembly to repudiate all their privileges in the memorable session of August 4, 1789, which day, he informed his hearers in solemn tones, is known in history as "The Day of Dupes." Lord Rosebery, another man of letters, followed him, but missed the chance of scoring neatly. Men of letters are not supposed to have the history of Richelieu at their finger ends, but whether cares of business or advancing years excuse them for forgetting Bulwer-Lytton's "Richelieu" is a question not to be answered in a moment.

BOOKS RECEIVED

- The American Commonwealth. By James Bryce. 2 vols. Completely Revised Throughout with Additional Chapters. New York: The Macmillan Company. Price $4.00 net.
- Kings in Exile. By Charles G. D. Roberts. Illustrated. New York: The Macmillan Company. Price $1.50.
- The Life of Robert Browning. With Notices of His Writings, His Family and His Friends. By W. Hall Griffin and Harry Christopher Minchin. With Thirty-seven Illustrations. New York: The Macmillan Company. Price $3.50 net.
- Reminiscences. By Goldwin Smith. Edited by Arnold Haultain. Illustrated. New York: The Macmillan Company. Price $8.00 net.
- Home Life in Spain. By S. L. Bensusan. Illustrated. New York: The Macmillan Company. Price $1.75 net.
- A Reader's Guide to Irish Fiction. By Stephen J. Brown, S.J. New York: Longmans, Green & Company.
- Education. How Old the New. By James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph. D., Litt. D. New York: Fordham University Press. Price $2.00. Postage 15 cents.
- Acadian Reminiscences. With the True Story of Evangeline. By Felix Voorhies. Opelousas, Louisiana: The Jacobs News Depot Company. Price $1.00.
- Andros of Ephesus. A Tale of Early Christianity. By the Rev. J. E. Copus, S.J. Milwaukee and New York: The M. H. Wiltzius Co. Price $1.25 postpaid.
- War on the White Plague. By the Rev. John Tscholl. Milwaukee and New York: The M. H. Wiltzius Co. Price, cloth $1.00; paper 60 cents.

Spanish Publication:

- Excelencia del Sacerdocio. Por el Padre Luis Caprón, C.S.S.R. Segunda Edición Revisada. St. Louis: B. Herder. Price $1.25 net.
- Vida de la Venerable Ana Catalina Emmerich. Por el Padre Carlos E. Schmoeger, C.S.S.R. Adornado con un Grabado. St. Louis: B. Herder. Price $1.70 net.

German Publication:

- Das Missale als Betrachtungsbuch. Vorträge über die Messformularien. Von Dr. Franz Xaver Reck. Vierter Band: Feste und Ferien. Erste und Zweite Auflage. St. Louis: B. Herder. Price $2.35 net.

EDUCATION

Several New England pastors have taken up the idea of introducing Catholic papers into their schools with a view of cultivating in the children a taste for Catholic reading. The plan generally followed is to allow a period of half an hour weekly for the discussion of articles which the pupils have read in the papers given to them. In one of the Catholic High schools of New York the teacher of English has followed a different practice. Each week she reads for a half hour selected articles from some Catholic paper to her pupils and these are then required to write their impressions of the articles read. Very excellent results have attended the exercise and the practice appeals to one as worthy of encouragement.

At the time of the visit of Dr. Douglas Hyde, president of the Gaelic League of Ireland, to this country some years ago, the principle of bilingual education, which the league had been advocating from its first establishment, was almost unrecognized in practice. To-day there exist in Ireland 181 schools in which the whole course of study is conducted through the medium of the national language as well as English; while in 3,066 schools out of a total of 8,538 in all Ireland, Irish is taught either as an ordinary or as an extra subject.

Discussions relating to the work done by college students we have always with us. In our unceasing search to find out why it is that our present methods of teaching are not successful, there is the ever-present implication that the problem before us is a new one, due entirely to the distractions of life in the twentieth century. "It may comfort some distressed instructors," says Prof. Bingham, of New Haven, in the New York Evening Post, "to read what Professor Moses wrote a year or two ago regarding one of the most ancient universities in America, the University of Cordova, in the Argentine. The period under discussion is the seventeenth century:

'The students gave little or no attention to any subjects except those on which they were to be examined for their degrees. They passed from one course to another with a very imperfect knowledge of the subjects supposed to constitute a necessary introduction to the course before them. When they found themselves near the final examination, a few undertook to repair their deficiencies by assiduous effort, but the majority found that the career of a scholar had not the attractions they fancied, and turned away to other pursuits. The evil of this state of things clearly demanded correction, and this was attempted, in 1680, by lengthening the course to ten months, and insisting on attendance. Annual examinations were established three years later, and it became necessary to pass them with approval in order to be advanced to the succeeding courses. This tightening of the lines of discipline led to acts of insubordination on the part of the students. That in an institution of learning they should be required to listen to lectures and pass examinations seemed to them an interference with their right as students, and they instituted a rebellion. The claustró, however, firmly supported the other authorities, and the two leaders of the rebellion were expelled and order restored.'

"There is something painfully familiar about all this. Can it be we are witnessing in these early twentieth century days a reincarnation of seventeenth century Argentina? Anyhow, it is pleasant to think those old Jesuit fathers had the courage of their convictions. One reason for their temerity may have been that the boys' mothers were not likely to rush into print with a wholesale condemnation of university methods."

The Bombay Examiner, in its November 5 issue, begins a reprint in weekly installments of the entire text of the "small but admirable volume on Goa," written by the French missionary, Father Denis L. Cot-tineau de Kloguen, one time honorary member of the Bombay Auxiliary of the Royal Asiatic Society, of the Madras Literary Society, and of the Philotechnical Society of the Island of Bourbon. Father Cottineau, who before he set out for India lived ten years in Baltimore, spent a long time in Goa studying the history of the old city and then wrote his admirable work. It was published at Madras in 1831, shortly after the death of the author, with a map showing the actual state of Goa at the time he wrote. Many of the churches then intact or visible in their decay have since disappeared. With some omissions Cottineau's book, says the editor of the Examiner, was taken almost bodily by Fonseca into his "Historical Sketch of Goa" and some of the parts omitted are precisely those which one would desire to have left in. A small edition uniform with the other Examiner reprints will be issued.

SOCIOLOGY

A young man has been brought before a superior court in the State of Washington to be examined as to his sanity. It seems that he has given away all his goods except the clothes he wears, he is greatly given to prayer, and holds that if it be God's will he should go to prison, to prison he must go willingly. The poor fellow is clearly mad, but not quite so mad as St. Francis of Assisi and other great saints who governed their lives by the rules of a certain mad book called the Gospel, instead of by precepts that are more acceptable to the State of Washington, and, for the matter of that, to other States in the Union and outside it too.

The government of New South Wales is bestirring itself to obtain English immigration on a large scale. It is preparing a system of irrigation of unoccupied lands and announces that within twelve months it will have land ready for 5,000 families, that is, for about 25,000 persons. It is arranging also for land banks to lend settlers the money necessary to develop their holdings.

Every now and then evidence comes up indicating the existence of suicide clubs, things so abnormal that one can hardly credit their reality. It is believed that there is one in Moscow composed of people of wealth and position. Some two months ago a wealthy Englishman, Allan Hopper, shot himself for no reason that can be discovered. Lately a rich lady, Mme. Griboff, took her life in the same way, and she has been followed by a millionaire, M. Zhouravleff. When religion has been cast aside, there is nothing people will not do to show themselves rebels against God.

ECONOMICS

The Postmaster of New York City calls attention to the fact that many letters mailed in the United States addressed for delivery in foreign countries which are subject to the Postal Union postage rate are prepaid only two cents. The only foreign countries to which the two-cent letter applies are Canada, Cuba, Mexico, Newfoundland, the Canal Zone, the Republic of Panama, Germany (by direct steamers only), England, Scotland, Wales and Ireland, and the City of Shanghai, China. To all other countries the rate is five cents for the first ounce or fraction thereof, and three cents for each additional ounce or fraction thereof, which must be fully prepaid or the letters become liable on delivery to a charge equal to double the amount of the deficient postage.

Marconi gave an exhibition before the King of Italy of the powerful apparatus he has set up at Pisa. He exchanged messages with Canada and with Massowah on the African coast of the Red Sea.

The transatlantic steamship companies have remonstrated with the authorities at Cherbourg on the heavy pilotage dues at that port. The Hamburg-American Company and the North German Lloyds pay 160,000 francs a year each, and the American and the White Star paid between them 205,000 francs. They point out that this enormous sum is sufficient to provide each pilot with a cabinet minister's salary, and say that unless a substantial reduction be made their ships will not call at Cherbourg in future.

In conformity with the views of the Interstate Commerce Commission the Pullman Car Company has announced some reductions in its rates for lower berths. Their nature may be judged from the reduction between Chicago and San Francisco. The rate was formerly $14; it is now $13. The reduction in the price of upper berths is greater, being 20 per cent. on all prices over $1.50. Thus the rate for a lower berth from St. Paul to Seattle is $11; for an upper, it is $8.80. The Company, notwithstanding the ruin these changes threaten it with, can afford to be humorous. It announces the reduction in the price of upper berths as the result of what it seems to think an unreasonable discrimination by the public against berths that cost more than the lower berths both to construct and to furnish. It does not understand a public which prefer comfort to costliness, and would take a lower berth in preference to an upper, even though the step ladder were of gold set with diamonds. As for the furnishing of the upper berth, our experience, quite extensive, is that its mattress is just as thin, its pillow as small and lean, its sheets and single blanket as skimpy as those of the lower berth. As for cost of construction, the Company holds very probably that the lower berth cost nothing to construct, as they are made of the seats of the car. In the same way we may assert that the upper berths cost nothing, because they are the closets in which the bed furniture is kept.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

The following was received by Archbishop Farley, in reply to a letter addressed by His Grace to the Holy Father in the name of the Cardinals; Archbishops and Bishops present at the Consecration of St. Patrick's Cathedral, protesting against the outrage offered to the Vicar of Christ by Mayor Nathan of Rome, on the 20th of September:

The Vatican, Oct. 22, 1910.

Your Grace:—

The Holy Father was particularly pleased with the beautiful letter of loyalty and of protest recently sent by your Grace to his Holiness in the name of the American episcopate. Thereby the large and representative body of the American Bishops and people, separated by distance but ever united in warm and filial affection to the common Father of the faithful, reechoes the cry of sorrow and of just indignation that arose forth from the hearts of the Catholics of Italy and of Europe, most deeply offended in their tenderest feelings by the vulgar insults offered to the Vicar of Jesus Christ. Amid his increasing trials the august Pontiff is greatly comforted by this letter. His Holiness desires me to make known to your Grace and the entire American hierarchy his paternal gratitude, and, at the same time, sends to each of them and to all their dioceses his Apostolic Benediction.

With sentiments of profound esteem, I remain,

Your faithful servant,

(Signed) R. CARD. MERRY DEL VAL.

Most Rev. John M. Farley,

Archbishop of New York.

The Rev. Edward Kelly, Pastor of St. Thomas' Church, Ann Harbor, Mich., has been appointed Auxiliary to Bishop Foley of Detroit, Mich. Bishop Foley, who is seventy-seven years old, was consecrated Bishop of Detroit, November 4, 1888.

The following rather elliptical announcement of the death of Father Augustus Muller, S.J., the Apostle of the lepers of Man-galore, was telegraphed to Bombay and published in the Bombay Examiner, November 5:

Father Muller expired yesterday [Nov. 1], 9.30 morning. . . . Last moments perfectly conscious: received Sacraments devoutly; died while kissing crucifix. Funeral from college to Kankandy attended by thousands of Catholics, non-Christians and every prominent official, European and Indian. . . . Most touching funeral oration by Father Gilbert Saldanha. . . . Buried in Leper Asylum Chapel by express desire. Monuments of indefatigable zeal, indomitable energy: Medical dispensary, manned by thirty-six clerks, two doctors, one lady doctor; institute of voluntary infirmarians and nurses; two hospitals; leper asylum. Movement afoot to perpetuate memory by considerable extension of charitable institutions.

SCIENCE

After many years of experiment, Mr. Elwood Haynes, an Indiana manufacturer, has produced an alloy of cobalt and chromium which combines the hardness of the best tool steel with the resistance to rust of platinum or gold. This alloy, which he calls Stellite, resists erosion even under nitric acid and hydrochloric acid, and its whiteness is unimpaired by any atmospheric conditions. The advantages of Stellite over steel for knives and tools is acknowledged by all; its commercial value, however, is seriously questioned, owing to the great cost of the component metals. A tool of Stellite, it is said, would last forever, but its cost would be about five times the cost of steel.

The enormous figures assumed by the agricultural products of the United States have forced the Department of Agriculture to issue a bulletin entitled "Agricultural Graphics." It is a textless volume containing 88 maps, indicating by diagram the leading agricultural products of the United States as a whole and by states. The compilation is the conception of Middleton Smith, of the Bureau of Statistics, and is the first of its kind on record.

F. A. TONDORF, S.J.

OBITUARY

All Hungary, irrespective of persuasion, rank or creed, is joined in mourning the loss of one of her most loyal and valuable sons, the saintly and venerable Archbishop of Kalocsa the Most Rev. Monsignor Julius Varosy, whose death occurred on October 28th, after a lingering illness. On November 3, with befitting solemnity, the beloved prelate was laid to rest in the mortuary chapel of the Cathedral in which, but five years ago, he was elevated to the archiepiscopate. There is no member of the Hungarian hierarchy to whom greater interest attaches on the part of American Catholics, none whose loss they could more deeply deplore. Nor does his obituary fail to merit space in the columns of AMERICA, to which, from its very beginning, he was a constant and enthusiastic subscriber. Not a few of AMERICA's readers in the United States have, during their visits to Hungary, enjoyed the privilege of meeting Monsignor Varosy and partaking of his genial hospitality; by his hands Holy Orders were conferred on the first American clerics educated and ordained in Hungary for pastoral work among the Magyar flock in the United States. To each of those whose good fortune it was to have met him the news must have come as a personal loss, for in truth "to know him was to love him." Born in Zombor, August 13, 1846, Mgr. Varosy completed his theological course in the Central Seminary of Budapest, and was ordained to the priesthood at the age of twenty-four years. The fame which his remarkable piety, character and ability as a seminarian attached to him grew with his years, and after filling various positions of trust and honor in his home Diocese of Kalocsa, he was appointed, in 1892, with the title of Domestic Prelate, Rector of the Seminary where he had himself been a student. Three years later he was made Ordinary of the Diocese of Szekesfehervar, and in 1905 promoted to the Archbishopric of Kalocsa. Later in the same year he was made a Private Counselor of His Majesty, King Francis Joseph.

The Archbishop's death comes at a time when Hungary is most in need of his services. That friction between the Church and her enemies which to such an unfortunate degree obtains today elsewhere in Europe is alarmingly asserting itself even in Hungary, and there was no one more fitted than he to lead the faithful in their rightful path. His own powerful example, his deep learning, his authority among his own flock, in religious circles, or in the Senate, had gained for him a prestige, even among the opponents of Catholicity, that was shared by few. No death in many years has brought forth such fervent expressions of sympathy from all parts of Hungary, nor such universal eulogy on the part of the press in general. This latter is not to be wondered at in those Catholic organs of which his Grace was so generous a supporter, but the following extract is indeed a worthy tribute, coming as it does from the Budapest Hirlap, a Jewish newspaper invariably inclined to condemn whatever pertains to Rome: "Those qualities which we yearn to find in a Catholic priest, in a prelate—the virtues of a man and of a clergyman—these, in all their fullness, adorned this great soul; moral goodness, spiritual purity, interior devotion of heart, the knowledge and the love of his faith, a life corresponding in every particular to that faith, a deep knowledge, not merely of theology, but of every science, especially philosophy and history, labor that knew no fatigue, modesty and humility of rare degree, the evasion of every public recognition; a wonderful serenity of soul, extreme plainness, and ideal justice in the judgments of his fellow men and in the government of his large diocese, an ardent and anxious fidelity to his fatherland, and finally an almost boundless liberality on every occasion where Catholic interests were concerned. These were the characteristics which gave this excellent prelate so conspicuous a place in the history of Hungarian Catholicity."

PETER J. DOLIN.

Budapest, Nov. 4, 1910.

There recently died in St. Louis at the age of sixty-one years, Pierre Chouteau, lineal descendant of the founder of that city and the originator of the Louisiana Purchase Exhibition. It was natural that Mr. Chouteau should have been an active member of the Missouri Historical Society, to which he gave valuable charts and books that had come down to him. He also compiled data about the founding of St. Louis and the part his family has had in the development of the city. He was educated in this country and abroad as a mining engineer, and was an inventor of distinction in air drills and other implements used in mining and structural work.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

SOCIAL WEEK IN BARCELONA.

When the Archbishop of New York inaugurated last year a series of lectures upon social subjects it was considered quite a new departure for New York. But the same thing has been going on for quite a long time in Spain, and particularly in Barcelona. All sorts of subjects pertaining to the social and economico-politic life are discussed by able lecturers.

During the past week in Barcelona the following program has been followed in the "Social Week," as it is called. It compares favorably with anything in this country:

Sunday, November 27.—Solemn pontifical Mass in the cathedral. Address on questions of the day by Right Rev. Dr. John J. Laguarda, Bishop of Barcelona. In the afternoon at vespers, sermon on labor by one of the visiting prelates. The inaugural session of the Social Congress was then opened in the great Hall of the Palace of Fine Arts, where the lectures were given.

Monday, November 28.—Morning lecture: "The Broad Lines of Catholic Social Work," by Don Rafael Rodriguez de Cepeda, senator and professor in the University of Valencia. Midday; visitation of the city institutions. Afternoon lecture: continuation by Professor Rodriguez de Cepeda. Evening discussion: "The Great Social Benefits of Catholicism in Christian Civilization and Social Order." Discussion opened by Rev. Canon Francisco de Mas, of the Cathedral.

Tuesday, November 29.—Morning lecture: "Catholic Social Work and the Problems of the Workingman," by Don Amando Castroviejo, professor of political economy in the University of Santiago. Midday; visitation of various institutions for social work. Afternoon lecture: continuation by Professor Castroviejo. Evening conference and discussion: "Labor and Practical Results by Catholics in Solving Social Questions." Discussion opened by Rev. Canon Santiago Guallar, of the Cathedral of Zaragoza. After this a reception was given to the lecturers and representatives of the press, by the society "Accion Social Popular."

Wednesday, November 30.—Morning lecture: "Intervention by the State and Municipality in Labor Questions According to Catholic Social Principles," by Professor Don Pedro Sangro y Ros, of the Institute of Social Reform and secretary-general of the International Association for the legal protection of workingmen. Midday: further visitation of institutions for social work. Afternoon lecture; continuation by Professor Sangro y Ros. At 5.30, special conference for employers; subject discussed: "Capital in its Relations to Labor." Discussion opened by Señor A. Lugan, a reviewer and newspaper man. At the same hour, special conference for women; subject discussed: "Social duties of women in labor questions." Conference opened by Rev. Gabriel Palan, S.J., director of the Spanish Volksverein, "accion social." At seven o'clock, special conference for young men; subject discussed: "The Youth of Our Colleges and Universities and the Social Problems." Discussion opened by Dr. Juan de Dios Trias y Giro, professor of the University of Barcelona. At the same hour, special conference for priests; subject discussed: "The Intervention of the Priest in the Promotion of Workingmen's Associations." Discussion opened by Dr. Enrique Reig, director of the paper La Paz Social.

Thursday, December 1.—Morning: a visit to the Factory Colony of Count de Güell. Afternoon: a visit to the workingmen's Trade School at Mataro.

Friday, December 2.—Morning lecture:

"Sunday Rest and its Beneficial Influence," by Professor Don Alvaro Lopez Nuñez, secretary of the Institute of Social Reform. Midday; visits to various institutes for social work. At four o'clock, lecture on "Benefit Institutions and the Workingman," by Profesor Don Francisco Moragas, director of the Institute for Savings and Old Age Pensions of Barcelona. At 5.30 o'clock, lecture: "Institutions and Remedies for Involuntary Idleness and Lack of Work," by Professor Don José Ruiz Castellá, secretary of the Social Museum of Barcelona. At eight o'clock, special conference for workmen; subject discussed: "Cooperation; its Educational Value, and its Present State in Spain." Discussion opened by Don Francisco Ripoll, a writer on social and economic topics.

Saturday, December 3.—Morning lecture: "The Social Activities of the Volksvereins and their Battle with Socialism," by Rev. Andrés Pont y Llodrá, a well-known priest and publicist. Midday; final visits to public and social institutions. At four o'clock, lecture: "Necessity of a Law for Unions of Professional Men and Trades Unions," by Don Mocencio Jimenez, professor in the University of Zaragoza. At 5.30 o'clock, lecture: "The Social Activities of the Volksvereins, and the promotion of Catholic Social Activity in General," by Rev. Andrés Pont y Llodrá. In the evening, special conference for working men and women; subject discussed: "Trade Organizations." Discussion opened by Don Narciso Pia y Deniel, President of the Governing Committee of the "Accion Social Popular."

Sunday, December 4.—Mass in the morning, and at ten o'clock, solemn closing session will be held at the Palace of Fine Arts; in the afternoon, a fraternal banquet on the summit of Tibidabo.

On Monday, December 5, an excursion will be given to the famous monastery of Montserrat, to which all the participants in the "Social Week" are invited.

ANDREW J. SHIPMAN.

CAGE MASTS ON BATTLESHIPS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I noticed in AMERICA of October 29, p. 72, a paragraph about the "cage masts" on our battleships. It is true that at certain speeds there is a great deal of vibration in the "tops" or upper platforms on these masts. On this class of ships the vibration is most noticeable at the speed of twelve knots and again at sixteen knots. This vibration makes the reading of range finders and other instruments difficult, but we do not consider that we should give up these distinctive "ornaments" yet on that account. We are, however, considering the advisability of using an armored station of less height to observe the fire, and may eventually abandon the cage masts, or make them much smaller.

The fleet had a few days of rough weather before getting into the English Channel. With a heavy sea and wind on the quarter the big ships were rolling and pitching like steam yachts.

Yesterday we were entertained by the "Pilgrims of England" at luncheon. There were many distinguished persons present, and it was a highly enjoyable occasion for all those who attended.

I was pleased to see AMERICA on the newsstands in New York on my last visit.

GILBERT CHASE,

Lieut. Comdr. U. S. Navy.

U. S. S. Vermont, Nov. 19, 1910.

JOHN LA FARGE'S ART.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

My attention has just been called to your review of November 26, in which there is an article speaking of the life and work of Mr. John La Farge.

Out of respect for the memory of my friend, and also for the sake of the reputation of your magazine, I feel I ought to call your attention to certain misleading statements and definite errors on the part of the author of that article.

First, William Morris Hunt is mentioned as a pupil of Millet; he was not a pupil of Millet but of Thomas Couture.

The article further on says of Mr. La Farge's windows that: "The first were leaded, the later ones show only filaments of metal used in the glass." This is quite misleading, as there is no way of making a large window in a proper manner but by the ancient system of leads and irons—a system used for at least a thousand years.

Mr. La Farge did very few cloisonné windows, such as the Peacock window, and they were all of small size; if I remember rightly, about thirty inches square. All of his large windows were very carefully leaded. The writer of the article says: "An innovation of his has been the treating of a stained glass window freely and pictorially, almost like a fresco."

In point of fact, it is no innovation to treat stained glass freely and pictorially: it is, indeed, considered a sign of decadent art; note the work of Philippe de Champaigne, of Dilh and of Séquin.

As to the words "almost like a fresco," these words used in this context give a very false impression, as there is no similarity whatever between Mr. La Farge's windows and a fresco. A fresco, as you know, takes its name from the fresh plaster in which it is drawn. This method of procedure produces pictures that are light in tone and hard in outline—see the work of Giotto, Perugino and Signorelli.

Mr. La Farge's glass, on the contrary, is deep in tone and very much "overplated" to soften the outline and enrich the color.

The great innovation made by Mr. La Farge—the innovation that, more than anything else, secured for him the "Cross of the Legion of Honor," the invention which separated his work from all previous works in stained glass, is not mentioned in any way.

This epoch-making invention was the use of "overplating" with opalescent glass. Nor is any mention made of the great honor he received from his brother artists in 1909 when he was awarded the first Medal of Honor ever given for decorative work. This medal was awarded on work done for the Paulist Church which possesses eleven painted figures by Mr. La Farge and twenty-three of his stained-glass windows. Mr. La Farge has often told me that this work for the Paulist Fathers was nearer his heart than anything else in his long career.

As this is the only Catholic church which patronized Mr. La Farge as an artist, it seems strange to have forgotten all about it.

The several mistakes in the article are so worded that they can, and probably will, be turned to the advantage of commercial salesmen who handle fraudulent glass.

I am sure you do not wish to have misrepresented the character of the life work of a great artist or have withheld from him his greatest honor. So I trust you will be able to correct at an early date the inadvertent errors of this article in your review.

WM. LAUREL HARRIS.

New York Dec. 2.

PIONEERS IN JEFFERSON COUNTY.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

We beg to call your attention to an article in AMERICA in the issue of November 26, 1910, entitled "Lafargeville," in which the writer states as a "notable fact": "Here was a colony of educated, prosperous French Catholics, but the Church and religion made no progress in this region under their direct or indirect influence."

Le Ray de Chaumont built a church in the French settlement of Rosière, situated about nineteen miles north of Watertown, and about seventeen southwest of Lafargeville, and gave a farm for the support of the priest. The church has been rebuilt, but the farm still largely defrays the parish expenses. At Cape Vincent, on the St. Lawrence River, six miles only from Rosière, the early French settlers built a stone church, still extant, and which owes its existence and maintenance chiefly to the descendants of those same French settlers. It is, furthermore, the only church in the Diocese of Ogdensburg free of debt.

DESCENDANTS OF AN EARLY FRENCH SETTLER.

New York, Nov. 28.

THE GROSS TOURS, Inc.

Pre-eminently the Leaders in Travel

TOURS FOR CATHOLICS

Offer the Following Tours for 1911

ORIENTAL TOUR

April 8, 73 days, $490 on Land (plus steamship fares) Azores, Madeira, Gibraltar, Algiers, Athens, Turkey, Smyrna PALESTINE, Egypt and Italy (returning from Genoa).

GRAND AUTOMOBILE TOUR OF EUROPE

May 10, 103 days, $986.85 on Land (plus steamship fares) Holland, Belgium, the Rhine, Paris, CHATEAUX OF TOURAINE (by automobile), London and Ireland.

VACATION TOUR OF EUROPE

July 4, 55 days, $417.15 on Land (plus steamship fares) Holland, Belgium, the Rhine, Paris, CHATEAUX OF TOURAINE (by automobile), London and Ireland.

SHORT VACATION TOUR

July 15, 44 days, $328.65 on Land (plus steamship rates) Paris, Chateaux of Touraine (by automobile), London and Ireland.

AUTOMOBILE TOUR OF ENGLAND

August 13, 7 days, $104.00, London to Windsor, Eton, Stoke Pogis, St. Albans, Ely, Cambridge, Peterborough, Oxford, Warwick Kenilworth, Shrewsbury, Birmingham, Chester, Liverpool.

AROUND THE WORLD

October 1, 1910, $2,300. Five Months. Hawaii, Japan, China, Philippines, India, Arabia, The HOLY LAND, Egypt, Greece, Turkey, Italy, Central Europe and British Isles.

EACH PARTY LIMITED IN NUMBER. $50 DEPOSIT MUST ACCOMPANY EACH APPLICATION. EVERYTHING THE BEST. PERSONALLY CONDUCTED. EVERY DETAIL CARED FOR.

APPLY AT ONCE. WRITE FOR ITINERARIES.

THE GROSS TOURS, Inc.

302 Ellicott Square

BUFFALO, N. Y.

WITH GLACIER WINDOW DECORATION

YOU CAN GET

Stained Glass Effects
on Ordinary Windows

Suitable for Residences
Churches and Schools

Special Ecclesiastical Designs

Write To-day for Booklet 6

Address WM. B. QUAILE, 752 Broadway, New York.

Catholic Mind Pamphlets

Christian Science

by Robert Hugh Benson

The Delusion of Christian Science

by Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J.

5 cents per copy

THE AMERICA PRESS

32 Washington Square, W.
NEW YORK

Most Nutritious Food Made From Flour

A strong statement — but an absolute fact. Backed up by years of testing.

The stomach digests them with pleasure, and sends them on their way to make rich, red blood, sound flesh and tough muscle.

Every ingredient is a strength-giver, scientifically blended and perfectly baked.

Crisp and delicious Uneeda Biscuit come to you in their dust tight, moisture proof packages, fresh, and clean, and good.

NATIONAL BISCUIT COMPANY

(Never sold in bulk)

5¢

for a package

McCray Refrigerators

We make a specialty of Built-to-Order Refrigerators
for SCHOOLS, HOSPITALS, INSTITUTIONS, etc.

Style No. 171

Write for our free Catalogs,
Number 48 for Institutions
" 87 " Residences
" 59 " Meat Markets
" 72 " Florists
" 67 " Grocers

Branch offices in all principal cities

McCray Refrigerator Co.

254 Lake Street

Kendallville, Indiana

New York Office, 231 West 42d Street

Sacred Heart Sanitarium

FOR REST, QUIET, RECUPERATION AND HEALTH

Unsurpassed results obtained in Nervousness, Rheumatism, Heart and Stomach troubles. No surgical, hospital nor insanity cases taken. A delightful, restful place—ideal for all run down conditions. Hydrotherapy, Electricity, Massage, Zander Gymnasium, Sun parlor; Swimming pools, billiards, bowling, etc. Gaited saddle horses, large indoor riding pavilion; suspended running track connected by tunnel with bath department. 17-acre park.

A staff of five physicians give their exclusive services to the patients.

WRITE SISTER SUPERIOR FOR BOOKLET X. MILWAUKEE, WIS.

HIGGINS'

DRAWING INKS
ETERNAL WRITING INK
ENGROSSING INK
TAURINE MUCILAGE
PHOTO MOUNTER PASTE
DRAWING BOARD PASTE
LIQUID PASTE
OFFICE PASTE
VEGETABLE GLUE, ETC

Are the Finest and Best
Inks and Adhesives

For School, Home and Business Use

Emancipate yourselves from the use of corrosive and ill smelling inks and adhesives and adopt the HIGGINS' INKS AND ADHESIVES. They will be a revelation to you, they are so sweet, clean, well put up and withal so efficient.

At Dealers Generally

271 Ninth St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

Branches: Chicago, London

CHAS. M. HIGGINS & CO., Mfrs.

Simplicity

is a prominent feature
of the

VICTOR

It is not necessary to make a lot of adjustments before doing special kinds of work.

The Victor is always ready without special adjustment, because its special devices are built in the machine—not extra attachments.

Send for the No. 2 Catalogue to-day

VICTOR TYPEWRITER COMPANY

812 Greenwich Street
NEW YORK

Why is 41 and 43 Vesey St.

—A—HOUSEHOLD WORD
When Groceries are Spoken of?
BECAUSE

You can get the best teas, the best coffees, the best butter, the best cheese, the best flour, the freshest eggs, the best canned fruits and vegetables, the finest olive oil (sold only in full measure, bottles and tins) absolutely pure wines and liquors, a choice assortment of cigars and the largest assortment of the best groceries in the city to select from.

All full weight, sold without misrepresentation of any kind.

Callanan's Magazine and price list mailed on request.

L. J. CALLANAN
41 and 43 Vesey Street

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER"
AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week
82 Washington Square, West, New York City

Has It Ever Occurred to You
THAT THERE ARE

MANY KINDS OF SODA WATER
AND SOFT STUFF

FOISTED ON THE PUBLIC

New York Bottling Co.

OUR PRODUCTS
COST NO MORE
OVER BARS THAN THE CHEAP
ONES MADE FROM GLUCOSE,
SACCHARIN AND ANILINE DYES

Get Your Money's Worth

ARTISTS' MATERIALS A good art teacher must have the Best to teach with, and then the scholars can show something worth looking at. Every school should use

WINSOR & NEWTON'S
Oil and Water Colors Brushes, Canvas, Paper, Boards, Rubber

Our Goods are the World's Standard
New York Office—298 Broadway
New Catalogue by Mail 5c

The American Carlsbad Sanitarium

Hydrotherapy according to the celebrated Kneipp system applied in all forms and up-to-date methods. All diseases, acute and chronic, scientifically and successfully treated. Testimonials and references furnished. First class accommodations for patients.

The famous Devonian Mineral water in use, a strong, sulphurated, saline, calcareous and magnesian water, the counterpart of the German Carlsbad.

Rates reasonable. Investigation solicited.

For information apply to

The American Carlsbad Co., Lorain, O.

PRINTING OF EVERY DESCRIPTION

FOR
Churches and Schools

Periodical Publications

Catalogues Programs

Stationery Etc., etc.

THE MEANY PRINTING CO.
6th Avenue, Cor. 11th St., NEW YORK

ATTENTION OF PASTORS!

Catholic Mind Pamphlet

Holy Communion for Children

DECREE OF THE SACRED CONGREGATION OF
SACRAMENTAL DISCIPLINE ON THE AGE
OF THOSE TO BE ADMITTED TO RE-
CEIVE FIRST HOLY COMMUNION

In envelopes ready for distribution
$4.00 per hundred. 5c each

THE AMERICA PRESS 32 Washington Square, W.
NEW YORK

AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE

THE AMERICA PRESS

32 Washington Sq. W.,

New York

THE KNOX HAT

Is universally recognized as the Standard by which all others are judged.

452 FIFTH AVE.
(Cor. 40th St.)

FIFTH AVENUE BUILDING
(5th Ave. & 23d St.)

161 BROADWAY
(Singer Building)

Mullins & Sons

$1.00 A WEEK FURNISHES THE HOME

78-84 Myrtle Avenue, Brooklyn

121-125 Newark Avenue, Jersey City, N. J.

218-220 Market Street, Newark, N. J.

Manufacturers'
Sale of 300

PARLOR SUITS

These Suits Make Splendid Christmas Gifts

They will adorn any home. Have it finished in any desired upholstery and delivered when required

This Exact $35 Parlor Suit

New Model Fall
Style, SPECIAL $29

Special
Sale

This suit is a sample of the rare bargain savings at Mullins'. By far the best value we have ever been able to offer. Out they go at great money saving prices. All beautifully polished mahogany finished frames, loose plush cushions. Selection of colors.

$29

COUPON

By presenting this coupon at our Brooklyn store a handsome framed picture 13 x 16 will be given

FREE

F. JAMES REILLY
President

WM. F. REILLY
Manager

JAMES REILLY'S SONS' CO.

General Electrical Repairs

122-130 CENTRE STREET

Corner White Street

Telephone 881 Franklin

NEW YORK

DENTISTRY

Loose teeth tightened by a new process; teeth without plates. Extracting avoided. High-class and up-to-date dentistry in all branches at reasonable prices.

DRS. BURKE & BURKE
DENTISTS

1947 BROADWAY AND 65TH ST
66th Street subway, L station and all surface cars.

BOUND VOLUMES OF AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW
OF THE WEEK

SIX MONTHS TO A VOLUME

$3.50

The AMERICA Press, 32 Washington q . W., New York

The Coward Shoe

A Helpful Shoe for Children

Weak ankle and arch are firmly supported by the extension heel of this shoe. The foot-form tread allows the great toe to meet the ground in a natural position.

Wearing this shoe, in childhood, prevents falling arch and "flat-foot."

Coward Arch Support Shoe, and Coward Extension Heel, have been made by James S. Coward in his Custom Department for over 20 yrs.

SOLD NOWHERE ELSE

JAMES S. COWARD

264-274 Greenwich St., N. Y.

(NEAR WARREN STREET)

Mail Orders Filled | Send for Catalogue

"MEMORY SCHOOLS EXPOSED"

and Booklet Free

"How to Read Music at Sight" 50 Cents

"How to Memorize Music" 10 Cents

MEMORY LIBRARY, 14 Park Pl., NEW YORK

LIBRARY SUPPLIES

Adjustable
Book Covers—Library Numbers Gummed
and perforated always in stock
—also alphabets of various sizes.

For sale by stationers or by

THE VAN EVEREN CO.
60 Ann Street - New York

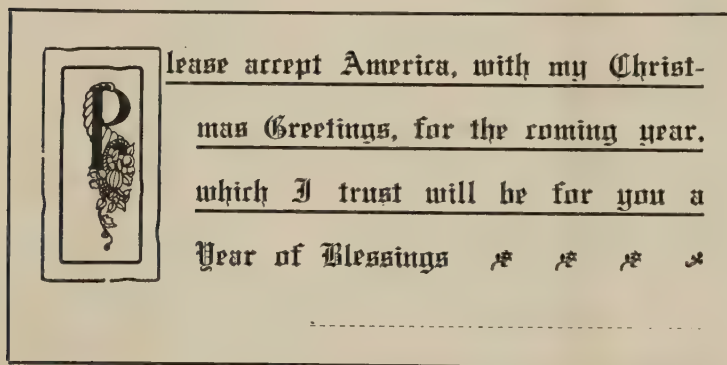

The Book Covers are made of tough, strong paper
and are inexpensive, efficient and easily put on

A Gift That Lasts Till Xmas Comes Again

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

We have prepared an attractive Christmas card which will bear the giver's name and compliments

(Reproduction of Card)

If you prefer to use your own card you may do so; kindly send same to us with your order.

SINGLE YEAR SUBSCRIPTION $3.00. FOUR YEARLY SUBSCRIPTIONS $10.00

Fill in below, names of parties to whom you wish to send AMERICA for one year and send order to us

CUT OFF HERE

NAME	STREET	CITY	STATE

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Square W., New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: Enclosed find in payment for the above order.

Name Street

City State

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

FOR A GIFT

AMONG THE HURONS

VOLUME II OF

Pioneer Priests of North America

Tells the heroic story of
de Brébeuf and His Associates

"This book is a striking illustration of the truth of Shakespeare's well-known words 'Men's good is oft interred with their bones.' . . . We cannot then but feel grateful to Father Campbell for what he has done to assure the fame of those glorious confessors and martyrs from a threatened obscurity. . . .

"Missionaries such as these have a special work in this day of weak faith and widespread disbelief; for the story of their lives, while it stimulates the one, is a living protest against the other. Father Campbell's theme is a great one, and he has dealt with it well. The clear and simple language in which he recounts the wonderful heroism of these truly wonderful men, is more impressive and convincing than any elaboration of style, and surely more in harmony with the quiet, simple characters of the men of whom he treats."—The Tablet, London.

By Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J.

480 Pages. With Index. 24 Illustrations.

PRICE, $2.00

VOLUME I

This extremely interesting book consists of a series of 18 monographs of the missionaries who labored among the Iroquois Indians. Beginning with the life of Jogues in 1642, they continue up to 1710, when the Indians, just before their annihilation, passed over from French to English control.

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS:

"For lovers of history and biography, of the adventurous, the heroic, and the saintly, there is much to attract the attention in this volume of over 800 large, clearly printed pages."—The Sacred Heart Review.

"The adventures of most of the missionaries read like romances."—The New York Herald.

"One of the most interesting Catholic books we have ever read."—The Monitor (San Francisco).

Price, $1.60, postage prepaid

THE AMERICA PRESS 32 Washington Sq. W.
NEW YORK

A SHOPPING GUIDE TO ABRAHAM & STRAUS

This store has a department organized for the purpose of supplying the convent, academy orphan asylum or school, hospital, etc., with serges, merinos, draps d'été, linens, etc., and clothing worn by children. The contract department, as it is called, also advises and estimates on carpets, furniture, shades, etc. A representative familiar with the requirements of religious communities will call, as soon as request is sent to Contract Department.

ABRAHAM & STRAUS

420 Fulton St., Brooklyn, New York

GOOD SAMPLE TEA

in lots of 100 pounds or more 16½ cents per pound

Good Old Crop COFFEE

splendid cup qualities—ground or in the bean 16½ cents per pound

New York & Columbia Coffee Co.

126 Front Street, New York City

$1.00 WILL BRING POSTPAID

one of our
Fine Gold Filled
5 year guaranteed

ROSARIES

In any color. Order through your jeweler or direct. Catalogue free.

Wm. Purnell Co.
Mfg. Jeweler
37 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER"
AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week
32 Washington Square West, New York City

FINN BROTHERS

Manufacturers of

Roll Top Desks

STORE and OFFICE FIXTURES
Counters, Shelvings,
Partitions, Etc.

Estimates and Designs Furnished

Office 358 BROADWAY Salesrooms

59-65 FRANKLIN ST., NEW YORK

Telephones, 4855-4856 Franklin

Factory: 112-114 LEROY STREET

Telephone Connection

Ecclesiastical Furniture

PEWS · PULPITS · FONTS · VESTMENT CASES · ETC.

Built to secure harmony with the general architectural and decorative scheme, from the finest, exquisitely hand-carved to the simpler, more inexpensive styles. Styles and Prices to meet any requirements.

Illustrations or special designs to harmonize with the architecture and arrangement of your Church gladly submitted to those interested.

American Seating Company

Address
Dept. B.X.

215 Wabash Ave.

NEW YORK

19 West 18th St.

BOSTON

70 Franklin St.

CHICAGO

PHILADELPHIA

1225 Arch St.

PITTSBURGH

824 Lewis Bldg.

The Famous Rayo

The Lamp with Diffused Light

should always be used where several people sit, because it does not strain the eyes of those sitting far from it.

The Rayo Lamp is constructed to give the maximum diffused white light. Every detail that increases its light-giving value has been included.

The Rayo is a low-priced lamp. You may pay $5, $10 or even $20 for other lamps and get a more expensive container—but you cannot get a better light than the Rayo gives.

This season's Rayo has a new and strengthened burner. A strong, durable shade-holder keeps the shade on firm and true. Easy to keep polished, as it is made of solid brass, finished in nickel.

Once a Rayo User, Always One.

Dealers Everywhere. If not at yours, write for descriptive circular to the nearest agency of the

Standard Oil Company
(Incorporated)

HEADQUARTERS FOR THE CLERGY

PHOTOGRAPHY! High-Class Work at Reasonable Prices

Cardinal Vannutelli—Exclusive and only sitting in U. S.
Copies for sale; also Cardinal Logue

E. F. FOLEY 164 FIFTH AVENUE
Bet. 21st and 22d Sts.

Appointments

'Phone, 5995 Gramercy

Telephone Call, 5922 Barclay

THE S. T. SMITH CO.

Manufacturers of

Ink, Inked Ribbons, Carbon, Manifold and Typewriter Linen Papers

Diamond Brand Typewriter Supplies

11 BARCLAY STREET

NLW YORK

MENEELY BELL CO.

TROY, N.Y. AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.

BELLS

ST. JOSEPH'S SANATORIUM

Silver City, New Mexico

Conducted by the Sisters of Mercy

A THOROUGHLY equipped institution for the treatment of all suitable cases of tuberculosis. Each room has two wide connecting porches, electric lights and all modern conveniences. Infirmary for febrile cases, also cottages for those desiring them. Trained nurses and resident physician in constant attendance. Climatic conditions ideal: cool summers and moderate winters. Annual precipitation 12 inches, with only 33 cloudy days. Altitude, 6,000 feet. All ethical lines of treatment, including tuberculin in suitable cases.

For Catalogue and particulars address either Sister Superior or Oliver T. Hyde, M.D., Medical Director.

We can supply anything in the line of Kitchen and Bakers' Utensils

Catalogue "M" FREE upon request

French Cooking Ranges
and Broilers

Cooking Equipments
of Every Description

JAMES Y. WATKINS & SON

16, 18, 20, CATHERINE ST.
NEW YORK N. Y.

DIRECTORY OF COLLEGES AND ACADEMIES

Georgetown University WASHINGTON, D. C.

Directory for Catalogues or Information

The College (Graduates and Undergraduate Schools)
The Registrar, 37th & O Sts., N. W.

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Joseph Himmel, S.J., President

LADYCLIFF

On the Hudson (Adjoining West Point)
Young Ladies' Academy

A department for small boys. Education thorough and practical. Location beautiful and convenient. Terms moderate. Send for prospectus. Address Sister Superior, Ladycliff, Highland Falls, N. Y.

New York State Regents' Examinations.

Academy of St. Joseph

In-the-Pines

BRENTWOOD, N. Y.

A Boarding School for Young Ladies,
Affiliated with the State University

PROSPECTUS EXPLAINS THE TERMS, ETC.

St. Mary's College

St. Marys, Kansas

BOARDING COLLEGE
Under the Jesuit Fathers

Two Courses of Study:
Classical and Commercial

For Catalogue, send to
REV. ALOYSIUS A. BREEN, S.J., President.

ACADEMY OF THE HOLY FAMILY

BALTIC, CONNECTICUT

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity
PREPARATORY, COMMERCIAL and ACADEMIC COURSES

Prospectus explains terms, etc.

Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

Convent of the Holy Child SHARON HILL, DELAWARE COUNTY, PA.

15 Minutes from Philadelphia

ACADEMY FOR YOUNG LADIES

Highest English Course. French, Drawing, Music by Certified Teachers. Preparation for foreign travel. As the numbers are limited, special care can be given to the formation of character and training of each child.
Address Mother Superior

COLLEGE OF ST. ELIZABETH

CONVENT STATION
Near Morristown, N. J.

One hour from New York City.

A Catholic Institution for the Higher Education of Women

COLLEGE

Four years' course leading to the degrees of B. A. and B. S.

SCHOOL OF PEDAGOGY

Required for entrance two years of College work

SCHOOL OF MUSIC. COURSE LEADING TO THE DEGREE OF B. M.

ACADEMY

A High School Course of Four Years. Full College Preparatory Work. GRAMMAR AND PRIMARY DEPARTMENTS SEPARATE

REGISTERED

By the New Jersey State Board of Education and the University of the State of New York

Apply for Year Book to The Secretary

MT. ST. JOSEPH ON THE WISSAHICKON

For illustrated catalogue address MOTHER SUPERIOR, Chestnut Hill, Philadelphia, Pa.

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE

WORCESTER
MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Collegiate and Preparatory Departments

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $260 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra. Send for catalogue to

REV. THOMAS E. MURPHY, S.J., President

Seton Hall College

FOUNDED 1856

South Orange, New Jersey

COLLEGE AND HIGH SCHOOL

Bayley Hall for Students
of Grammar Course

FOR CATALOGUE ADDRESS
Very Rev. James F. Mooney, D.D., Pres.

COLLEGE OF ST. CATHERINE, ST. PAUL, MINN.

A CATHOLIC COLLEGE FOR GIRLS

Accredited by the Minnesota State Board of Public Instruction and by several prominent Universities.

SEVENTY ACRE CAMPUS.

FIREPROOF BUILDINGS

COMPLETE COURSES
IN THESE DEPARTMENTS

THE COLLEGIATE, leading to the degree of Bachelor of Arts.
THE ACADEMIC OR COLLEGE PREPARATORY, MUSIC
AND PAINTING in their various branches. DOMESTIC ART,
HOUSEHOLD SCIENCE and COOKING.

YEAR BOOK FORWARDED ON APPLICATION, Address: THE SECRETARY

ST. JOHN'S PREPARATORY COLLEGE

DANVERS, MASS.

SELECT HIGH SCHOOL conducted by the XAVIERIAN BROTHERS

Classical, Scientific and Commercial Courses

Ideal Location

All New Buildings

New Equipment

Competent Instructors

Develops the Whole Boy

Send for Catalogue

Brother Benjamin, Director

IMMACULATA SEMINARY

MOUNT MARIAN, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Situated in the suburbs. Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of St. Mary-of-the-Woods. Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Conservatory methods in Music. Oil and Ceramic and Water-color Studios. Abundant out-door exercise. Sightseeing with experienced chaperons.

For Year Book address, Sister Secretary

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

ADJOINING BRONX PARK, NEW YORK CITY

College and High School

ST. JOHN'S HALL, FOR SMALLER BOYS

The location affords the healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city

MEDICAL SCHOOL
in connection with Fordham Hospital

WRITE FOR CATALOGUE

LAW SCHOOL
at 20 Vesey St.
in the midst of the courts

SPRING HILL COLLEGE

FOUNDED 1830

Spring Hill, Mobile Co., Ala.

CHARTERED 1836

BOARDING COLLEGE CONDUCTED BY THE JESUIT FATHERS

Just the School for boys who wish to escape the rigors of the Northern climate. Mean temperature of the winter months, 52 degrees Fahrenheit.

HEALTHY LOCATION—EVERY CONVENIENCE OF A MODERN COLLEGE

CURRICULUM INCLUDES THE PREPARATORY, HIGH SCHOOL AND COLLEGE COURSES. DEGREES CONFERRED

Write for Catalogue to Rev. F. X. Twellmeyer, S. J., President

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Vol. IV, No. 10

(Price 10 Cents)

DECEMBER 17, 1910

($3.00 a year)

Whole No. 88

CHRONICLE

Edward D. White, Chief Justice—President Taft's Message—Report on Philippines—Filipino Home Rule Remote—Statue of Von Steuben—Canada—Great Britain—Ireland—France—Belgium—German Socialists Warned—Plans for Greater Berlin—Italy—Hungary217-220

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Socialism in the Schools—Mass in the Presbyterian Church, II.—Margaret Brent; the First Suffragette—Christian Archeology221-227

CORRESPONDENCE

National Catholic Congress of Hungary—Jansenism in Holland—Christianity Without Christ227-229

EDITORIAL

The Outlook and the Vatican—"Homages" and Homage—The Report of the Immigration Commission—Women in Public Life—St. Vincent de Paul's Christmas—Portuguese Freemasonry,230-233

SOME FRIENDS OF MINE, IV. The Captain. 233-234

LITERATURE

Christmas Presents Among Books—Some Catholic Books—Hints for Catechists on Instructing Converts—Special Pleading for Anarchy in McClure's Magazine—Books Received.....234-237

EDUCATION

Working Their Way Through College—Discrimination Against Catholic Parochial School Pupils—Anti-Catholic Utterances at Meetings of School Teachers' Associations237

SOCIOLOGY

The Uplifting Grace of Christian Charity—Zeal for Practices Not Christian.....237-238

ECONOMICS

How a Trust in China is being Regulated..238

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

Correct Translations of Papal Decrees—The Pope and the North American College—Archbishop O'Connell on the Generosity of the Poor—Mass for Night Workers at San Francisco—Diocesan Synods in New York and Brooklyn.238

SCIENCE

The Mineral Resources of the Philippines—The Question of Martial Markings.....239

PERSONAL

Judge Mark A. Sullivan—Rev. Allan McDonnell, S.J.239

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Contradictory Views of Protestant Episcopal Ministers on Confirmation.....239

OBITUARY

Right Rev. Mgr. Anatole Oster, V.G.—Very Rev. William Kloepper, D.D.—Right Rev. Mgr. P. J. Harkins—Rev. Frederick P. Garesché, S.J.239-240

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

An Interesting Book in Gaelic—The Recent Disturbances in Mexico.....240

CHRONICLE

Edward D. White, Chief Justice.—Edward Douglass White, of Louisiana, a Democrat, was nominated to the Senate, by President Taft, for Chief Justice of the United States on December 12, and the nomination was promptly and unanimously confirmed by that body. Justice White was born in the parish of Lafourche, La., in 1845. He was educated at Mount St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg, Md., at the Jesuit College in New Orleans and at Georgetown College, Washington, D. C. Following graduation at Georgetown he entered the Confederate army, serving until the close of the war, when he practised law in his native State. In 1874 he was elected to the Louisiana State Senate, in which body he ranked among the leaders; and in 1878 he was appointed an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of Louisiana. He was elected to the United States Senate, as a Democrat, to succeed James B. Eustis and took his seat on March 4, 1891. While serving as Senator he was appointed by President Cleveland in 1894 an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court.

President Taft's Message.—The final session of the Sixty-first Congress opened on Monday, December 5, and the yearly message of the President was delivered to both houses on December 6. The document contains about 34,000 words. In it the President makes many recommendations for legislation toward economy and reform in the administration of the various offices of the government and urges the extension of the classified service so as ultimately to free the post office and the consular service and other branches of government activity from political taint. Some of the schedules of the Payne bill, he remarks, have "been subjected to a great deal of criticism," and he opposes any general revision, though admitting that some of the criticism has been just. By the opening of the next Congress, Mr. Taft expects to be able to present the argument for further revision of separate tariff schedules; meanwhile, he is ready to have the Tariff Board enlarged and made permanent and given added powers, if Congress sees fit.

On the subject of conservation, the President reaffirms the views to which he gave utterance in his St. Paul speech last September, dwelling upon the need of new legislation if the coal deposits and phosphate lands and water power rights are to be safeguarded and made available. As concerns anti-Trust legislation, or further amendment of the Interstate Commerce act, the President advises a pause until the Supreme Court gives a full interpretation of the meaning and scope of the statutes we now have.

Recommendations favorable to various measures already advocated by the President, are renewed. Under this heading he proposes reciprocity with Canada, mail or other subsidies for the creation of a merchant marine, the bestowal of fitting recognition on Capt. Robert E. Peary for his discovery of the North Pole, the fortification of the Panama Canal, national incorporations, the cheapening and simplification of equity proceedings in the national courts, regulation of injunction proceedings, increased salaries for Judges, higher postage rates for magazines, introduction of the parcels post on rural routes, two battleships a year, government of Alaska by commission, the valuation of railroads and a retirement fund for the civil service.

Report on the Philippines.—Peace, law and order prevail throughout the islands, says Secretary Dickinson's report on the Philippines, which has just been issued by the War Department. He inspected practically all the public institutions and army posts and held many public hearings. The administration of the various departments was found to be, generally speaking, satisfactory. The Legislative Assembly, though controlled by the Nationalist party, which was organized in opposition to those who favored American control, has enacted laws for development and progress in keeping with the recommendations of the Governor-General. The support of education and internal improvement has been liberal. Good progress is being made in learning the English language. The Secretary dwells at some length on his investigations relative to the sale of Friar lands, which received much attention in the last session of Congress and the public press, but found no basis for the extreme statements made. The financial condition of the islands is satisfactory, and there is a surplus of $6,395,000. The Secretary recommends an appropriation of $250,000 for the development of coal claims on the island of Batan, which he says might be of incalculable value to the government in an emergency, and reviews recommendations previously made for the benefit of the islands.

Filipino Home Rule Remote.—In the same report the Secretary of War, referring to the fitness of the Filipino people for self-government, says: There are very many highly educated Filipinos—many men of talent, ability and brilliancy—but the percentage in comparison with those who are wholly untrained in an understanding of and the exercise of political rights under a republican form of government is so small, and under the best and most rapid development possible under existing conditions will continue so small, that it is a delusion, if the present policy of control of the islands by the American people shall continue, to encourage the Filipino people in the hope that the administration of the islands will be turned over to them within the time of the present generation.

Statue to Von Steuben.—The statue of Major-General Friedrich Wilhelm von Steuben, Inspector-General and drill-master of Washington's army, was unveiled at Washington on Dec. 7. President Taft, the German Ambassador to the United States, members of the President's Cabinet, and of the diplomatic corps and thousands of von Steuben's countrymen gathered at the monument.

Canada.—The Prime Ministers of the Provinces met in Ottawa December 9. It is said that they discussed two important questions, of which the first relates to the proportion of representatives in the Dominion House of Commons. Under the provisions of the British North America Act the number of representatives from the Province of Quebec is fixed and the number of representatives from each of the other provinces bears the same proportion to that number as the population of each province bears to that of Quebec. This rule works serious injury to the maritime Provinces, the population of which grows but slowly in comparison with that of the rest of the country, and there is a prospect that at no distant day Prince Edward Island will have only one member in a House of Commons much larger than that of the early years of Confederation. When British Columbia entered the Confederation in 1871 it was given three members. Its growth was not foreseen and the articles of agreement included the promise that its representation should never be diminished. The Maritime Provinces think that this concession might be made to them. The second question touches difficulties of concurrent jurisdiction arising out of the insufficient definition of the powers of the two governments, federal and provincial. The Provinces complain that the Dominion Government is trespassing continually on their rights and it has been proposed that some of these should prepare a case in the matter to be carried to the Privy Council. British Columbia carries provincial rights to the extent of refusing corporations of other Provinces permission to do business unless incorporated under its own laws.—People are beginning to see what AMERICA has been pointing out for some time, that the British Empire is in a most critical condition. The Conservative leader, Mr. Borden, says that its fate must be determined in a very few years, and puts its safety in effective cooperation of its parts in trade and defence.

Great Britain.—The elections leave parties much as they were. Unionists explain their failure by personal popularity of candidates, revival of trade, strikes in the coal and shipbuilding trades. Some say that the party cries they adopted injured them. They certainly did not help Bonar Law in Manchester, who was getting on very well till he touched on "American dollars" and received a volley of comments: "nonsense," "humbug," "bosh," etc., and Lord Rosebery had a like reception. The general poll was less than last January on both sides; a comparison of the two showing that a handful of Liberals may have voted for the Unionists' candidates and a slightly larger number abstained from voting. What the elections show clearly is, that on the whole the electors are at least apathetic regarding the House of Lords and Home Rule. Unionists themselves admit that the elections went on ordinary party lines modified by purely local questions; and the hoped-for rush to preserve the constitution and to prevent the separation of the kingdoms did not come off anywhere. As Mr. Balfour has proclaimed himself a Democrat in favor of the referendum, and as both those matters have been referred to the people, and as the people are content to let the government go ahead with its proposals, the proper course for the Unionists seems to be to stand aside and not interfere. —A few Suffragist candidates stood. The absurdly small vote they polled shows that female pretensions helped by female violence have not impressed the voters.

Ireland.—The recent cable reports of bloody encounters in Cork city between the two Nationalist sections had absolutely no foundation. There was no collision between the rival meetings, no fighting of any kind, and the "eighty sent to hospital" was a pure invention. The same is true of similar reports from other quarters sent out by parties interested in showing Ireland unfit for self-government. The only scene of serious election brawls was Belfast, where the regular Orangemen attacked the insurgent Orangemen who had helped to secure the victory of Mr. Devlin. Mid-Tyrone is another Ulster constituency which has been wrested from the Unionists. The surprises of the elections were the capture of both seats in Cork city by Mr. O'Brien and Mr. M. Healy, and the loss of North Louth by Mr. T. M. Healy. Mr. O'Brien's supporters are now confined to Cork County. Mr. Healy declined to accept the offer of a seat in Cork, as he intends to contest the legality of the Louth election. —Mr. Asquith made several declarations during the week in favor of Home Rule, and in reply to a question whether he intended to introduce a Bill to that effect in the next Parliament, replied in the affirmative. Mr. Birrell also declared that the first measure to be introduced after the Lords' veto was disposed of would be a Bill giving full self-government to Ireland in Irish affairs. This formally commits the government to practical and immediate action and justifies the course of Mr. Redmond. It is now evident that his confident prediction of a speedy settlement of the Irish question, should the Liberals win at the polls, was founded on reliable assurances. The result of the elections has strengthened his position in Ireland. Replying to taunts that in supporting the British Democracy against the Lords he was supporting Socialistic ideals, Mr. W. Redmond said that "good order, good government, reverence for religion and everything that became a Christian people were better and more wisely safeguarded by an honest and true-hearted democracy than by any privileged class." As an Irishman and a Catholic he deemed himself bound to stand by the masses in all that was just and honest.

France.—The bishops of France have received a circular under signature and without date, but with the stamp of Paris on it, which professes to be a protest of a great number of priests belonging to all the dioceses against the oath which the Holy Father exacts from all clerics, as a safeguard against the doctrines of Modernism. The document declares that the individuals sending the protest are willing to take the oath with a mental reservation that they do not intend to be bound by it.

The declaration is so self-stultifying that one is surprised that any attention was paid to the paper at all.—The Duke of Chartres, King Louis Philippe's grandson, who will be remembered as serving in the American Civil War with the Comte de Paris, on the staff of General McClellan, died at Paris on December 5. In a diary of his service with the Army of the Potomac kept by Father Tissot, S.J., chaplain of the Thirty-seventh Regiment, N. Y. Volunteers of the Irish Brigade, and published in the "Records and Studies" of the U. S. Catholic Historical Society, there is an interesting account of a visit made in camp by Father Tissot, who was a Frenchman, to these two illustrious representatives of his country.—When the General Strike was over, great things were expected from the Prime Minister, about what he was to do to prevent the recurrence of such disorders. He spoke at the opening of Parliament but satisfied himself with generalities; nor did he say anything about coercing civil service employees in the matter of syndicates, nor about the General Confederation of Labor, nor the union of syndicates. In the debate which followed the announcement of the Government program, Briand appeared pale, haggard and bent. He announced that he would continue his fight against Christianity; that is to say, he would increase his "lay conquests." Maurice Barrès, writing in the Echo de Paris, says that "Briand has wit enough for fifteen but not enough political morality for two." One of the new members of the Cabinet, Laferre, was the chief object of attack by the members of the Right, chiefly Piou and Driant. Laferre was the individual who championed the system of army espionage by which 56 generals and 600 officers were expelled from the army because of their leanings, real or supposed, to Catholicity. He also had presided at a meeting of Freemasons who passed a resolution that the seizure of Alsace and Lorraine was a matter of no interest to them. Laferre's bungling attempts to explain made even Briand smile. When the budget was discussed most of the members withdrew or read novels, and the Government was given a free hand to pile up its appropriations unchallenged.

Belgium.—The bishops of the country have issued a joint pastoral on the subject of the First Communion of children. It insists upon a respectful and thankful reception of the papal decree, and reminds the faithful that nothing will more quickly develop grace in the hearts than early and frequent Communion. As soon as the children are prepared, they are to approach the Holy Table privately and without the usual ceremonies. The solemn and public reception of the Sacrament will take place after the child has followed at least two years' instruction in Catechism. Possibly this arrangement will tranquilize those who are worrying about the new arrangement.—The Catholic quarrel in Parliament seems to have been settled, and it is thought that even the Daensists, or Catholic Socialists, can be relied upon in any question that affects religion. Moreover, the Government program for the coming session is distinctly social in its character, and cannot be assailed by the Socialist side of the House. The first article is a project to give miners who are 55 years old a minimum pension of 360 francs; then follow old age pensions, reform of the syndicate laws, and of domicile labor. The impatient Manchesterians who flout every thing in favor of labor reform will probably snap their fingers at the whole program, but the Socialists will have to fall into line.—The Government is assailed by the Liberals for running into debt. M. Liebart, the Minister of Finance, shows that even if the national debt is four milliards, the value of the railroads alone would balance it as an asset. There are besides, the bridges, canals, the colonial possessions, etc. The budget in 25 years has increased by 68,000,000 francs, but in the same space of time the revenues have gone up to 73,000,000. So the country is safe.—At last accounts the Queen who had been dangerously ill was out of danger.

German Socialists Warned.—In a striking address before the Reichstag, Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg freely commented on the internal politics of the empire. He deplored the factional spirit animating the various parliamentary groups and regretted the manner in which, to gain tactical party advantage, national fundamentals were often ignored in party programs. Touching the subject of Socialism and the Socialist party the Chancellor expressed himself with unwonted frankness. "The revolutionary character of Social Democracy," he said, "is finding more and more brutal expression. Dr. Carl Liebknecht, a Socialist member of the Prussian Diet, speaking in the United States recently remarked that matters in Germany were developing in such a way that the German crown might soon be swept away in a night as was the case in Portugal. Our people must have a clear answer to those views. The Socialists and whoever teaches the masses of the people that they can prosper only after the existing order is overthrown is responsible when the masses draw practical conclusions from this doctrine. Therefore, hold Social Democracy responsible for the great excesses recently committed during the strikes at Moabit and elsewhere. Who sows the wind reaps the whirlwind."

Plans for Greater Berlin.—A bill compelling Berlin and its suburban municipalities to combine in a greater Berlin has been drawn up by the Prussian government. The population of the contemplated metropolitan area is close to 3,500,000. The measure provides for an administration of the greater city similar to that of the London county council.

Italy.—General Pelloux, former Minister of War in Italy, has given to the press the text of the speech which he will make in the Senate in support of his interpellation regarding the recent anti-papal utterances of Mayor

Nathan. The speech is a vigorous protest against the silence of the Government regarding what "must be affirmed to be an insult offered to millions of Catholics." Reminding the Government that next year is to witness the commemoration of the jubilee of the proclamation of United Italy, General Pelloux continues: "Surely the best interests of all Italians demand that nothing be allowed to occur to mar the enthusiasm of the celebrations that is being planned, that nothing be permitted to disturb the peace and order of the patriotic festivities which are to mark that celebration." He complains that Mayor Nathan has abused his position to utter statements which disgrace Italy and violate the chief laws of the land. The Government, he adds, is bound to take action in a matter thus touching Italy's law of guarantees, unless it be willing to stand accused of cooperation with Mayor Nathan in his offence. General Pelloux concludes by demanding to be informed whether the Government means to continue its passive attitude in the matter and allow the injury done to Catholic sentiment to pass without any reparation.

Hungary.—Despatches from Budapest make known that the followers of Kossuth and Justh, the two hitherto irreconcilable leaders of the Opposition, are beginning to show a disposition to settle their differences and that strong efforts are being made to unite the factions so that the Independence party may present an unbroken front in its attack upon the strong government majority during the approaching session of parliament. The reason is clear. The principal question to come before parliament will be that of electoral reform, in regard to which Kossuth and Justh are alike strongly opposed to the solution suggested by the Premier, Graf Khuen-Hedervary, in his public announcements. The Independence party demands universal, equal and direct franchise with a secret ballot, the Government declares itself unprepared to accept such a sweeping reform. Should an agreement between the two Opposition leaders secure common action on the part of their followers the status of the party in parliament would unquestionably be a stronger one. Kossuth has a following of 55 members, Justh's party numbers 42; disunited they can do nothing against the overwhelming forces of the Government, which controls 260 votes, united they will be able, owing to the peculiar conditions obtaining in parliamentary procedure in Hungary, to hamper and harass the activity of the majority. This is especially true in the matter of electoral reform, in which, it will be remembered, with full approval of the Emperor-King, very liberal promises were made to the Hungarian people just a year ago. The Government will not be pleased to see an effective alliance between the two leaders; Kossuth it has tolerated because of his moderate views, moderate at least from the Government's standpoint; but Justh it has opposed with energy and bitterness, owing to the extremely radical character of his program.

'QUESTIONS OF THE DAYSocialism in the Schools

The instruction given by Mayor Seidel of Milwaukee to the younger generation of the city under his charge, that their government is founded upon oppression and that their study must be to prepare for revolution, may well arouse indignation but should not excite surprise. It is the only lesson which Socialism has come to teach. For the Marxian followers the entire social order under which we live is based upon ignorance, violence and injustice, and there can be no remedy except total destruction. "It is not to reform the evils of the day," Eugene V. Debs has told us in "The Growth of Socialism," "but to abolish the social system which produces them, that the Socialist party is founded. It is the party not of reform but of revolution." Truce there can never be, they cry, until the reins of power and the nation's destinies have been gathered into their hands, until they have swept away most of the "sweet ideals and dear moralities": the private ownership of capital and "patriotism—even patriotism."

It is clear then that the system of our public no less than of our private schools is pronounced by them to be entirely inadequate. In both Socialism beholds the same capitalistic bias, the same predetermined purpose to train obedient subjects for the service of the ruling classes, slaves for the plutocracy within our land. "The public school," Austin Lewis writes, "has come to be regarded as a factory of citizenship, so that children are put through a series of patriotic devotions by means of flag worship, which is, in the ultimate, the blindest of fetichisms." Patriotism, which is the cardinal virtue of these schools, a virtue more deeply though less ostentatiously instilled into the mind of the Catholic child, is written by Socialists at the head of their catalogue of vices. In his public harangues the party orator may conceal his meaning in effusive rhetoric, but he is plain-spoken when addressing the initiated. "Patriotism," says Comrade Gustave Hervé in "My Country, Right or Wrong," "in every nation masks the class antagonism to the great profit of the leading classes, through it they prolong and facilitate their domination;" and to strengthen his position he informs us what a country is: "a monstrous social inequality, the shameful exploitation of a nation by a privileged class." Socialism acknowledges no country but only one universal struggle all the world over of class against class, of poor against rich, which must be waged even to annihilation. "The workingmen have no country," reads the Communist Manifesto, "we cannot take away from them what they have not got." Therefore the watchword to be remembered, especially in times of national danger: "Whoever be the aggressor, rather insurrection than war!" (Gustave Hervé.)

It is evident then that Socialism must construct its own schools in which the new ideal of education can be attained, in which Patriotism and Love of Country can be discarded as effectively as Religion has already been. It is after all but another step in the materialistic progress of our age. It is only logic pushed to its ultimate deductions with God left out in the premises. The beginning of this new education has now been realized in the Socialist Sunday School, an institution already established in various cities and pointed to with satisfaction by journalists and party leaders.

What then is a Socialist Sunday School? Looking over the first lesson of a model course we meet at the very opening with a familiar subject, a chapter "On the Beginning of Things." There is, however, no disturbing reference made to a God or a Creator. Stating in a word the existence of material things, the author enters upon a minutely accurate description of our earliest human progenitors as they existed not more than thirty millions of years ago. The distinction between them and their less developed brethren of the forest is sufficiently established by the fact that they have learned the use of fire. No antiquated theories of a spiritual principle in man are allowed to prepossess the mind of the child, no visionary dreams of a hereafter are permitted to rob it of its assured present. There is, of course, nothing new in these lessons. They are scientific as they are edifying and have been taught for years past in countless schools throughout the land. The originality of Socialism consists in making them matter for Sunday instruction and, especially, in pointing out the vast superiority of social and ethical conditions in that golden age of cave-man and forest-man, as compared with those of our own iron reign of sex inequality and class oppression. Sociology, history and science, as seen through a haze of red, are the favorite branches of these schools, and their object is to instil into the heart of the child a brotherly affection which shall exclude none of its own class, and a happy discontent with the entire order of existing things—Socialism alone excepted.

But Sunday School teaching does not bound the educational horizon of Socialism. The training of a more highly educated proletariat for effective propaganda work is a problem of no small importance, one solution to which has been the foundation and endowment of the Rand School of Social Science in New York. I quote a brief review of its scope and work taken from an article by Ada C. Sweet. The passage presents a clear summary of Socialist teaching, and, apart from what opponents would call a party-coloring, it merely reproduces the very theses which every consistent Socialist must defend.

In this school are taught the general theories and doctrines of Socialism; the abolition of private ownership of land, public utilities and means of production, and a complete "social democracy" as opposed to the present form of representative government in the United States.

With more or less power each lecturer enlarges upon "class consciousness," and preaches class hatred; other agitators present distorted views of the past and present, urging what is properly called the "materialistic conception of history;" these speakers bitterly attack the United States Constitution and especially the United States courts. Discouragement and despair as to the life and progress of workers under present conditions are constantly expressed, while disloyalty to country and the complete obliteration of the sentiment of patriotism are common doctrines. Under the thin guise of forwarding the sentiment of universal peace and brotherhood, virulent hostility to the army and navy is taught, and constantly the most pessimistic views of industrial and social conditions are expressed, while individual efforts are discouraged and branded as useless in the "struggle with capitalism."

Added to the Rand School are correspondence courses, each consisting of six outlines. These are sent to the students at intervals of one month, and give a synopsis of the subject to be treated with directions for reading. After completing the prescribed study the correspondent writes an essay which is "read and marked by comrades well qualified for such work," and returned with criticism and fraternal advice.

But the most comprehensive plan for engaging in the cause of Socialism the power and resources of education is the Intercollegiate Socialist Society, whose membership is drawn from the great universities of our country. At present Socialistic study chapters have already been erected, according to official accounts, at educational centres like Harvard, Columbia, the University of Pennsylvania, Marietta College, the College of the City of New York, while representatives are drawn from Yale, Vassar, Ohio State, Princeton, Smith and other colleges. Their activity may be illustrated by quoting from the plans of the New York chapter, which are "to hold monthly propaganda meetings and through the teachers', engineers', medical, legal, press and other committees seek to organize the members of the professions of the city and vicinity for the purpose of Socialistic study and activity." To this chapter is likewise attached a press committee to present the Socialist standpoint in newspapers and magazines and encourage other members to do the same, and a lecture bureau to arrange with other organizations for lectures to be given by members of the chapter. The first annual convention of the Society was attended by students and alumni from thirty-six American and five European colleges.

It is to be noted that the most prominent of the Socialist leaders in the past and present belong to the class of "Intellectuals." Marx and Lasalle themselves were of this number. Liebknecht in Germany, Ferri in Italy, Vandervelde in Belgium, Jaurès in France and a long list of American writers and party leaders are to be counted among this same class. They are said to belong to the proletariat in as far as they do not own the means of their employment, even as all university professors can be embraced in this term. Kirkpatrick, the organizer of the Intercollegiate Socialist Society (I. S. S.), gives their status and indicates their importance in a quotation taken from Bebel. Referring to the large proletariat in the liberal professions the latter remarks that its utility consists in "constantly increasing and carrying discontent with the state of affairs into the highest ranks of society. The capitalistic spirit in these circles is roused to criticism of actual conditions and helps to accelerate the universal dissolution." In the same spirit Jaurès insists "If it (Socialism) is limited to the wage-earners, it cannot conquer. If it includes all the workers and the moral and intellectual elite of the nation, its victory is certain" (Studies in Socialism, Jaurès). The moral élite at present mainly consists, we presume, of the not inconsiderable number of Protestant clergymen who have already given it their support.

So at length we behold, more truly than the poet saw in dream, the raven perched upon the bust of Pallas.

"And the lamp-light o'er him streaming casts his shadow on the floor." It is the forecast of all that Socialism so confidently predicts, and whose realization, whether we fear it or not, we must labor to prevent. Our lethargy would be its strength. Socialism has inexhaustible resources of enthusiasm and energy. We have summed up but a portion of its work in the educational field, and doubtlessly we shall soon witness its efforts to introduce Socialistic text-books, openly or by stealth, into our public institutions. Yet, Socialism, with all its hatred of the Church, may not be without blessings to us in the Providence of God. If it can but arouse in us a spirit of equal aggressiveness, a more profound sense of our social responsibilities, an eager zeal for organization, press-activity and apostolic work of every kind, it shall have done us a worthy service. This is the use we must endeavor to make of it, for vainly as the poet shall we now conjure it with empty words:

"Get thee back into the tempest and the Night's Plutonian shore!"

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

Mass in the Presbyterian Church

II.

The celebrant then began the Great Ektene, and the choir sang in response to each petition, "Hospodi pomilui" (Kyrie Eleison), exactly as in all Greek churches, and all was conducted with the same words and same intoning. When, however, he came to the part, "Let us pray for our most holy ecumenical Bishop, Pius, the Pope of Rome," and the rest of the Archbishops and Bishops, as the words stand in the Greek Catholic missal, he used only the concluding expression: "for the honorable Presbyterate and the Diaconate in Christ, etc." At the end of the Ektene, the celebrant loudly intoned the Bogorodicheu (Theotokion) or ascription to the Blessed Virgin: "Commemorating our most holy, most pure, most blessed and glorious Lady, the Mother of God and ever Virgin Mary, with all the Saints, let us commend ourselves and one another and all our life to Christ our God."

After that the choir and many of the congregation sang the first antiphon, the response to each versicle of it being, "Molitrami Bogoroditsy, Spase, spasi nas," (Through the prayers of the Mother of God, O Saviour, save us), which response is sung four times in the first antiphon. After the celebrant had again intoned, "commemorating our most holy, most pure, etc.," the second antiphon was sung. The responses to the versicles of this antiphon are: "Molitrami sviatikh troikh, Spase, spasi nas" (Through the prayers of thy Saints, O Saviour, save us). And again the celebrant intoned, "commemorating our most holy, most pure, etc.," and then the third antiphon was sung. The response to the versicles of this antiphon were: "Save us, O Son of God, risen from the dead, who sing to Thee, Alleluia."

After that came the Little Entrance with the Gospels which were taken from the altar and then afterwards laid on the altar again. During each one of these blessings, and indeed every time the celebrant intoned, "Glory be to the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost, as it is now and ever shall be world without end," each member of the congregation and the choir bowed and crossed himself devoutly. After that the Trisagion (Sviaty Bozhe) was sung, after each stanza at the "Glory be to the Father, etc.," all of the congregation and singers made the sign of the cross. Following this the Lector, or reader, in the choir read the Apostle (Epistle) and then while the choir sang the "Alleluia" preparatory to the Gospel, large candles were distributed to certain of the congregation, who after receiving them went upon the platform near the altar and lighted them and formed a miniature procession to accompany the celebrant as he carried the Gospels from the altar to the pulpit at the edge of the platform, where they encircled him as he intoned the Gospel of the day. The only thing noticeably different from the ceremonies of the Mass in the Greek Catholic Church was that the celebrant did not use either censer or incense. But whenever he turned to bless the congregation his arm was extended and his fingers held in exactly the Greek Catholic position and each time he made the full sign of the cross.

After this the choir sang the Cherubic Hymn, that well known deliberate melody of the Greek Church, by which the elements of bread and wine, already blessed, are welcomed as they are carried to the altar to be consecrated. This solemn carriage of the chalice and paten with the bread and wine is known in the Greek rite by the name of the Great Entrance. It is a foreshadowing of the consecration yet to come. The Cherubic Hymn sung at this imitation Mass in Hope Chapel was word for word the same as in the Greek Catholic or Greek Orthodox church: "Let us, who mystically represent the Cherubim and sing to the life-giving Trinity the thrice-holy hymn, put away all the cares of this life, (here the Entrance to the altar takes place) that we may receive the King of All who comes invisibly escorted by the angelic hosts, Alleluia, Alleluia, Alleluia." The celebrant entered with the paten and chalice uncovered, but with the iliton or aer (the large veil covering the paten and chalice) over his left shoulder, and after reciting the prayers for the "Synod and Presbyterate" (omitting all mention of the Pope or the Bishops) he deposited the chalice and paten in the middle of the altar directly under the cross.

After the little Ektene was intoned by the celebrant and its responses "Grant us, O Lord" were sung by the choir, he unfolded the aer and held it up on high above the chalice and paten, exactly as in the Greek Catholic Church, while the choir and people sang the Nicene creed. When they sang the words "i vohelovichshasia" (and was made man) every one bowed their heads as prescribed in the Greek rite. After several prayers, the celebrant intoned, "Let us lift up our hearts," the choir responded "We have them up to the Lord," and then the celebrant, "Let us give thanks to the Lord," while the choir responded, "It is meet and just to adore the Father and Son and Holy Ghost, the holy consubstantial and indivisible Trinity." The celebrant, then stretching out his arms, recited in a low tone, the Preface after the Greek style, concluding by intoning aloud the last words of it. The choir then took up the response, "Sviat, sviat, sviat (Sanctus, sanctus, sanctus) etc."—"Holy, holy, holy, Lord of Hosts, heaven and earth is full of Thy glory. Hosanna in the highest. Blessed is he who cometh in the name of the Lord. Hosanna in the highest." And at this moment a small bell was rung thrice,

Then all the congregation began to kneel down, and the celebrant, bending low over the altar intoned aloud the Greek form of consecration: "Take, eat, this is my body broken for you for the forgiveness of sins," while the small bell was again rung thrice. The choir responded "Amen," while the kneeling congregation crossed themselves repeatedly. Then he intoned again the Greek form of consecration of the chalice: "Drink ye all of this, this is my blood of the New Testament shed for you and for many for the forgiveness of sins," and again the choir responded "Amen" and the small bell was rung thrice, while the kneeling congregation again crossed themselves. Then the celebrant turning to the congregation held up the chalice and paten and intoned: "Thine of thy own we offer to thee, for all and through all," just as in a Greek Catholic church. The celebrant continued to say something in a low voice, but whether he said the epiklesis, "make this bread the holy body of thy Christ and that which is in this chalice the precious body of thy Christ," I do not know, as I was too far away to catch the words, but immediately afterwards he intoned loudly: "Especially our all holy, all pure, exceedingly blessed and glorious Lady, the Mother of God and ever Virgin Mary." Immediately the choir and most of the congregation sang in response: "Meet indeed it is to praise thee, Mother of God, (Bogoroditsu) ever blessed and immaculate Mother of our God (preneporochnu Mater Boha nasheho). More honorable than the Cherubim and beyond compare more glorious than the Seraphim, thou who without stain barest God the Word, thee, verily, the Mother of God, we magnify!" Imagine this in a Presbyterian church!

Afterwards the celebrant lifted up the paten (really the Greek elevation), and intoned: "Holy things for the holy!" while the choir responded: "One Holy, One Lord, Jesus Christ, in the glory of God the Father, Amen." And he afterwards blessed the congregation with the chalice, making the sign of the cross with it, intoning: "O Lord, save thy people and bless thine inheritance." Although the time came for communion, the celebrant consumed what was on the paten and in the chalice, none of the congregation coming forward. After this he made the ablutions in the form used in the Greek rite and then cleansed the chalice, and retired with it from the altar. Then he divested himself of his chasuble, and coming to the public in alb and stole, he preached a sermon in which he said a good deal about "Greek Catholics," referring particularly to the change in name of a Ruthenian society which had lately taken those words as an additional part of its name. Afterwards he resumed the chasuble, the choir sang again: "It is meet indeed to praise thee O Mother of God, etc.," the final prayer was said and the blessing with the sign of the cross was given to the people.

The celebrant then retired into the vestry where he took off his vestments. While he was doing so, nearly all the small congregation came up to the analogion in front of the pulpit, bowed down, crossed themselves repeatedly and reverently kissed the crucifix there, just as they would have done in a Greek Catholic church. When the celebrant came out of the vestry in ordinary street dress, he was asked in English what kind of a church it was, and he replied "This is a Presbyterian church." A little later one of the men present said it was an Independent Greek Catholic church. The celebrant said his name was Basil Kusiv, and once described himself as a priest and at another time as a minister. I asked him to let me see the service book which he used, and going towards the altar he directed the church attendant, who was then extinguishing the candles, to show it to me. It was a beautifully printed edition (of which I have a copy) of the Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom in Slavonic, issued and printed by the Basilian monks at Zhovkwa in Galicia, dated 1906, and bearing the imprimatur of Most Rev. Andrew Sheptytski, Greek Catholic Metropolitan of Lemberg. The Book of the Gospels used on the altar is the regular one printed in Lemberg for the Greek Catholics.

The vestments used by this imitation priest were of the well known Greek form and were very fine and new. Every gesture, every word in accent and intoning in the service, were according to the Greek ritual, and the very books on the altar, and those used by choir and congregation were Greek Catholic ones. In fact every means seems to have been taken to completely deceive and lead astray these poor Ruthenians and to give them the idea that they are attending a Catholic Mass, as in their old country.

ANDREW J. SHIPMAN.

Margaret Brent The First Suffragette

It is a curious historical fact that the first recorded suffragette, on this side of the Atlantic, is Margaret Brent, a woman whose name is held in the highest honor in the annals of Catholic Maryland. William Hand Browne, in his "Maryland, the History of a Palatinate," calls her "the only woman whose figure stands clear in our colonial history," and he regrets "that so few particulars of her life are left to us, and that we have no portrait of this stately old English gentlewoman." Her name occurs frequently in the pages of the twenty-seven volumes of the official archives of colonial Maryland.

The Brents were conspicuous in the founding of Virginia and Maryland. Captain George Brent, under a patent granted him and three associates, February 10, 1687, by James I, purchased 30,000 acres of land, between the Potomac and Rappahannock, for a colony in which the inhabitants should enjoy "the free exercise of their religion, without being persecuted or molested upon any penal laws or other account of the same." His descendants, Robert and William Brent, married Ann and Ellen Carroll, sisters of John Carroll, fellow-student at Bohemia of the Brents, and first Bishop of the hierarchy of the United States.

Margaret Brent, with her brothers Giles and Fulke and her sister Mary, arrived in Maryland, November 22, 1638. They were relatives of the Calverts. Margaret brought with her nine colonists, five men and four women. She and her sister Mary took up manors, imported more settlers, and managed their affairs with most successful masculine ability. One of the two "courts baron" of which there is record, was held at St. Gabriel's Manor, on the estate of Mary Brent. Fulke and Giles Brent were delegates to the Assembly of February 25, 1639. Giles was the Military Captain and instructor in arms of the local forces, Governor of the Isle of Kent, and he was appointed Acting Governor of the whole colony, on April 15, 1643, when Leonard Calvert went to England.

In such an environment Margaret Brent grew to be one of the most influential personages in the colony. Leonard Calvert made her his most favored counsellor.

She was present with her sister Mary at his death bed, and just before he died he said to her: "I make you my sole executor. Take all and pay all." The Maryland Assembly of 1648 recognized this verbal will; and it was on her testimony, that Calvert's dying wish was that Thomas Greene should be his successor as Governor, that Greene was chosen.

After Calvert's death the soldiers he had hired to help him to recover the colony were clamoring for pay long overdue. The weak Greene did not know what to do, but Margaret Brent went among the mutinous soldiers and quieted them while she sold enough of the Proprietary's cattle to satisfy their claims.

According to the "Archives of Maryland" (I, p. 215) she appeared in 1647 before the General Assembly, "and requested to have a vote in the House for herself, and a voice also, for at the last Court, January 30, it was ordered that the said Mistress Brent was to be looked upon and received as his Lordship's Attorney. The Governor denied that the said Mistress Brent should have any vote in the House. And the said Mistress Brent protested against all proceedings in this present Assembly unless she may be present and have a vote as aforesaid."

This Governor who refused her demand for "a vote for herself and another as his Lordship's Attorney," was the Thomas Greene who owed his position to her help. The Lord Baltimore, who succeeded Leonard Calvert, did not like her aggressive methods of "doing things," especially her sale of the Proprietary's cattle to pay the soldiers, hence he wrote some sharp animadversions on the fair Margaret to the Assembly of 1649. But, as we learn from the "Archives" (I, pp. 239; 316), that body took her part in the following terms:

"As for Mistress Brent's undertaking and meddling with your Lordship's estates here (whether she procured with her own or others' importunity or no) we do verily believe, and in conscience report, that it was better for the colony's safety, at that time in her hands, than in any man's else in the whole province after your brother's death. For the soldiers would never have treated any other with that civility and respect, and though they were even ready at several times to run into mutiny, yet still she pacified them—till at last, things were brought to that strait that she must be admitted and declared your Lordship's Attorney by an order of court . . . or else all must go to ruin again, and then the second mischief had been doubtless far greater than the former."

Princess Mary, the daughter of the Indian Emperor Kittamaquund, was entrusted to the care of Margaret Brent, who jealously watched over the interests and education of her ward, regarding her as an adopted daughter. Margaret remained a bachelor maid to the end, and we learn from the Annapolis Mss, that in 1658, when fifty-seven years of age, she appeared before the Provincial Court and testified "that Thomas White, lately deceased, out of tender love and affection he bore unto the petitioner, intended, if he had lived to have married her, and did by his last will give unto the said petitioner his whole estate he was possessed of in his lifetime."

There are records of her being alive three years after this, but the precise details and date of her death are lacking. Although present-day advocates of striking "the word male out of the Constitution," might draw many fruitful lessons from a study of her life and character, they seem to have entirely ignored this pioneer in the cause they are so vociferously upholding.

THOMAS F. MEEHAN.

Christian Archeology

Rome offers many advantages to those who are attracted by the records of the past. The amazing number and variety of the monuments which the Eternal City possesses carry us back by leaps and bounds into the very night of antiquity. For the Catholic scholar there are few more fascinating subjects to which he may devote a portion of his recreation, or his leisure, if he be so fortunate as to possess any, than the study of the history of the first ages of Christianity. If he will but listen, the very stones will call out to him, in a voice thin, indeed, yet clear and certain, across a chasm of nearly nineteen centuries.

A notable contribution to archeology and early Christian history lies before us in two volumes of Father Sisto Scaglia's work in Latin entitled: "Notiones Archaeologiae Christianae Disciplinis Theologicis Coordinatae," published by Desclée & Co., Rome. The first volume contains some 450 pages, and it is a splendid specimen of the book maker's art, having 200 illustrations, all prepared especially for this work. It is occupied largely with the introduction to the study of Christian archeology, giving the documents necessary for its thorough knowledge, such as the Acts of the martyrs, ancient calendars, itineraries, lists of inscriptions, the persecutions and their juridical basis, the number of the martyrs, their relics, the origin and nature of the underground and open air cemeteries of Rome, funeral rites, etc., and on each of these topics the author says the last word. His varied and extensive learning, his great researches, his distinguished abilities, and his sound orthodoxy entitle any work from his pen to be received with interest and respect, and ensure him a place among the many famous names that shine out so splendidly through the historic past.

The second volume sustains the author's great reputation, and adds additional lustre to the honors he derived from his first. "Christian Inscriptions" is the subject treated by the learned Carthusian in his second book, an octavo volume of 400 pages, magnificently illustrated. For the Catholic apologist it is a work of the highest importance. It is the only one that has yet seemed to grasp the value of a clear and adequate grouping and coordination of the dogmatic inscriptions found in the Roman Catacombs. By devoting an entire volume to this study, Father Sisto's contribution to theology and Christian archeology can scarcely be overestimated. It is a veritable mine of information, and defenders of the Faith will find in it an inexhaustible storehouse of arguments to support the continuity of the Catholic religion across a gulf of nineteen centuries to the dim distance of the earliest antiquity.

In this work which deals with dogmatic inscriptions, the gifted author first takes up those of known date, and then passes on to determine the approximate date of those bearing no indication of the time they were written. Afterwards he groups all the inscriptions found anywhere in the Catacombs to support thirteen of the major dogmas of the Faith. One entire portion of the book is devoted to the inscriptions bearing directly upon the ecclesiastical hierarchy, and it will prove a revelation to those who are unacquainted at first hand with those ancient documents of the Faith.

A very important, if not the foremost place among the sources from which we derive a knowledge of the first ages of the Church is occupied by Christian epigraphy, the name by which Christian inscriptions are designated. These inscriptions are important, not only by reason of their immense multitude and their remote antiquity, but for the further reason that they have suffered less than other objects from the destroying hand of time. True, indeed, we possess but a fractional part of the total number that once existed. The barbarian invasions, the repeated sacks of Rome, and the desecration of the Catacombs have destroyed countless treasures in the shape of inscriptions that to-day would be simply priceless. Yet, fortunately, enough of them remain to be of vast assistance in giving life and color to the habits and modes of thought of our Catholic brothers and sisters when Christianity was beginning its career.

Pope Pius VII (1800-1823) whose preserving arm was ever stretched forth to save the relics of antiquity, whether Christian or Pagan, was among the first to recognize the value of inscriptions, and his name will always be held in honor by archeologists. He opened a special museum in the Vatican, known as the Galleria Lapidaria, and lined that immense corridor with inscriptions, one side Pagan, the other Christian. It is one of the most interesting places in Rome. On one side we have the haughty phrases of a mighty empire, the greatest the world has yet seen, then in the pride of power and place; on the other, the story of a handful of Christians so humble that they do not even give their names. On one side we read only of conquests and victories; the other tells us nothing but martyrdom and defeat. On the one hand, war; the other breathes only gentle peace "pax tecum." These silent monuments of the past suggest food for the imagination, for they call out to us with an imperious warning voice that the glory of the world passes quickly, and that failure may have its triumph.

In illustrating or proving Catholic belief and discipline, inscriptions furnish an argument of the first order, since they are based upon purely monumental evidence. While much can be derived from them, we should not, however, look for the demonstration of every dogma of faith, for the reason that most of those inscriptions that have come down to us are sepulchral—thoughts of death being uppermost in the minds of those who wrote them, and consequently the doctrines of a future life, the communion of saints, prayers for the dead and Purgatory, follow as a matter of course. The early Christians, however, were not to be expected to speak of the seven sacraments, the ecclesiastical hierarchy, of the infallibility of the Pope, when they were engaged in a solemn funeral rite that had no direct and immediate connection with those points of Catholic doctrine. They had no thought of future ages, when, in the dim light of those subterranean galleries they hastily carved a few words on a marble slab, covering the place where they laid the charred or mangled remains of some martyred relative or friend, and then hastened away to meet, perhaps, the same fate themselves. Hence we must not be surprised at our inability to prove every single dogma of faith from these early inscriptions. Rather, our amazement should be that we can prove so many, considering the circumstances under which they were written. If we walk through the Catholic cemeteries of any of our modern cities and read the epitaphs to see how many dogmas of faith they reveal, we shall be struck by their apologetic poverty. Nay, worse than this. In the vast majority of them, neither the inscriptions nor the tombstones seem to be differentiated in the slightest degree from those of Pagans or Protestants. What shall the archeologists twenty centuries hence say of the Catholics of this age?

Father Sisto shows clearly that the very earliest inscriptions are marked by a striking simplicity and brevity. They say very little, and yet from their very silence we can deduce two important conclusions. First, in all the multitude of early inscriptions, whether they be brief, as in the first century, or slightly eulogistic, as in the fourth, not one has been found to utter a single word of complaint or resentment or bitterness toward the established government, or the long line of Roman sovereigns who repeatedly employed the vast machinery of the empire to blot out Christianity from the face of the earth. Surely, while the intellect admires, the heart cannot fail to go out to those ancient brethren of the faith, who, like Christ Himself, suffered and were silent.

Secondly, the erudite author proves conclusively that the primitive Christians placed master and slave on an equality, and the boast of the Church that within her fold there is no distinction of classes is amply verified by the fact that among all the thousands of inscriptions found in the Catacombs, not a single solitary one mentions a slave. That the Church, even in Apostolic times, numbered persons of the highest nobility among her converts is a fact too well known to need illustration here. The very mention of the Catacombs of Domitilla is sufficient to connect the early Church with the imperial Flavian family. At times, the very thought of this fairly startles us, for had it not been for an accident, there is a great probability that a Christian might have been seated on the throne of the Cæsars, even before the end of the first century.

Father Sisto's work is unquestionably the best of its kind in any language, and it is a striking refutation of the once fashionable calumny that friars are lazy and monks are ignorant. The author's versatile and multi-form genius, his lucidity in stating a problem, the judicial poise and balance of his mind in weighing counter opinions, his splendid marshalling of facts to support his own conclusions, the profundity of his erudition in citing and interpreting an amazing quantity of documents in many of the great ancient and modern languages, all this varied learning, united to the penitential life of a Trappist monk passed amid the lonely wastes of the Roman Campagna, proves that the Catholic Church is still the mother of scholars no less than of saints.

THOMAS F. COAKLEY, D.D.

CORRESPONDENCE

National Catholic Congress of Hungary

BUDAPEST, HUNGARY, NOV. 18, 1910.

The National Catholic Congress of Hungary, held in the capital city on November 13, 14 and 15, was, from every point of view, a decided success. The enthusiasm with which the clergy and laity from every part of the country assembled in Budapest, the unflagging interest displayed in each of the various meetings and the conviction manifestly carried away by every one of the delegates, of the necessity for renewed and augmented activity in affairs Catholic, all point to a renaissance in Hungarian Catholicity much needed and long hoped for.

This year's was the country's tenth General Congress, and the sixth-held in Budapest, the custom being to meet annually, alternately in the metropolis, and in one or another of the larger cities in the kingdom.

The principal sessions were held in the "Vigado," a hall owned by the city and used for musical recitals, receptions, etc., and the largest building of its kind in Hungary. Here eight public gatherings were held, while approximately twenty departmental meetings took place in other halls throughout the city; sermons and addresses in German and Slovak were also arranged for those of the delegates not understanding the Magyar tongue.

The formal opening of the Congress took place in the "Vigado" on Sunday at eleven a.m. Previous to this, however, sacred services were held in three of the local churches. At eight o'clock a pontifical Mass in presence of the Most Blessed Sacrament was celebrated in the Church of the Perpetual Adoration, for the members of the Eucharistic and Altar Societies, all of whom received Holy Communion, and during the entire day the Blessed Sacrament was exposed for special public adoration. At the same hour in St. Stephen's Basilica, Count Majlath, the Bishop of Transylvania, offered up the Holy Sacrifice, during which the united Sodalities of the Blessed Virgin and the Children of Mary, not only of Budapest, but from every part of the country, received Holy Communion. It is estimated that nearly four thousand of the faithful communicated at these Masses. At nine o'clock in the Belvaros parish church the "Veni Sancte" was intoned and pontifical Mass celebrated by Monsignor Balás, the Bishop of Rozsnyó. Long before the hour of the opening exercises every available space in the "Vigado" was taken. Among those seated on the speakers' platform, were seventeen of Hungary's bishops, including three of the Greek Ruthenian and Roumanian rites, the Minister of Religion and Culture, Count John Zichy and his predecessor, Count Albert Apponyi, about twenty members of both houses of Parliament, abbots and provincials of several religious Orders, the theological faculty of the Budapest University, numerous Canons from the various cathedrals, and many of the Catholic counts and barons. The splendid and impressive picture made by so representative a body was to be seen at every public session of the three-days' Congress.

At the opening meeting, after the chairman, Count Emil Széchenyi had welcomed the delegates, and outlined the proposed work of the Congress, Bishop Csernoch, of the Diocese of Csanada, spoke on "The Holy Crown and the King," and paid a fervent tribute to the venerable ruler of Hungary, Francis Joseph I, who recently celebrated his eightieth birthday, and who, like several of his predecessors, bearing the title of "Apostolic King," wears the crown presented by Pope Sylvester II to St. Stephen, Hungary's first king, in the year 1001. "The Authority of the Pope" was the theme of the third speaker, Count Adalbert Somssich; in voicing the sentiments of loyalty and devotion of his Hungarian flock, the speaker took occasion to protest against the insults and indignities perpetrated towards the Holy Father by the unworthy chief magistrate of the Eternal City.

Telegrams conveying the greetings of the assembled delegate were despatched, during the opening session, to the Holy Father, King Francis Joseph, and to the heir-apparent, Francis Ferdinand, from all three of whom cordial messages of gratitude and commendation were read at one of the subsequent meetings. At the second public session, held on Monday afternoon, the speakers were Count Peter Vay, Protonotarius of His Holiness, and well-known for his activity among the Hungarians in America; Alexander Giesswein, Papal Prelate and member of the Hungarian Parliament, and the noted Bishop of Székesfehérvár, Dr. Ottokar Prohaska; their respective subjects being "Missions for Emigrant Laborers;" "Why We are in Need of Autonomy (i.e., in administering the temporal affairs of the Church independently of the National Government); and "The Unbelieving World's Roads to Christ." The latter address is conceded to have been the finest ever made by Bishop Prohaska, whose ability as an orator is far-famed. The following morning's edition of the Pester Lloyd, the local Jewish commercial paper, contained a translation in German of the entire speech, with the remark that the editor, while not agreeing with His Lordship in matters religious, gladly devoted the paper's front page to the publishing of so excellent and masterful a sermon. In the departmental meetings, questions of propagation of the Faith, charitable organizations, total-abstinence, Catholic education and culture, Church music, etc., etc., were treated, but the matter most widely discussed throughout the Congress was the press. The strength of the Catholic press in Hungary is unfortunately no more marked than in most of the European states, and various steps were taken toward strengthening and spreading Catholic writings, and, by every means possible, offsetting the pernicious influence of the untruthful and immoral reading matter constantly being spread throughout the country. This was the aim of the third speaker at the closing meeting, Father Anthony Buttykay, superior of the local Franciscan Monastery. His address: "The Question of the Press—a Question of Life," was a masterpiece of oratory that seemed to have been reserved as a fitting climax to the entire Congress. As Count-Bishop Majlath was finishing his remarks at the final meeting on Monday evening, the hour of seven was sounded from the towers of the city churches, and at the venerable prelate's suggestion, the thousands who filled the convention hall joined with impressive fervor in his prayer which ended the Congress—the Angelical Salutation.

PETER J. DOLIN.

Jansenism in Holland

Recent happenings among the so-called Jansenists of Holland have once more attracted public notice to this all but extinct and moribund sect. It is a remarkable fact that the man by whose name they are generally known died in the spirit of complete submission to Holy Church. Cornelius Jansen, or, Jansenius (according to the then prevailing custom among the learned of latinizing names) was Bishop of Ypres in East Flanders and a very learned and pious man. He died in 1638, and the schism with which his name is connected must in its origin partly be laid at the door of his literary executors who published Jansenius' posthumous writings. These, as embodied in the book entitled "Augustinus," attracted wide interest among the clergy of Belgium and Holland.

Though the book had been publicly condemned by Pope Clement XI in several successive Bulls, the propositions it was supposed to contain continued to be the subject of constant and much heated controversy. Their most subtle supporters were found among the French; yet while in France the agitation gradually died out, in Holland alone it led to an acute and deplorable schism.

The Vicars Apostolic who at the time presided over the remnant of Dutch Catholicity in that Protestantized country had become infected with the virus of so-called Jansenistic doctrine. Van Neercassel, who died in 1686, began by offering an asylum to its French supporters. Codde, his successor in office, went further still and openly abetted the movement, and because of it was deposed in 1704. He died obstinate to the end in 1710, and the succeeding years saw the acrimonious controversy result in an open revolt against the Holy See.

In the course of time the so-called Jansenists established three bishoprics of their own, viz., Utrecht, Haarlem and Deventer, and through the complicity of Varlet procured pseudo-bishops for these Sees. This has been continued ever since Steenhoven in 1723 was first consecrated archbishop by the aforesaid suspended French bishop.

In striking contrast with this sacrilegious consecration was that of St. Willibrord, Holland's first apostle, "whom in the city of Rome, Pope Sergius did bless and consecrate archbishop," or, as a medieval poet puts the same in quaint old Dutch:

"Want ne te Romen in die poert
Sergius die Pauës benedide
Ende hi ne Aertsbischoep wide."

But the Catholics left in Holland and who during the fierce struggle forced upon the Church by Protestantism had remained true to the Faith, were not easily to be alienated from their allegiance to the successor of Peter. In fact a mere few of the laity followed their rebellious leaders outside the Church, and, in so far as numbers are concerned, the Jansenists were never more than a negligible quantity. (The official census of 1900, as given by the Jansenist organ, De Oud-katholiek, credits the sect with a membership of 8,030, of whom 4,144 are communicants, and with three bishops and 29 priests. The Catholics of Holland, on the other hand, number close on to two millions, with five bishops, upwards of two thousand priests and over one thousand organized parishes.)

Still, most likely owing to lack of information on this point, the revolt, small as it was, may at the time have created in the minds of many in foreign lands some suspicion in regard to the loyalty of Dutch Catholics. But if any suspicion still lingered anywhere it must have been dispelled completely in the late sixties when the Catholics of Holland, relative to their numbers, sent, of all countries, the largest contingent from among them to form the regiments of Papal Zouaves, who fought and bled and died in defence of the Patrimony of St. Peter. We know of no country in all Christendom to-day where Catholics as a body are more loyal and more steadfastly devoted to the Vicar of Christ than are the sturdy Catholics of Holland.

For nearly a century and a half after the consecration of their first archbishop the Jansenists of Holland were scarcely ever heard of until their bishops attained some notoriety by publicly protesting at the time against the definition of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, and of the Infallibility of the Pope. Next we heard of them while fraternizing to some extent with the Old-Catholics of Germany whom they provided with pseudo-bishops in the persons of Professor Reinkens of Bonn and Herzog of Geneva. But their worst notoriety they have achieved within the last two or three years, when they have shown themselves capable of much mischief in spite of the insignificance of their numbers. Their bishops have openly and officially allied themselves with the rebellious of all countries. They have provided the Polish Mariavites with three pseudo-bishops, and worse than all they have conferred the episcopal order on the Englishman, Mathews, in turn ex-Protestant, ex-religious, ex-priest, ex-Episcopalian and a married man; and they have done so in spite of Mathews still holding on to his Protestant wife! Shades of their staid and stubborn forbears of 1763, who gathered in Synod, declared most solemnly "they accepted and most heartily embraced all and every one of the decrees of the Holy and Oecumenical Council of Trent!"

The disintegrating elements contained in all schism and heresy are manifesting themselves among the Jansenists of to-day with startling rapidity. No longer do they insist on the celibacy of their clergy, and from one of their latest official pronouncements we gather, they have tampered still further with the Creed. They have gone so far even as to interfere with the Ritual of the Mass; all of which may be seen from a joint pastoral letter, signed by the three Jansenist bishops and dated January 9th, 1909. The pastoral was issued "in connection with the publication of a new edition of the liturgy for Mass and Vespers." A few quotations from it may prove highly interesting reading:

1. "We have," say the three bishops, "deemed it permissible to ourselves to introduce a few changes." The Responsofia, the Gradual, Tract, the Offertory, the words: per quem haec omnia. . . . et praestas nobis; the prayer, haec commixtio—"all of these we have cut out because to our mind they have lost all sense and meaning!"

2. "In the Creed, in the words: Who proceedeth from the Father and the Son" filioque has been eliminated. . . . Its acceptance or rejection is left to individual choice!

3. "Mention of the reigning Pope's name in the Canon has been omitted. . . . as long as he persistently continues in his errors." (It may be mentioned here that of late the Jansenists have wisely discontinued their former practice of notifying the Pope of each one of their episcopal appointments, and, in reply to which notification invariably followed a nominatim excommunication.)

4. The vernacular (Dutch) has been substituted for the Latin in the liturgy of the Mass and in the administration of all the Sacraments. . . . "but for the time being freedom is granted to use Latin if so preferred."

The future for so-called Jansenism in Holland is far from being rosy just now. Dissension is rife among both the clergy and laity. Most of the clergy, notably the younger element among them, are out and out Modernists and approve of the wholesale slashing of the old tenets and practices. Among the laity the majority is of the "liberal" stamp, bent upon aligning themselves with the Old Catholics of every country where they may be found. The laity also is clamoring for a voice in the appointment of pastors and in the administration of their church's temporalities. However, there still exists among them a persistent, if small, conservative element which while rejecting the dogmas of the Immaculate Conception and of Papal Infallibility, nevertheless clings with dogged tenacity to their Synod of 1763.

Such are some of the recent happenings among the Jansenists of Holland. Though after all but the logical sequence of all revolt against the Church's Supreme Authority, nevertheless in view of the fact that Jansenism in the past has in the minds of most of us been associated with ultra rigorism these happenings do appear startling to a degree. They would seem to be enough to make the eighteenth century Jansenists, if it were possible, turn in their graves from sheer horror and disgust; they would also seem more than enough to open the eyes of those alive to-day and stop them from further following in the footsteps of their blind and casehardened leaders. "Respecte finem!"

V. S.

Christianity without Christ

STOCKHOLM, Nov. 30, 1910.

Among the Protestants of Sweden, as well of other countries, two opposite currents are observable; one is a feeble attempt at a sort of comprehensive Catholicism; the other a negation more and more complete as time goes on, of the great truths which Protestants took with them when they left the Church. The Catholicizing current is somewhat akin to English Ritualism; the other is the present modern German Protestant Theology. The former, however, has never occupied in Germany the position of importance which Ritualism does in England. Its principal champion was Doctor Krogh Tonning, the celebrated professor in the University of Christiania in Norway, who sacrificed a brilliant career and a rich ecclesiastical benefice in order to embrace the Catholic Faith.

In Sweden a movement has just declared itself in a growing comprehension and reverence for the Catholicism of the Middle Ages, and an interest and a constantly growing respect for that most remarkable personality of those times, Saint Bridget. This interest finds expression in different forms, as we have shown in the recent communication to AMERICA, on "The Revival of Medievalism in Sweden." As regards the Protestant Theology, which is mostly mere negation, its most conspicuous leaders are to be found in the Universities of Upsala and Lund. Its general program has been given to the world lately in the pastoral letter published by the Lutheran Bishop of Knorköping, Doctor Personne. It must be remembered that the State Lutheran Church of Sweden has, like the High Church of England, preserved the title of bishop. When they are installed in their Sees, these bishops usually issue pastoral letters, in which they give utterance to their opinions on the questions of the day, and in that way trace the program which they propose to follow in the administration of their respective dioceses.

The program of Doctor Personne is impregnated through and through with this modern Protestant Theology. Father Pesch, S.J., under the pen name of Gottlieb, has given us a vivid picture of it in his "Briefe aus Hamburg." Doctor Personne is particularly hostile to the Athanasian Creed, and expresses himself with regard to it, and the Doctrine of the Holy Trinity, in the most bitter language. He describes the Creed as "a composition of everything nonsensical and monstrous." He insists that it is time for the Swedish State Church to follow the example of the Scotch, Swiss and the French Reformed Churches, and to erase the Athanasian Creed from the list of its declarations of faith. On the subject of the Divinity of our Lord, Jesus Christ, he expresses himself in a way which would have pleased Arius. His program evoked the wildest applause from the Rationalist press. However, the orthodox Protestants protested energetically against it. Thus, for example, the pastors of the Province of Nerike, who belong to the general Society of Lutheran Pastors of Sweden, have formulated the following resolution: "The Pastors of Nerike assembled at Oerebro, protest against the opinions expressed by Bishop Personne in his pastoral letter, especially with regard to the most ancient symbols of Christianity." Other orthodox Lutherans have, in the same way, manifested an active opposition to the ideas of Doctor Personne. Chief among these antagonists is Dr. Waldern Stroem, the well-known leader of an important section of Protestants in Sweden who dislike the bishop for his peculiar ideas of Christianity.

In connection with this we may recall what Father Pesch, S.J., has written on another occasion: "The Protestant world finds itself between Scylla and Charybdis. If it turns to the left whither the Evangelischer Bund, the "Christliche Welt" and Ritschl, Harnack, and all others who reject the Apostles' Creed, wish to lead it, it will be thoroughly Protestant, but it will lose whatever supernatural and Christian elements it possessed, and will be little else than paganism. If, on the contrary, it goes towards the right it will remain Christian, indeed, but will lose its Protestant character and will become a mere worthless copy of Catholicity; and as it will be a State Church, will differ scarcely from the Schismatic Church of Russia.

BARON G. ARMFELT.

A M E R I C A

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1910.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1910, and published weekly by The America Press, New York, President, THOMAS J. CAMPBELL; Secretary, MICHAEL J. O'CONNOR; Treasurer, J. J. WILLIAMS.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Sq., W., New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

The "Outlook" and the Vatican

The Outlook of November 26, 1910, has a tumultuous and tempestuous editorial article entitled "The Vatican and the Roman Catholic Church." It is an impassioned and partisan appeal from the platform, rather than a serious and sober discussion of an important subject, such as one would expect in a Review. It is not an outlook, but an outburst.

The writer clears the way for the fight by informing us that the word "Vatican, means the political activity and public policy which now control the Church, and to which the large number of Roman Catholics who are loyal to the Church are in sharp opposition."

To this statement we, of course, demur, and sweeping aside the alliterative ponderosities—of "political activity and public policy" which are presumably pseudonyms for the Pope, whom the writer seems afraid to name—we hasten to assure him that "the large number of Roman Catholics who are loyal to the Church are" not "in opposition," and by no means "in sharp opposition" to the Sovereign Pontiff, whether he be Pius IX or Leo XIII, or even Pius X with the Spanish influence with which the writer discovers the last named Pope to be overwhelmed.

Had he been in New York, when at a few hours' notice, some 30,000 men, on that stormy Sunday night of January 27, 1907, hurried to the Hippodrome to proclaim their loyalty to the Pope, whom France had insulted, and had he felt the throb—for even he might have felt it—which made every heart in that vast assembly quiver with emotion each time the beloved and venerable name of the Pope was mentioned; and had he heard the spontaneous and prolonged and enthusiastic cheers that leaped from the throats of the thousands who packed every inch of the immense amphitheatre, echoing and re-echoing again, till they reached the other thousands who were standing, for hours, outside in the snow and rain, he would have dismissed from his mind the delusion that "the large number of loyal Roman Catholics are in sharp opposition to the Vatican." They could not be "loyal Roman Catholics" if they were not devoted and affectionate sons of the Pope.

With regard to "the political activity of the Vatican," at least, we Americans are not harassed by it; nor does the Prime Minister of England or the King give it much thought; nor the Kaiser, nor the Czar, nor the Emperor of Austria; nor has the Vatican any overwhelming regard paid to it by Italy, Portugal and Spain at the present moment. The Outlook has conjured up a ghost, and the ghost has a Spanish scowl upon its face.

Instead of meddling in the political affairs of the nations, the trouble has always been, from the beginning, to keep the nations from meddling in the affairs of the Church. The Church's fight has been an incessant one for liberty, and there is not the shadow of a doubt, that if the "Vatican" would accept a degrading slavery like that of the English or Russian Church, there would be peace in the world to-morrow. But the Church of God is Catholic and not national, and it refuses absolutely to be shackled by any earthly ruler in its quest of human souls.

Far from being swayed by "the political activity of the Vatican," Catholics are the very first to resent the slightest suspicion or semblance of such action. It is sufficient to recall the Septennate in Germany, not to mention other instances which will occur to any one familiar with current events, to understand how absolutely free Catholics consider themselves in political matters. They do their own thinking, and provided the laws of ethics are not violated they are subjected to no compulsion. Nor is it true as the Outlook informs us, that "the political activity of the Vatican has been the bane of the Church for centuries, has taken it into fields where it does not belong, and has lowered its moral standards by the use of methods and the pursuit of ends which had nothing to do with religion." On the contrary, whenever it did interfere, it has been in the interest of religion and morality, as with the unspeakable Henry VIII of England, or to free the people from the thralldom of tyrants like Frederick II and Henry IV of Germany; not to speak of more modern struggles against oppression and immorality.

Doubtless there is some discontent at present in France, due to the Papal prohibition of the cultural associations, and possibly that is the trouble which is perceived by "those who frequently visit Europe." But it is absurd to describe that feeling as "sharp opposition on the part of loyal Roman Catholics." A son may dislike what his father tells him to do but if he is "loyal" there can be no "sharp opposition." Indeed, right-minded men in France, even unfriendly statesmen, are already perceiving the wisdom of that prohibition, and are putting an end, let us hope forever, to that spineless and hopeless inactivity which is so alien to the French character and to the best national traditions. The Church took the measure of the foes she had to meet, for she had the experience of nearly two thousand years behind her, in dealing with the devices of all sorts of political manipulators. She was fully aware of what she was doing, as well as of the difficulties she would have to face, when she refused to compound a national felony and to destroy the faith of millions of souls. She had been despoiled of her patrimony and if she had accepted the offer of the Government to make sextons and beadles of her bishops, there would not be a vestige of Catholicity in France to-day. Criticism indeed there was, and it was expected, but the result has been that Catholic France is on her feet again determined to vindicate her rights to her ancient title of Eldest Daughter of the Church. If that is "political activity," let the Outlook make the best of it, or the worst of it.

We Catholics are grateful for being told that "the Church is particularly adapted to administer to races of Latin descent and of the Latin temper." She is, but she has never despised those of Teutonic descent and Teutonic temper. She pursued them when they were savages in the fens of Holland and the forests of Germany, and did not desist when they became Anglo-Saxons in England, persisting in her task till she forced upon them the only civilization they ever possessed. She has had to do with all sorts of races, but has never for a moment been guilty of the folly of thinking that any of them could claim the monopoly of virtue, or look with contempt on the rest.

Nor has she any need of being warned not to stand in the way "of sincere scholarship, conscientious thought, and devout pursuit of truth." Without the Church there would be no scholarship, no sincerity, no conscientiousness, no pursuit of truth in the world to-day. Had it not been for her "activity" and "policy," both Europe and America would to-day be a howling wilderness inhabited by barbarians and savage beasts.

She is not terrified or even surprised because some of her doctrines are questioned by certain individuals whose temerariousness is only equalled by their lack of information. She stands above mankind, with the Light of Divine Truth in her hands, and its splendors no more interfere with intellectual liberty, than the light of the sun prevents the traveler from pursuing his journey. It is only darkness that puts fetters on our feet and fear in our hearts. The truth with which she illumines the world, is from God; and in it there can be no error. It reveals to man his origin, his duties, and his destiny; and it alone leads to salvation. It is not an opinion, not a fancy; nor is it subject to the views or reviews of great or little theologians or even contributors to magazines. St. Paul would not let even an angel from heaven modify or change it. In the Providence of God we are free to receive it, and free to reject it, but whether men are lost or nations apostatize, her Light must shine on forever.

"Hommages" and Homage

Our readers may remember that when Cardinal Vannuelli was approaching the shores of Canada for the Eucharistic Congress, Mr. Justice Girouard, Lord Grey's deputy during his absence, welcomed the illustrious visitor by wireless in the following terms: "L'Administrateur du gouvernement de Canada presente ses hommages à son Excellence et lui souhaite le bienvenue."

Certain fanatics seeing the word "hommages" and not knowing French, pretended that the Administrator, as far as he could, was putting the Crown he represented in much the same condition as did King John in his dealings with the Legate Pandulph. A pretence so absurd was soon forgotten and would have remained so, had not the Orange Lodges seen fit to bring it up in parliament. The Grand Master, Dr. Sproule made an inquiry on the subject, but Colonel Sam. Hughes went further and asked whether the Administrator of the Government had tendered homage to the Papal Legate. Sir Wilfrid Laurier replied to the effect that he had not, but had only presented his respects in a formal way, even as Colonel Hughes, without any fear of being called to account either in a Conservative caucus or in an Orange Lodge, would profess himself the Prime Minister's obedient servant should he write officially to that functionary.

With Canadian Orangemen it is perhaps a point of honor not to know French. But this is no reason for being foolish. A glance into a French dictionary would have shown Colonel Hughes that "hommages" in this plural form, is the equivalent of our English "respects," that it means no more than this word, and is the common term when compliments are expressed formally.

The Report of the Immigration Commission

In 1907, following the passage of the Immigration Act of that year, a special Immigration Commission was created by act of Congress. Made up of three Senators, three Members of the House of Representatives and three representative citizens not connected with the National Legislature, this body was instructed to "make full inquiry, examination and investigation, by sub-committee or otherwise into the subject of immigration," and "report to Congress the resolutions reached by it, and make such recommendations as in its judgment may seem proper." The result of the ample powers bestowed upon the Commission, to facilitate the work with which it was thus charged, have been published from time to time and at the completion of three years of strenuous activity forty octavo volumes full of useful information are ready at hand to help students interested in the problem of the inflow of aliens into our country.

Upon the opening of the last session of the Sixty-first Congress on December 5, the Commission presented its final report and announced the end of its labors. As has been anticipated in many quarters, the final verdict rendered is unanimous for a limitation of foreign immigration into the United States. One paragraph of this report appears to sum up the impellent motive underlying the body's judgment.

"The present immigration movement," it says, "depends largely upon economic causes, but just at present there appears to be no economic necessity for the large emigration to these shores from Europe. In general, emigrants to the United States seem to be ruled by a desire to improve their condition, rather than by a necessity forcing them to free themselves from intolerable burdens at home. This fact should in great measure dispose Americans to modify the disposition hitherto prevalent among us to consider the question of immigration from a sentimental standpoint, and should bring us to look at the question more as an economical problem facing us for solution."

What the members of the Commission may understand by the phrase "sentimental standpoint" is not quite clear—but evidently they mean to urge a setting aside of the ancient American boast that the United States holds its hospitable doors wide open to the oppressed and down-trodden of every land.

Undoubtedly the argument advanced by the opponents of unlimited immigration, that the maximum of emigration to the country from Great Britain and Ireland, Scandinavia, Holland, France, Switzerland and Germany has long since been reached, and that the flood-tide of southeastern European emigration, which began to gather head in 1900, has brought and continues to bring to our shores a multitude of undesirables, has had much weight with the Commission. The suggestions, embodied in the report, make clear the body's disposition to favor legislation which shall prevent a lowering of the relative wage earning opportunity for the day laborer in the United States, as well as a purpose to exclude illiterate and diseased and physically unfit from our shores.

Whether these suggestions shall prove to be effective remains to be seen. One recommendation, that, namely, imposing an examination in reading and writing upon every incoming immigrant does not seem to appeal to the entire Commission as a practical measure.

Women in Public Life

A measure has been introduced into the French Chamber of Deputies, to give women the right to elect and to be elected to the council of the commune and of the department. The official reporter, commenting favorably on it, pointed out that in the Middle Ages women owning real property took the part in public affairs to which such property entitled them.

To our daily press this seemed a discovery so wonderful as to warrant its being telegraphed from Paris: to instructed Catholics it is one of the common things of history. The Catholic Church has never ignored the administrative capacity of women, as her great orders and congregations directed by them show plainly. That it has never begrudged them social and political status and influence, the histories of St. Pulcheria, Matilda of Tuscany, St. Hilda, St. Catherine of Siena, Queen Blanche of France, Isabella of Castile, Mary of Burgundy and others, all worthy successors of the valiant women of the Old Testament, prove most clearly. If in Catholic times such could be at even the helm of state, it is only reasonable to look into those times for women using their baronial and manorial rights, and is not surprising to find them doing so.

The reporter of the French Bill went on to say that the loss of their rights by women comes from the Revolution. This changed the stately movement of political action in which a woman could bear herself nobly, into the tumult and confusion, lasting to the present, in which no self-respecting woman will care to mingle. Striving and clamoring by opposing candidates for the suffrages of hundreds, even thousands of voters, replaced the dignified claim to the place in public affairs coming to one by an evident title, so well exemplified in the story of Margaret Brent of Maryland, to be read in this issue of AMERICA. Such furious turmoils are alien to feminine modesty and delicacy, and so the worthier women withdraw and the Théroigne and the Cabarrus appeared on the scene. Taking things at their best, Jeanne, the Maid of Orléans, directing the war from the lofty station to which reverence had raised her, is the type of woman in public life as she should be: Agustina, the Maid of Zaragoza, dishevelled and black with smoke and dirt from serving her gun among the artillerymen, is the type of such a woman as she is. Until Christian women can mingle in public affairs under conditions approaching the former rather than the latter, we think they will follow the advice of Cardinal Gibbons to the young ladies of St. Catherine's Normal Academy: "Don't run after female suffrage."

St. Vincent de Paul's Christmas

"Shop early for Christmas!" is a cry that has its reasons. It appeals to the selfish instinct we all have. By shopping early one gets the cream of the market, and lightens the labor of the men and women behind the counter. On the other hand, if I shop too early I shall pay top prices and help the proprietors of the shops rather than their employees, since a distributing of buying through the four weeks before Christmas will enable them to get on with their ordinary staff and to dispense with the extra help usually employed, not to speak of extra time for the regulars with its not unwelcome extra pay. It is no easy task to determine just when I should do my Christmas shopping.

While making up your mind on this matter, turn your attention to another which presents no problems to the intellect, though not without its difficulty for the will. Our Lord Jesus Christ, in His poor has a very definite claim upon your purse. You know this, of course, and you would satisfy the claim if you could but reach the poor. Unfortunately your calling, whatever it may be, does not bring you into contact with them. You may be thinking of sending something to the Salvation Army, or to the Young Men's Christian Association, or to one of the so-called nonsectarian Homes or Refuges, or to some Protestant institution which manages to keep itself in the public eye. Catholics have been known to do such things. Put away the idea and fix your attention on the Society of St. Vincent de Paul. During the past year, to quote an example that is typical of the rest of the country, it has expended in round figures more than $100,000, here in New York, in charity. Where did it get the money? Almost entirely from the poor. Who paid the cost of distribution? This is small, as the Brothers of St. Vincent de Paul attend to the matter for the love of God. Still there are some necessary expenses and these are practically defrayed by the Brethren themselves. Every cent you give will go to the poor. The many Conferences are in touch with the deserving poor whom the Brethren know personally. Let your first Christmas spending be a generous remittance to the Treasurer of whatever place you may happen to live in, astonish him with a shower of contributions from the rich and well-to-do. Ask for a supply of the Society's beautiful Christmas circular for distribution among your friends. To help you we give the following addresses: George J. Gillespie, 375 Lafayette Street, New York; Patrick O'Connor, 4 and 5 Court Square, Brooklyn.

On November 20, a meeting was held in Lisbon, in honor of Senhor Magalhaes Lima, grand master of the Portuguese Freemasons. The minister of justice, Bernardino Machado, was present as the representative of the Provisional Government and was one of the orators of the evening. His speech, as reported by O Mundo, the organ of the administration, gives a vivid picture of Portuguese affairs. "The brotherhood existing between the Government and Freemasonry," said Machado, "will continue as before the revolution, for the Government will always find in this temple the most manly spirits and the most disinterested fighters. Through Masonry the revolution triumphed, and in Masonry it will find the men to defend the work to which they contributed so much. It is impossible to forget the important part played by Masonry in the revolution. By my presence on this occasion, I wish to give a new proof of respect and esteem for Masonry, and particularly to give testimony to the solidarity of Masonry as manifested by the embrace which in the name of the government I am going to give to the grand master, Magalhaes Lima, with a cheer for Portuguese Freemasonry."

These Portuguese patriots and lovers of liberty, therefore, frankly admit that their national life is controlled by rulers who are themselves subject to absolutely irresponsible powers beyond the confines of Portugal. The ultimate aim of these powers may not be very clear, but their way of proceeding is plain enough.

SOME FRIENDS OF MINE.

IV.

THE CAPTAIN.

As I was entering the Post Office a few evenings ago, I heard the boom of a mighty voice. It clove the air like the sound of a giant roller striking the beach in a storm. It was laden with the huskiness betraying many a long, wet night on the bridge. It had that undercurrent of command that marks him who has ruled rough men. But it was an honest voice. Some men color their speech like chameleons. They have an every-day voice and one reserved for Sundays; one for use at home and the other when they are abroad. The Captain has but one voice. It rings loud and clear for friend and foe. I perceived that the Witenagemot was in session and the Captain in the chair. This much I caught in passing:—

"Yellow fever? Yes, I've seen yellow fever, men dying in hundreds like rats. Had it three times myself. Last time was in the China Sea. Everybody on board died but me. Navigated that ship when I had to crawl along the deck to do it. But I brought her in. That fever is in my bones to-day. Once Yellow Jack gets his claws into you, you'll remember him all your days. Funny how many diseases a man can have and live. Why out in Singapore in sixty seven—"

The Witenagemot is often inclined to take the Captain lightly. The Bedouins who live under the eyes of the Sphinx joke about it. The Captain is easily annoyed, and some of the youngsters like to prod the old lion just to hear him roar. But when he talks of blue water a large respect settles down upon the group. He is on the quarter-deck and his word is law.

He has sailed the Seven Seas and been wrecked so many times he has to ponder to differentiate the occasions. But it is always worth while waiting. He voyaged the Pacific when men lived "thrillers." He saw the Orient before it was modernized. I have an abiding pity for the casual travelers who write about what they have seen in the East. They have as much real adventure as a Cook's tourist abroad. If anyone wants a picture of the oldtime China and Japan he ought to make the acquaintance of the Captain.

He has a long, trig-looking house that surveys the river across a sloping lawn. A flag-staff graces the greensward and on gala days all the pennants are fluttering. Everywhere are flower pots from out-of-the-way places in the world, for the Captain dotes on flowers. The interior of the house is a museum. Every room is crowded with curiosities. They are not of the sort you buy in Oriental stores. Each one is an exemplar and each has a story. For instance, this elephant was a present from a Rajah, when the word meant something in India. That priceless vase was sent on board by a Daimyo whose life the Captain saved. The date and name are duly inscribed on a label, but that label is the title of a romance. The Captain has the only copy of that book in existence. It is printed on the tablets of his memory.

Certain amiable gentlemen who lived all their lives on the outside of things seem impelled to write memoirs, men of uneventful lives who kept diaries and put down facts you can find in any manual of history. Nothing ever happened to these annalists. They were like Kipling's "Tomlinson." But a collection of the Captain's logs would make a series of real memoirs. If I could chain him to a stenographer for a few weeks the public would soon forget Conrad. There you would have stark stories of the sea, cross sections of savage life, backgrounds so true that you could hear the whistling of the wind, the creak of aching timbers and the swishing of bilge water in the hold and in the foreground, scenes as swift and grim as "Pagliacci."

But the sailor home from the sea lives a hum-drum life contentedly. He finds it hard to find a housekeeper, for few women measure up to his standard of neatness, and these, of course, are treasured like jewels by their possessors. So he keeps house alone most of the time. But you will find no dust on his curios. Personally he is the acme of the proprieties. Always much the gentleman, when he makes a formal call it is the call of an admiral making a visit of ceremony in a foreign port. From the crown of his speckless hat to the toe of his polished shoes, he is immaculate.

Under the shaggy bark of the old sea-dog's breezy heartiness lies deep sorrow. The Captain's laugh can be heard across the river easily, but I suspect he sighs a good deal when he is alone. He lost two lovely daughters a few years ago and he has never really gotten over it. He cannot speak of them without a filling of the eyes. The children died under circumstances particularly pathetic. So beneath that bluff exterior the wound aches ceaselessly.

The Captain is always busy. When he is not looking after his estate he is here and there on public duties, for he is a town official. When he goes abroad you might imagine him some old clubman who was waited on by a careful valet. What a fine trait, this careful scrupulousness about the little things old men are so liable to neglect, after all these years in our quiet village, where nearly everyone outrages the laws of fashion! He never varies from the correct in dress and deportment.

Never have I asked a favor of the Captain that he did not give threefold. Whenever we have a lawn-party, he takes it as his privilege to preside over the decorations, and nothing he has is considered by him too good for us. The last occasion he was sick, but he would not let illness interfere with a duty of friendship, as he considered it. He drank unlimited quantities of lemonade, and ate ice cream at ten in the evening, and went home only at midnight, but he solemnly declared the next morning that he felt ten years younger for the experience.

When I first came to the village, I heard much about "narrowness." I have seen no evidences of it, but such examples of kindly feeling and open-heartedness that I glow in thinking of them. Von Ruville, in his singularly fresh and stimulating story of his conversion, speaks of the exceeding difficulty he had in getting Catholics to talk to him about the Faith. He states that later on he understood. They did not wish him to be convinced and remain outside the Fold. I never force any theology on the Captain. His habits of mind are fixed, and I think he will die as he has lived, an honest, kindly gentleman, who believes in the goodness of God, the duty of charity, and in the hope that he will see his little girls again where there is peace.

CHARLES W. COLLINS.

LITERATURE

CHRISTMAS PRESENTS AMONG BOOKS.

A popular form of the Christmas spirit is the sending of a book to a friend. Too often, we fear, the intention behind the act is the only pleasant feature about it. When someone in the overflowing goodness of his heart sends us the sayings of Epictetus, or the essays of Emerson, as a token of fond remembrance during the Yule-tide season, we find ourselves, whether we like it or not, hating the very gift which increases our affection for the giver. And yet, under certain circumstances, the benevolent friend may not be one whit to blame. He cannot always know how our taste lies. Even if he should happen to have a vague and general notion of our leanings in literature, his detailed information concerning the books we already possess and the newly published books that we are not likely to own, may be, through no fault of his at all, very circumscribed and deficient. To help him out in his embarrassment we shall try to diminish at least one of his difficulties. Our display of gift-books will be mainly determined by the stack of them lying on our table. Because we are aware of its limited dimensions, if the benevolent friend, for whom we are doing this, does not find our exhibit satisfactory, he shall not annoy us in the least by passing on for consultation elsewhere. We view such a contingency much more serenely than the publishers and the authors concerned. But our serenity is not indifference; and we should perhaps not be above some little disappointment if the benevolent friend found nothing in our list to suit his festive purpose.

The largest and most resplendent book on our table is a Roman Missal in Latin. It is a thick folio, bound in red leather, with gold ornamentation and page-marking ribbons in various bright colors pendent from its lower edge, such a book as one sees on the high altar of a cathedral. It is truly a Christmas book; for almost at the opening of the text we come upon St. Paul's clarion call of Advent: "For now our salvation is nearer than when we believed. The night is past, and the day is at hand," and the tone of glad anticipation deepens page after page until we reach the text of the three Christmas Masses. But, of course, it is not a Christmas book for general perusal and is quite useless to our benevolent friend unless he should happen to be very generous or a collective individual, such as a sodality, and his parish priest should need a new Missal to replace the worn one which has to do service even on solemn feasts. Pustet (New York and Cincinnati) publishes it at what appears to us to be a very low price, viz., thirteen dollars. Next to it among our books is a comparatively diminutive copy of the Missal, by the same publisher, bound in soberer color, and which many a seminary preparing for the priesthood would like to have for his own (cloth, $2.00; morocco, $2.75).

The next work that our eyes rest upon is Mrs. Hugh Fraser's "A Diplomat's Wife in Many Lands" (2 vols. New York: Dodd, Mead and Company. $6.00 net). We know of no more appropriate present for the general reader. Mrs. Fraser is a sister of the late Marion Crawford. Her life has been unusually rich in interesting experiences, and she writes about them in a sprightly and cultivated style. Her Catholic view of Italian unification, formed on the ground, will be a valuable corrective to the dithyramatic gush and twaddle of Mrs. Browning and other English writers who idolized Mazzini, Garibaldi and similar pinchbeck heroes of the time. Mrs. Fraser, besides giving us an entrancing book, has done a good stroke incidentally in behalf of the truth. Catholics especially should read her book, and we recommend its presentation heartily to the benevolent friend as a medium of the Christmas spirit. Another book, not unlike the preceding, is "Memories and Impressions of Helena Modjeska" (New York: The Macmillan Company. $4.00 net).

Among other recent books that might be found available in this connection are "Heroic Spain," by Miss E. Boyle O'Reilly, the daughter of the poet, John Boyle O'Reilly (New York: Duffield & Company. $2.50 net); "The Dawn of Modern England," by Carlos B. Lumsden (New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $3.00 net); and, by the same publishers, Father Russell's "At Home with God: Priedieu Papers on Spiritual Subjects." ($1.25 net). Father Russell's two other books on the Blessed John Eudes and on the Eucharist, "Jesus Is Waiting," noticed recently in these columns, would, we fancy, be pleasant and acceptable little gifts. The same can be said of Father O'Rourke's excellent book of devotion "Under the Sanctuary Lamp" (New York: The Messenger Press. 50 cents). In another column can be found the names of other good devotional works. A more recent book than any we have so far mentioned is Dr. James J. Walsh's "Education, How Old the New." (New York: Fordham University Press., $2.00 net; postage 15 cents). The title of the book would indicate that it would be appropriate only to teachers, professors and very serious persons; but anyone acquainted with the pleasant discursiveness of Dr. Walsh and his freedom from technical jargon will know that any book of his will possess a general interest. We can assure the benevolent friend that he will not make a mistake if he chooses this book. To close our list of more serious books, we might suggest to the B. F. that, if he knows a former student of a Sacred Heart Convent, he would very likely make a favorable impression by sending her the "Life of Mother Hardey" (New York: America Press. $2.00; postage 20 cents). Since we have been beguiled, in the most disinterested spirit, into Cicero's weakness of saying a word or two in favor of our own house, we shall take advantage of our fault, if fault it be, to direct the attention of the Christmas shopper to Father Campbell's two volumes of "Pioneer Priests of North America." (America Press $2.00). We only reecho the words of others when we say that no Catholic library should be without them, and that no American library will have its historical section complete if these brilliant sketches of brave men are lacking.

As regards fiction, we shall confine ourselves mainly to Catholic novels, and so, to attain our purpose the sooner, we shall begin with one that is not Catholic at all. "Phoebe and Ernest," by Inez Haynes Gillmore (New York: Henry Holt & Co. $1.50 net) happens to be on our table, and it is such a rollicking picture of American home life that we cannot help mentioning it in spite of its faults. Among other novels, Catholic in tone and very good stories we would like to call special attention to "The Centurion, A Romance of the Time of the Messiah," translated from the French of A. B. Routhier, by Lucille P. Borden (St. Louis: B. Herder $1.50) and "Andros of Ephesus, A Tale of Early Christianity," by the Rev. J. E. Copus, S.J. (New York: The M. H. Wiltzius Co. Postpaid, $1.25). Both these novels have the added merit of being especially seasonable at present. Miss E. M. Capes makes an agreeable offering of fiction in her three short stories under title, "A Poet's May" (St. Louis: B. Herder. 50 cents), while P. J. Kenedy & Sons have had the happy inspiration of reprinting J. V. Huntington's "Rosemary." It was a prime favorite in our early youth, and there ought be little risk in offering it to any reader now, even if it was pored over feverishly in the distant past. In fact the latter possibility would only increase its value.

A book of poems is always a delightful gift. Here is a tempting list: "Carmina," by T. A. Daly (New York: John Lane Company); "Voices From Erin and Other Poems," by Denis A. McCarthy (Boston: Little, Brown & Company); Father Tabb's "Poems," "Lyrics," "Child Verse" and "Later Lyrics," four dainty volumes (New York: John Lane & Company); and "The Hill O'Dreams, and Other Verses," by Helen Lanyon, with their delicate Irish accent (New York: John Lane & Company). The uniform price of these volumes is one dollar, which explains what a hard time a poet must have to make ends meet.

The juvenile world has a special claim on the Christmas season, which is recognized in the number of books issued at that time for their special benefit. Among the distinctively Christmas stories that have fallen under our notice are "The Christmas Angel" a gaily dressed little volume with a refined and sweet story, by Abbie Farwell Brown (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Company. 60 cents net); "One Christmas Eve at Roxbury Crossing, and Other Christmas Tales," which will surely meet with juvenile approbation, by Cathryn Wallace (New York: F. Pustet & Co. 75 cents); W. J. Locke's "A Christmas Mystery," which will not hurt those who are too young to search for esoteric significances in their stories (New York: John Lane Company. 75 cents; postage 10 cents); and "Melchior of Boston," by Michael Earls, S.J. (New York: Benziger Bros. $1.00). We have our doubts about the wisdom of placing the last named story among juveniles. But we are sure boys and girls will find it absorbing reading and, after them, their elders will probably pick it up, to see more in it than the children. We should not include in juvenile literature a play written for the students of St. Cuthbert's College, Ushaw. Our only excuse for doing so is that Father Robert Hugh Benson's "The Cost of a Crown, A Sacred Drama in Three Acts," (New York: Longmans, Green & Co.) can be read by young and old with interest. Another book which all young people, as well as their elders, will enjoy hugely, is M. D. Haviland's "Lives of the Fur Folk" (New York: Longmans, Green & Co.), and better still, in the same vein, "Kings In Exile," by Charles G. D. Roberts. (New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.50). Benziger Brothers (New York) have five new juvenile stories ready for the holidays: "As Gold in the Furnace," a college story, by the Rev. J. E. Copus, S.J.; "The Old Mill on the Withrose," Father Spalding's new Kentucky story; "Ned Rieder," a parochial school story, by the Rev. John A. Wehs; "Freddy Carr and His Friends," a story about English schoolboys, by the Rev. R. P. Garrold, S.J., and "Our Lady's Lutenist and Other Stories," by David Bearne, S.J. The cost of each of these stories is 85 cents, and, in order to make their offering as tempting as possible to the benevolent friend of youngsters, the publishers declare that they will add any one of Father Finn's classic stories to the five, and thus give our benevolent friend six fine books for four dollars and twenty-five cents. We hope for the sake of the boys and girls the benevolent friend will not hesitate. We have reserved for last mention a delightful story for the young, "Eric, or The Black Finger," by Mary T. Waggaman (Philadelphia: H. L. Kilner & Co. 75 cents). It is bound neatly in cheerful holiday color, with good illustrations, and is printed in clean type.

Before withdrawing our attention from children's books, we think the benevolent friend will thank us for calling to his notice the appropriateness of Lives of Christ for children as holiday gifts. Longmans, Green & Co. (New York) have two such books: "A Life of Christ for Children," with a preface by Cardinal Gibbons, ($1.00 net; postage, 10 cents) and "Bible Stories Told to 'Toddlers'" by Mrs. Hermann Bosch. The latter is a narrative representing real conversations between a mother and her child, and follows the Catholic seasons from the Nativity to the Feast of All Saints, (80 cents; postage, 10 cents). A Carmelite Nun offers us "The Story of Our Lord's Life Told for Children" (New York: Cathedral Library Association. $1.00).

Whilst we were writing these notes we received from the Grolier Society, New York, the first four volumes of their "Book of Knowledge, The Children's Encyclopedia." It makes a sumptuous gift for the lucky child who has a benevolent friend willing to purchase it. Like all works of the kind it is strangely inclusive, and in the volume which lauds Father Damien and Joan of Arc, we have eulogistic notices of man like Jean Jacques Rousseau and Mazzini. But the work is really excellent in spite of blemishes, and in the hands of intelligent parents would be quite harmless.

These are but a few of the books that suggest themselves to us on the spur of the moment as supplying material for a choice on the part of Yule-tide generosity. A glance over the literature of the year, as represented in the book-reviews of some Catholic periodical, would extend the bounds of selection. Francis Thompson's "Life of St. Ignatius Loyola" (Benzigers); "The Life of an Enclosed Nun" (John Lane Company), and René Bazin's "The Barrier." (Scribners) are a few of the books which occur to us and which anyone would be glad to receive. The new edition of Bryce's "American Commonwealth," which has just come to us in two volumes (New York: The Macmillan Co. $4.00), would make an acceptable gift in many quarters.

SOME CATHOLIC BOOKS.

"The Charity of Christ" (Philadelphia: Peter Reilly, Publisher. Price, 50 cents; postage 6 cents) is the second volume in a series of studies of Christ's life. The author, Rev Henry C. Schuyler, S.T.L., is to be congratulated on the way he is carrying out his idea, which is comparatively new to English readers and is attractive as it is instructive. His study is not primarily either exegetical or historical, and when we say that it is devotional we only partially describe it. He chooses as the nucleus of his investigations and reflections some particular virtue or trait in the life of our Divine Master and allows us to watch it in all the varying phases and circumstances of that life.

It is clear that such a plan possesses unusual advantages in fulfilling its purpose of increasing our insight into the sweetness and beauty of Christ's character. It has, besides, the additional merit of grouping scattered texts and apparently unrelated incidents around some definite spiritual fact which, in our changing moods and needs, may have more significance for us at one time than at another. It pleases us to learn that the first volume in this projected series, namely, "The Courage of Christ," has in the course of a year gone through three editions. The publisher has set a good example to many of his Catholic rivals by the neatness, elegance and durability in binding, paper and letterpress, not to mention the extraordinary cheapness with which he is issuing these volumes.

Another book which we take great pleasure in recommending to the notice of our readers is "Catholic Religion, A Statement of Christian Teaching and History," by the Rev. Charles A. Martin. (Cleveland: The Apostolate Publishing Co.; cloth, $1.00; paper, 35 cts.). It is a miniature encyclopedia of information, containing all sorts of tables concerning events in the history of the Church, with lists of such practical and current usefulness as those of the principal Catholic books and periodicals published in English. A remarkable feature, notwithstanding the book's compactness and plethora of facts, is the way it contrives somehow to preserve a pleasing discursiveness rich in allusions and illustrated references to literature, science, biography and history. It is a book for Catholics and non-Catholics, and not the least of its virtues is its equipment of a fairly complete index.

In "Mere Hints," by the Rev. John E. Graham (published by the author, Mercy Hospital, Baltimore. Price, $1.00; to the clergy, 75 cents) we have little five-minute chats on a variety of subjects such as suggest themselves to most of us nearly every day and concerning which we are glad to have the point of view of a trustworthy observer. Education, literature, the news of the hour, the problems of society, the individual's commonest difficulties in the struggle of life, these and kindred topics have struck off sparks from Father Graham's pen. The editorial columns of the Baltimore Sun caught these momentary flashlights, and we are glad they have been preserved in a more permanent form and given a larger audience.

Madame Cecilia, in her convent of St. Andrew's, London, does well to keep her pen busy. She has the knack of conveying religious instruction in a practical way, adapting it ingeniously to the homeliest contingencies and clinching it in the mind and memory with new and apt illustrations from modern life. In her latest book, "More Short Spiritual Readings for Mary's Children," (New York: Benziger Bros. $1.25) she addresses herself, as the title indicates, to girls and young ladies living in the world. These very pleasant discourses group themselves naturally into various chapters, all bearing vitally upon important sides of Catholic life.

The Rev Andrew Klarmann, A.M., appeals to thoughtful readers in his "Life in the Shadow of Death." (New York: Frederick Pustet & Co. $1.00 net). His book is more philosophical than devotional. Its first half is mainly scientific, and in it he lays a rational sub-structure for the second half in which he views life and death in the light of Faith and gives the Catholic solution to the cardinal problems of mankind. Father Klarmann does not permit the profundity of his reflections to obscure his style, which is very direct and plain and sometimes bordering on the colloquial.

B. Herder, the Catholic publisher, St. Louis, has done a service to priests and religious, and, we may add, laymen, by issuing a new edition of the well-known "Meditations For Every Day in the Year, According to the Doctrine and Spirit of St. Alphonsus Liguori," by the Rev. Louis Bronchain, C.S.S.R. The present edition is a translation from the twelfth Belgian Edition, which has been made by the Rev. Ferreol Girardy, C.S.S.R. The two bulky volumes are a veritable arsenal of spiritual weapons and have been for so long a standard work of Catholic devotion that they need no lengthy recommendations. (Price, $5.00 net).

Hints for Catechists on Instructing Converts, by MADAME CECILIA, New York, etc., Benziger Bros., price 75c. net, seems to have in view simple souls drawn to the Church after lives of piety according to their light, and instructors other than the clergy. To give such lay catechists an insight into their work the author has selected several accounts by converts of how their conversions were brought about; she dwells in a timely manner on the qualities, natural and supernatural, the catechist's functions call for, and discusses very practically some ordinary difficulties of converts and the way to meet them. Not the least useful feature we have noticed in this little book is the pointing out that fundamental notions taken for granted by Catholics, such as the elevation by grace to the supernatural order, the nature of faith and of the Incarnation, must be explained most carefully to converts, to whom they are often absolutely new. Some remarks on the assistance to be given converts after their reception, and a list of books for their reading round off a thoroughly serviceable manual.

The December McClure's has another wearisome article on the Ferrer trial of over a year ago by the dramatic critic whom it strangely selected as its special commissioner on this subject. Mr. Archer is somewhat more artful but not less partisan than his predecessor, whose virulent attack on the Catholic Church, under the guise of defending the Spanish anarchist, evoked such a storm of protest that the magazine felt constrained to admit a reply. But its policy remained unchanged; it proceeded to devote many pages of the two succeeding numbers to the same kind of special pleading and to equally venomous, if more covert, calumnies on the Church. To these Mr. Shipman's lucid and well-informed statement of the Ferrer episode in the October number is sufficient answer, while his specific exposé of the first Archer article in the December Catholic World anticipates the contents of the second. The dramatic critic need not have gone to Spain. He seems to have consulted only the Ferrer partisans, and their views he could have found in the anti-religious press, sources which he frequently uses without acknowledgment. The scraps of truth he occasionally admits are offset by, "it is believed, however," "it is stated," "one may doubt," etc. Even so he cannot conceal the fact that Ferrer preached revolt, took active part in the Barcelona rioting, was "anti-religious, anti-monarchical, anti-patriotic, anti-militarist," but, forsooth, niceties of legal procedure were not observed in his case. The marvel seems to be that a civilized government tolerated his activities so long. The implied charge runs through both articles, that it was the Catholic Church and not his colleagues of the continental anti-religious fraternity that made a hero of Ferrer. We commend to the consideration of Catholics this attitude of McClure's.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Through Five Administrations. Reminiscences of Col. William H. Crook. Compiled and Edited by Margarita Spalding Gerry. New York: Harper Brothers. Net $1.80.

The Wonderland of Stamps. By Dwight Burroughs. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Company. Net $1.50 postpaid.

Leon Gordon. An Appreciation by Abraham Benedict Rhine. Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society of America.

Step By Step. A Story of the Early Days of Moses Mendelssohn. By Abram S. Isaacs. Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society of America.

A Prophetic Biography of Jesus Christ. By Father Vigilus H. Krull, C.P.P.S. Collegeville, Ind.: St. Joseph's Printing Office.

The Hill o' Dreams and Other Verses. By Helen Lanyon. New York: The John Lane Company. Net $1.00.

German Publication:

Predigten für den Weihnachtskreis des Kirchenjahres. Von Dr. Augustin Egger Herausgegeben von Dr. Adolf Fäh. New York: Benziger Bros. Net $1.25.

French Publication:

France et Papauté. Leur Mission, Leur Avenir. Par le R. P. Léchien. Gien: Librairie Putois. Net 3 fr. 50.

Spanish Pamphlet:

El Secreto de Maria. Carta Sobre la Esclavitud de la Santísima Virgen. Por El B. Luis Maria Grignon de Montfort. Bilbao: Administración de "El Mensajero del C. de Jesús."

EDUCATION

The report issued last week by the official in charge of the employment office maintained by Harvard university contains detailed information that will be of interest to a growing class of college men. The statement affirms that a very considerable number of Harvard men work their way through college and that their outside work does not result in low standing in their classes. Fully a quarter of the students registered in the various university departments, or 956 students to quote the exact figures, applied for work during the past year. Of this number 645 received positions through the agency of the employment office, the men earning throughout the year a grand total of $136,849.77 towards their college expenses. Altogether 2,290 temporary positions were filled. Many students procured work without the aid of the agency, but of these the report, because of lack of precise information, makes no record. The statement adds: "The average college rank of the men who secured positions through the university's employment office was B, which is next to the highest mark given in the college."

Reference was made some time ago in this column to an interesting phase of State school direction which had arisen in Altoona, Penn. Owing to a peculiar condition of affairs in that city permission had been asked that the pupils of Catholic parochial schools, properly qualified, might have the privilege of attending the manual training department of public schools. The Altoona school board refused to grant the permission, and its action was upheld by Pennsylvania's State Superintendent of Public Instruction. Catholic taxpayers urged the claim that the concession, which they petitioned for, is in no way opposed to existing law governing the action of the school board, and, as they pay their share towards the upkeep of the department in question, they fail to perceive any reason why their children should not enjoy the benefits it affords. That they should do so, as was said in the reference already made in AMERICA to the question, is to them a matter of no inconsiderable importance, owing to economic conditions prevailing in Altoona. The petitioners, moreover, showed the school board that the granting of the request would involve no disturbance of the order existing in the manual training school.

To test the decision of the State Superintendent, Dr. John M. Sheedy, a prominent physician of the city, has brought suit in the County Court against the Altoona School Board. The Court at once awarded a writ of alternative mandamus ordering the board to show cause for their refusal to admit Catholic parochial school pupils to the manual training course.

How does it happen that they who talk loudest of the need of "unsectarianism" in the public school system, are most apt to fail in the amenities which that term is presumed to cover? Complaints are heard from many quarters, that in meetings of School Teachers' Associations held last month in many states, some of the distinguished educators invited to address the public sessions of those bodies indulged in utterances full of bigotry and prejudice against the Catholic Church. It is distinctly wrong and un-American to take undue advantage of one's opportunity on such occasions, supposed to be free from religious influences, to introduce topics that cannot but offend the religious sentiments of many who may be present. These associations are meant to be organized in a non-sectarian spirit, and in fact a large proportion of Catholics are found in all of them. Why should the Invitation Committees in charge of these gatherings not exercise a prudent and courteous control and arrange their programs in such wise as not to permit the sower of sectarian prejudice a place among the speakers? One is glad to be able to affirm that the meetings of the Catholic Educational Association are free from this impropriety. Whilst the conventions of this latter body are calculated to set forth the Catholic view regarding the problems of education, there is never a fear that the work of the Association may arouse any unpleasant or jealous feeling among non-Catholics. No word was ever uttered, as far as our recollection of most of the Catholic Association's meetings goes, that would have offended any non-Catholic or public school man.

SOCIOLOGY

Most people enjoy giving elephants apples and squirrels nuts. The beast's satisfaction in eating is pleasant to watch, and some imaginative persons find in the interest it manifests in the one who furnishes the nut or the apple, the rudiments of gratitude; anyhow, it flatters the self-love of the giver. Such treatment spoils the elephant and the squirrel as such, for their nature is to provide themselves with food, not to expect it from others. Still, as animals are for man, we have a perfect right to weaken the food-getting instinct in them for our own advantage.

In much the same way we enjoy giving children cakes, candy, toys and so on. Children are not altogether like animals; they cannot provide for themselves. Hence the mere giving of such things does not injure their nature. It may injure their morals if it incites to greediness, or improvidence, or to the claiming such gifts as a right. What is given to children should be given in moderation, they should understand that they will not have friends always to give such things, and they must be trained to recognize, at least, benevolence in the giver, and to say "thank you" for the favor bestowed.

Social workers have the instinct of the animal feeder and the treater of children. They like to give everybody something. This instinct is good and may be turned to great advantage for both the workers and those who receive their favors. Elevated by grace it becomes Christian charity. There is a great objection to this word charity. Children must be fed in school, their books must be given them, their parents must be insured against unemployment, in their old age they must have pensions, but none of these things are to be called charity. Here evil comes in. Neither children nor parents have a right to such provision for their wants. If, therefore, the provision be made this is not done out of justice. It would be well to have it done out of Christian charity recognized frankly on both sides. Christian charity does not degrade the recipient, on the contrary, it lifts him up to God's throne, for whatever is done out of charity is done for God. Charity, therefore, is the bond of peace, and peace between classes is what the world needs to-day.

An English lady died lately, leaving by will, £200 to a Cornish parish on condition that it should set up a crematorium. Should it refuse to fulfil the condition, then the money was to go to the first parish that should comply with it. It is hard to understand what Cornishmen could want with a crematorium, and harder still to see why a woman of mature years should try to bribe them to dispose of their dead otherwise than they have always done. But it is good for us to see the zeal that can be shown for practices not Christian, that we may emulate it in our defence of Christian social institutions.

ECONOMICS

The Trust is not an exclusively American institution, and our readers may be glad to know how it is dealt with elsewhere. Singapore is at the gateway of the East. Every ship entering or leaving the China sea, whether by the Straits of Malacca or the Sunda Straits, must pass it. As European exports to China and Japan exceed greatly, at least in bulk, the imports from those countries, it used to happen that many a ship, which had gone out full, passed Singapore on the homeward voyage in ballast. Owners, therefore, were glad to take freights from that port at almost any figure; and so these were abnormally low, ranging from five shillings to twenty per ton. The great lines, unwilling to carry at such rates, organized in 1897 "The Homeward Conference," which included 21 lines with the Peninsular and Oriental, the Ocean, the Messageries Maritimes and the Norddeutscher Lloyd at the top of the list.

These companies giving regular and quick service, proposed to be paid for it at a minimum rate of 27 shillings and 6 pence per ton and a maximum of 40 shillings. To shut out all other vessels from the trade the combine had to make it to the interest of shippers to use its lines exclusively. Accordingly it promised to give at the end of six months a rebate of 5 per cent. on his freight account to every shipper who could show he had not gone outside the Conference, and of another 5 per cent. for the same six months at the end of a year if during this period also he had been faithful. Hence, 10 per cent. of his freight account was always due to the shipper with payment suspended for six months or a year to compel his fidelity. But this was not all. More than half the trade was in the hands of six large firms. Amongst these was divided secretly every year 5 per cent. on all the freights earned by the Conference from whatever source they came. This payment was a pure bribe paid for the good will of the influential houses.

Singapore is the capital of the Straits Settlements, a crown colony with a small legislative council appointed by the Colonial Office, which has the last word in all its legislation. Sir John Anderson, the Governor, felt bound to take up the matter of the Conference, and the Freight and Steamship Bill, popularly known as the Anti-Conference Bill, has been passed. Its provisions, decidedly thorough-going, follow the methods of the Conference. The principal one levies a duty of 20 per cent. with $100 as a minimum on every bill of lading, and orders that such duties are to form a fund to promote the object of the Act, i. e., to promote shipping by vessels not in the combine. Should any shipper prove that he is not a party to secret agreements with the Conference, he is to have this duty refunded. Another article provides that all who have rebates coming to them from the Conference, need not wait for the stipulated time of payment, but may get them at once and may sue for their recovery.

The Bill is now in London for the approval of the Colonial Office. While it was under discussion the steamship companies of the Conference sent a deputation to the Colonial Secretary, who recommended them to come to a compromise with Sir John Anderson, and thus have the Bill dropped. They did not take his advice, and it is to be presumed that they will now leave nothing undone to prevent its receiving the Royal Assent.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

One of the recent reprints in The Catholic Mind is the translation of the late decree of the Sacred Consistorial Congregation on the Removal of Parish Priests. The translation has been carefully compared with the Latin text of the original. This was found necessary as the English version which appeared in many papers was at times misleading or inexact. Some canons were given only in part and the numbering was faulty. Still more serious errors occurred in some translations of the decree on "Holy Communion for Children."

One hundred and fifty young American clerics, students of the American College in Rome, headed by the rector, Mgr. Kennedy, were received by the Pope last week in special audience in the Consistory Chamber. The visitors passed the Papal Throne in single file, each kissing the Holy Father's ring. In a brief address the Pontiff expressed his great pleasure at the growth of the Catholic Church in the United States, and closed by imparting his Apostolic blessing to all those present. The party was afterwards received by Cardinal Merry del Val, the Papal Secretary of State, who echoed the Holy Father's sentiments regarding the flourishing condition of the Church in America.

At a lecture and concert in Boston, on December 4, for the benefit of St. Mary's Infant Asylum, Archbishop O'Connell presided, and in his address touching on the apathy with which works of Catholic charity are often regarded by those in a position to give material help, said:

"Two things have always been a mystery to me and I think, to most of you as well. The first is: Why is it and how is it that the poor, the really poor, are constantly giving to others and yet never miss it once, and the rich, the really rich, give so little and miss it all the time? Will some wise philosopher of our day who understands the times and the men solve me that riddle.

"Another mystery which I have tried to solve is this: Why is it that of hundreds of thousands who during the past forty years have passed away in this vicinity, men of enormous wealth, not Catholics, not one has ever thought that perhaps a Catholic charity might be worthy of consideration.

"Why should Catholic institutions be forgotten? I hear much talk of non-sectarian charity.

"Catholic institutions have received little or nothing from any one who is not of the Catholic faith. How strange is it that those people who are so good at heart and that really have so many good qualities should leave out only Catholic institutions in all their charities. Will someone answer me why? Will someone solve me that riddle?

"But let us come nearer home. Why is it that generally only the poor Catholics—the men and women who have just enough to get along—give so generously and our rich Catholics have not, as a rule, measured up to the generosity of the poor Catholics? These institutions thus far have been supported mainly by the generous almsgiving of our poor."

San Francisco has joined the cities in the East that provide an early morning Mass for night workers. The Mass that before the earthquake was celebrated every Sunday morning at three o'clock in St. Patrick's Church, was resumed on November 20. In addition to this there will be a low Mass at noon every Sunday hereafter at the same church.

The third synod under the administration of Archbishop Farley, and the thirteenth in the history of the diocese, was held in St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York, on December 6, and attended by 610 of the clergy. The archbishop's address on diocesan affairs lasted for two hours, after which the diocesan officials were reappointed. In addition the new board of examiners on the administrative removal of priests, was appointed in accordance with the recent decree of the Holy See "Maxima Cura." The Synod of the diocese of Brooklyn was held on December 15.

SCIENCE

The annual report of the Bureau of Science, Department of the Interior, Manila, on the mineral resources of the Philippines, estimates the output of gold for 1909 at $248,000, an increase of 14 per cent. over the year 1908. The production of coal was 30,336 tons, a 155 per cent. gain over the previous year. This yield comes from two mines on the island of Batan, one at the extreme east and the other at the extreme west of the island. The coal appears to be of the Tertiary age, is classified as subbituminous, is low in ash and satisfactory for steam production.

Apropos of the much discussed question of Martial markings, maintained by Prof. Lowell of the Flagstaff observatory, Prof. James H. Worthington, of England, who spent a month at the Lowell observatory, observing the planet during the past opposition, writes:—"Of the objective existence of these markings in the image of the telescope there can be no doubt, and Lowell's representations of them are nearer the actual appearances than any I have seen, though even in his drawings the lines seem hardly fine enough. The effect produced on my mind by this remarkable definition which lasted for upwards of one and a half hours (Oct. 25, 8.30 p.m. until 10 p.m.) was staggering and ineffaceable. There is in my mind no sort of doubt that the revelation of this night was due to the perfection of the instrument and the atmospheric conditions which are found at Flagstaff. As to the deductions which Dr. Lowell has drawn from his observations I have nothing to say except that the startling artificial and geometrical appearance of the markings did force itself upon me."

PERSONAL

Mark A. Sullivan, of Jersey City, for the last three years Democratic leader in the House of Assembly has been appointed by Governor Fort a Judge of the Court of Errors and Appeals, the highest tribunal in New Jersey. Mr. Sullivan is thirty-two years old and is probably the youngest man ever appointed to the higher courts of the State. He was graduated from St. Peter's College, Jersey City, in 1897, and admitted to the bar as recently as 1903. Governor Fort said that he had watched Mr. Sullivan's career in the Legislature and had formed a high opinion of the young man's legal ability and independence of political and corporation domination. "I have a high regard for Mr. Sullivan," said Governor Fort, "although he and I are of different political faith. He has a splendid judicial temperament, is young and active and will bring to the court physical and mental attainments and capacity for work."

At Woodstock College, Maryland, the Rev. Allan McDonell, S.J., celebrated recently his diamond jubilee as a Jesuit. The venerable Father is now in his eighty-sixth year. He was born in Prince Edward Island, and entered the Society of Jesus in 1850. For many years he was Socius to the Superior of the New York and Canada Mission.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

The glory of Anglicanism, in this country Protestant Episcopalianism, is its comprehensiveness. How true this is may be seen by comparing the teaching on confirmation of two of its ministers, both in good standing, both authorized to teach, both professing to speak in its name.

The doctrine of Bishop Lofthouse of Keewatin at St. Philip's Church, Norwood, Manitoba, Nov 13, 1910.

The bishop, addressing the candidates before the confirmation took place, said in part: "The step of confirmation is a very solemn and responsible one, and means more than conversion. Most of us who were baptized in childhood knew nothing at all about it, but we were brought up under Christian conditions and surroundings. Confirmation has two sides, the negative and positive. I want to tell you, in the negative, that confirmation is not a Sacrament and not by any means equal to the Lord's Supper or the ordinance of baptism. It is only a means to an end, and only an outward sign of one's belief. There are only two sacraments, and these have been given by God Himself; these were ordained by Christ. Confirmation was never ordained by Christ; it is only a man-made ordinance."

The doctrine of the Reverend Mr. Maxwell at St. Bartholomew's Church, Brighton, England, October 16, 1910.

"Very soon any person who has been received into the Church of Rome will receive what I dare not call confirmation—it is not confirmation—but they will receive something which will claim to be the sacrament of confirmation. And I say without fear of contradiction that it is quite impossible for anyone to go through that ceremony without, in fact, giving the lie to the confirmation they have received here in the Church of England. You cannot be confirmed a second time, and therefore you must, if you go through that ceremony, either deny all the sacraments you have received, or you are guilty of taking part in an act of sacrilege; for to repeat the sacrament of confirmation is a sacrilege. Confirmation confers character; it leaves its indelible mark on the soul, and it cannot be repeated without sacrilege."

OBITUARY

Right Rev. Mgr. Anatole Oster, V.G., the last surviving priest of the noble band of young clerics who came from France in 1854, to assist the first bishop of St. Paul, Minnesota, Mgr. Joseph Cretin, died December 5th at St. Joseph's hospital, St. Paul, in the 77th year of his age, and the 56th of his ministry in Minnesota. He was a priest noted for his virtuous life, his sweet disposition and his learning. Successively pastor of the Cathedral, later in charge of the Archbishop's colonies in the western part of the state, then Spiritual Director of St. Paul's Seminary and Vicar General, Mgr. Oster was everywhere eminently successful. Bishop Lawler, auxiliary Bishop of St. Paul, celebrated pontifical Mass at the funeral; Archbishop Ireland pronounced the absolution, after paying a loving tribute to the deceased prelate. At the funeral ceremony 200 seminarists of St. Paul's Seminary, 100 priests from all points of the diocese, surrounded Archbishop Ireland, Bishop Lawler and the Bishops of Duluth, St. Cloud, Winona and Fargo.

The Very Rev. William Kloepper, D.D., a German Canadian, Provincial of the Fathers of the Resurrection, died on December 3d in St. Joseph's Hospital, Guelph, Ontario, in his sixty-second year. As a young man he studied philosophy and theology in Rome, and his work ever since was done especially in Berlin, Canada, either as rector of St. Mary's Church or in connection with St. Jerome's College. Over a year ago Father Kloepper was appointed by the Bishop of Hamilton administrator of the diocese, during the absence of the Ordinary. The Fathers of the Resurrection have three houses in Chicago and one in the diocese of Louisville, Ky.

The Right Rev. Mgr. Patrick Jerome Harkins, one of the best-beloved priests in the diocese of Springfield, Mass., died in the Providence Hospital in Holyoke, on December 4, after a week's illness. Mgr. Harkins was one of the oldest priests in the Springfield diocese. Appointed pastor of St. Jerome's Church, Holyoke, in 1866, his ministry was closely woven into the civil and religious life of that thriving city. He was known and loved by all, but especially by the children of Holyoke, and his death comes as a personal bereavement. Mgr. Har-kins was born at Green Hill, a short distance from Derry, Ireland, seventy-seven years ago. He attended the schools in his native town until 1848, when he came to America and made his home in Boston. His seminary course was pursued at Laval University, Quebec, and he was ordained to the priesthood in May 1864. His first appointment was as assistant to Mgr. Strain, whose parish embraced the cities of Chelsea and Lynn. Two years later he was appointed pastor in Holyoke, and the abundant fruits of his long pastorate show how much can be accomplished by a devoted and self-sacrificing priest.

Speaking of the death of Mgr. Harkins, Mayor Avery of Holyoke said: "The death of Mgr. Harkins is a public calamity. He has been one of Holyoke's greatest citizens. It would be very difficult to estimate the influence for good which he has exerted on the growth and development of the city, and in the forming of the characters of the men and women with whom he has come in contact. Holyoke and its citizens owe him a great debt of gratitude, and the only way that debt can ever be paid in part is by revering his memory and emulating his sturdy and splendid virtues."

Father Harkins was made Monsignor with the rank of Prothonotary Apostolic about five years ago. The Right Rev. Thomas D. Beavan, Bishop of Springfield, was celebrant at the solemn Mass of requiem and the Rev. John C. Ivers, of Holy Cross Church in Holyoke, delivered the eulogy.

The Rev. Frederick P. Garesché, S.J., a Jesuit of more than local reputation, died on December 8 in St. Xavier College, Cincinnati. He was born in 1825 and belonged to a family that has given distinguished members to various honorable professions and has been prominent in St. Louis for several generations. He was a cousin of Col. Julius Garesché, who was killed in one of the battles of the Civil War, while fighting under the Northern flag. His father was of Huguenot ancestry and served abroad for a number of years as a United States Consul.

Father Garesché entered the Society of Jesus in 1845, and after his novitiate in Florissant, Missouri, was sent to Rome in 1847 to pursue his classical studies. The revolution drove him and his fellow students out of Rome in the following year and he returned to America. After a period of teaching in St. Louis University he completed his ecclesiastical studies at Fordham, New York.

Father Garesché's natural eloquence and his unusual power in the pulpit marked him from the start as an able missionary, so that, with the exception of short intervals spent in responsible collegiate offices in Florissant, St. Louis and Cincinnati, his active religious life was spent in preaching and lecturing. He was a fellow-worker with Father Damen and Father Smarius and, if not always quite equal in forcefulness, was superior to them in the finer qualities of oratory.

In 1876 Father Garesché's health failed him, whilst he was living in Chicago. After several years in his native city of St. Louis, his continued ill-health made it advisable for him to try a different climate and, like many another melancholy invalid, he was "ordered south." A new period of activity then began for him. The polished lecturer and eloquent pulpit preacher of the great northern cities became an itinerant missionary in pioneer Texas, traveling about for days at a time on horseback, fording streams, and taking pot-luck in the log-cabins on the way. The rough life of the frontier relieved him in a considerable measure of his racking head-aches, and after some years he was assigned to the Jesuit church in New Orleans where he delivered courses of lectures that attracted wide attention.

He was called to St. Louis in 1895 in order that he might celebrate among his old friends the fiftieth anniversary of his life as a Jesuit. He passed seven years longer in the south and then was sent to Cincinnati where he spent his declining years in the full possession of all his early mental vigor.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

AN INTERESTING BOOK IN GAELIC.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Will you kindly let me know does Sommervogel, the Jesuit Bibliographer, mention any work by Rev. John Baptista Manni, S.J.? Father Manni was, I think, an Italian priest. I have a small book in the Irish language on "Eternity" written originally in Italian by Father Manni, and translated into Irish. In the preface the Irish translator says, in Irish, that it passed through twenty-six editions in Italian and nine in English. The volume I possess is the second edition in Irish and was published at Waterford, Ireland, in 1825.

CHARLES O'FARRELL.

Brooklyn, Dec. 9.

[John Baptist Manni was a native of Modena and entered the Society of Jesus in 1625 at the age of nineteen. He exercised the ministry of preaching for forty-two years and was successively Rector at Modena, Parma, Mantua, Bologna and Piacenza. A sketch of his life and a complete list of his works are given in Sommervogel. The work on "Eternity" which appeared originally under the title "Quattro Massime di Christiana Filosofia" passed through a great many editions in Italian, but only four editions are noted in English, the first in 1675 and the last in 1877, Burns & Oates, London. The first translation into Irish was issued in 1820. Two of the English editions are published with the Irish translation. Ed. AMERICA.]

THE RECENT DISTURBANCES IN MEXICO.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The recent disturbances in Mexico have been insignificant and certainly most grievously exaggerated abroad.

The anti-American sentiment which enemies of Mexico have wished to make so much of, does not exist in reality; decidedly not among the better classes, business circles and persons of right judgment.

The troubles which occurred following the lynching of a Mexican in Texas, undoubtedly were not occasioned by the lynching, against which unfortunate occurrence manifestations of a purely pacific character in the form of protest were intended; but malcontents (and such will be found to exist under any government) took advantage of the occasion to mix politics with the protest and caused annoyance to worthy American residents. Their conduct is totally disapproved of by right-minded Mexicans and has been punished by the Mexican authorities.

In the so-called "Madero Movement," which, after all, is nothing but a pestilent bubble, no respectable persons are involved. The whole thing is perfectly uncalled for, and it is absolutely certain that such an absurd effort cannot meet with success. The Government is more than powerful enough to quell any disturbances that may arise, and things will resume their ordinary course in a few days.

It is lamentable to think that some of the lower classes, unable to judge for themselves owing to their unintellectual condition, should be made the tools of men who use these credulous illiterates for their own personal ambitions.

Anyone who witnessed the recent Centennial Celebrations in Mexico will have been able to judge of the firm adhesion to and spontaneous love of the people for General Diaz. Such outbursts cannot be the result of bribery but are the true sentiments of the country.

JOAQUIN PALOMO RINCON.

Mexico, Nov. 25.

Richard L. Walsh Company
General Building Construction
100 William Street
New York City

YOU CAN EASILY GET THIS

Beautiful Wood Medallion by sending us a $1.00 Bill

SPECIAL OFFER No. 28

(Retail Value $1.50)

Send us attached coupon with a $1.00 Bill and we will send you postpaid one of these elegant Medallions.

The Frame is of Rosewood, and contains a real Photograph of any of the undermentioned subjects, size 7½ x 9½. Sacred Heart of Jesus, Sacred Heart of Mary, Ecce Homo, Mater Dolorosa, Immaculate Conception, St. Anthony.

CUT OFF HERE

Send your special offer No. 28 (Medallion of -----) to Name..... Street.....

 City..... State.....

FR. PUSTET & CO. 52 Barclay Street, New York
 436 Main St., Cincinnati, Ohio

Mayer & Co.

OF MUNICH and LONDON

47 BARCLAY STREET NEW YORK

STAINED GLASS Statues
 Stations of the Cross

IN view of the fact that cheap plaster casts of our Statues and Stations of the Cross are offered for sale by some unscrupulous firms, we call attention to a small stamped metal plate, which is affixed to the base of all genuine Mayer-Munich Statuary.

Correspondence Invited

The Coward Shoe

Toe Freedom and Arch Support

The Coward Arch Support Shoe is provided with a broad toe and an extension heel. It is anatomically and mechanically correct.

For Men, Women and Children
 Coward Arch Support Shoe and Coward Extension Heel have been made by James S. Coward, in his Custom Department, for over 30 yrs.

SOLD NOWHERE ELSE

JAMES S. COWARD

264-274 Greenwich St., N. Y.

(NEAR WARREN STREET)

Mail Orders Filled | Send for Catalogue

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 32 Washington Square, West, New York City

Bouillon Spoons
 Almost FREE.

Full size, Rogers' A A plate, Bouillon Spoons, Tea Spoons, Table Spoons, Forks. A beautiful rose design in French Gray finish—Free from advertising.

You can get full sets, almost without expense simply by saving the metal caps from jars of Liebig Company's Extract of Beef—The purest, best tasting, most concentrated extract you can buy.

LIEBIG
 Company's Extract of Beef

Send us one Liebig Cap and 10 cents and we'll send you a Bouillon Spoon or a Tea Spoon, post-paid. Send one cap and 20 cents for a Table Spoon or a Fork.

Address for silverware and free cook book, Dept. S, Cornette David & Co. 4 N. Moore St., N. Y.

60-page Cook Book by Mrs. Rorer, sent Free on request.

Sacred Heart Sanitarium

FOR REST, QUIET, RECUPERATION AND HEALTH

Unsurpassed results obtained in Nervousness, Rheumatism, Heart and Stomach troubles. No surgical, hospital nor insanity cases taken. A delightful, homelike, restful place—ideal for all run down conditions. Hydrotherapy, Electricity, Massage, Zander Gymnasium, Sun parlor; Swimming pools, billiards, bowling, etc. Gaited saddle horses, large indoor riding pavilion; suspended running track connected by tunnel with bath department. 17-acre park.

A staff of five physicians give their exclusive services to the patients.

WRITE SISTER SUPERIOR FOR BOOKLET X. MILWAUKEE, WIS.

LIBRARY SUPPLIES

Adjustable Book Covers—Library Numbers Gummed and perforated always in stock—also alphabets of various sizes.

For sale by stationers or by

THE VAN EVEREN CO.
60 Ann Street - New York

The Book Covers are made of tough, strong paper and are inexpensive, efficient and easily put on

$250. Reward

A reward of Two Hundred and Fifty Dollars will be paid for the arrest and conviction of any junk dealer or other person guilty, under the provisions of Section 550 of the Penal Code of the State of New York, of criminally receiving any property belonging to this Company.

$50. Reward

Fifty Dollars Reward will be paid for the arrest and conviction of any person who maliciously injures or interferes with the lines of this Company.

NEW YORK TELEPHONE CO.
15 Dey St., New York

JOHN H. CAHILL,
May 1, 1908 Vice-Pres't & Gen'l Counsel

GOOD SAMPLE TEA

in lots of 100 pounds or more 16½ cents per pound

Good Old Crop COFFEE

splendid cup qualities—ground or in the bean 16½ cents per pound

New York & Columbia Coffee Co.
126 Front Street, New York City

Telephone Call, 5922 Barclay

THE S. T. SMITH CO.

Manufacturers of

Ink, Inked Ribbons, Carbon, Manifold and Typewriter Linen Papers

Diamond Brand Typewriter Supplies

11 BARCLAY STREET

NEW YORK

ARTISTS' MATERIALS

A good art teacher must have the Best to teach with, and then the scholars can show something worth looking at. Every school should use

WINSOR & NEWTON'S
Oil and Water Colors

Brushes, Canvas, Paper, Boards, Rubber

Our Goods are the World's Standard

New York Office—298 Broadway

New Catalogue by Mail 5c

ST. JOSEPH'S SANATORIUM

Silver City, New Mexico

Conducted by the Sisters of Mercy

A THOROUGHLY equipped institution for the treatment of all suitable cases of tuberculosis. Each room has two wide connecting porches, electric lights and all modern conveniences. Infirmary for febrile cases, also cottages for those desiring them. Trained nurses and resident physician in constant attendance. Climatic conditions ideal: cool summers and moderate winters. Annual precipitation 12 inches, with only 33 cloudy days. Altitude, 6,000 feet. All ethical lines of treatment, including tuberculin in suitable cases.

For Catalogue and particulars address either Sister Superior or Oliver T. Hyde, M.D., Medical Director.

ORIGINAL CHRISTMAS STAR

"THAT CHARMS AT SIGHT"

Do not break your head what unique Christmas present to make to Children, to Pupils, to Parishioners, to Friends, young and grown, to few or to many. Write at once for a circular to FRED. KOCH CO., 89 Orange St., Newark, N.J.

Catholic Mind Pamphlets

Christian Science

by Robert Hugh Benson

The Delusion of Christian Science

by Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J.

5 cents per copy

THE AMERICA PRESS 32 Washington Square, W. NEW YORK

$1.00 WILL BRING POSTPAID

one of our
Fine Gold Filled
5 year guaranteed

ROSARIES

In any color. Order through your jeweler or direct. Catalogue free.

Wm. Purnell Co.
Mfg. Jeweler
37 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

The Dayton White-washing and Cold Water Painting Machines

The Progress series of machines are especially adapted for applying white-wash, cold water paints and other wall coatings. They make ideal machines for use about Colleges, Academies and Schools. They can be used as well for general spraying in the Park, Orchard and Conservatory. They are all built on the same principle; varying only in size and construction details.

THE PROGRESS JR.

has a capacity of 12 gallons and is mounted on two wheels and two supporting legs. Price, with Galv. Tank, $21.00. Weighs 99 lbs. Brass 25.00.

THE PROGRESS

has a capacity of 20 gallons and is mounted on two wheels and two supporting legs. Price, with Galv. Tank, $30.00. Weighs 132 lbs. Brass 35.00.

THE PROGRESS HEAVY DUTY (Illustrated above)

has a capacity of 20 gallons and is mounted on three wheels. It is built very strong and will stand a lot of hard usage. It is recommended where there is a lot of whitewashing as well as a lot of spraying to do.

Price, with Galv. Tank, $35.00. Weighs 200 lbs. Brass 40.00.

For further particulars and detailed description address McCORMICK M'FG CO., Dept. Y, Dayton, Ohio

MENEELY BELL CO
TROY, N.Y. AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.
BELLS

Simplicity
is a prominent feature
of the
VICTOR

It is not necessary to make a lot of adjustments before doing special kinds of work.

The Victor is always ready without special adjustment, because its special devices are built in the machine—not extra attachments.

Send for the No. 2 Catalogue to-day

VICTOR TYPEWRITER COMPANY

812 Greenwich Street
NEW YORK

The 121st Semi-Annual Dividend has been declared at the rate of FOUR PER CENT.

Deposits made on or before January 10th, 1911, will draw interest from January 1st, 1911.

4%

Emigrant Industrial Savings Bank

51 Chambers Street

Condensed Statement, December 1st, 1910

Assets		Liabilities
Real Estate -	$2,971,465.55	Due Depositors
Bonds and Mortgages -	61,476,370.00	(including accrued interest)	$102,511,683.43
State Bonds -	6,328,923.50	Surplus, Market
Municipal Bonds -	12,580,908.69	Value -	9,828,695.88
Railroad Mortgage
Bonds -	23,986,968.00
Accrued Interest -	1,684,970.20
Cash -	3,310,773.37
	$112,340,379.31		$112,340,379.31

JOHN J. PULLEYN, Comptroller.

THOS. M. MULRY, President.

Mullins & Sons

$1.00 A WEEK FURNISHES THE HOME

78-84 Myrtle Avenue, Brooklyn

121-125 Newark Avenue, Jersey City, N. J.

218-220 Market Street, Newark, N. J.

Manufacturers' Sale of 300

PARLOR SUITS

These Suits Make Splendid Christmas Gifts

They will adorn any home. Have it finished in any desired upholstery and delivered when required

This Exact $35 Parlor Suit

New Model Fall Style, SPECIAL $29

Special Sale

This suit is a sample of the rare bargain savings at Mullins'. By far the best value we have ever been able to offer. Out they go at great money saving prices. All beautifully polished mahogany finished frames, loose plush cushions. Selection of colors.

$29

COUPON

By presenting this coupon at our Brooklyn store a handsome framed picture 13 x 16 will be given

FREE

BOUND VOLUMES OF AMERICA A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

SIX MONTHS TO A VOLUME

$3.50

The AMERICA Press, 32 Washington Sq. W., New York

A Gift That Lasts Till Xmas Comes Again

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

We have prepared an attractive Christmas card which will bear the giver's name and compliments

(Reproduction of Card)

If you prefer to use your own card you may do so; kindly send same to us with your order.

SINGLE YEAR SUBSCRIPTION $3.00. FOUR YEARLY SUBSCRIPTIONS $10.00

Fill in below, names of parties to whom you wish to send AMERICA for one year and send order to us

CUT OFF HERE

NAME	STREET	CITY	STATE

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Square W., New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: Enclosed find..... in payment for the above order

Name..... Street.....

City..... State.....

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

FOR A GIFT

AMONG THE HURONS

VOLUME II OF

Pioneer Priests of North America

Tells the heroic story of
de Brébeuf and His Associates

"This book is a striking illustration of the truth of Shakespeare's well-known words 'Men's good is oft interred with their bones.' . . . We cannot then but feel grateful to Father Campbell for what he has done to assure the fame of those glorious confessors and martyrs from a threatened obscurity. . . .

"Missionaries such as these have a special work in this day of weak faith and widespread disbelief; for the story of their lives, while it stimulates the one, is a living protest against the other. Father Campbell's theme is a great one, and he has dealt with it well. The clear and simple language in which he recounts the wonderful heroism of these truly wonderful men, is more impressive and convincing than any elaboration of style, and surely more in harmony with the quiet, simple characters of the men of whom he treats."—The Tablet, London.

By Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J.

480 Pages. With Index. 24 Illustrations.

PRICE, $2.00

VOLUME I

This extremely interesting book consists of a series of 18 monographs of the missionaries who labored among the Iroquois Indians. Beginning with the life of Jogues in 1642, they continue up to 1710, when the Indians, just before their annihilation, passed over from French to English control.

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS:

"For lovers of history and biography, of the adventurous, the heroic, and the saintly, there is much to attract the attention in this volume of over 300 large, clearly printed pages."—The Sacred Heart Review.

"The adventures of most of the missionaries read like romances."—The New York Herald.

"One of the most interesting Catholic books we have ever read."—The Monitor (San Francisco).

Price, $1.60, postage prepaid

THE AMERICA PRESS 32 Washington Sq. W.
NEW YORK

The American Carlsbad Sanitarium

Hydrotherapy according to the celebrated Kneipp system applied in all forms and up-to-date methods. All diseases, acute and chronic, scientifically and successfully treated. Testimonials and references furnished. First class accommodations for patients.

The famous Devonian Mineral water in use, a strong, sulphurated, saline, calcareous and magnesian water, the counterpart of the German Carlsbad.

Rates reasonable. Investigation solicited.

For information apply to

The American Carlsbad Co., Lorain, O.

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week
32 Washington Square, West, New York City

INKS THE BEST BY TEST FOR 85 YEARS DAVIDS

ELECTRO CHEMICAL BLUE BLACK WRITING FLUID

The best Ink for general office and school use.

Writes blue, turns black and is permanent.

We also make Ink that writes black and remains black.

QUARTS 60c. EACH. $6.00 A DOZEN
GALLON JUGS, $1.75
5 GALLON KEGS, $7.50 EACH

F. O. B., N. Y.

Thaddeus Davids Co., Mfrs.

95-97 Van Dam Street, New York

If you use Davids' Inks you are using the best; if not, why not give it a trial?

FINN BROTHERS

Manufacturers of

Roll Top Desks

STORE and OFFICE FIXTURES
Counters, Shelvings,
Partitions, Etc.

Estimates and Designs Furnished

Office 358 BROADWAY Salesrooms

59-65 FRANKLIN ST., NEW YORK

Telephones, 4855-4856 Franklin

Factory: 112-114 LEROY STREET

Telephone Connection

Dry Your Clothes on a Wet Washday With a New Perfection Oil Heater

When clothes can't be hung outside, and must be dried in a room or cellar, the New Perfection Oil Heater quickly does the work of sun and air. You can hang up the wet clothes, light your Perfection Oil Heater, open the damper top, and the heat rises and quickly dries the clothes.

Do not put off washing to await a sunny day in order to avoid mildew. Dry your washing any day with hot air from a

PERFECTION SMOKELESS OIL HEATER

Absolutely smokeless and odorless

It gives just as much heat as you desire. It is safe, odorless and smokeless.

It has an automatic-locking flame spreader, which prevents the wick from being turned high enough to smoke, and is easy to remove and drop back, so the wick can be quickly cleaned. Burner body or gallery cannot become wedged, because of a new device in construction, and can always be easily unscrewed for rewicking.

An indicator shows the amount of oil in the font. Filler-cap does not need to be screwed down, but is put in like a cork in a bottle, and is attached to the font by a chain. Finished in Japan or nickel, strong and durable, well-made, built for service and yet light and ornamental. It has a cool handle and a damper top.

Dealers Everywhere. If not at yours, write for descriptive circular to the nearest agency of the

Standard Oil Company
(Incorporated)

F. JAMES REILLY
President

WM. F. REILLY
Manager

JAMES REILLY'S SONS' CO.

General Electrical Repairs

122-130 CENTRE STREET
Corner White Street

Telephone 881 Franklin NEW YORK

SANITARY FLOOR BROOM EXTRA LONG ELASTIC STOCK

Drawn with Rust Proof Wire—PEERLESS
Knots will not come out.
Backs Bolted on with Rust Proof Bolts.

Prices—Per Doz. Net
14 inch 16 inch 18 inch
$14.00 $16.00 $18.00

Guaranteed for use with Oil or Sweeping Compounds

E. J. KELLY (EVERYTHING) 104 Chambers St.
(IN BROOMS) NEW YORK, N. Y.

INSTITUTION

LINEN

of all kinds, also Sheets and Pillow Cases, Blankets, Bed Spreads, etc., etc.

WRITE for SAMPLES and PRICES

H. W. BAKER LINEN CO. Dept "K"
41 WORTH ST.
Importers and Manufacturers NEW YORK CITY

DENTISTRY

Loose teeth tightened by a new process; teeth without plates. Extracting avoided. High-class and up-to-date dentistry in all branches at reasonable prices.

DRS. BURKE & BURKE
DENTISTS

1947 BROADWAY AND 65TH ST
66th Street subway, L station and all surface cars.

Catholic Mind Pamphlet on "THE EUCHARISTIC CONGRESS AT MONTREAL"

5c Each, $4.00 per Hundred

The America Press, 32 Washington Square, West, New York

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

DIRECTORY OF COLLEGES AND ACADEMIES

Georgetown University WASHINGTON, D. C.

Directory for Catalogues or Information

The College (Graduates and Undergraduate Schools)
The Registrar, 37th & O Sts., N. W.

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E. St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University
Rev. Joseph Himmel, S.J., President

LADYCLIFF

On the Hudson (Adjoining West Point)
Young Ladies' Academy

A department for small boys. Education thorough and practical. Location beautiful and convenient. Terms moderate. Send for prospectus. Address Sister Superior, Ladycliff, Highland Falls, N. Y.

New York State Regents' Examinations.

Academy of St. Joseph

In-the-Pines

BRENTWOOD, N. Y.

A Boarding School for Young Ladies,
Affiliated with the State University

PROSPECTUS EXPLAINS THE TERMS, ETC.

St. Mary's College

St. Marys, Kansas

BOARDING COLLEGE
Under the Jesuit Fathers

Two Courses of Study:
Classical and Commercial

For Catalogue, send to
REV. ALOYSIUS A. BREEN, S.J., President.

ACADEMY OF THE HOLY FAMILY

BALTIC, CONNECTICUT

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity
PREPARATORY, COMMERCIAL and ACADEMIC COURSES

Prospectus explains terms, etc.

Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

Convent of the Holy Child SHARON HILL, DELAWARE COUNTY, PA.

11 Minutes from Philadelphia

ACADEMY FOR YOUNG LADIES
Highest English Course. French, Drawing, Music by Certified Teachers. Preparation for foreign travel. As the numbers are limited, special care can be given to the formation of character and training of each child.
Address Mother Superior

COLLEGE OF ST. ELIZABETH CONVENT STATION

Near Morristown, N. J.

One hour from New York City.

A Catholic Institution for the Higher Education of Women

COLLEGE Four years' course leading to the degrees of B. A. and B. S.

SCHOOL OF PEDAGOGY Required for entrance two years of College work

SCHOOL OF MUSIC. COURSE LEADING TO THE DEGREE OF B. M.

ACADEMY A High School Course of Four Years. Full College Preparatory Work. GRAMMAR AND PRIMARY DEPARTMENTS SEPARATE

REGISTERED By the New Jersey State Board of Education and the University of the State of New York Apply for Year Book to The Secretary

MT. ST. JOSEPH ON THE WISSAHICKON

For illustrated catalogue address MOTHER SUPERIOR, Chestnut Hill, Philadelphia, Pa.

CATHOLIC COLLEGE FOR WOMEN
situated in the romantic Valley of the Wissahickon. Degrees conferred. Also Academic, Commercial, Intermediate and Elementary Departments. Very special advantages in Music and Art. The piano student possesses superior opportunities in the use of the Virgil Clavier Method pursued throughout the course. The Art Studio is admirably equipped, and every attention is given to the study of Art, both in theory and practice. Gymnasium perfectly equipped. Outdoor exercise, tennis, basket ball, fencing, etc.

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Collegiate and Preparatory Departments

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $260 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra. Send for catalogue to

REV. THOMAS E. MURPHY, S.J., President

Seton Hall College

FOUNDED 1856

South Orange, New Jersey

COLLEGE AND HIGH SCHOOL

Bayley Hall for Students of Grammar Course

FOR CATALOGUE ADDRESS
Very Rev. James F. Mooney, D.D., Pres.

COLLEGE OF ST. CATHERINE, ST. PAUL, MINN.

A CATHOLIC COLLEGE FOR GIRLS

Accredited by the Minnesota State Board of Public Instruction and by several prominent Universities.

SEVENTY ACRE CAMPUS.

FIREPROOF BUILDINGS

COMPLETE COURSES
IN THESE DEPARTMENTS

THE COLLEGIATE, leading to the degree of Bachelor of Arts.
THE ACADEMIC OR COLLEGE PREPARATORY. MUSIC
AND PAINTING in their various branches. DOMESTIC ART,
HOUSEHOLD SCIENCE and COOKING.

YEAR BOOK FORWARDED ON APPLICATION, Address: THE SECRETARY

ST. JOHN'S PREPARATORY COLLEGE

DANVERS, MASS.

SELECT HIGH SCHOOL conducted by the XAVIERIAN BROTHERS

Classical, Scientific and Commercial Courses

Ideal Location All New Buildings

New Equipment Competent Instructors

Develops the Whole Boy

Send for Catalogue

Brother Benjamin, Director

IMMACULATA SEMINARY

MOUNT MARIAN, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Situated in the suburbs. Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of St. Mary-of-the-Woods. Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Conservatory methods in Music. Oil and Ceramic and Water-color Studios. Abundant out-door exercise. Sightseeing with experienced chaperons.

For Year Book address, Sister Secretary

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

ADJOINING BRONX PARK, NEW YORK CITY

College and High School

ST. JOHN'S HALL, FOR SMALLER BOYS

The location affords the healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city

MEDICAL SCHOOL
in connection with Fordham Hospital

WRITE FOR CATALOGUE

LAW SCHOOL
at 20 Vesey St.
in the midst of the courts

SPRING HILL COLLEGE

FOUNDED 1830 Spring Hill, Mobile Co., Ala. CHARTERED 1836

BOARDING COLLEGE CONDUCTED BY THE JESUIT FATHERS

Just the School for boys who wish to escape the rigors of the Northern climate. Mean temperature of the winter months, 52 degrees Fahrenheit.

HEALTHY LOCATION—EVERY CONVENIENCE OF A MODERN COLLEGE

CURRICULUM INCLUDES THE PREPARATORY, HIGH SCHOOL AND COLLEGE COURSES. DEGREES CONFERRED

Write for Catalogue to Rev. F. X. Twellmeyer, S. J., President

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Vol. IV, No. 11

(Price 10 Cents)

DECEMBER 24, 1910

($3.00 a year)

Whole No. 89

CHRONICLE

World Peace Conference—Mr. Carnegie's Peace Fund—War Scare—Canada—Great Britain—Ireland—India—France—Portugal—Emperor William and Portugal—Interesting Debate in Reichstag—Constitution for Alsace-Lorraine—The Beuron Address—Danish West Indies—Belgium—Bohemia241-244

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Incarnation and the World—Mass in the Presbyterian Church, III, In Newark, N. J.—The Growth of Materialism in England..245-250

CORRESPONDENCE

Prosperous Mexico—The Devil and the Peasant—Germany's Foreign Colonization.....251-253

EDITORIAL

Greeting—An Eloquent Voice from Portugal—Edward Douglass White—An Apologist for Modern Italy—Mexican Misgivings—Unlooked for Returns—Fortune Tellers.....254-257

LITERATURE

Mary Aloysia Hardey, Religious of the Sacred Heart—Early Steps in the Fold—Back to Holy Church—A Winter's Comedy—The Territorial Governors of the Old Northwest—Cuba—Kings in Exile—Through Five Administrations—Our Lord's Last Will and Testament—The Wonderland of Stamps—Books Received.....258-261

EDUCATION

The Necessity of Watching Projected Legislation Inimical to Catholic Education.....261

SCIENCE

A New Demonstration of the Axial Rotation of the Earth261-262

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

Notable Development of the Church in Chicago

—New Buildings for Santa Clara College—Rebuilding San Francisco's Ruined Churches—Bishop Kennedy Back from Rome—Converts Ordained Priests262

SOCIOLOGY

The Dignity of Poverty.....262-263

ECONOMICS

A New British Atlantic Cable to Connect Australia through Canada—Improving Mexico's Fruit Orchards263

OBITUARY

Rev. Thomas Fitzgerald, S.J.—Sister M. F. de Chantal Lampe—Right Rev. Mgr. Thomas Griffin263-264

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

The Pioneers of Jefferson County—The Brents of Maryland264

CHRONICLE

World Peace Conference.—Various events at the national capital have drawn public attention to the movement which seeks to unite the nations of the earth in the bonds of perpetual peace. One of these is the three days' conference of the American Society for the Judicial Settlement of International Disputes. The society has for its aim the creation of a permanent court, as distinguished from a temporary tribunal, for the adjustment of international controversies by judicial decision according to principles of law, not by compromise, according to the standard of diplomacy. A notable gathering of diplomats, jurists, soldiers and men of international renown were present at the first session, which Cardinal Gibbons opened with a brief prayer for the peace of the world. Among the speakers at the conferences were Ambassador de la Barra of Mexico, Senator Elihu Root, former Secretary of State John W. Foster, Andrew Carnegie, Governor-elect Simeon E. Baldwin of Connecticut, the French Ambassador M. Jusserand, W. Bourke Cockran and President Taft. To quote from Mr. Carnegie's address: "While some important powers," he said, "still declare that nations cannot submit all questions to a tribunal, others have quietly gone on doing so. Argentina and Chile were the first. They erected a statue of the Prince of Peace upon their boundary line in the Andes, engraving thereon: 'Sooner shall these mountains crumble into dust than Chileans and Argentinans break their vow never to attack each other, made at the foot of this statue to the Prince of Peace.' Norway and Sweden did so, and more recently Belgium and the Netherlands have followed. Surely the two branches of our English-speaking race should follow their example." President Taft is the honorary president of the Society, and has given his hearty approval of the proposed court.

Mr. Carnegie's Peace Fund.—To carry on a peace propaganda and to establish the whole movement on a solid business foundation, Andrew Carnegie transferred to a board of twenty-seven distinguished American citizens as trustees named by himself $10,000,000 as a perpetual fund, the income of which, "from century to century," is to be "used to hasten the abolition of international war, the foulest blot upon our civilization." After international peace is firmly established and war is no more, the income is to be employed for the banishment of "the next most degrading evil or evils" which afflict mankind or the fostering of whatever "new element or elements would most advance the progress, elevation, and happiness of man." This is to go on "from century to century, without end."

A War Scare.—Curiously enough, simultaneously with the Peace Conference and the contribution of $10,000,000 towards a permanent peace fund, a confidential report, disclosing dangerous weaknesses in the national defenses, was sent to the lower branch of Congress from the War Department. The document was returned, without having been divulged, on the ground that the House could not receive a secret report. Members of Congress who saw the document before its withdrawal say the report of Secretary Dickinson points out that the country is wholly unprepared; that there is a woful lack of men, guns and ammunition; that the army should be reorganized, and that a council of national defence, with the Secretary of War at its head, should be created by Congress. Congressman James A. Tawney, of Minnesota, chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, said that the Secretary's report and Congressman Hobson's lecture on "The Yellow Peril" were practically identical and he charged the existence of a conspiracy between the War Department and military enthusiasts in the House of Representatives to force enormous appropriations for military purposes. He asserted that the effort to get the report of the Secretary of War before the American people was simply a part of a propaganda of jingoism to secure support for larger appropriations.

Canada.—The Government naval scheme is for four cruisers of the British type, that is a protected cruiser of about nine to ten thousand tons, and six torpedo destroyers. The objection of the opposition to the plan is radical, namely, that such vessels would be useless in the time of war, and therefore an unwarrantable expense in time of peace. The matter of Commander Roper, R. N., who employed with regard to the new navy under Government, spoke publicly against those attacking its policy, has been brought up in parliament.—An explosion in a coal mine at Bellevue, Alberta, caused thirty-three deaths. Just before it occurred the miners had complained of its condition, but a public inspector examined it and declared it perfectly safe.—The Conference of Provincial Premiers, which we mentioned in our last issue, has separated without taking action regarding the representation of the Maritime Provinces. Nothing is said of the other matter.—F. D. Monk has introduced into parliament a Conservation Bill prescribing only fifty year leases for water power, the advertising of such leases and the disposal of them by public auction.

Great Britain.—The new parliament is made up of 271 Liberals, 84 Nationalists, 43 Labor Party on the one side, and 272 Unionists on the other. The Government has increased its majority by two votes, but these represent Labor and Nationalist gains; the Liberals of Great Britain having lost ground slightly. It is said that the policy of both parties depends now upon what the king will do. If he assures Lord Lansdowne and Mr. Balfour that he will never swamp the House of Lords by the creation of 500 peers, more or less, the Unionists will fight the Parliament Bill, and amend it in the Upper House, substituting their own plan of reform for that of the Government. If the king promises Mr. Asquith to yield to Mr. Redmond's demand for a creation of peers sufficient to overcome all opposition, the Unionists will allow the Government measure to pass. If the king stands upon his constitutional place refusing to take any part in the quarrel but ready to sign any bill that comes to him in the ordinary way, there will be conferences and talk of compromise ending in another dissolution. All this rests upon the assumption that because their numbers remain the same, the parties are in the same condition as before the dissolution. This is not so. Unionists believed that the nation was displeased with the revolutionary projects of the Government and would show it at the polls. The elections prove that the nation is indifferent, giving no answer one way or the other. It is a case of silence giving consent. Consequently it seems more probable that the Unionist policy will be what words falling from Mr. Balfour in the course of last week, imply: the withdrawing of all real opposition and the promise of a repeal of the Parliament Bill as soon as the party is in power. The fulfilment of such a promise would be difficult, but not absolutely impossible.

Ireland.—Home Rule has benefited by the elections in Ireland as well as in Great Britain. Two seats have been recovered from the Unionists, one of them in Ulster; all the close seats in Ulster have been retained with an increased majority, and not one Nationalist seat has been lost, a record which no other party can show as well as a striking proof of national solidarity. Mr. Shane Leslie failed to wrest Derry from the powerful Hamilton family by 100 votes but would probably have won on the new register. Mr. Frewen, who was presented with a seat in Cork by Mr. O'Brien, is a cousin of Mr. Leslie, as is also Mr. Winston Churchill, their mothers belonging to the Jerome family of New York. All three are converts to Home Rule, while Mr. Leslie is also a convert to Catholicism, of which, within the last few years, he has been a zealous and able defender with tongue and pen. The Independent Nationalists seem to have suffered a net loss of two seats and possibly more, as two of their number will probably be readmitted into the party. Mr. O'Brien's influence was shown by the contests to be limited to Cork County. The entire Nationalist strength is over 80 per cent. of the Irish representation, includes every seat in Munster, Connaught and Leinster, except Trinity College, Dublin, and almost equally divides Ulster.—The information sent to some American papers to the effect that Cardinal Logue and the Irish bishops are lukewarm about Home Rule, if not secretly hostile to it, is directly contrary to the words and actions of the Prelates. Nearly all the bishops doubled this year their annual subscriptions to the Irish Party Fund and reiterated their belief in the necessity of self-government for proper natural development, social, educational, industrial and religious. Bishop O'Donnell, of Raphoe, is chairman of the Fund. Cardinal Logue made a strong Home Rule pronouncement immediately after his return from the United States, as is his wont on every important occasion. These reports were founded on some articles, voicing the fear that Home Rule would prove hurtful to the Church, in the London Times, a source from which Irish bishops are not likely to take suggestions in Catholic matters. The statement that the Cardinal had lost confidence in Mr. T. M. Healy is also untrue; but he forbade his priests to take prominent part in the Louth election, as he judged such action inexpedient where the rival contestants and supporters were Catholics and Nationalists.

India.—The conspiracy trials continue. The "Howrah gang," consisting of 47 Bengalis, have just come into court charged with conspiracy to upset British rule.—The Dalai Lama is anxious to visit England and has twice asked permission to do so.—The government has established as a ruling principality, the family domains of the Zemindari of Benares, consisting of the districts of Bhadohi or Korh, Kerah Mangraur or Chakia, and Gungapur or Kaswa Raja, containing 887 square miles and 362,000 sou's. This is the first time the Government has taken British territory to set up a principality.

France.—What to us in America would be a very unexpected result from the new regulation about the early Communion of children has occurred in the very Protestant section of Audincourt in France. The Protestant ministers in those quarters have been for years very busy in visiting Catholic families to inform them that it was no sin for a child to change its faith before First Communion and Confirmation. They are said to have had considerable success in winning over by this falsehood a great many children. According to the present regulation a good many years will be lopped off for this kind of proselytism.—In connection with Mme. Curie's candidacy for membership in the Academy of Sciences it may be of use to recall that in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, several women occupied seats in the Institut. They were Catherine Duchemin, Genevieve and Madeleine de Boulogne, Sophie Chéron, Anne Strésor, Dorothee Masse, Catherine Perrot, Rosalba Carriera, Marguerite Havermann, Marie Therèse Roboul, Dorothee Leincinska, Marie Giroust, Anne Vallayer, Labille des Vertus, and finally and above all Mme. Vigée-Lebrun. Napoleon excluded women from the Academy.

At a meeting of the "Teachers of the Seine," M. Maurice Faure reiterated the old declaration that the duty of the country was to support the lay-schools. He complained that the bill which his predecessor had presented to the Government had been pigeonholed in the official desks of the Palais Bourbon. If the lay-schools were not maintained the principles of the French Revolution would be ignored, and the clerical schools, which objected to certain books, would be soon objecting to the Republic. Of course, he said, "I believe in religious freedom."—The Royalists are at odds with each other and the Duc d'Orleans writes to one of his supporters complaining of the dissension and of the disregard of orders.—The Eclair of Paris complains that justice in France is a very costly affair if one desires to get it, and to illustrate its assertion it adduces the case of a poor woodcutter whose chattels had been seized and put up at public auction. Between the cost of summonses, postage stamps, official notices, newspaper notices, affidavits, etc, the cost ran up to almost 271 francs, much more of course than all the rubbish was worth.—The Court of Inquiry in the Rochette Case in which Clémenceau is alleged to have been implicated, finds that the Minister of the Interior interfered with the working of the court, and also that the Prefecture of Police, on the recommendation of a newspaper manager interested in the swindle introduced a bogus plaintiff supplied with fraudulent securities. It is impossible at this distance to know how far this concerns the famous Prefect of Police Lepine.—A new condition of things presents itself in France where in former times drunkenness was considered to be non-existent. Briand describes the situation as terrible, and hopes that the Senate will pass the Bill now before it on Alcoholism. One would almost imagine he was preparing for war. He considers it to be a measure of national defense—A credit of $1,160,000 has been voted by the Parliament for the relief of the flood victims.

Portugal.—The action of the Provisional Government in recalling the decree of exile pronounced against Queen Maria Pia, grandmother of Manoel, was prompted by the conditions of the marriage settlement when she became a member of the Portuguese royal family. Her allowance of $65,000 a year was made contingent upon her residing in Portugal; should she leave the country, she was to receive but half the allowance. As she had been driven out, her nephew, the King of Italy, insisted on the annual payment of the full sum, and the Braga clique meets the demand by excepting her from the decree which banished Manoel's kindred. Father Cabral, Provincial of the Jesuits in Portugal, who was so eagerly sought for, even hunted, by the Revolutionists, succeeded in reaching Madrid, Spain, from which place he has issued a dignified protest which is at the same time a clear vindication of his religious brethren. The leaders of the revolutionary movement are still at a loss to explain their triumph; for during the three days of supposed war, not one of them received so much as a flesh wound. Several, however, were badly shaken up when, fearing that the plot had failed, they fled wildly in automobiles; but they heroically bore the bumps and bruises while some of their dupes were stopping the bullets of the few loyal troops. Spanish newspapers report further that the Sisters of Charity have already been invited by the Government to return to Lisbon and resume their noble work in the public hospital.

Emperor William and Portugal.—The Court Directory for the year 1911, which has just been published, fails to mention among the titles borne by Emperor William that of Honorary Colonel of the Fourth Regiment of Portuguese Cavalry. His Majesty evidently has resigned the incumbency, formerly accepted by him, since the upheaval which deprived King Manoel of his throne.

Interesting Debate in Reichstag.—Prolonged sessions featured the close of the Reichstag for the holidays. During one of these occurred a scene marked by all the dramatic intensity of Kulturkampf days. Dr. Müller-Meiningen, of the Progressists, introduced into a speech he was making a stinging reference to the much-discussed oath against modernistic errors recently prescribed by Pius X for all priests. Herr Gröber, a distinguished member of the Centre party, spiritedly replied to the attack. He showed that the Evangelical Church demanded from its ministers a similar pledge to safeguard its own interests, and a similar formal obedience towards all in authority; civil officials and officers in the military establishment are also bound to swear fidelity to the government; ecclesiastics of every confession are expected to abide by the regulations of their churches or to resign their charge. The speaker concluded an eloquent address with the impassioned cry: "Away with the Kulturkampf and with all who would renew the Kulturkampf's bitterness." Both speakers were listened to with deepest attention and enthusiastic applause greeted the telling points scored by Herr Gröber. In the course of the same sitting Dr. Frank, the Social Democrat, renewed the vicious attacks made earlier in the week upon Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg because of the latter's charge that the Socialist party was morally responsible for the bloody happenings that marked the Moabit disturbances.

Constitution for Alsace-Lorraine.—After the Christmas recess the German Reichstag will be asked to pass upon the draft of a Constitution for Alsace-Lorraine just adopted by the Bundesrath. The draft agreed upon provides for two Legislative Chambers and a Governor appointed by the Emperor. The higher chamber will consist of thirty-six members, one half of whom will be ex-officio or selected by Chambers of Commerce, Agriculture and Labor, the other half to be appointed by the Emperor upon the nomination of the Bundesrath. The lower Chamber will be made up of members elected by universal suffrage of those twenty-five years old or over. Voters over thirty-five years of age will have two votes, and those over forty-five three votes. The ballot will be secret. With inauguration of the two Chambers the authority of the Bundesrath and the Reichstag will cease and home rule will prevail. In anticipation of the debate on the Constitution for Alsace-Lorraine in the Reichstag, public discussion has centred on the question of suffrage, owing to Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg's refusal to concede the principle of universal suffrage for Prussia.

The Beuron Address.—The memorable speech of Emperor William, on the occasion of his visit to the Benedictine monastery at Beuron, has caused an incredible outburst in the Liberal press of the Empire. Once again is it evident that their opposition to positive Christianity is so marked, that they would eagerly repress every sign of Christian life and thought given by their Emperor. The speech itself the press writers do not attack; there is not a sentiment in it, says the Kölnische Volkszeitung, which will not be indorsed by every sincere Catholic and Protestant. The critics find in it, however, a play of politics, which no one else can see, and though its whole tenor suggests nothing but a sympathetic plea for the fostering of religious influence in the land, the Liberals hail it as an open bid for the assistance of the Centre vote.

Danish West Indies.—The inhabitants of the Danish West Indies Islands, it is reported from Copenhagen, are renewing their former efforts to bring about a sale of the islands to the United States. An address has been received by the Home Government in which a strongly indorsed petition is presented to have negotiations looking to this end reopened. The Danish cabinet will probably not take any initiative in the matter. The Ministers express themselves as not exactly opposed to the sale, but they affirm that the Opposition might be able in Parliament to kill a measure favoring it, and they have no desire to have a party measure run the risk of rejection. It is said that Queen Louisa, who has shown a lively interest in the well-being of the islands, is unalterably opposed to any plan which will involve the loss of the islands to the home kingdom.

Belgium.—The Liberals promised themselves a triumph when the debate on the Address from the Throne would take place in the House. Much to their chagrin they revealed a good deal of dissension and division in their party, and their official journals are advising the leaders to put a gag on some of the speakers. —A former Governor of the Congo, M. Camille Janssen, admits that there were many abuses in the old methods of the colonial administration, but declares that if there are still many things to be corrected, the principles which now guide the government will soon remove every reproach.

Bohemia.—Emperor Francis Joseph personally intervened to bring about an understanding between the German and Czech parties. Recently he received the Czech leader, Adamek, and held a confidential conference with him concerning the disastrous results of the Compromise Committee's meeting in Prague chronicled some time since. The venerable ruler represented in moving terms the absolute need that the Bohemian Landtag be induced to hold its session in peace and harmony if Bohemia is to be preserved from a financial catastrophe. The united German members of the Landtag have voted to accept Minister von Bienenrath's invitation to assist at another compromise conference to be undertaken with a view to promote peace between the Czechs and themselves.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Incarnation and the World

Gazing recently from the rails of a steamer on the tranquil waters of the Gulf, a traveled and cultured non-Catholic, religious by instinct, but devoid of definite creed, remarked to his neighbor, a Catholic priest: "What a mystery it all is! The flying fish are pretty as they fly, but they dive to devour. 'Tis a picture of human life. In it there are many pretty things, but the strong prey on the weak and the weak are the majority. The strong even prey on one another and the result is misery and injustice all round. Where is the justice of God?"

"In Eternity," said the priest. "Man perpetrates or performs for a day; God has all eternity to make readjustment. Do you happen to know that this is Advent?" "Advent? I really don't know. What is it?"

The priest explained that it was a period assigned by the Church of preparation for the Coming of the Lord, for the physical manifestation to a few Judean shepherds, to a few truthseekers from the East that "the Word was made Flesh and dwelt amongst us." "There," he added, "is the answer to your question." This led to an explanation of the Incarnation—of which most non-Catholics are strangely ignorant—the one central religious dogma which has been for nineteen centuries and will never cease to be a question of the day.

"The sufferings of the flying fishes' victims," said the priest, "and of the victims of their victims are not claimed by scientists to be acute nor by anyone to be imputable, but man's cruelty to man is in another category. Man is endowed with free will and intelligence, and he chose, as he still too often chooses, to abuse his intelligence by doing injustice and wrong. But God loved him, the only creature of clay whose soul He had fashioned in His own image, and would save him from himself. He saw in their totality what you see in part, the miseries brought by sin on Adam and his seed; He knew them infinitely more than you and I, for His knowledge and love are uncircumscribed. Hence He repeatedly comforted His people from the day of their fall with the prophetic assurance of restoration and redemption, and in the fullness of time came among us the Christ Child, begotten of God's Love and a Virgin pure, assuming our flesh and in all things save sin becoming like unto us. Taking our nature upon Him and selecting the lowliest rank, where the stress of poverty and pressure of injustice most heavily fall, in His own Person and by His example He taught man how to possess his soul against might, attain righteousness amid wrong, from temporal injustice to snatch Justice Eternal and spring to glory from the footstool of shame."

The gentleman had many doubts and questions. Why did God give man free will or, giving it, permit him to abuse it? Why so long delay. His coming? Why did not His coming redress all grievances? Why do so many modern scholars question or deny the traditional story of the Incarnation. The priest replied subsequently as follows:

To all questions regarding the acts and decrees of an omniscient and omnipotent God, I will give you the only answer that man can give to the last why of anything: Because God willed it so. The finite cannot compass the Infinite. You cannot explain the flying fish; Darwin could only offer an unproved and unprovable, if not an exploded theory; why try to fathom creative Wisdom? Turn rather to the Incarnation, the supreme manifestation of His love, and you will gather that He who so loved man that He descended from infinite heights to be one with him and live his life will surely find a way in His omnipotence to redress all wrongs and remedy all ills.

The questioning of the Gospel Story of the Incarnation, as well as of every fact in Jesus' life that implied His Divinity, is not a Modernist invention. From the beginning Christ has been in all things, but most in His Incarnation "a sign to be contradicted." Admit the Apostolic dogma, that Jesus Christ, the only Son of the Eternal Father, is our Lord and our God, "conceived by the Holy Ghost and born of the Virgin Mary," the Divine authority of His teaching necessarily follows, and you admit into the affairs of life a Personal God to whom for every thought and word and deed you must hold yourself accountable.

This the pride of man could not brook. There are and always have been men whose motto is the rebel angel's: "I will not serve." These could afford to admire the character of Christ, the man; His wisdom, sympathy, magnanimity, self-sacrifice; but to recognize His Divinity, never. In the whole Christian era there has not been an heresiarch, a leader of schisms or other anti-religious revolt, who was not characteristically proud. However pronounced their other qualities, good or bad, pride was the dominant note. That which would set a law on mind and will they would not have, and the most logical of their number assailed and still assail the Divine Personality of the Child conceived in Virgin womb.

Now, as from the beginning, the Catholic Church teaches that Christ is true God and true man, physically uniting in one Divine Person two natures, human and Divine, with two natural wills and activities and all the actions and attributes of God and of man in perfect harmony. His dual nature, it holds, is clear from the prophetic descriptions of the Messiah in the Old Testament, especially in the Psalms and Sapiential Books, from the four Gospels, from the Acts and Epistles, notably St. Paul to the Romans, Galatians I, Corinthians I and II, and from Apostolic traditions. This explains many things in the Gospel; how, ordinarily Christ acted and always suffered as Man, but, when occasion demanded, as frequently happened in His public life, claimed and exercised the powers of the Godhead.

The assertion of this fundamental dogma, that from the moment of His Conception Christ was perfect God and perfect man, became at once the battle-ground of heresy, and has so remained. St. John wrote His Gospel to vindicate it, and the Fathers wrote to defend it against the heretics of their day. It was to condemn the Arian denial of the consubstantiality of the Son with the Father, and therefore of His Divinity, that the first General Council was summoned. The Gnostics, the Christian Scientists of the early centuries, the Manichean and kindred sectaries denied the human nature of Christ; the Nestorians, the physical union of the two natures; the Eutychians insisted on only one Nature and Person, the Monothelites on one Will; but all had the same tendency, to destroy the Divine Character of the Christ of the Gospels and lower Him to the common level of humanity. In four General Councils the Church He had founded and authorized vindicated His character and dignity; the Church was the next object of attack.

Take away its infallible authority to teach, interpret and define, and the character of Christ is again at the mercy of the Judases, the Pharisees, the Pilates and the mob. Hence the chief subsequent revolts were directly against the Church rather than its Founder, and the Vicar rather than the Master; but, whatever the conscious motive, Christ Himself, as the sequel proved, was the ultimate object of attack. The Protestant world having rejected the authority of the tribunal Christ established, proceeded by new methods to interpret away His Divinity and Mission. The early heretics, living close to Apostolic times, when Biblical language and facts were better understood and Apostolic traditions more familiar, accepted perforce the Bible narrative, but misinterpreted its meaning. Modern heretics, Strauss, Renan, Harnack and their kind, untrammelled by tradition or authority, took advantage of the change in environment to attack the inspiration and authenticity of Scripture and thus undermine the basis of belief. Scholarship and the vogue of arbitrary literary and historical criticism under the guise of scholarship; contemporary science or what passed for it; mental ingenuity and the pride of unbelief, were all pressed into service for the predetermined purpose of tearing the Bible to pieces and thus destroying the God-head of Him to whom it witnessed.

Modernism is only a modification of the older plans of attack, in as far as it combines the salient characteristics of all. Hollow and cloudy in its tenets, shifty and shallow in its hierophants, it is, in the graphic phrase of Pius X, "a congeries of all heresies." It has had a shorter and less vigorous life than its predecessors. Within the reign of the Pontiff, whose motto is "to restore all things in Christ that Christ may be all and in all," it has left the Catholic world as it found it, firm in the faith of Athanasius; "Jesus Christ is God of the substance of the Father, begotten before the world; is man of the substance of His Mother, born in the world; perfect God and perfect man, of rational soul and human flesh subsisting."

How does this bear on the miseries of men? It was to heal them that God's love devised the Incarnation of the Word, "for God so loved the world as to give His only begotten Son," and the Son so loved the world that He "emptied Himself taking the form of a servant, . . . humbled Himself becoming obedient unto death." He not only died for us; He lived our life, and from the moment of Conception went through the whole gamut of human wants and woes. "Being rich He became poor for our sakes that through His poverty we might be rich." Perfect man in physical weakness, as in strength, He realized as none other the nature of life's complex burden and felt in His own Person every pulse of humanity. Thirty years He chose of poverty, hardship, toil, and then went forth "doing good and healing all that were oppressed by the devil." Delighting "to be with the children of men," He so adopted their ways that He made their daily experiences the framework of His teaching. From His human experience, as well as Love Divine, sprang His call to humanity: "Come to me all ye that labor and are heavy burdened and I will refresh you." "All, sinners and sinless, enemies and friends, the oppressed of every race and nation," and for their sakes He exhausted the bitterness of pain and shame and death. Come to heal spiritual ills, He could not behold physical suffering without drawing on His omnipotence for relief; so that disease fled from His glance and, to dry a father's, a mother's, a sister's tears, death was changed into life.

A Man, He sympathized with man's material wants, but enjoined: "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His justice." Most of man's miseries, and these the worst, are, of his own making. Inverting the order of things he would have heaven upon earth, barter the spiritual for the material, and enjoy in time what is reserved for eternity. Reducing the error to a system, Materialists, Socialists, Hedonists would thrust future readjustment aside, expel God from their institutions, as in France and Portugal, and confine human happiness within the circle of temporal life. The scheme cannot satisfy, for the soul is spiritual and things material cannot appease its hunger.

Christ, knowing as God what alone can satisfy the nature He assumed, directed man's eyes to the larger life beyond the short span of time. Human suffering He willed not to destroy but to ennoble. He, the perfect Man, endured all from Crib to Cross, from womb to tomb, and then He rose in glory. The Incarnation found its complement in the Resurrection. He would teach us that sufferings are the trial practices of virtue; that only they who manfully endure them develop the spiritual prowess that wins the prize of blessedness, of freedom, of unpurchasable and inalienable riches. Blessed, He declared, not the mighty and wealthy and triumphant, but the poor in spirit, they who hunger and thirst after justice and suffer persecution for justice' sake; blessed the merciful, the meek, the peacemaker, the pure of heart: they shall obtain mercy and be filled with plenty, shall as children of God look into the His face and take possession of His Kingdom.

Not by hate and strife shall wrong be redressed: "Love your enemies; do good to those who hate you; pray for those who maltreat and slander you, that you may be the children of your heavenly Father." Christ exemplified this love not merely in His life and death; He would abide with those He loved forever. Exhausting His omnipotence by a miracle of love, He reproduces the Incarnation in mediation and atonement on our Altars and, enwombing His Divinity in our tabernacles, draws men's hearts and minds from the travails of time to the joys of His and our eternal Home, where "death shall be no more and time shall be no more, nor weeping nor sorrow shall be any more." There every reach of the mind shall be filled, every longing of the heart shall be sated, "for eye hath not seen nor ear heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive what things God hath prepared for those who love Him."

M. KENNY, S.J.

Mass in the Presbyterian Church

III.

IN NEWARK, NEW JERSEY.

In the city of Newark, this so-called Presbyterian mission for Ruthenians is at present held in the hall of a German Evangelical church on College Place. In its interior arrangements it strongly resembles the Hope Chapel. There is the same platform with a pulpit in the middle. The back of the platform here is filled with an organ, and against this organ the altar is built. In front of the platform and directly in front of the pulpit is the analogion with its two lighted candles and the crucifix in the centre. The altar here, built up on the platform, was clothed in white and had but six lighted candles on it, a cross and above it a picture of the crucifixion. Worshippers knelt in the aisles, crossed themselves repeatedly, came forward to the analogion and kissed the crucifix several times, knelt down again and crossed themselves.

Here again the celebrant, who was said to be Basil Pyndykowski, was vested in all the vestments of a Greek priest, and officiated on the altar with even more ceremonious gesture and form than his confrere in New York. The Little Entrance with the Gospels and the Great Entrance with the bread and wine were celebrated with particular pomp and ceremony. At the Little Entrance the celebrant preceded, and followed by a member of the congregation, each carrying a lighted candle, came out from the vestry into the body of the church bearing the Book of the Gospels. When he came in front of the analogion he blessed the congregation with the Gospels in the sign of the cross and then stood there to allow the members of this peculiar Presbyterian congregation to come up and kiss the figures of the evangelists on the volume. The Gospels were then carried in stately procession to the altar. Here the epistle was read from the choir loft, and afterwards the Gospels were brought from the altar to the pulpit and the Gospel of the day was intoned, while the sanctuary attendants stood around with lighted candles.

At the Great Entrance the celebrant again left the altar while the Cherubic Hymn was sung and, preceded and followed by candle bearers, came forth from the vestry bearing the chalice and paten containing the bread and wine, and having the aer or veil thrown over his left shoulder. When in front of the analogion he turned and faced the congregation, and with the chalice and paten he made the sign of the cross over the congregation, saying the usual prayers for the church authorities, with the omission of the Pope and Bishops. The vessels were then carried in state to the altar and the imitation Mass proceeded. At the Sviat (Sanctus) the bell was rung, and again at the consecration when it was rung three times at the intoning of the sacred words of each institution, the people all devoutly kneeling and crossing themselves.

It is not necessary to follow this imitation Mass of the Newark Presbyterian church in all its details, for it repeated everything which has been described concerning Hope Chapel. The response to the first antiphon was: "By the prayers of the Mother of God, O Saviour, save us!" That of the second antiphon was: "By the prayers of thy Saints, O Saviour, save us!" At the end of each of the three antiphons the celebrant intoned: "Commemorating our most holy, most pure, most blessed and glorious Lady, the Mother of God and ever Virgin Mary, with all the Saints, let us commend ourselves and one another and all our life to Christ our God." All through the imitation Mass the celebrant blessed the congregation using the sign of the cross, while the people repeatedly crossed themselves again and again. He elevated the chalice and paten as already described, and again intoned loudly: "Especially our all holy, all pure, most blessed and glorious Lady, the Mother of God and ever Virgin Mary," to which the choir sang the response: "Meet indeed it is to praise thee, Mother of God, ever blessed and immaculate Mother of our God. More honorable than the Cherubim and beyond compare more glorious than the Seraphim, thou who without stain barest God the Word, thee, verily the Mother of God, we magnify." This Bogorodichen (anthem of the Mother of God) was sung once again during the service, which is fully described in the statement about Hope Chapel. This imitation Mass was almost an exact counterpart of the Greek Catholic Mass, as any one could see by going to the Greek Catholic Church of St. John the Baptist upon Court Street, some four blocks away. At the conclusion of the Mass the members of the congregation went forward to the analogion, kissed the crucifix there, crossed themselves repeatedly and made a reverence to the altar as they left. Certainly, none of these doings here or in Hope Chapel could by any stretch of the imagination be called a Presbyterian form of worship.

About two years ago most of these Ruthenians belonged to the Court Street Greek Catholic Church, but they had a quarrel about the management of the church and its funds, and being defeated left in a body and undertook to set up a new church. Their disagreement did not arise out of theological or disciplinary differences, but solely from a quarrel about church management. Their difficulty, however, was to get a priest, for neither a Greek Catholic nor a Greek Orthodox priest could lawfully perform any sacred rites for them. Then they had recourse to another expedient, which shows their lamentable state of mind. Some five years ago a Russian monk, called Seraphim, was expelled from his monastery for misconduct. He went to Constantinople and the East, and while there claimed to have been consecrated a bishop. At any rate he procured a bishop's robes and all the insignia, according to the Greek rite, no matter whether he was entitled to them. I have in my possession a copy of a letter from the Russian Consul General in Constantinople, saying that he had never been consecrated by any prelate whatsoever in the East. At any rate Seraphim came to the United States, but no one, either Greek Orthodox or Greek Catholic would have anything to do with him. So he betook himself to Canada, and in Winnipeg and the surrounding country undertook to found an independent Greek church, having nothing to do with Rome, Constantinople or Moscow. He ordained to the priesthood several singers and choir masters (diaki) and made them full-fledged Greek priests; and even ordained almost illiterate immigrants for a consideration it is said. One of these church singers was a certain John Bodrug, who was thus made a Seraphimite Greek priest. This Ruthenian congregation in Newark called him as their pastor. The present pastor, Pyndykowski, his successor, and the former editor of the Ruthenian paper Ranok in Winnipeg, was also ordained the same way.

Bodrug when he became pastor sought out the Presbyterians, and in some way convinced them that he was a Presbyterian too, and got their support for his congregation. Dr. Lusk, of the Newark Presbytery, has been said to have received him with open arms. He received help from them in a suit between the real Greek Catholic church and the seceding congregation of which he was pastor. In the course of that suit an affidavit was made by Michael Baron on July 21, 1908, on behalf of the seceding congregation, in which he said: "the Rev. John Bodrug is a Greek Catholic priest," and John Bodrug, himself, in his own affidavit made July 30, 1908, in the same suit swears that "he recognizes seven sacraments of the church, and has used the Greek ritual in full, as the same is used by the Greek Catholic Church," and further down says, that "it is not true that he has ever stated that he was a Presbyterian." Bodrug and his side lost their case before the Vice-Chancellor.

Another case in which Bodrug was involved came up in the Newark District Court before Judge MacLear. Bodrug caused the arrest of a Greek Catholic for slander, in saying that Bodrug was not a priest. But many of Bodrug's own witnesses testified that they were Greek Catholics and went to the Collège Place services, because he had always represented himself as a Greek Catholic priest, and they believed that the Mass he celebrated there was a Catholic Mass. But Bodrug himself was obliged to admit that although he used the Greek ritual pretty much as before, yet he was acting in connection with the Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian church in New York City, and that really he was not a Greek Catholic priest. He again lost his case.

These are the people with whom the Presbyterian church is dealing in this missionary work, and these are the methods which are taken to attract the Ruthenians to them. They have gone even further. Just now the Missionary Board is engaged in building a $32,000 church for them, Sts. Peter and Paul, on Beacon Street, Newark. I have a picture of it before me in their paper, Sojuz, and it is decorated with the Ruthenian spires and each one is capped with the Slavonic three-armed cross. It is expected to be dedicated upon the feast-day of the Immaculate Conception (Neporochnie Zachatie) which falls according to the old style calendar on December 22, 1910. As a most remarkable thing, this Presbyterian Mission observes the feast-day of the Assumption, August (15)-28th, the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin, Exaltation of the Holy Cross, and all the feast days of the saints.

In connection with this reaching out for foreign immigrants by the Presbyterian church we may note the fact that the Fourth Presbyterian church, at the corner of Fourth Avenue and Twenty-second Street, died almost from lack of a congregation. The land, however, was sold for $660,000, and a business house now occupies the place, while the handful of church members worships in the United Charities building. They have recently decided to come up town near Columbia University, but the voting for the new site revealed a church voting membership of only ninety-six persons. It seems, therefore, that with so little membership and so much money, the Presbyterian denomination might well confine its efforts for the spread of its membership to those who have fallen away, and to those of Protestant indifference who need its ministrations badly, rather than to poor immigrants of the Catholic and Orthodox churches by playing upon their beliefs and practices through the medium of pretended priests and pretended celebrations of the Mass. Here is a real idolatry for zealous Calvinists to thunder against, a deliberate proposing of mere bread and wine for divine worship.

ANDREW J. SHIPMAN.

The Growth of Materialism in England

When the enemy of mankind sowed religious dissension in the fair fields of God, as a result of his evil cunning, the good seed was like to die in human hearts, and upon the souls of men there fell the darkness of unbelief. Out of which spiritual gloom, there rose up the spirit of Materialism, whose influence is now making itself felt in every walk of life. Rich and poor are suffering alike from the effects of the new order, as may be seen in the growing indifference of the people regarding the things that matter.

"O that thou hadst hearkened to my Commandments," cried the Prophet, who perchance saw as in a vision the social and moral problems of to-day—"thy peace had been as a river, and thy justice as the waves of the sea." But wise men are generally at a discount: even the prophets have spoken in the wind. And to-day no one has time to give heed. Each man is busy with his material concerns.

In the underworld of labor, where the teeming millions live, the struggle to live is so fierce as to exclude all else. The claims of the material absorb their whole being. The majority of the toilers have no ideals. Many have no belief in a future state. Some have never heard of a God. When their hour comes they creep into their lairs, like the beasts of the field, and, with a curse on their lips, they pass out to judgment. Doubtless some among them may have sinned against the light. But of the rest, who shall speak? Verily they have lived and died in the darkness where false gods beckon.

Led on by these lying spirits, the inhabitants of this underworld have been induced to forsake the straight and narrow way of belief for the trackless waste of Rationalism. And in this wilderness they wander hither and thither throughout the long night of their earthly pilgrimage. They are without knowledge and destitute of hope.

"Sufficit tibi sounds well," says a modern writer, but music will not heal the wounds of the soul: Sufficit tibi gratia mea sounds equally well, and it is the sovereign salve for broken or despairing humanity. To those who know the conditions of life in poor quarters, the decline of religion is to be attributed in part to the spirit of the age which is prejudicial to the interests of the supernatural, but in even greater measure to the social and economic disabilities which fetter the many in all our great cities.

In the present day it is an acknowledged fact that the conditions of industrial life and labor are not only un-Christian but inhuman: the sweating system is sapping the life blood of the masses just as surely as the housing system is undermining their morality, with the result that even those who believe, can hardly withstand the strain thus imposed upon them.

That there are in these quarters, vast numbers of our Catholic poor, whose lives are an example of Christian virtue is a significant testimony to the power of Divine Grace. There are others alas! and these not a few, who are of frailer build and it is these broken ones who constitute that section of our poor commonly called the leakage which the Catholic Church in England mourns so far in vain. And if this instability be experienced among those who are strengthened by a faith in the Promises, what must be the difficulty among those who know not God?

Leo XIII had a clear conception of this when he wrote, "Those people are much mistaken who say the social question is economic only, in the sense of a money question. On the contrary, it is primarily moral and religious, and there to be met by moral and religious forces." For in truth the slum tenement is nowadays no school for saints; and to preach a standard of ethics to a people whose physical and moral environment renders it impossible of attainment is neither reasonable nor just.

Housed in dens that are a blot upon a Christian state; herded together in over-crowded areas which are a menace alike to body and soul, what wonder is it that the ten Commandments are in danger of becoming obsolete? To see these stricken ones huddled up in their rags; to know that they are not only cold but starving; to realize that they are constrained to labor for such a pittance as to render a self-respecting life impracticable—in view of these things it is inevitable that there should be a general slackening of the cords of self restraint: the effects of which are chronicled in the unedifying news of the daily press.

But though these facts do not surprise the sociological student who is acquainted with the life of the submerged, and though the British public reads unmoved the criminal happenings in our midst, the gravity of the position is such as to excite serious comment from those beyond our borders.

Thus a London weekly writes: "The increase of crime in London has alarmed the United States Department of Commerce and Labor, which has published a statement on the subject. 'London,' says the report of the department, 'is paying the penalty paid by all large cities. Crime is inside her gates. In round numbers she has to pay nearly £1,600,000 to keep criminals in check, for that is the sum paid to her police, courts, prisons and prosecuting officers.'"

Those statistics are interesting. They testify that the decline of religion has projected its shadow where few would have looked for it, namely, in the coffers of the National Exchequer. So that, viewed from the standpoint of mere national expediency, the cult of the Material may prove not only a moral but an increasing financial burden to the statesmen of to-morrow.

However reluctantly it be admitted, the truth must nevertheless be stated, that in this, our day, a vast number of our fellow men and women have practically repudiated God. So much indeed is this the case, that it seems a blinking at facts to speak any longer of England as a Christian country. Taking them all round, it is open to question whether one-twentieth or even one-fiftieth of the denizens of our cities is not covertly pagan. Possibly the percentage is higher, since many still retain the name of believers while they have ceased to practise any form of religion. Nor is this all. For while the decline of religion is so marked a feature in the life of the English masses, it is unfortunately not confined to the poorer population. The cult of the Material would seem to be equally practised among the upper ranks of society.

Addressing a conference of clergy and church workers at Blandford (I quote from a London daily paper), the Bishop of Salisbury said the growth of divorces and suicides, the trying controversy with regard to the education question and many other things, had made people anxious of the country, not to speak of the Church. There had been revealed, he continued, the terrible and painful fact that a great many people were giving up public worship, and that a large proportion of the people of England paid little attention to religion at all.

The above is a moderate estimate; the fact being patent to all that Materialism is stalking in the land, and following in her wake is a multitude whom no man may count. That the generation of to-morrow will go to swell these ranks is not only possible but all too probable, for what Cardinal Manning said of his own day, applies with even greater force to ours. Speaking of the threatened un denominational teaching in the elementary schools of England he wrote: "Satan knows well that if he can separate religion from instruction, he has cut through the roots of the Christian civilization of the world. For that reason all the art, all the wiles, all the frauds, all the false politics of this day, are directed to what is called secular education, national education, imperial education—anything you like, only not Christian education."

But apart from this very real danger of the future, it is a matter of common knowledge that rationalistic tenets are to-day taught and held by all sections of society, each day bringing its quota of proof in the lowered standard of our social life. With the decline of religion, corruption has set in. And as the excesses of Imperial Rome hastened the downfall of a mighty power, the same causes now threaten to undermine the foundations of an empire more vast than Cæsar's.

As an interesting side-light on the cult of the Material which is now so widespread among us, let me quote in passing, an opinion expressed by a man about town. This man was without religious bias. He was a free-thinker. He had traveled widely and in his wanderings East and West, had had considerable opportunities for studying life in many queer corners. Besides this, he knew his London, and he belonged to more than one London club. And after discussing the comparative morality of modern countries and peoples, he stated his conviction that London was, of all cities, the most wicked.

Do you mean that literally? I asked. He paused, then with greater deliberation, he repeated the statement. "For it is my firm belief," he said, "that not even Sodom and Gomorrah rolled into one, could equal the iniquity of modern London."

As to the accuracy of this statement, the more wise must judge. As for me, "my tongue is the pen of a scrivener that writeth quickly."

But taking a comprehensive view of the present-day position in England, it is evident that religion is fast losing its hold on the popular mind. In the cities the churches are crumbling; in the country districts, the chapels and other religious conventicles are being emptied of worshippers. Their power of appeal is either dying or dead. Practically every house of worship is feeling the action of the encroaching waves—of the fret and stress of those new ideas which assort not with revelation and which spurn the claims of the supernatural. Soon there will be no church left standing save that which was built upon the Rock and against which the waves of unbelief have beaten in vain for nigh two thousand years: which Christ—backed by the promise of God—is destined to outlive all error and all time.

Perhaps it was a slowly dawning realization of this truth which, in the evening of life, was borne in upon the Sage of Chelsea, for we read of Carlyle that "in his extreme old age and when every vestige of religious credence had left him," admitted to his biographer Froude, "that the Mass was the only relic of religious faith now left in the world."

That the cult of the material is not peculiar to any one state or country, and that England is not an isolated example, is indicated by the first encyclical of Pius X wherein he deplores that the nations are forsaking the God of their fathers and are falling away into rationalism and unbelief. Thus he writes: "For who does not know that now more than in all ages past, the society of men is stricken by a most grave and deep disease which is growing daily graver and eating it utterly away, hurries it on to its ruin?"

Therefore, the matter being urgent he impresses upon all Christian rulers "that the divers orders of the state must be brought back by Christian laws and customs. For assuredly, says the Supreme Pontiff, if in the cities, if in all the villages, the Commandments of God were faithfully kept, if holy things were held in honor, if the use of the Sacraments were frequent. . . . there would be very little more to be done, in order to re-establish all things in Christ."

M. QUINLAN.

—••—

The joint assembly of the legislative chamber of Switzerland has elected Marc Emile Ruchet President of the Swiss Federation for the year 1911, in succession to Robert Comtesse, who is completing the one year term in that office sanctioned by the Swiss Constitution. Louis Forrer was at the same time chosen Vice-President. Ruchet is now filling the post of Vice-President and Minister of Home Affairs in the government of the Federation. Forrer has already served a term as President, having filled that office in 1906.

CORRESPONDENCE

Prosperous Mexico

MEXICO CITY, DECEMBER 2, 1910.

The eighth of December of this year marks the beginning of a new era of prosperity for the Republic of Mexico. On this day President Porfirio Diaz took the oath of his high office for the eighth time, and the better elements of Mexican society congratulate themselves that the old general is still able to be at the head of the government, and to devote all his energies to the development of his country. The fact that Diaz is once more President of Mexico is a guaranty to all those who have interests in this country; it means that peace will continue even as during the last thirty years, and that every foreigner who wishes to cooperate either with his money or his talents to the prosperity of Mexico shall receive a hearty welcome from the man whose chief policy has been to promote and encourage by all fair means the investments of foreign capital in this country.

The firm step and pleasant smile of Gen. Diaz showed that he was in the best of health; and the cheering of the people as he passed by is a proof that he is yet the idol of his country. After he took the oath of office the president returned to the National Palace, there to receive the congratulations of the diplomatic body, the army and the people. The words of the Hon. Henry Lane Wilson, the American Ambassador, are a valuable recognition of the work of Gen. Diaz, and show the confidence which foreign governments place in the present administration.

"The marvelous development of Mexico," said Mr. Wilson, "during the successive administrations to which your excellency has been called by the mandate of the suffrages of your fellow citizens; the moral and material progress which has been achieved, the firm position of the public credit, and the faith felt by the nations and rulers of the world in the stability and responsibility of this government are matters of common history, which, however well known, may be repeated with profit upon this occasion which is so profoundly significant for the future of the republic."

It is to be remarked that this happy event was in no way marred by the petty disturbances which have occurred in some parts of this country during the last few weeks. False accounts of this disturbance have been sent abroad by the few partisans of a certain very wealthy man by the name of Madero, and the yellow press has not been slow to make the most absurd commentaries on them. But these disturbances were far from being as reported. Americans and all foreigners who have interests in this country must be very cautious in crediting such reports, the sole purpose of which is to unsettle the minds of foreign investors and to breed discord where greater confidence than ever should be felt.

No thinking person will ever give a second thought to this Madero and his plans. It is enough to study his personality, and the means by which he tried to subvert the present prosperous and happy condition of Mexico, to be convinced that he belongs to that school of petty and ambitious mischief makers who are the cause of the continual civil strifes which clog the progress of the Central American Republics.

The partisans of Madero (happily few in number and of no influence) go to the United States, and there clamor against what they, and they only, call the tyranny of General Diaz, and of the large party which supports his Government. They bribe the yellow journals of the United States, and therein write articles like the "Barbarous Mexico" series, which are nothing but libels on their native land. These men who by such means seek the sympathy of the American people, are the very ones who incite the Mexican populace to insult peaceful American citizens in the streets of Mexico, because a motley mob recently burned a Mexican in Texas, and seek thus to foment international discord. To bring about the discredit of the Diaz administration, even at the expense of their country's honor, is the chief aim of Madero and his henchmen. As for Madero himself, what has he done to entitle him to occupy the high position to which he aspires? Surely no thinking person would like to see such a man take the place of the Maker of Modern Mexico.

The work of General Diaz has been often studied; but that work cannot be understood fully till one considers the state of this country previous to his time. The treasury was in a state of bankruptcy; the few railroads and the insignificant telegraphic lines which then existed, were constantly destroyed by bandits and revolutionists; the lives and property of foreigners as well as of Mexicans were in constant danger; national credit did not exist; the lack of discipline in the army was notorious. Troops sent in 1847 to fight the enemies of their country pointed their rifles not at the lines of the enemy, but at those of their countrymen who supported the established government. From this chaotic state of affairs Diaz made the Mexico of to-day in the short interval of thirty years. A few figures will speak more eloquently than anything I may say:

Revenue of the Federation in 1884-85, $30,660,434; in 1908-1909, $98,775,510.

Treasury Reserves in 1884-85, none; in 1908-1909, $76,022,511.

Imports, 1884-85, $23,786,684 (gold); in 1909-1910, $194,857,547 (silver).

Exports 1884-85, $46,670,845 (silver); in 1909-1910, $260,056,228 (silver).

Railways 1877, 383 miles; in 1910, 15,260 miles.

Telegraph lines 1877-78, 4,437 miles; in 1910, 31,069 miles.

Capital of chartered banks 1897, $41,050,000; in 1910, $176,609,000.

Production of gold 1884-85, $1,804,668; in 1908-1909, $44,881,620.

Production of silver 1884-85, $33,226,211; in 1908-1909, $77,076,097.

Units of mail matter handled 1897-1898, 112,840,890; in 1908-1909, 202,000,000.

The state of the finances of Mexico was well summed up by Sir Edward Grey the English Secretary of Foreign Relations, in a speech delivered in the name of the King, at a banquet in London, recently, in honor of the Honorable José Yves Limantour, Secretary of the Treasury of Mexico. "In regard to the finances of Mexico of to-day," he declared, "it was sufficient to state that the deficits of the past have become superavits, and from these surpluses have come the reserve funds which have made possible the numerous public works constantly inaugurated, and the material betterment and welfare of the nation in general." These words pronounced by so high an authority, and at a moment when yellow journals flared lurid headlines about the "Revolution" of last month, are the best proof that the credit of Mexico is still unimpaired, and that great foreign Governments have faith in the present administration.

I do not believe in indispensable men. Should the worst happen, Mexico will still be there. But if General Diaz can still ably head the Government, and if the large majority of the Mexican people, and of all the foreigners who have made their home with us wish him to be there, it is not only an act of patriotism but of the highest justice to support his Government and let him finish the great work which he has so far so successfully carried out.

It is ridiculously false to say that the president is no longer popular. Those who saw him ride from the "Monument of Independence" down to the National Palace, on the 16th of September last, and heard the spontaneous cheering which greeted him on all sides know otherwise. But this last attempt at insurgency on the part of Madero, and his demented followers, is the strongest proof of the president's popularity, for the legislatures of all the States, large crowds of people, labor societies, and commercial bodies, have offered themselves to support the president instead of joining hands with Madero. That the president is keenly alive to the importance of having with him the great commercial and industrial associations, is well shown by his answer to Mr. Manuel Buch upon the latter's congratulations to the Chief Executive in the name of a large group of prominent merchants of Mexico City. "The class which unites capital and honest effort to patriotism," said the president, "is the class which should lift its voice loudest against the forces of Anarchy and Socialism which are the unrelenting enemies of national peace and progress. The voice of true citizenship is the voice of justice, and is the voice which should calm evil passions and stay the advance of brigandage."

This attempt of Madero has not been without good fruits. The "Revolution" has given us the opportunity to see the loyalty and efficiency of the army. The trouble makers were obliged to pry open two prisons in the small towns they captured in order to swell with criminals their meagre ranks. The people remained alien to sedition. This means that the Mexicans are a peace loving people. It also means that after Diaz there shall be "no deluge," but the continuation of the grand era of peace and prosperity which he established thirty years ago. This great country of a million square miles, and millions of people well impelled towards civilization and prosperity shall not turn back.

BENJAMIN MOLINA CIREROL, A.B.

The Devil and the Peasant

There is a story current among the Syrian peasants that one of them went into partnership with the devil to cultivate the soil. The first crop was potatoes, and the devil got the stalks. They then tried wheat and the peasant took the ears. The angry devil then went to the peasant's hut to beat him with an ox-goad; but the place was too small for the goad, and the peasant prodded his foe with a pitch fork. Exchanging weapons they went outside to continue the fight, and there the ox-goad kept the devil at a distance.

This is their favorite illustration of their national cleverness. They can always get out of a fix, be it with the government or their enemies. Their ignorance is astounding, but not more so than their astuteness, in (more or less honestly) baffling an adversary. The Arabians have a proverb: "Don't seek the friendship of a peasant. If you don't rule him, he'll rule you." And it's true of the Syrian countryfolk; to do anything with them at all you must simply hold them tightly in your grip.

How the poor old Sultan Abdul Hamid was abused and sworn at! But he was the least of the tyrants in this unfortunate country. Each village has its Abdul, one who has got the upper hand, and makes it felt: who sows dissension, bribes openly, even terrorizes his neighbors to gain his ends. Take the system of tithes, for instance. Here is where they especially show their shrewdness. In this country the taxes are farmed out, and in my opinion this is the most widespread cause of ruin and disaster in the whole Ottoman Empire. The income from the crops of each village is, say, 10,000 piastres. The government puts the taxes on this at auction, and give the task of collecting them to the highest bidder. The latter must then give the government a proof of solvency, either by handing over some of his land-titles, or in any other way so as to make up for the 10,000 piastres, plus the extra figure he bids, say, 500 piastres. Then he takes the place of the government, which lends him help and protection, even sending police if called for. Now, right here is the radical viciousness of the system, for of course the tax-collector will, by hook or crook, extort as much above the regular sum as he possibly can. The surplus goes to his own pocket. He is thus in a position to get rich quickly, having even the arm of the law on his side. He will not scruple to gain three or four thousand piastres in a single village. Thus, the ordinary tax on the income of the harvest would be 12½ per cent. He makes it 14, 15 or even 20, if he can.

If the villagers would only resist this tyranny by joining forces, and flatly refuse to pay more than the regular tax they would escape the evil. But, alas, such things rarely happen here. If there is one trait more characteristic than another of this country it is the fatal dissension and strife that reign everywhere, even in the family. This is why the country is ruined and a prey to Turkish exactions. The government never steps in, except when called in by a formal accusation of one native against another. And the result is that where there is the greatest enmity there is also the greatest poverty.

To come back to our subject. If by any chance it should happen that the villagers unite to refuse to pay more than their 12 per cent. the contractor starts in to sow dissension. He begins with the sheik or another of the most influential citizens, and offers him a certain percentage if he gives his help. The man thus tempted rarely refuses and the contractor then has smooth running. Pressure is thus brought to bear on all by this accomplice, who knows just how much each one is worth, and together they squeeze out what they want. If a villager refuses, a false accusation is trumped up, the government steps in (there are, by the way, as many false, absolutely unjust lawsuits here as just ones), and after that all is easy—the wretches get what they call for.

This is the general tax-system. The government is not a cent richer because of it, for it gets only the price bid by the highest bidder and nothing more. It is the tax-collector who gets all, swooping down on a village as he does, like some hideous bird of prey. But don't think that these men are always strangers to the country; often they are the men of the village itself, for they are in a better position than any to know just what each one can or cannot give.

This system obtains throughout the whole country. But if the peasants only remained united they could make life so miserable for these tax-farmers that they would never come back again. They do so occasionally and here is how they go about it. All the grain is taken into one immense barn, and measured; this is to calculate the tax. It takes more than one day, and during the first night all conspire to get away with a goodly portion of the grain thus gathered. Hence the tax-farmer loses heavily. In many cases, the parish-priests have even encouraged such action, and perhaps some moralists would not blame them. It is a case of legitimate defense. But the moral effects of the whole thing are lamentable; it encourages all sorts of violence, and develops that spirit of lying and trickery so noticeable in the land. Somebody once said that they can even do more than beat the devil, for have they not outwitted a tax-farmer?

In the same way they beat the government out of the military service it demands of them, in virtue of the new Ottoman constitution, which now enrolls men without distinction of religion. The Greeks and Armenians have gladly acquiesced in the new ruling and indeed have openly volunteered. But with the Syrian Christians it was different. They protested vigorously: nothing could make them obey. The Government, however, was in earnest, and sent out recruiting sergeants to all the villages; and that was where their troubles began. The only thing they had to go by was the baptismal register, and in hundreds of cases that did not even exist! Then they fell back on the citizenship papers of each Christian. Here again they were baffled. This is the way it happens. Every male Christian is taxed, so as to make up for the tax of blood demanded of Mussulmans.

The ordinary system for this is to take the number of boys born in a year, divide the sum total of the resultant tax by the number of the inhabitants and tax each one equally. Now it is clear that the fewer the children, the smaller will be the tax, and naturally this course was followed. The child was not declared until it was absolutely necessary, e.g., on change of residence, etc. Hence men of forty, if down at all, were down as being only twenty or twenty-five years of age. The Christians were not blind to all the difficulties of the situation. According to the new law all ministers of religion were exempt, and it had not been promulgated a week when, in one instance, 200 children of from thirteen to fifteen years of age trooped off to a neighboring monastery. All but four were, however, on examination, sent away. Then another expedient was thought of. The law exempts all who have married an orphan girl of another district who cannot support herself. For a while poor orphans of other districts were at a premium. But after all, the best means of escape was America.

This shows more than anything else how much in earnest they were to escape the army, for in a few months every single young man who was eligible for the army emigrated to America. Then, when the recruiting commission came and called for those of legal age, they were shown men of thirty or forty, or an elder brother beyond the age or were told the person sought was in America. To back all this up they brought a mob of witnesses who all cheerfully swore in the way desired. Many a time I told them such conduct was unworthy of Christians. They laughed at me. Everything is lawful in their eyes, provided it gets them out of a fix. Out of 300 young men in the districts south of the district of Bekaa, not one-tenth served, and of these not one Christian.

Besides, the Mussulmans take it ill to see Christians put on an equal footing with themselves and they would rather prolong their time of service than see their place taken by a Christian. The solution of the problem will be to make the Christians buy themselves off instead of serving.

Now you see that the story that I told in the beginning is an only too true picture of the reality, and that these poor peasants balk at nothing to get themselves out of trouble. That state of affairs will last as long as there is not a regular civil service in the hands of intelligent and honest officials.

J. J. HAVA.

Germany's Foreign Colonization

The public proceedings of the third German Colonial Congress, which met in Berlin early in October, furnish new and convincing evidence that Christian missionaries are to-day, as in earlier years, the most reliable authorities regarding existent conditions in the colonies. The papers read by missionaries during the Congress, and their extremely pertinent suggestions during the discussions marked them as men of practical experience and keen appreciation of the difficulties facing Europeans in their efforts at foreign colonization. The colonies owe a debt of gratitude to these untiring workers, who so ably exposed their interests; and the government officials recognize the advisability of furthering to the utmost the suggestions the missionaries advanced. Never before, perhaps, in Germany, has the worth of Christian missionaries, indefatigably toiling in the forefront of progressive civilization and unweariedly as well as unselfishly interesting themselves in the promotion of the welfare of their people, been acknowledged as it has been in the course of the past year. Happily is this so, for the poor natives of our colonies. A harmonious cooperation of the government's agents with the missionaries assures the Christian character of the great work Germany is striving to encourage in its development of foreign colonies, and without such a character the reward of its labors in the interests of the natives would be scarcely worth the tremendous price it is paying for this colonial expansion. The proceedings of the Congress this year were followed with widespread interest, a proof that Germany's new imperial policy of foreign expansion is taking a strong hold of the people. The reports presented give assurance that the foundations have been well laid and that hereafter we may look for a progress that will entirely satisfy our national pride. One feature of the meeting was extremely gratifying. In previous conventions of the Colonial Congress men's minds seemed to be divided between the rash enthusiasm of one section of the delegates and the timid, hesitant policy of another. This year neither extreme appeared to have place, the delegates set about their work in a dispassionate, eminently practical way, and made clear to all that a keen sense of assured policy had come to rule. They showed they knew the established purpose of imperial colonization had met with marked initial success, for the future there was need merely of prudent building on the sturdy foundations already laid.

S. G.

Word comes from Germany that the Government has laid before the Reichstag for approval an amendment to the existing patent laws of the empire, which will have widespread consequences. Alleviating a necessary protection of German industries as motive of the change proposed, the Government authorizes the annulment after a period of three years, of patents issued to foreigners, which cover articles entirely or chiefly manufactured outside of Germany and its colonies.

A M E R I C A

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1910.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1910, and published weekly by The America Press, New York, President, THOMAS J. CAMPBELL; Secretary, MICHAEL J. O'CONNOR; Treasurer, J. J. WILLIAMS.

SUBSCRIPTIONS. POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:

THE AMERICA PRESS, 32 Washington Sq., W., New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

Greeting

To-day AMERICA sends its most heartfelt Christmas greetings to its friends, all the world over; not as a conventional and perfunctory message, but as a profoundly earnest and grateful response to the multiplied manifestations of kindness, encouragement and even of affectionate solicitude that have made of the year now drawing to a close, almost a perpetual Christmas for those who have been charged with its success as a Catholic Review.

Independently of the recurrence of the festival, the Catholic journalist hears ever ringing in his ears, the far-away echo of the hymn on the hills of Bethlehem: "Glory be to God in the Highest and Peace on Earth to Men of Good Will." The plenitude of that glory is in the Incarnate Word, the knowledge and love of Whom can alone bring peace to men. For it is written that "the nations shall walk in His light and kings in the brightness of His rising."

To endeavor to promote that glory and to extend that peace is not only a privilege but a continual recompense for those who directly or indirectly cooperate in the Apostolate of the Press. It is a preparation for that other Christmas when the echoes shall cease and the song itself shall be heard no longer in the sudden light that shone around the earthly Bethlehem, but in the infinite splendor of the eternal hills. That the meaning of those celestial harmonies may be grasped and that the Light from the Throne of the Word may be seen by all mankind is the wish of AMERICA to-day.

An Eloquent Voice from Portugal

The pamphlet printed by the Portuguese Provincial denouncing the new Republic for expelling the Jesuits from their native land, has produced a profound sensation in Europe. It is of great value as a historical document.

After a pathetic introduction, every word of which comes from a heart overburdened with its sorrow, the writer says: "In a century which boasts of its freedom, and is continually invoking the principles of equality for all alike, three hundred men and more, all citizens of the country and living in twenty different houses in Portuguese European and Colonial Possessions, have been driven out of Portuguese territory without being convicted of a single offense, without being afforded the opportunity of saying a single word in their own behalf, without being given the chance to carry away with them any thing but the clothes on their backs. Their notes, their manuscripts, their books which are the fruit of long years of labor and research are all lost.

"In the name of liberty they have been robbed of scientific collections of incalculable value, of museums of natural history, of physical cabinets, and laboratories in the colleges of Campolide and S. Fiel, which had been created by fifty years of unremitting and disinterested economy and toil. All those possessions belong to us and to no one else."

He gives us some valuable and at the same time some very startling information about the experiences of the Jesuit prisoners in the artillery barracks.

"During the night, the guards threatened to shoot any one who would attempt to rise from his miserable couch. They even went so far as to introduce into the guard-room a number of abandoned women who, poor wretches, withdrew of their own accord, overwhelmed with shame in the presence of the austere virtue and dignified bearing of the prisoners."

When the sentence of exile was pronounced the executioners demanded that these penniless men should pay their own way out of the country. When their inability to do so was represented to one of the officers, he answered: "Well! wait here till you rot, and then some one will furnish money enough to get rid of you."

Friends outside the jail heard of it, and the needed help was furnished, but before they were put out they were all subjected to the Bertillon system of measurement usually applied to criminals, and thus, venerable old men, men eminent for their learning at home and abroad, priests admired for their many virtues, and young men on whom the shadow of evil had never rested were compelled to submit to the degrading process. All the indications were photographed, then and there, as is usually done with the outcasts of society, and were reproduced in the papers with the names of the victims affixed.

"And yet," the indignant writer continues, "what have these alleged criminals done?" He then enumerates the six charges against them. 1st. Their concealed weapons and subterranean passages. 2d. Their wealth and their capture of inheritance. 3d. Their inveigling subjects into the Order. 4th. Their secret organization. 5th. Their hatred of the Republic. 6th. Their reactionary influence. He then proceeds to demolish those charges one by one. Needless to say, he does it most effectually.

He closes his presentation of the case in touching words of thanks to friends and benefactors. He forgives the executioners of himself and his brethren; and expresses the wish that Portugal may prosper, and return to proper sentiments of peace and justice.

Edward Douglass White

The appointment of Edward Douglass White as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court came to the people of the United States as a distinct surprise. The distinguished jurist was not only a Democrat, a Southerner and an ex-Confederate officer, but above all he was a staunch Catholic. Any one of these objections following the usual method of appointment would, it was felt, have debarred a candidate for so exalted a position from serious consideration. In the present instance no higher testimony could be given to the eminent fitness of the man for the place than that all these objections should be swept aside, and that, too, by a President himself profoundly learned in the law and most competent to judge of the qualifications for the position, a President, moreover, who had he not been honored by the nation with the office of the Presidency would be the most prominent candidate of his party for the exalted dignity which he has now conferred on Justice White. That the nomination was promptly confirmed by the Senate without reference to a committee may have been due in part to the courtesy usually extended to a former member of that body, but it is well known that the President had taken the Senators into his confidence and that he was well assured beforehand of their unanimous and hearty endorsement.

Catholics could almost afford to be silent in this instance of highest recognition of a member of their Faith, as their satisfaction and approbation would be taken for granted, were it not that gratitude compels them to join in the universal tribute of admiration felt by them, more, perhaps, than by their fellow citizens of other religious beliefs for the noble and disinterested action of William Howard Taft. True there was the precedent of another exemplary Catholic Chief Justice of the United States, the distinguished though much maligned Roger B. Taney, of Maryland, whose valuable services to his country not even the unfortunate Dred Scott decision can deprive of a foremost rank among former Chief Justices, though his dust lies to-day in an unhonored grave at Frederick, Md. But the appointment of Taney was made by Andrew Jackson, a fellow Southerner, and took place at a period too remote to have had any influence on the nomination of another member of the same religious faith.

If there was any hesitancy in naming a Catholic on the part of the President, the example of Gladstone, the grand old man, who in a Protestant nation made the Irish Catholic, the late Charles Lord Russell, of Killowen, Chief Justice of England, may have afforded him a suggestive parallel. If Gladstone could ignore the prejudices and traditions of three centuries and a half in Protestant England, why should a President be less free in democratic America? Whatever may have been the pros and cons which presented themselves while he was deliberating on the choice, the President has displayed the courage of his convictions; he has risen above party, above sectional feeling, above religious bias, and in so doing has set an example of disinterestedness worthy of closest imitation by every citizen of the Republic.

Nor is it possible to overlook the universal acclaim with which the appointment has been received by press and people. "In the selection of a new Chief Justice," says the New York Sun, "Mr. Taft has well met his highest duty and his greatest responsibility. In the selection of Edward Douglass White he has conferred a richly deserved honor upon one of the greatest Justices that the Supreme Court has had in all its notable history. "Among lawyers," says the Baltimore Sun, "Chief Justice White is regarded as the ablest jurist on the bench and his opinions have always been worthy of the best traditions of the high court over which he presides. He is a man absolutely free from political bias. He was against the Government in the Northern Securities Case and with it in the income tax cases." And the Sun adds, "he has always shown himself a sound lawyer and the open-minded judge with a strong common-sense grasp for things practical."

"Even judges grow, and the mellowing and ripening processes of sixteen years' experience have made Justice White the logical Chief Justice. Questions of unusual moment will come before the Supreme Court in the next few years, and there are those who believe that the court itself, in a large sense, is passing through a crisis which is to determine now as never before what part it is to play in the development of constitutional government in this country, and we believe that it is fortunate to have at its head a man of the recognized balance and courage and vision of Justice White."

An Apologist for Modern Italy

William R. Thayer, who appears to be a Harvard historian, writes pompously in the December North American Review on Modern Italy. He professes to give what he calls the clue to it, that is, he tells his readers what Catholics have known and asserted for years, that it is the work of the secret societies. But he does more; he revamps the fable, so often exploded, that modern Italy was the work of heroes, accomplished in the face of great odds.

Mr. Thayer finds three foes of Italian unity; difference of race in its peoples, physical barriers in the country and the Pope. One would have thought the first and second quite sufficient to explain the existence of independent states in the peninsula until the Revolution gave the order for their union. Less than they separate Norway from Sweden and divide the Balkan States, and Mr. Thayer has read Italian history very cursorily if he thinks that Florence and Milan and Genoa and Venice and Naples needed any one to hold them apart. The Pope could not be an enemy of an idea actually non-existent. He took Italy as he found it; and, like every other prince of the peninsula, objected to see any power, domestic or foreign, attempting to dominate.

But the Pope called foreigners into Italy to support him. He did only what the other Italian states did, what small states must do almost necessarily. Milan called in the French; the Medici in Florence invited them thither. Indeed A. H. Johnson, an historian of greater name than Mr. Thayer, excuses Ludovico Sforza on these grounds (Europe in XVI Century, p.16). Mr. Thayer's animus in the matter is evident when he is seen reproaching the Pope for calling in Pepin against the Lombards!

The spiritual authority of the Roman Pontiff is not a consequence of the temporal power. Only the merest sciolists could suggest such a notion. How such succeed in imposing themselves on people is a question the answer to which is humiliating to human pride.

Mexican Misgivings

In spite of many official and officious expressions of friendship between the United States and Mexico, we must necessarily admit that there is between the two nations a certain amount of mutual distrust which no number of after-dinner speeches can wholly allay. Leaving aside temperamental differences, which are by no means inconsiderable, there still remain in the recollection of Mexicans old wounds which have never really healed over. In the first place, over five-sixths of the signers of the Declaration of the Independence of Texas had been citizens of the United States; then President James Knox Polk had declared in his inauguration speech that one of the aims of his administration should be the acquisition of California, but he had prudently refrained from committing himself to any particular means for effecting an object that would give our country an opening on the Pacific Ocean. The crushing defeat in the war which followed "by act of Mexico," as the United States pathetically averred, is still so fresh in the memory of those against whom it was waged that the older people reckon time by it, much as in Ireland "the night of the big wind" remains in the speech of the people.

It would be rash to assert that the Diaz administration has the active and hearty support of the whole Mexican electorate, for, explain it as we may, that country has a large number of citizens (and by no means confined to the dregs of the population) who habitually refrain from dabbling in political affairs. They are thankful for the public order and the respect for life and private property that have attended the long continuance of General Diaz in office; but they view with some misgiving his policy of generously inviting foreign capital by granting valuable concessions and disposing of the public lands on highly favorable terms. This "conservative" element of the population includes men whose fathers and grandfathers were great in the councils of Mexico at a time when the names of most of the present leaders were famously obscure. Outside of the avowed organs of the administration, the tone of the Mexican press is not, so to speak, excessively affectionate towards the "Colossus of the North," as the United States is frequently styled. The Alsop claim against Chile, American activity in Nicaraguan affairs, and our influence in Panama and Cuba have called forth more than one wrathful editorial against the greed of the Yankee for all that he can get. And there was much rubbing of hands, there was much self-congratulation, because the United States had not carried everything with a hurrah at the Pan American Congress last summer in Buenos Aires. But, alas! Madero, he with the presidential bee in his bonnet, has furnished an occasion for a fresh source of suspiciousness and dissatisfaction. He is known to be a wealthy man, yet the recent revolutionary spasm in Mexico called for a larger outlay than he could afford. Therefore, concludes one of our esteemed exchanges, since a good deal of money was within reach, even if not in sight, whence did that money come if not from some outside source hostile to Mexico's unqualified sovereignty?

If anybody was so rash as to advance ready money for the success of the anti-Diaz movement, he will have some time to wait before collecting his interest, for the so-called revolution is confined to the rugged mountains of Chihuahua, where cliffs are plentiful and people are scarce.

Unlooked For Returns

One may ask whether Mayor Nathan experienced any misgivings suggesting a most excellent effect which has resulted from his address of September 20 last. Probably he did not. It was sweet, indeed, to allow his hate to run riot in insulting phrase, but even his undisguised bitterness of hatred for the Prisoner of the Vatican would surely have been slow to gratify itself, were he to have known that his utterances would arouse a storm of indignant protest from every quarter. Mayor Nathan's outburst has served to emphasize the enduring and uncompromising opposition of the Pope to existent conditions in Rome in a manner that must have astounded him.

The eyes of the Catholic world are turned anew to the Eternal City, and the distressing position of him whom they revere as Christ's representative on earth is brought home to them with a freshness of vivid detail quite as keen as that accompanying the original crime which created that position. With the characteristic disposition that holds us all, many Catholics seemed to have almost forgotten the outrages of forty years ago. The splendid demonstration which in the early seventies marked the Catholic world's disapproval of the injustice then done to the Holy See, had seemed to have been replaced in the lapse of years by slumberous toleration on the part of many. All unconsciously, no doubt, Mayor Nathan has aroused the slumberers, and far and wide a challenging cry rings out across the world.

Surely Signor Nathan must have fancied that Catholics had lost sight of their old contention that their Spiritual Head must be absolutely free, that he must rule in secure possession of unhampered rights and that courteous respect befitting his exalted sphere. He knows better now. The answer which Catholics have given to the insults he dared to utter within the very shadow of the Vatican has made clear the fact that the Church's sons are still unquestionably united in the attitude so solemnly proclaimed after the spoliation of the Holy See, of September 20, 1870.

It is the old lesson of history. Just when the enemies of the Papacy feel strongest assurance that their long delayed triumph over the Holy See is within their grasp, He, who is with His Church always, intervenes and the looked for triumph is changed to shameful and disastrous defeat.

Fortune Tellers

The municipal authorities, like some private individuals, seem to suffer from an occasional spasm of virtue, from which, however, they make a rapid and complete recovery. Just at this writing, Gotham's fortune tellers are receiving a little well-merited attention. With so many of them and in a variety so great, it is a wonder that anything remains to be revealed, disclosed or communicated; for they read the stars, the palm, the cards, and, as if that were not enough, enter into a trance and evoke the departed. That is, if one is to believe their flaring advertisements, they perform all those feats; but if one consults the police records, one learns that they are raided and carried off to jail just as if they were ordinary rogues. But zeal for the welfare of the people soon grows cool; the spasm passes away; the fine (if any be imposed) is duly paid; and once more the newspaper, the window card, etc., combine to impress upon an expectant public that for the merest trifle in coin, one's whole career, from birth to death will be revealed at the drop of a hat. As our lives unfold day by day, there is no lack of more or less plausible reasons for discouragement, envy, and discontent; but the day bears its burdens and the future has yet to come. The fire of hope is not the first to die out in even the most wretched of mortals. God in His infinite mercy does not see fit to take us or any other ordinary being into His confidence and roll away the curtains of the future, for He knows our fickleness and frailty; yet these smooth-tongued impostors affect to do for all comers what God's sweet Providence does not and will not permit.

It is even said that these fortune tellers, taking advantage of woman's inborn curiosity and suspiciousness, play into the hands of the divorce court lawyer and divide the fees. The procedure is quite simple. A married woman presents herself for a "reading" and learns just what she has long suspected, namely, that she has a rival for her husband's affections. If the inquirer is light, the rival is dark; if the poor dupe is tall, spare, and thin-haired, the rival isn't; and thus, one by one, the seeds of distrust are scattered in a soil ready to receive and nourish them. The anxious seeker ventures another peep into the unknown and learns that her husband is false beyond hope of cure, that her one comfort will be a divorce, and that she ought to lay aside her shame and seek redress in the courts. New York law does not smile upon and encourage divorces, for there is too much old-time respectability still left in the State; but in some parts of the Union, the most trivial and nonsensical causes may be successfully alleged. Thus when a certain Rev. J. Monroe Markey applied for a divorce on the ground of "incompatibility of temper," those who saw the couple in the court room regretted that the gentle little woman had ever been obliged to live with her ungallant spouse.

If our inquirer proves "susceptible," the seer mentions the name of an able attorney who will get the divorce with all despatch. And the attorney recognizes substantially the cooperation of "drummer." The victim may even betake herself to one of the divorce colonies and there idle away the time until she can claim the protection of the local laws against the husband whom she loved and trusted until, in an evil hour, she foolishly sought truth where the stock in trade is falsehood and suffered a professional liar to destroy her peace of mind.

Other doings as little to the credit of the fortune-telling fraternity are charged up against them. Broken friendship, dissensions in the family, and acquaintances which end in great harm are some of them, but the list is much longer.

All this can have no application to practical Catholics, it is true, for to dabble in fortune telling is to invite the anger of God and to sin against His holy commandment; but it may move us to pity those whose notions of God's Providence are so vague that they fancy it can be known and controlled at the price of a piece of silver. How can people throw God aside and set up an army of gods?

Periodical or spasmodic raids have yet to correct the first abuse in the life of a city. Much more to the purpose was the action of the aldermen in a bustling western city where fortune-telling fishers commonly had a good catch. A municipal ordinance was framed and in accordance with its provisions, the mystic dealers in past, present and future events had first to obtain a license and secondly to file a satisfactory bond for the faithful performance of what they promised. In that little city, prophets, seers and revelators are scarce, but hard sense abounds. The physically afflicted are always helped; the mentally afflicted (such as are the prey of the fortune teller) should have more than spasmodic protection.

LITERATURE

Mary Aloysia Hardey; Religious of the Sacred Heart, 1809-1886; with an introduction by Rev. Thomas J. Campbell, S.J. New York: The America Press. Price $2.00; postage, 20 cents.

The subject of this biography was born in 1809. The first Sacred Heart Convent was founded in the United States in 1818, when she was nine years old. Three years later the second foundation was made, and in 1825, at sixteen years of age, she became a postulant. There were then but these two convents of the Institute in America, St. Charles, Missouri, and Grand Coteau, Louisiana. Six years later she became Superior of the third foundation, St. Michael's, being only twenty-three years of age, and thereafter during her long life she continually exercised in various positions executive authority in her Congregation. It is not therefore surprising that her life is to all intents and purposes a history of the Congregation of the Sacred Heart in America, nor is it too much to claim for her, as does the editor in his introduction, that she must be regarded as practically its American foundress. Father Campbell brackets her name with that of Elizabeth Seton in the honor roll of American Catholic womanhood, and the distinction may not fairly be denied her.

Mary Hardey came of Catholic stock that had given abundant proof of sturdiness in the Faith. In later life she spoke of her mother as a saint. While yet a very young child her strength of character made itself apparent in many ways, and her personality was commanding. Her biographer notes several instances where these characteristics impressed themselves very definitely upon those associated with her. Furthermore, she demonstrated a very remarkable aptitude for affairs, and consequently it is not strange that even amid a group of able associates she was singled out at once for positions of responsibility, and for the fifty-four years preceding her death she was never free from administrative cares.

The Institute of the Sacred Heart spread with remarkable rapidity and success in America under her persistent and well-directed efforts. It came to New York in 1841 (Houston Street); Canada in 1842; New York (Astoria) in 1844, and finally in 1846 Manhattanville was founded, followed by Eden Hall, Halifax, Buffalo, Detroit, Albany and Kenwood, to say nothing of foreign foundations, as in Cuba. In all these cases Mother Hardey had to bear the burden of the anxiety. It was in this work that she showed her extraordinary business aptitude and foresight, also a legal acumen which so impressed Charles O'Connor, the great New York lawyer, who represented the Congregation in money matters, that he once declined to examine some deeds which Mother Hardey had approved, on the ground that if she had passed them they must be all right! Also, when the Convent property at Manhattanville was menaced by the growth of the city around it, necessitating encroachments for streets and the like, Madame Hardey managed, in face of enormous difficulties, to avert on each occasion the threatened dangers, especially in 1882, when its very existence seemed to be in question.

Her spiritual life was worthy of her great qualities. Hers was an heroic soul, and the many intimate details given in her letters explain the great confidence reposed in her by the saintly Foundress of the Religious of the Sacred Heart, Mother Barat, and the Superiors General who succeeded her, to whom Mother Hardey was assistant. Her biographer has succeeded admirably in giving us a clear portrait of her, not the least charm of which is the absolute impersonality of the narrator. In this respect the biography resembles that of another great Religious of the Sacred Heart, Mother Henrietta Kerr. Of both it is only just to say that they make fascinating reading.

The book should interest everyone to whom great souls are of consequence.

T. F. W.

When Ecclesiastes complained: "Of the making of many books there is no end," he excluded such as, "by the counsel of masters are given from one shepherd." There is a just complaint to-day of the multiplication of books, but it does not touch those that expound our holy religion profitably and make the embracing and the practising of it easier for souls coming from without. The multiplication of books of this class is inevitable. The instructors of converts grow beyond their book in their experience, and therefore have something useful to add to what others have written on the subject. Besides converts differ so greatly one from another, that a method most successful with one will not suit another, the difficulty of the latter will not affect the former, and what appeals to this will leave that one unmoved.

Early Steps in the Fold, by F. M. de ZULUETA, S.J., New York, P. J. Kenedy & Sons, price $1 net, $1.15 postpaid, is, as its name implies, a handbook for converts already received, though it will be found useful for those under instruction. It explains solidly and pleasantly the things that make up a Catholic's daily life, giving almost 200 pages out of a little more than 400, to invaluable remarks, drawn from the author's ripe experience on sacraments, pious societies, etc. Its great object is to make the new Catholic feel at home in his Father's house, something more necessary than such as have never been elsewhere, realize. This book is particularly adapted to the needs of converts of some education.

Back to Holy Church. By Dr. ALBERT VON RUVILLE. New York, etc. Longmans, Green & Co. Price $1.20 net.

The books we have been noticing have been written with a view to English or American converts, especially such as come from Anglicanism. Here we have a book by a German university professor, who was a Lutheran tainted more or less with modern ideas, though he never seems to have lost utterly the Christian spirit. The process of his conversion began with Harnack, whose encomiums of our Lord Jesus Christ moved him greatly. These he soon perceived were quite irreconcilable with Harnack's denial of our Lord's Divinity, and so in Von Ruville's mind was formed gradually an adequate concept of the nature of revelation and faith to be found in no Protestant system. With this grew up the practice of daily prayer and the striving after a Christian life. Then came the concept of St. Peter's perpetual Apostolate in the Church. He read Professor Reinhold's book, "The Old and the New Faith," and sought an interview with its author, which did not prove encouraging. But Moehler's "Symbolism" did for him what the living theologian was not destined to do, and the process ended with his reception into the Church.

This is a most useful book for the man of modern culture seeking the truth. The remarks on the relations between science and revelation are excellent, and the devout enthusiasm of the writer carries the reader along, one might say, in spite of himself. The English translation, which is well done on the whole, is edited by the Rev. Robert Hugh Benson, who contributes an instructive preface. As the author is not a theologian, his expressions are not always the happiest, though his orthodox meaning is sufficiently clear. Thus on page 148, he says that as secular right originating in violence becomes legitimate by prescription, the Church had to submit to its violations of her rights, and on page 151, his remarks on liberty of research are objectionable for more reasons than one. It is a pity that Father Benson did not in footnotes bring out what is right in the author's ideas and point out the errors of expression into which his inexperience has betrayed him.

H. W.

A Winter's Comedy. By HALLIWELL SUTCLIFFE. New York: The John Lane Co. Net $1.50.

The story is healthy in tone, the author being staunchly conservative with all the good points and some of the defects of that quality. No one but an Englishman could have written it. The villain of the tale is a she. The hero and the heroine are of the bluest blood, while the Deus ex machina of the plot is a yeoman. All are types, and very respectable types at that. There is very little of the supernatural in the book, though there is not a line which could hurt religious susceptibilities.

The heroine has a short upper lip, the hero's is not a whit longer. The short upper lip, traditional in fiction as the sign of the "aristox," has been rather overdone. In these United States when one meets a "well-groomed" woman with no more upper lip than is compatible with beauty, one is apt to ask oneself whether the owner belongs to the "aristox" or to vaudeville.

There are a few points on which we find it impossible to agree with Mr. Sutcliffe. With him heredity is everything, environment nothing worth taking into account. Thus his heroine, though brought up in the prim surroundings of Kensington is, simply by reason of her "claims of long descent," at once at home in the highest society. Paradoxical as it may seem, she inherits breeding.

Also, it is difficult to believe that she dreamed in the days of Kensington all, or nearly all, the details of her love and courtship as they actually came to pass in later life.

We admire the author's attachment to the soil. Doubtless he would be shocked—not without reason—at our abandoned New England farms, and our country without ruins. "A Winter's Comedy," as the title would lead the reader to expect, has no note of the tragic; but it has so little to do with making a merry jest of the foibles of its characters as hardly to merit being called a comedy.

FRANCIS J. FINN, S.J.

The Territorial Governors of the Old Northwest. By DWIGHT G. McCARTY. Iowa City, Ia.: The State Historical Society of Iowa.

The citizens of what was the Northwest Territory owe a debt of gratitude to him who has delved into forgotten records and searched through scattered libraries for facts that he has gathered into an attractive volume. Ours is not an old country, yet so uncertain is the fate of many documents, especially those which are connected with the frontier, that to collect them and make them readily available is to confer a singular favor. The author must have been aided by a love for the work, for his references, which are two hundred and eighty-two in number, send us to histories, biographies, the Statutes at large, and the collections of Historical Societies. All these treasures may be beyond our reach but with his volume as a guide, we can follow the vicissitudes of governor and governed through the formative period to the maturity of statehood.

It is to the lasting glory of Massachusetts and Virginia that they united their forces in the second Continental Congress and thus secured the passage of the Ordinance of 1787, by which slavery was forever excluded from the region bounded by the Great Lakes, the Ohio and the Mississippi. For truth's sake, we are bound to admit that the Congress in thus legislating exceeded the powers with which it was vested, but as the Ordinance was duly ratified by the first Congress under the Constitution the defect was made good before the validity of the act had been called into question. Had the foresight of the great Thomas Jefferson been better appreciated by his contemporaries, the ominous words, Missouri Compromise, Omnibus Bill, Kansas-Nebraska Bill, and Dred Scott Decision, could have found no place in our history; for the illustrious Virginian had first drafted a bill for the government of the Southwest Territory, "ceded already or to be ceded to the United States" (Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi and Alabama), in which bill slavery in that whole district was forbidden after the year 1800. But when the measure was put to the vote, it failed of passage through the absence of one of its friends, a delegate from New Jersey. Thus, for the want of a single vote the status of four future States was changed and the history of the United States was begun in a different book. Slavery confined to the Atlantic seaboard from Delaware to Georgia, or even Florida, could not have developed into a power capable of shaking the principles and shaping the course of men like Henry Clay and Daniel Webster, Millard Fillmore and Franklin Pierce.

The Northwest Territory never knew slavery at first hand, although two of its future States, Indiana and Illinois, drew largely upon the slave States for their early settlers and were emphatically "Southern" in their sympathies. Ohio was Pennsylvania moved a little further west; but a convention at Vincennes held in 1802 and attended chiefly by delegates from what are now southern Indiana and Illinois, urgently petitioned Congress to remove, at least for a term of years, the provision against slavery in the famous Ordinance. William Henry Harrison, then Governor of the Territory, presided at the meeting. Congress refused the request.

The Ordinance of 1787 was the first and only attempt of the Continental Congress to legislate for territories, and one of the early acts of the Federal Congress was to adopt it after trifling modifications accommodating it to the recently ratified Federal Constitution. It is therefore worthy of remark that this Ordinance which has been, since its existence, the starting point in establishing territorial government, leaves little power in the hands of the people while it exalts the governor and arms him even with an absolute veto over the acts of the prospective legislature, and most of the officials are his appointees. The possession of a freehold was a necessary condition for holding office and for exercising the limited suffrage which was granted. Not until 1828 did the Supreme Court at Washington decide that the citizens of territories have no political rights; therefore the eagerness of the early settlers for a greater share in public affairs is easily understood.

The practice of bestowing Federal offices as a reward for activity at Presidential elections and of dismissing office-holders simply on political grounds did not prevail until the Northwest Territory had dwindled to the Territory of Wisconsin. Hence, it is not surprising that the governors, beginning with General St. Clair and continuing through the honorable list to Governor Dodge of Wisconsin, were men of exceptional ability and, almost always, successful in their various and trying duties. Indians, French settlers, frontiersmen, desperadoes, New Englanders and Southerners were some of the elements over which the Governor was placed as the representative of the Federal authority. Land grants and land grabbers were the bane of his existence while his remoteness from the seat of government and the indifference of Congress left him to solve his difficulties as best he might. The rapid and healthy development of the Northwest Territory in the course of sixty years from the home of the marauding Indians, the wandering trapper and the rare settler into five sovereign States is no less a proof of the energy of our people than it is of the patriotic ability of the men commissioned from Washington to watch over, protect and develop the interests of the people whom they governed. H. J. S.

Cuba. By IRENE A. WRIGHT. New York: The Macmillan Company. Price $2.50 net.

"I had thought that in fifteen years' association with Latins I had come to understand them; now I know that I shall never comprehend them, nor they me." Thus writes the author in the chapter on Foreigners in Cuba. We agree with her, for the task is always difficult, often impossible. The first ray of light appears on the horizon when we realize that perhaps we do not understand the Latins; the darkness enables us to perceive clearly that the Latins view us much as the five blind men viewed the elephant, namely, by bumping into it. Hence, with rare exceptions, of which "Cuba" is not one, the Saxon and the Latin fall short of the ideal in their appreciation of each other, because they lack that indescribable something which is called "sympathy." How could a man nurtured amid the bare, bleak cliffs of New Hampshire appreciate the delicacy of a Spanish employer who graciously gives him "indefinite leave of absence without pay" because the Yankee has found an opportunity for more remunerative work? No, the case is too hopeless. Misunderstandings beget misrepresentation, rancor, ill-will. We often feel well-disposed and even friendly towards those of whom we know little and see less; but the tang of intimate acquaintance may leave a tart taste. During her long residence in Cuba, Mrs. Wright has seen the dust on the lintel and the fly in the (tinned) ointment, and she has seen them, it appears, more than once; yet we think that if she had been more "simpática" she could have found, if not less to deprecate, at least more to commend. Mingling freely with the people, she has read them and studied them at short range and spreads before us a generous allowance of local color which is full of novelty for Americans; but we doubt whether her earnest effort to portray every-day life in the "Pearl of the Antilles" will be equally acceptable to the Cubans. All readers, however, with the marked exception of those who had some share in precipitating or perpetrating the Intervention, will relish extremely what she tells us about Cuban politics. Nearly a hundred illustrations are scattered through the five hundred pages of text.

* * *

Kings in Exile. By CHARLES G. D. ROBERTS. New York: The Macmillan Company. Price $1.50.

